PREFACE

IN 1909 there was published by the FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY "A Standard Bible Dictionary," under the same editorship as controls the present book. The purpose of that publication was that students of the Bible might have in readily usable form an adequate presentation of the facts regarding the contents of the Bible, based on thorough scholarship and also animated with loyalty to the essential truth of the Gospel.

The success of that venture was both immediate and continued. And as the time drew near when the edition was about exhausted, the question arose, not as to the need of a second edition—since that was obvious, but as to its character and contents.

It was, of course, evident that in the years which had passed since the first printing, the advance in the criticism and the knowledge of the Bible had been such as to demand a revision of the original articles which would bring them abreast of present scholarship. It was also believed that the addition of several general articles on selected subjects would add to the completeness of the Dictionary's service to those Bible students whose interests were its chief concern.

It was consequently decided that the entire work should be reset, thus giving to the revisers of the original articles as well as to the writers of new articles such freedom as would insure the best results.

With a practically new book thus assured, a group of scholars were invited to revise, or rewrite if that seemed preferable, those articles whose authors had died in the intervening period, or found it impossible to undertake the revision of their own work. The preparation of the new articles was in each case entrusted to scholars who, in the judgment of the Editors, were eminently fitted for the service they were asked to render. Naturally, wherever it was possible, the revision of articles that were to be retained was entrusted to the original authors, altho cases were not infrequent where there was collaboration.

The general result of these readjustments has been that the staff of contributors to the Second Edition is materially larger than was that of its predecessor.

The problem confronting the Editors in this New Edition of the Dictionary is the same as that with which they were faced when they undertook the preparation of the Original Work. To solve it there must be an understanding of the material with which the Dictionary has to deal, an appreciation of the constituency to which it is to minister, and an intelligent comprehension of the critical position to which its purpose commits it.

The material with which an English Bible Dictionary has to deal is, necessarily, the contents of the English Bible. The English Bible, however, is simply a version, and behind its English terminology are the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek originals. As a consequence, the Dictionary, while it reproduces the words and phrases of the English Bible in its titles, must treat them primarily with reference to the Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek terms which underlie them. In brief, its task must include the explication of a terminology drawn in the first place from the English Bible, but not from the point of view of English philology or etymology, but from the point of view of the underlying terminology of the originals.

The constituency had in view in such a Dictionary is much wider than the class of scholars who are continually engaged in Bible study, are familiar with Hebrew and Greek, and have a first-hand acquaintance with the field of modern Biblical research. It is made up of the educated ministry, who, while possessed of Biblical scholarship, have not always the leisure to enter into a discursive presentation of critical research; besides this, it includes the Sunday-school teachers and workers, who in most cases have not had the benefit of a scholarly education in Bible study and yet desire and appreciate all that Biblical scholarship can give them of its results; and, finally, it includes the intelligent laymen interested in Bible study, but not acquainted with Hebrew, or in many cases with Greek. For this widely extended circle of interested Bible students the Dictionary, to be of service, must avoid being too scholastic in its general character. It must be accurate in its presentation of facts, but not so technical as not to be easily understood; it should be up to date in its information, but not so discursive as to burden its pages with the pendency of undigested facts. What it gives should be given in such a form as not to repel the busy man and woman of to-day, but to help them in their understanding of the Bible, which they wish to read intelligently and to study with a view to the best results for themselves and others.

The critical position to which such a Dictionary is necessarily committed must be one of acceptance of the proved facts of modern scholarship, of open-mindedness toward its still-debated problems, and of conservation of the fundamental truths of the Christianity proclaimed and established in the message and mission of Jesus Christ. The constituency to which the Dictionary appeals is not to be helped by an apologetic method that ignores what a reverent critical scholarship has brought to light regarding the Book of the Christian religion; nor is it to be served by a radical spirit so enamored of novelty and opposed to tradition that it would seek to establish a new religion on the ruins of the historical facts of Christianity. It can be ministered to only by a clear, charitable, uncontroversial presentation of the results which a century and a half of earnest, conscientious, painstaking, self-denying study of the Bible has secured, to the end that all students and readers of the Book may be led into its more intelligent understanding and its more spiritual use.

The problem remaining the same, the Editors found themselves guided in the preparation of the present work essentially by the same principles as before.

(1) The text of the American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible has been made the standard English text of the Biblical citations and references. At the same time, it is evident that, the Dictionary being intended for English readers in general, this text could not be adhered to exclusive of any reference to that of the English Revision which occupies in British countries relatively the same position as that held by the American Revision in this country; much less could there be an ignoring of the Authorized Version of 1611, which in all English-speaking countries still maintains, and is certain to continue to maintain for some time to come, a position of great respect and considerable use. In fact, in so far as the Dictionary concerns the English Bible as a version of its original languages, it must, while adopting a standard English text, have constant reference to such varieties of interpretation as the English versions actually in use present.

(2) The Concordance to the English Bible has been made the basis of the list of titles. At this point the Editors were confronted with a serious difficulty; for there is as yet no adequate concordance to the American Revised text. The nearest approach to any such work is the elaborate Concordance of James Strong, S.T.D., LL.D., which indicates the passages in the Authorized Version where changes were made in the Revision of 1881, and which shows these changes in a comparative table, but contains no concordance of them. The recent concordance to the American Revised Version, by Dr. M. C. Hazard (Nelson, 1922), is not arranged according to the Hebrew and Greek originals and therefore, while actually serviceable to a degree, was of less value than was hoped for in the work of checking up the references in the Dictionary. While every effort has been made to make the list of terms complete and to verify all references, it is more than likely that some terms in the American Revision have been inadvertently omitted. Apart from this, however, it is obvious that this basal relation of the concordance to the list of titles does not mean that all the words in the concordance have been given a place in the list of titles. The purpose of the Dictionary is not to record the contents of the Bible, but to give such information regarding them as may be of service to Bible readers and students. Furthermore, it is clear that not all the contents of the Bible which call for such treatment belong legitimately to a Bible Dictionary; for, again, the purpose of such a Dictionary is not to do the work of an English lexicon or grammar. There are not a few obsolete English words and phrases—especially in the Authorized Version—which are subjects of interesting study in our own language, but are without significance as regards the original text of the Bible. These can safely be omitted, and both the space and the dignity of the Dictionary be conserved. Still further, there are words and phrases which so obviously have little or no significance in the study of the Bible, that there would be no real service rendered the student or the reader in considering them. The Dictionary is not intended to do the work of the general English commentary any more than of the general English lexicon. With these exceptions, however, the effort has been to include in the list of titles every term in the American Revision.

(a) This being the working list, it will be found as a matter of fact that its larger part consists of names of persons and places. These resolve themselves into two classes, the more important and the less important. As to the latter class, it has been impossible in many cases to do more than record the Bible statements, there being nothing known beyond them. But even in doing this the endeavor has been to place these statements in the critical connections to which they belong, the purpose of the Dictionary being not simply to gather Bible references, but to present results of scholarship wherever they have been secured. As to the former class, the endeavor has been to treat them not only in regard to the facts of the Bible record, but also and more especially in regard to the relation which they sustain to the progress of the history and the development of the religion contained in and connected with the Bible. This, the Editors believe, will be conspicuously evident in the most important articles in this class—such as those on Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Palestine on the one hand, and those on Moses, David, Elijah, Jeremiah, John the Baptist, James, Peter, John, and Paul on the other. It will be found at its best in what has been written of the One Supreme Personality in all religion.

(b) Closely connected with these person and place articles and necessitated by the historical method employed in their treatment will be found a class of articles presenting in larger compass the general subjects of the History of Israel, The Religion of Israel, Israel's Social Development, Semitic Religion, Greek and Roman Religions, Ethnography and Ethnology, and the results of Excavation and Exploration, with a specific discussion of the politico-religious parties of the New Testament times, and the Religious Thought and Life and Institutions of the Jewish People.

(c) Conversely, in the direction of the details of the people's civic and domestic life, the reader of the Dictionary will find articles on such subjects as Crimes and Punishments, Law and Legal Practise, Family and Family Law, Marriage and Divorce, Money, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Artizan Life, Disease and Medicine, Dress and Ornaments, Burial and Mourning Customs.

(d) It is impossible, however, in any study of the Bible to dissociate the history and life of the people from the literature in which the history has been recorded and the life has found expression. Necessarily, therefore, the plan of the Dictionary has included a discussion of the origin, composition, and characteristics of the Bible writings, together with those of the Apocrypha and of the more important writings in the apocalyptic literature. In the treatment of these writings the Editors have been influenced by a consideration of the readers for whom the Dictionary is intended, and have sought, consequently, not so much to enter into the details of the critical problems involved as rather, along with a plain statement of the critical facts which scholarly investigation has brought to light, to unfold the significance of the writings in their connection with the history which they record and the teachings which they present. This will account for the space devoted to the analysis of the contents of the respective books and for the treatment in many of them of their theological position. With a treatment of the Biblical books naturally is connected a treatment of the languages in which they were written, of the text in which they have been preserved, and of their collection into the canons of the Old and New Testaments.

(e) From such a treatment of the Biblical literature it follows that there must be some specific presentation of the religious teachings of the Bible as a whole. The plan of the Dictionary confessedly did not permit it to enter the field of systematic theology; but equally, it did not admit of its ignoring the Biblical basis on which this science is founded—the point in fact at which the Bible is perhaps most profoundly searched and studied. The Editors, consequently determined upon including articles which presented the teachings of the Scriptures on such fundamental doctrines as Faith, Repentance, Atonement, Sin, Forgiveness, Grace, such presupposed doctrinal facts as God, such doctrinal inferences as Predestination, and such general fields of doctrinal thought as Eschatology. The specific religious teaching characteristic of the individual books and of the leading personalities of the Bible has also been given as thorough a treatment as the space of the Dictionary permitted.

In all these varied directions it has been the endeavor of the Editors to maintain, the purpose of the Dictionary to present to the readers and students of the Bible the results of a reverent scholarship, committed to the accepted facts of criticism, open-minded to its unsettled problems, and thoroughly loyal to the basal truths of an evangelical Christianity.

While this Second Edition has thus preserved, in the problem presented to it and in the principles followed in the solution of the same, the position taken in the original work, nevertheless it will be found by those who use it to be a book different in many important respects from its predecessor.

(1) Naturally, mention should be made first of the revision of the original articles referred to above. Since the publication of the First Edition progress in the reverent study of the Bible has continued steadily and searchingly, with the consequent modifying or confirming of the earlier views as new facts have been brought to light. It is this progress of scholarship that has been the first concern in the revising of the articles of the First Edition in order that the readers of this Edition may be served to-day, as they were by the former book, with the facts of the Bible as now understood. This revision has in some cases meant the complete rewriting of articles, particularly where the revision was entrusted to some one other than the original contributor. Different views often obtain with different writers, and the fullest freedom consistent with adequate scholarship has been granted to the revisers as was granted to the original writers. However, where new writers have been asked to revise the work of others, they have been selected because of their sympathy with the general position of the original authors.

It has also been the constant aim, in the present work, to restrict the contents of the revised articles more narrowly to their connection with the Bible. For example, since the World War the Near East has undergone a great transformation, but with all this the Bible has nothing to do; and historical or geographical articles in a Bible Dictionary cannot be expected to deal with modern history or geography. This restriction has resulted in the elimination of some material which was, relatively at least, extraneous to the treatment of the subjects as primarily Biblical.

Furthermore, it has been thought wise to omit many references to theories or views so old, or discussions so long outworn, as to be of no service or interest to students of to-day. From the bibliographies attached to articles many old titles have been omitted to give place for attention to be called to the more recent literature. It is certain that this emphasis upon present-day thinking will add freshness to the Dictionary and materially increase its value to those who go to it in their Bible study.

This revision has been in every way a thorough one. It has covered every title, even the smallest, and in such a way as to make the book practically a new work. It has, of course, been possible to use without change considerable material in the First Edition, especially the registering of the occurrence and Biblical usage of proper names and technical terms. It was found also that there was little call for change in the treatment of many titles, which, though the subject of more or less discussion during these last fifteen years, were dealt with so thoroughly in the original work as to need only slight alteration in order to bring them up to date.

(2) Mention has been made already of the fact that the present book contains a number of new articles on important subjects which, it is believed, greatly enhances its value as a Bible Dictionary. Of these new articles special attention may be called to the two that are placed at the threshold of the Dictionary on The Approach to the Bible, by the two distinguished scholars whose initials are attached. It is felt that a careful reading of these two articles will serve to clear away much of the unfortunate misunderstanding of the Bible that is so wide-spread and interferes so greatly with the true appreciation of its nature and how to study it. The article on Excavation and Exploration gives the reader a clear and concise view of what archeological research is and what it has accomplished toward a better understanding of the Bible. The articles on the History of Israel, the Religion of Israel, and the Social Development of Israel form together an almost complete account of the life of God's ancient people. The new articles on the Gospels and on the Synoptic Problem serve very materially to complete the Dictionary's presentation of New Testament subjects and problems.

The enlargement of the Dictionary's scope through these and other added articles is obvious; we believe the competency of the scholarship which has produced them will be as evident.

It will be perhaps not too much to say that the Editors have discovered in their experience with the re-editing of such a publication as a Dictionary of the Bible that the second task was even more difficult than the first.

In their original effort the very newness of the undertaking gave them an enthusiasm that was born of the adventure upon which they were entering. But, in spite of such success as may have attended their work, the criticisms it invited, the mistakes it involved, the consciousness it brought to them of unattained ideals, made them realize that when again they set their hands to the task, they must make good where they had fallen short and, at least, give evidence of what experience and maturing conviction had enabled them to accomplish in the direction of a better book.

They are under no illusion as to the perfection even of this second effort; but they believe that if unremitting labor and unceasing care can add anything to experience and thought, they have made appreciable progress toward their ideal.

It is difficult to measure the help to the editorial work which has come from the sympathetic interest of the contributors to the undertaking. The Editors desire that their appreciation of the assistance which has thus been rendered them shall not be underestimated. They would also acknowledge the courtesy of the PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND and the EGYPTIAN EXPLORATION FUND and of the HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS in permitting the use of cuts which have appeared in their publications.

The Editors renew their obligations to the friends named in the Preface to the First Edition, two of whom, Professors STERRET and ANANIKIAN, have passed to their reward. The assistance of Dr. THAYER and his associates of the CASE MEMORIAL LIBRARY has been as kindly and unsparing in forwarding the work on this Edition as it was with its predecessor. Of others whose aid in one way or another has been greatly appreciated, mention should be made of Rev. JOHN RAMAKER, for assisting in working out certain details in the initial stages of the work, of Mrs. WILLARD JOHNSON for her careful attention to records and statistics, of Prof. ELBERT C. LANE, of the Hartford Theological Seminary, for his invaluable aid in the matter of the pointing, accentuation and transliteration of the Hebrew and Greek terms, of Miss HELEN NOURSE for her transcription of certain maps and plans and of Mr. JOSEPH SARON, of the New York office, for his painstaking work in proof-correction. The kindly interest and sympathetic cooperation in the whole undertaking on the part of Dr. FRANK H. VIZETELLY, Managing Editor of the "New Standard Dictionary of the English Language," is most gratefully acknowledged by the Editors.

HELPFUL HINTS FOR THE GUIDANCE OF THE READER

Sections: The larger articles will be found to be divided into sections numbered consecutively, no matter how large the article may be or how it may be divided otherwise. This is done to facilitate easy cross-reference. Wherever any reference is made to these longer articles, the number of the section is given, so that it may be turned to and found instantly. When the section to which reference is made is a long one and the term referred to it is treated only there, this term is printed in heavy-faced type. In this way it is believed the value of the Dictionary as a ready-reference book will be greatly enhanced. For example, the term KEY is not discussed by itself, but is referred to HOUSE, § 6 (1), where it is found printed in heavy-faced type and its Biblical usage is explained.

Proper Names: In the case of proper names, the meanings have been given wherever they are known or can be ascertained with a fair degree of probability. In a great many cases this is not possible, and consequently no meanings have been assigned.

Transliteration: In the transliteration of the Hebrew the aim has been to enable the English reader, who may be unfamiliar with Hebrew, to understand, as easily as possible, how the Hebrew words should be pronounced, and also to avoid the unnecessary printing of large numbers of Hebrew words. The system used is slightly different from that in general use, a few modifications having been made for the sake of greater simplicity. In particular, the older transliteration (as in the Englishman's Concordance) of ץ by ts has been retained, although the almost universal usage today is to represent ץ by z.

In regard to the vowels, no distinction has been made between the natural-long and tone-long, both alike being marked as long by a — over the vowel letter. The hatephas are indicated by an inverted caret, thus, אֶ, עֶ, וֹ. Vowels with no mark are short. The indistinct shewas are indicated by small superior letters, nearly always ◌̣ or **◌̤.

The following table indicates how the vowels are to be pronounced;

◌̣ אֶ long, as in father,		◌̣ a short, as in fat, ◌̣ אֵ very short
◌̣ or ◌̣ עֶ " " " prey,		◌̣ e " " " met, ◌̣ עֵ " "
◌̣ or ◌̣ יִ " " " ravine,		◌̣ i " " " pin,
◌̣ or ◌̣ וֹ " " " tone,	◌̣ or ◌̣ וֹ " " " not, ◌̣ וֹ " "
◌̣ or ◌̣ וִ " " " lute,	◌̣ u " " " put,
◌̣ אֵ , עֵ , וֵ , merely a breathing—not a full vowel sound.

In pronouncing a transliterated Hebrew word the following general rules will be of service;

There are as many syllables as there are vowels, and every syllable must begin with a consonant (חֵ and יֵ are consonants).

As a rule, a consonant with the vowel following forms a syllable.

When two consonants, or a double one, occur between two vowels, the first consonant unites with the preceding vowel to form or complete a syllable, while the second consonant takes the vowel following it. A final consonant belongs with the syllable of the vowel preceding it.

Hebrew words are, as a rule, accented on the last syllable, but if both vowels of the last two syllables are short the accent will generally be placed on the syllable next before the last.

The transliteration of the Hebrew consonants is exhibited in the following table. The letters כּ, ך, ק, גּ, ג, נּ have each two sounds, a hard and a soft. When pointed with a dagesh, e.g., כּ, these letters have a hard sound; when without a dagesh, a soft sound. With the exception of כּ, these two sounds are easily represented in English by b and bh (= v), d and dh, k and kh, p and ph, t and th. Altho gh does not well represent the sound of undaghesed כּ, it has seemed best to make the same distinction in regard to this letter.

Hebrew words are transliterated according to the following table:

HEBREW
 כ = k  כ = b, כ = bh (i.e., v)  ג = g, ג = gh  ד = d, ד = dh (i.e., th as in the)  ה = h  ו = w  ז = z  ח = h (i.e., a guttural h)  ט = t (palatal t)  י = y  כ = k, כ, ך = kh (like a Scotch ch) 	 ל = l  מ, ם = m  נ, ן = n  ס = s (emphatic s)  ע = ' (a guttural, gasping sound)  פ, פ, ף = p  צ, ץ = ts  ק = q  ר = r  ש = s  ש = sh  ת = t, ת = th

THE APPROACH TO THE BIBLE

1. THE APPROACH TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.

I. THE LITERARY APPROACH.

IN He 11 the OT is regarded by implication as a 'word of God.' In it 'God has spoken.' He spoke, however, 'by divers portions and in divers manners,' because He spoke through men, who necessarily varied in their circumstances, character, and capacities. The O T is therefore a word of man, or of men, as surely as it is a word of God, and it is best to begin by approaching it thus. This is the literary, as distinguished from the religious, approach. For whatever else the Spirit of God did or did not do, it assuredly did not suppress the individuality of the men whom it used.

Many kinds of literature and many points of view are represented in the O T. The historical and legal portions (cf. Lv) are in prose; Ps, Pr, Job, Song, Lam, and most of the Prophets, are in poetry. This obvious but important distinction often affects interpretation. For example, the miracle which men used to see in Jos 10 12 f. disappears the moment we remember that the incident is related in a book of poetry (10 13) and must therefore be treated according to the canons of poetry and not of bald annalistic prose. The prose portions (Gn-Est) are historical in form, but their contents stretch far back into periods for which there is nothing like contemporary evidence. Hence we have to remember that for the period, say, between Abraham and Moses, we are dealing with tradition, which nevertheless may doubtless have a real historical kernel, while the period before Abraham (Gn 1-11) is practically prehistoric, and what we have in those earlier chapters of Gn is not a record of historical fact, but rather the Hebrew answer to the problems raised by the universe and by human life—whence came the world, man, woman, sin, sorrow, pain, death, etc.? Thus in O T prose there is myth, legend, tradition, as well as annals, tales, biography and history. An even greater variety characterizes the poetry. There are war-ballads (Ex 15, Jg 5), dirges for the dead (II S 1 19-27), love poetry (Song), gnomic poetry (Pr), dramatic (Job), lyric (many of the Ps), ecstatic (Is 21), hortatory (everywhere in the prophets): the Psalms alone exhibit a wide variety of style and theme—processional songs (24), hymns for pilgrims (120-134), songs whose theme is nature (8, 104), history (78, 105 f.), worship (84), the riddle of life (49, 73), etc.

The outlook and personalities of the writers are refreshingly diverse. The grim Amos with his passion for justice—how unlike his younger contemporary Hosea with his appeal for love (6 6)! Or could any contrast be greater than that between the glowing exuberance, alike in message and style, of Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40-55) and the meager jejune prose of Haggai; or between Jeremiah who cared less than nothing for ritual and Ezekiel to whom it was almost the all in all? The O T becomes a book of fascinating interest when we begin to appreciate the differences, sometimes important, sometimes unimportant, between its various writers. Job, for example, is in essence a protest against the prevailing doctrine of O T (cf. Dt, Ezk, Pr, Chr) that men receive in this world exactly what they deserve. Isaiah announces that Jerusalem will be divinely protected (37 35), Micah that it will be destroyed (3 12). The attitude to foreigners is sometimes friendly to the point of generosity, as in Ruth and Jonah; sometimes it is aggressively and fanatically hostile, as in Esther. Ecclesiastes denies the contemporary Hebrew faith in four fundamental points: (a) that the world is good (Gn 1 31); (b) the law of retribution (Ezk 18 4); (c) immortality (Ps 73 24; Dn 12 2); (d) the Messianic hope—the thing that hath been is that which shall be (Ec 1 9), and the world, which is bad now, will never be any better.

The most pervasive and fundamental contrast, however, is that between the prophet and the priest. Amos at the beginning and Malachi at the end of the prophetic succession are diametrically opposed—Amos maintaining that J<sup>1</sup> demands not sacrifice and offerings but righteousness only (5 24 f.), and Malachi declaring that the people have robbed God and brought His vengeance upon themselves by withholding the tithes and presenting blemished and inadequate offerings (1 14 3 8-12). Jeremiah is the champion of a religion of the spirit, asserting that J<sup>r</sup> had given no command concerning sacrifice (7 22) and that in the glorious future the law that would regulate human life would be the law written on the heart (31 33); Ezekiel, on the other hand, his younger contemporary, sees that future regulated by an elaborate ceremonial system (chs. 40-48), and believes that such a system alone can guarantee the presence of J<sup>r</sup> (48 35). The development of religious history and thought in the O T is, at least in part, a struggle between these two conceptions, and it is most instructive to watch the great protagonists of those ideas in their conflict with one another—a conflict most vividly epitomized in the clash between Amos and Amaziah in Am ch. 7.

By the literary approach we are brought face to face with the vivid personalities of the writers—their experiences, problems, temperaments, idiosyncrasies. The O T is not a quarry out of which texts may be dug in proof or support of doctrines; it is the literary reflection of experience, and we have not begun to enter into its real meaning or power until, by sympathetic imagination, we have passed through and beyond the words into the souls of its writers whose experiences those words record. This is conspicuously true of the Psalms, which can only be adequately interpreted through an imaginative sympathy which reconstructs, so far as is possible, the original situation within and without the soul of the Psalmists; but it is scarcely less true of the historical and prophetic books. Behind these books, too, are men with a living faith which interprets for them God's ways in history, and His demands upon men and nations. A literary study of this kind is, or should be, a real communion of souls.

II. THE HISTORICAL APPROACH.

It is of profound significance that nearly all the prophetic books begin with a chronological statement relative to the period during which the prophecies were delivered (cf. Am, Hos, Is, Mic, Jer, Ezk, Hag, Zec). This implies that only within these periods are their messages fully intelligible, and this simple fact imposes upon the student of prophecy the obligation to acquaint himself as fully as possible with the social and political facts of the times in which the prophets lived. Certain isolated passages may lend themselves to edification without a knowledge of those times, but without some such knowledge the bulk of prophecy is as good as unintelligible. When one prophet begins his message with 'Comfort ye my people' (Is 40 1), or another with 'O Jehovah, how long shall I cry and Thou wilt not hear?' (Hab 1 2), we must, in order to understand it, be able to visualize the public sorrow which called for comfort, or the oppression which seemed to imply that J<sup>r</sup> was indifferent. The prophecies were addressed primarily to Israel or Judah, not to us; to the 8th, 7th, 6th, or 5th century B. C., not to the 20th century A. D. Often the necessary knowledge is but very scantily supplied by the historical books of the O T itself (Kings, Ezr, Neh), and we have to draw heavily upon the records of Assyria, Babylon, and other extraneous sources; but from the prophets themselves we derive our fullest information about the social and religious conditions of the people they addressed (cf. Am 6 4-6; Hos 4 11-14; Jer 2 27 f., etc.). When this is understood, it will be seen how idle and inept is the attempt to interpret individual isolated passages, and more particularly the so called Messianic prophecies, as predictions of events in the life of Jesus or of other events hundreds of years later still. A promise like that of Dt 18 15 or of the child to be born in Is 7 14 finds its true and primary meaning in relation to the generation in which it was uttered. This is the historical approach, and it delivers us from much fantastic and inconclusive interpretation. From such interpretation the book of Daniel has long suffered. But when we learn that it was issued in the second century in the midst of the great Maccabæan struggle, not to enlighten later generations about the end of the world, but to comfort and sustain faithful Hebrews in their desperate struggle with heathendom, and to assure them of the ultimate triumph of the Kingdom of God, we begin to understand something of its amazing insight, faith, and power.

But every book of the O T, and not the prophets alone, can best be understood in the light of the contemporary situation. Why does Chronicles, for example, when traversing the same ground as Kings, so persistently emphasize ritual, as is very evident from a comparison of their respective accounts of the reigns of Hezekiah (II K 18, II Ch 29-31) or Josiah (II K 23 21-23, II Ch 35 1-19)? Simply because the ritual interest was predominant, as it is in Ezra, in the century, whether 4th or 3rd, B.C., when the book was composed. Whatever be its historical value for the times it describes, it is of great and unquestionable value as a reflection of the type of piety prevalent in the postexilic community. So the book of Job, with its passionate protest against the traditional theodicy, and Ecclesiastes, with its melancholy verdict upon the futility of life, are best appreciated when seen in relation to the popular doctrines which they challenge, and against the background of a world filled with the misery of upheavals (Job 12 17-21) and oppressions (Ec 3 16, 4 1). Perhaps poetry—the Psalter, e.g.—has least to gain from a discovery of the historical background, tho, could we recover that completely, many things would be luminous that now are dark.

The principle that literature is always a witness to the period which gives it birth is also true of the early historical books—of the sections, for example, in Gn dealing with patriarchal times. In ch. 22 Abraham prepares to sacrifice his son in obedience to a call which he believes to be divine; in ch. 28 Jacob erects as a sacred pillar at Bethel the stone on which he had slept and had his heavenly vision. These traditions go back to so hoary an antiquity that we can never know how much historical truth they may ultimately contain. But to remember that the passages were written in the 9th or 8th century B.C., when Bethel was a very popular and celebrated sanctuary (Am 5 5, 7 13) and the practise of child sacrifice, altho not prevalent, was occasional (II K 16 3), is to hold in our hands the key that unlocks their contemporary significance. Gn ch. 28 gratifies the Bethel worshippers and glorifies the sanctuary by tracing it back to their great and ancient father Jacob, while ch. 22 is a sermon, in narrative form, against child sacrifice, a prophetic protest of the same sort as, and only perhaps a few years earlier than, the protest in Mic 6 7. Prophet and historian alike were working for the same end, the purification of contemporary religion.

The full appreciation of the sequence of O T history and the development of Hebrew thought is only possible on the basis of such a rearrangement of O T material as has been won by the patient toil of generations of critical scholars. To begin with Gn ch. 1 or to regard the book of Lv as a witness to the mind of Moses would be to vitiate our conception of the sequence and development, as these belong to the latest and postexilic stratum of the historical books. In view of the composite nature of these books it is not easy to say where a beginning might be most wisely made—possibly with the book of Judges, where social and religious life is, so to speak, in the raw. In any case the student should make use of some of the many helps to the appreciation of the literary sources and the chronological understanding of the O T. Of these the most elaborate is Prof. C. F. Kent's Student's Old Testament, Logically and Chronologically Arranged and Translated, and one of the simplest Prof. I. G. Matthews' Old Testament Life and Literature, where the synchronisms of the History and the Literature are tabulated in parallel columns.

III. THE CRITICAL APPROACH.

CRITICISM is inevitable. The problems with which it deals are created by the facts, such facts, e. g., as discrepancies and contradictions. Without some explanation or solution of these the intellect remains unsatisfied, and it is no mark of reverence to ignore or deny them. Let us single out some of the more salient and significant. According to Ex 3 13-16 and 6 3 the name of J" was unknown before the time of Moses. It is he who first proclaims it. But according to Gn 4 26 it is already known to the earliest generations of the world. The perplexity occasioned by this contradiction diminishes when we discover that in accounts, which look like duplicates, of the same event, for example, Abraham's denial of Sarah, the name of the deity is in the one J" (Gn 12 10-20), in the other Elohim, i. e., God (Gn ch. 20). In other words there appear to be two literary sources, distinguished by different views of the origin of the name J"; and this conclusion, verified in numberless other ways, has thrown a flood of light upon the composition of the Pentateuch and upon early historical writing among the Hebrews. Or take again the quite incidental word of Gn 20 7 that Abraham is 'a prophet,' and compare it with the statement in I S 9 9 that the man who in Samuel's day began to be called prophet had formerly been known as seer. The inevitable inference from the latter passage is that the prophet in the former is an anachronism, and that Gn ch. 20 can not have been written before the time of Samuel, is indeed in all probability considerably later, and belongs to the time when the prophet had become an important figure—a valuable clue being thus furnished to the date of the document in which it stands.

Consider, again, the divergence in the two conceptions of the monarchy implicit in the story of its origin. One of the sources regards it as a blessing and a gift of J<sup>n</sup>; the first king is anointed by divine commission 'to be prince over My people Israel, and he shall save My people out of the hands of the Philistines' (IS 9 16); the other regards the popular request for a king as a rejection of J<sup>n</sup>, and the monarchy as destined to prove a vexation, if not a curse (IS 8 7, 11 ff.). Is it unreasonable to regard this second source as the later reflection of an unhappy experience of monarchy, a criticism of the kind we have in Hos 8 4, 13 11? But by far the most flagrant divergence of all is that between Samuel and Kings on the one hand and Chronicles on the other. From the latter everything is omitted that would tell against the great David, while chapter after chapter is devoted to a description of the elaborate preparations he is said to have made for the building of the Temple and the organization of its officers (I Ch chs. 22–29); and minor discrepancies between the books abound. The divergencies become very intelligible when we remember the late date of the Chronicler and the ritual and theological motives by which his presentation of the history is governed.

The most momentous contradiction in the O T occurs in connection with the origin of the Hebrew sacrificial system. Amos (5 25), still more explicitly Jeremiah (7 22) and by implication Micah (6 6–8), maintain that J<sup>n</sup> had given no commandment concerning sacrifice. His demand was for a moral service. But how is it possible to reconcile this with the book of Leviticus which, almost from end to end, is an elaborate regulation of the sacrificial and other ritual, prescribed and issued by Moses at the command and with the authority of J<sup>n</sup> Himself? Criticism resolves this contradiction by putting the law, as expressed in Lv and the cognate sections of the Pentateuch, later than the prophets. The true chronological order is not the law and the prophets, but the prophets and the law; and this is one of the most vital and illuminating discoveries of criticism.

The prophetic books present problems of another kind. The historical implications of one section may be so utterly inconsistent with those of another within the same book that the only possible conclusion is that they come from different periods. Why is it now universally believed that Is chs. 40–55 was written, not by Isaiah, but by an anonymous exilic prophet a century and a half after Isaiah was in his grave? Simply because the background is indisputably Babylonian,—it is Babylon's gods that are mocked (46 1) and her empire that is doomed (ch. 47). But most decisive of all is the definite mention of Cyrus as the agent of J<sup>n</sup>'s purpose (44 28, 45 1); he is not predicted, he is already on the field of history, sweeping victoriously across it (41 2 f.). This simple fact obliges us to find for the prophecy a date within the period 549 B. C. when the Median empire fell before him and 538 B. C., when he captured Babylon.

The aim of all true criticism is constructive, and its broad result is to make it abundantly clear that revelation was progressive. In detail it has shown that, apart from Dt., three documents are represented in the Pentateuch—two preexilic and prophetic (known as J and E) and one postexilic and priestly (P); that Dt was published in 621 B. C. in the reign of Josiah (II K 22 f.) and written perhaps only a few decades before; that the material of Judges—Kings was redacted so as to drive home Dt's lesson of the ruinous folly of idolatry; that in the literature (cf. P, Chron.) as in the life (cf. Ezra) of the post-exilic age, priestly interests predominated. This predominance has left its mark deep on O T literature and, perhaps to an undue extent, has determined some types of Christian thought.

IV. THE RELIGIOUS APPROACH.

THE O T is, first and last, religious literature. It is the religion that has preserved the literature; and to fail to take account of the religion that created and lives in it, or to forget that a religious literature demands a religious approach, is to commit even a scientific blunder of the first magnitude. The O T is a real unity: the variety dealt with in The Literary Approach is held together by the idea of God. 'In the beginning God,' and all the way through to the end. Every book of it is a testimony to its writer's grasp of God and faith in Him. The historians reveal Him as the Controller of history, through even the mysterious places of which His purpose runs: prophets plead with their fellows to return to Him in whose name they speak and to whose service they are called, interpreting His will for them as a demand for a deeper purity, justice and compassion in their relations with one another. The psalmists pour out their passionate hearts before Him. Always He is there, a Presence as real and almost as palpable as that of the men who speak for Him or to Him. Their peculiar intimacy with God is seen in its intensest form in the three prophets who have described the strange experience in which their call to service came (Is 6, Jer 1, Ezk 1), but to all the writers—we may well believe—God, altho apprehended less vividly, was the great Reality.

It is always a religious purpose that inspires their writing. They never write for effect, or merely to convey information: they write to justify the ways or expound the will of God to men, to express their own faith and to inspire others with a faith like their own. This purpose, which is implicit throughout all the historical narrative, is sometimes powerfully and elaborately suggested, if not directly expressed—notably in Jg 2 11-23, before the historian launches on the story of the early struggles in Palestine, and in II K 17 7-23, when he has just brought to its melancholy conclusion the story of the fall of the northern kingdom. Altho couched in the form of narrative, these passages have all the ring of a sermon. They look like a quiet exposition of the ways of God with Israel; they are in reality a passionate exhortation to the readers to remember the God whose inexorable laws control history and to avoid the sins of the fathers. Less immediately obvious but equally certain is the religious purpose underlying the glorious descriptions of the omnipotent majesty and wisdom of God revealed in the wonder of His universe, such, e. g., as we find in Is 40 or in Job 38 f. They are not mere descriptions, they are instinct with a religious purpose: they are designed, the one to comfort a despondent and disconsolate people by reminding them of the infinite power of the God who they think has forsaken or forgotten them (Is 40 27), the other to answer the doubts of God's justice that had risen in the heart of a tortured man, by pointing to the wisdom and love at the heart of the universe (Job 38 26, 39). To one who understands that Daniel was written at the time when Antiochus Epiphanes was making his implacable assault upon the Jewish religion and its adherents, the purpose of the book is transparently to encourage and strengthen the faithful in their resistance to heathen demands, and to inspire them with the assurance that the kingdoms of this world, based upon brute force, would in the end be succeeded by the humane kingdom of God (Dn ch. 7). It is this passionate conviction of God and His purpose, this persuasion of His presence in the individual life and in history, this delight in His law and His love, that binds the multifarious books of the O T into so singularly impressive a unity. Without some real affinity of spirit with those ancient men of God it is impossible to enter into the innermost heart of that wonderful literature, for at the heart of it is God.

2. THE APPROACH TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NEARLY a hundred years ago Thomas Carlyle wrote a letter upon religion to John Stuart Mill, exhorting his friend to study the Bible. 'I advise you,' he said, 'to persevere in reading the Bible (in seeing it, through all distances and disguises).' The distance between us and the Bible is great; it is probably about 1800 years since the latest of the N T books was composed. But this is a minor difficulty; an ancient classic reaches across centuries to those who appreciate it. The real distance between us and the Bible is moral. What prevents, for example, the N T from being understood, what makes it seem often a foreign book to us, is not so much its Oriental shape and color as that we are out of touch and sympathy with its religious spirit. Only those who are prepared to be receptive, can enter into its meaning and message. This does not imply that we are called upon to believe exactly as men in the first century believed about the world and nature; their mental environment and outlook has long passed, and the more we recover it by antiquarian study, the more do we realize that it would be unreal for us to put ourselves back into their attitude of mind toward miracles, for example. What is essential is the faculty of entering into the religious faith which took this form at this period. And this faculty is aided by the fact that the faith has never ceased to live and move within this world, assuming various forms, but always true somehow and somewhere to its fundamental principles. To belong to the Christian church or fellowship is to possess a certain clew to the understanding of the N T, such as no outsider, with the best of intentions in the world, can secure. The N T was written by and for members of the Christian Church. It is literature of a community. The Church has sometimes misunderstood it, sometimes neglected it for long, and sometimes depreciated it. Nevertheless the ethos of the Church is the atmosphere of the N T, and, however acute and earnest outsiders like Carlyle and Mill may be, however much the interpretation of the N T owes to scholars and thinkers who have seen and illustrated some of its truths vividly from a detached position, the best focus for observing it lies in the Christian community, where life depends for its meaning upon a living Lord.

I. THE PROBLEM INVOLVED IN THE LANGUAGE, TEXT, AND CANONICITY OF THE N T BOOKS.

THIS does not imply, however, that pious feeling and devout aims can afford to do without technical scholarship. To overcome the distances and disguises of the N T, historical imagination is required—that is, imagination as the vision of realities. The realities in question come before us in a collection of small books written in a foreign language and in an Oriental country, centuries ago. This collection has been translated into various languages, and it has passed through all the vicissitudes of a literary work exposed to the successive phases of circulation and editing which apply to any similar collection of books. The first concern of a reader is to know what exactly it means, or rather what exactly it meant. For this purpose investigation has to call upon the different methods of historical and literary inquiry, with the best available resources of pure scholarship. By their help, and by their help alone, the disguises that hide the N T or, at any rate, that obscure it can be removed, till it stands out clear and commanding. The first (a) problem is the language. Here the study of the N T is simpler than the study of the Old. While a small part of the latter is in Aramaic, the N T is all in one language, the Hellenistic Greek which formed the medium of intercourse throughout the Roman Empire at the period of its composition. The exact study of this language, of its vocabulary and grammar, has been transformed within the last half century.<sup>1</sup> We are now in a position to judge with fair accuracy how far the new religion created a language of its own, how far it stamped new meanings on old terms, and how far it simply carried on its inheritance in this respect. There are variations of style in the writers; some are highly cultured, like Luke and the writer of Hebrews, and one at least, the author of Second Peter, tends to be florid. But the general level of the N T Greek is that of a language popular, flexible, and effective. How far it reflects its Semitic soil, is not yet clear. Most of its writers thought in Semitic; some translated Semitic sources. The outstanding problems to-day in this connection are those of the Fourth Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, perhaps also of the book of Revelation. But the epistles were originally written in Greek; there is no probability that any one of them represents a translation. And even in the case of those books which may be held to represent a Greek version, in whole or part, of some Hebrew or Aramaic source, the general sense is not often rendered ambiguous, altho here and there the discovery of the Semitic original may reveal a fresh accent or new meaning. Substantially, the religious message of the N T may be made out in all its outlines from the existing Greek text. And (b) the text of the N T is in a far better state of preservation than the text of the O T. On the large majority of controverted readings there is a fair consensus of authorities for some one reading, whereas in many places of the O T the original text can only be guessed at. The huge mass of variants which swell a critical edition of the N T may seem formidable, but they are often merely secondary. Now and then early errors have crept into the text, but in the main it may be argued that these do not affect the cardinal facts and truths enshrined in the book. The problems of the text have been largely reset and elucidated during the past hundred years. They still form a delicate branch of research, but criticism has answered more questions than it has left open in this department, and there is a large measure of agreement upon the essential text. With any good modern edition of the Greek text in his hands, supplemented by an adequate modern English version, the reader need have little hesitation in believing that he is as near as can be, or need be, to the position of those who first read these documents in their original form. (c) Another point at which the problem of the N T is simpler than that of the O T, is in the question of the Canon. While all the books in the N T were written within a hundred years after the crucifixion of Jesus, it took several centuries before the Church finally fixed the Canon, that is, the list of the books which were to be regarded as inspired. Some were once read which were afterward ejected; others were left out or admitted with hesitation, which eventually won their foothold inside the collection. But once the N T Canon was fixed, as it was by the end of the fourth century, the uncanonical or apocryphal books, which had once competed for a place, were dropped. They were widely read still. Some of them helped to develop superstitions which entered into medieval theology, and many influenced medieval art and legend. But, apart from this, they were never ranked near the N T, whereas several books of the later Judaism clung to the O T Canon and, if not regarded as equal in doctrinal value, were read as edifying. Hence, there is a difference between the Reformed Church and the Roman Church on the precise limits of the O T Canon, whereas, whatever be the differences between these churches, there is none upon the exact number of the original books in the N T. The N T Canon has no penumbra as the O T Canon has, no fringe of deuterocanonical documents like the books of Ecclesiasticus and the Maccabees.

II. THE PROBLEM INVOLVED IN THE RELATION OF THE N T AND THE FAITH IT EXPRESSES TO THE O T AND ITS FAITH.

THESE differences, however, only serve to bring out the unity and continuity between the O T and the N T. The N T reflects a final phase in the revelation of God to His People. The primitive Christians were intensely conscious of the new, supreme revelation which had been made in Jesus Christ, but they claimed as their inheritance the traditions of Israel; their belief was that God had now fulfilled the ancient promises and realized His age-long purpose. The O T, with all its hopes and history, was theirs, understood for the first time in the light of Jesus Christ. This was fundamental to Christianity. But it raised difficulties for the Church, as it still raises difficulties. Some, like Marcion, stressed the new revelation in Christ so sharply that they repudiated the O T. It was to them not simply the record of an earlier and inferior stage in God's revelation, but an incompatible entity, from which the new and true religion of Jesus Christ must shake itself clear. Against this exaggeration the main body of the Church, by a proper instinct, protested. Guided, as we may believe, by the Spirit of God, the Church held to the O T. But not always for right reasons, nor always along right lines. Historical criticism was hardly in existence, and as a rule the only way of conserving the O T was to allegorize it. As a witness to monotheism, as a moral code, and as a proof of God's past dealings in history with His People or Church, it was thus preserved. But, once historical criticism asserted itself, the relation of the O T to the New became at once clearer and more difficult to define. In our own day, the argument from prophecy has been reset, for example. It is no longer possible to expect a literal fulfilment of some O T prophecies about the rehabilitation of Israel as a Messianic community ruling the world from Jerusalem, or to treat the Messianic anticipations of the O T as literally fulfilled in Jesus. What appeals to us is rather the religious experience and ideals of the O T, and in the N T we recognize that the primitive Church read its O T under the limitations of a time-view which we can no longer fully share. Their belief that God's purpose and plan of redemption culminated in Jesus Christ, we share heartily. But not always for their reasons and not always by their arguments. We too recognize in the O T history an essential preparation for the N T, but not an allegorical or obscure anticipation of its truths. We see in the O T differences of level which were generally hidden from the eyes of the early Christians, and even as we penetrate to its unity of revealing purpose we estimate its contents more carefully and critically. Instead of a mechanical uniformity between the two Testaments, we note a historical development of revelation, which makes the connection between the two organic and vital. All this involves special problems, such as the determination of the text of the O T used by the writers of the New, their conception of O T inspiration and authority, and their use of special O T books. But the outcome of these discussions is to recapture the permanent relation between the two and to restate it in terms of modern historical research.

III. THE PROBLEMS RAISED BY THE CRITICAL STUDY OF THE N T ITSELF.

THIS opens up in turn the problems raised by the criticism of the N T itself. No religion ever survives in any healthy form if it allows itself to fall below the level of contemporary intelligence in any age. This does not mean that religion is bound to accept the dicta or dogmas of contemporary science, either in philosophy or in history. These have their vogue, and yield to others, or suffer modification as research proceeds. But it does mean that religion can not afford to ignore or to defy the methods of the purest and most exacting research as applied to its sacred books. What it ought to do is to welcome and employ these fearlessly, conscious that its message has nothing to lose and everything to gain from a fair examination at the hands of critical methods, and that the ordeal will only serve to bring out the fundamental truths at stake. To permit criticism only so far as it bears out some preconceived dogmatic conclusions, or to deny criticism any rights at all in this region, is as futile as to maintain airily that real faith and historical criticism move on quite different planes and that the inner evidence of faith may dispense with any proof that the gospels, for example, are historically reliable. Some critical methods and conclusions would idealize Jesus into a symbol. It is idle to pretend that the acceptance of such theories would not impair the security of Christian truth. The Christian revelation has been made in and through history, and no mystical or idealistic reconstruction can survive apart from the historical reality to which the N T in its own way witnesses. But it is imperative that the record of the revelation be tested, thoroughly, fairly, and persistently. This is a commonplace which requires wisdom and courage to practise, especially in the study of the N T.

The controlling principle is to realize what the N T really is. As its very name indicates, it is a collection of books held together by one religious conviction. 'Testament' is the equivalent of 'covenant,' which means a gracious purpose of God for His People, a purpose entering into history. In Jesus Christ God created a new relationship between man and Himself, an inward, spiritual fellowship, which superseded the older 'covenant' in the days of Israel, and which was never to be superseded. The People of God were to be now not one nation but a church or fellowship drawn from all nations; the basis of the 'covenant' was to be faith on the part of men, faith elicited by the revelation of God in Christ. In earlier days, after some deliverance, the People would say: 'Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation' (Is 25 9). So, the primitive Church at the advent of Jesus, said, 'This is our God, the Lord.' One of the notes that thrill through the N T is a note of relief: 'At last!' People felt that a long-expected revelation had been made, which indeed transcended all expectations. The realization of God's gracious purpose in the person of Jesus Christ was the answer to many a hope and the fulfilment of many a promise and prediction. The redeeming power of God, in forgiveness and fellowship, was at last operative fully through Jesus Christ, whose place in history was decisive, marking the action of God as a God of love moving freely within the history of His People. The N T books are the record of this experience. They were written in the first flush of this supreme revelation, and they eventually acquired their common title on account of their religious content. Modern criticism has emphasized the variety of outlook in the different books; it has revealed a growth of thought and experience, and it has made clear the fact that none of the books was consciously written for a place in the N T, since in that age no one dreamt of any 'New Testament,' the Bible of the Church being the O T. But all this stress upon various types and phases has also revealed the fact that there is a natural coherence in the N T. Independent and divergent as the individual writers may be, they witness to an underlying unity of interest and aim. They are not of equal importance; no one, for example, would claim that the Epistle of Jude is as vital as the Gospel of John, or that the Second Epistle of Peter is on the same religious level as the Epistle to the Romans, or that the Second and Third Epistles of John mean as much as the Synoptic gospels. Neither are they always in unison; the divergences in the four Gospels show a varying attitude to certain facts and features in the tradition about Jesus. Nevertheless the books of the N T are not in the collection by accident. We might almost say that 'they gravitated toward each other in the course of the first century of the Church's life, and imposed their unity on the Christian mind. That they are at one in some essential respects is obvious. They have at least unity of subject: they are all concerned with Jesus Christ, and with the manifestation of God's redeeming love to men in Him' (Denney, The Death of Christ, Ch i). This is the focus from which we may estimate the N T as a whole. It witnesses to a historical revelation of God, culminating in Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ as divine. The most common expression for this belief in Christ is that He was 'the Son of God,' a Semitic expression which requires careful study. What it involves, for the birth of Jesus, for His miracles, and for His resurrection, is one of the central problems set by the study of the N T. But it is indubitable that the writers were convinced that He was in some sense the 'Son of God,' in a sense indeed in which no other being was or could be. One of the acutest problems is to determine, in this connection, how far such a consciousness was present to the mind of Jesus Himself. It has been argued that the N T really contains two religions, a religion of Jesus and a religion about Jesus; in other words, that Paul and the early Church made a redemptive religion out of the simple, ethical gospel preached by Jesus. The weight of evidence rather tends in the opposite direction. There was in Jesus Christ, when He was on earth, a consciousness of God which involved the faith afterward held by the early Church. Explain it as we may, there is a vital continuity between Jesus and Paul, between our Lord's life and the subsequent faith of this Church. Apart from a redemptive, unique element in the person of Jesus, the development of the apostolic Church and its theology is inexplicable. It is not unfair to hold that the critical study of the N T, as it does justice to the idiosyncrasies of the individual writers and to the differences of outlook which characterize their minds, succeeds in bringing out with new emphasis the fundamental religious unity and interest of their belief in Jesus Christ.

IV. THE PROBLEM INVOLVED IN THE FACT THAT THE N T WRITINGS BELONG, AS TO THEIR DATE, TO A PARTICULAR AGE WITH ITS OWN SPECIAL CHARACTER.

THE revelation in Jesus Christ, which produced the N T, or rather which produced the Christian Church in which and for which the N T books were written, was made at a certain age, and its record bears water-marks of its origin. The outlook upon the universe, the psychology, the conception of history, and the attitude toward social problems, which are reflected in the N T, are no longer ours. There are elements in its message which are not permanent. Also, there are questions upon which it throws no light; it is not a text-book for ecclesiastical or for ethical practise, and one of the responsibilities laid upon the Church in every generation is to recover its principles and ideals, without attempting to make it a code. One extreme position is to assert the literal validity of every word in it as inspired and authoritative. The opposite extreme is to manipulate it in order to suit the prejudices of the age—a tendency which Mr. William de Morgan, the English novelist, satirically describes in his sketch of a Positivist solicitor (in Joseph Vance), who 'was an example of a Christian who had endeavored to strain off the teachings of Jesus the Nazarene from the scum and the dregs of the world and the churches, and had never been able to decide on the mesh of his strainer.' Now, the mesh of the strainer is not constant. But a mesh there must be, and a mesh which does not allow the fundamental reality of the divine Sonship of Jesus to slip through as an accretion. The study of the N T, which is to be religious and critical, must be alive at all points to the historical and literary environment of the first century A. D. This is the beginning of wisdom in its interpretation, and much real progress has been made in this direction. We may say that the problems of literary origin and structure have been placed in a fairly clear light, even tho they are not yet solved. The outstanding questions to-day relate to (a) the original language of the Gospels, including the Fourth Gospel, and (b) the relation of Paul's theology to contemporary cults in the sphere of pagan religion. The former is important, as it suggests the possibility that here and there the passage of the tradition from Aramaic or Hebrew into Greek may have altered the sense of a saying. But, upon the whole, it is not likely that investigations in this field will affect materially the main outlines of early Christian belief. And, so far as questions of a literary nature are concerned, they are mostly secondary. Whether or not Paul wrote Ephesians or the Pastoral Epistles, whether Peter wrote First Peter, or the Apostle John the Fourth Gospel, are matters which, altho profoundly interesting, do not essentially alter the religious message of these documents. The determining issue is the primary conviction about the significance of Jesus Christ, and the main interest to-day is to evaluate the forms in which this was conveyed to the first generation of Christians. The N T is dominated by the impression of the redeeming realities of the Gospel. Jesus Christ's person and work are the supreme subject and object of all the N T books, and it is by the standards of this revelation that they are ultimately to be weighed. These standards are not to be picked up by a superficial reading even of the Gospels. For the Gospels themselves witness to a variety and a development in their interpretation, and they present the difficult problem, for example, of determining how far the eschatological horizon affects the outlook of Jesus as well as of the Early Church upon duty. But, for the honest and fruitful study of the N T, which seeks to be free from bondage to literalism and traditionalism, and at the same time to recognize the moral and spiritual authority of the N T as a religious classic, the following points may be noted: (a) As literature of revelation, that is, as literature which conveys the immediate impression of God's revelation in the life of Jesus Christ, the N T possesses the twofold quality of being intelligible to the age for which it was written and also of containing more than the original recipients could understand; it is meant for more than its first audience. Had the literature failed to express the significance of the revelation to the first century readers, it would have missed its aim. On the other hand, it was not understood absolutely and purely by that age; its meaning and message were not exhausted in the contemporary life of the Church. For revelation is a continuous process of God's Spirit, and, while the N T is an indispensable record of the revelation in Christ, it is capable of fresh reinterpretation by the Church under the guidance of the Spirit. Over and again the life of Christianity has been revived by fresh contact with the N T, after conventional traditions of the Church have dulled the meaning of its sacred books. The N T is the record of a supreme religious experience and also of the interpretations of that experience. The latter are often couched in temporary and transitional forms, which lie open to historical criticism; but the religious experience does not depend necessarily upon the interpretations. The living Spirit of God maintains the life of the Christian fellowship, which penetrates again and again to the reality of the creative force of the revelation in Jesus Christ. (b) This record of the Christian revelation is more than a mere record; through it similar religious experience is generated, that is, religious experience similar to that of the first Christians. It is true to speak of 'the sacrament of the Bible,' or, more specifically, of the 'sacrament of the New Testament,' for it has always had sacramental value for the Church, by putting its readers into direct touch with the presence of God, and thereby acting as a means of grace. The N T is not shut up in the first century. Historical study finds it there, rooted in its soil and breathing its air. But the more thoroughly this study is carried on, the more does the N T enable readers of a later generation to have a direct and personal experience of the revelation which it enshrines. It is in this sense that we may even call the N T 'the Word of God.' Not only does it contain God's word, that is, the revelation of His saving mind and purpose in Jesus Christ, but, as Rothe observes (Zur Dogmatik, p. 155), it is such an original record 'as is itself an integral element in the revelation which it records,' charged with vitalizing power—not in any mechanical sense, as if the mere letter operated like a medieval sacrament, but in the contact between the living God and the living faith of His People who seek to know and do His will. For (c) the revelation with which the N T is charged is not a fixed deposit of dogma, supernaturally conveyed, but a Life generated by the Spirit of Jesus Christ. This Life implies no doubt certain truths or doctrines, which have to be retained and from time to time restated. But they are only tenable in and through participation in the Life itself. What enforces them is not any dogma of Church-tradition, not any arbitrary hypothesis of verbal infallibility, but the authority with which life speaks to life. When Erasmus broke through the tradition of the medieval Church and dared to present the N T, in as pure and direct a form as he knew, to the people of his day, he declared that this was the end and object of all N T scholarship and study, to allow Jesus Christ to become more visible. The pages of the N T, he wrote, 'will give you Christ Himself, talking, healing, dying, rising, the whole Christ in a word; they will give Him to you in an intimacy so close that He would be less visible to you if He stood before your eyes.' This realization of Jesus is the end of all N T study, just because it is the object of the N T itself. It demands more than a merely emotional or devotional attitude on the one hand, and on the other hand an approach which is wider than that which technical scholarship provides. For truth requires all our faculties, if we are to grasp it, and the larger the truth, the wider the demand upon intelligence and emotion. The revelation of God in the Life and Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is enshrined in the N T, requires a personal verification from all who claim to accept it, a verification involving mental as well as moral honesty, humility, candor, perseverance, and a readiness to give up prejudices; most of all, perhaps, it requires a disposition to admit that the truth of this revelation is larger than any one age can grasp. Many, who are free from either animosity or indifference toward the N T, would find their appreciation of its meaning redoubled, were they to open their minds to the fact that this is the literature of a Life which disturbs whatever is lifeless and which remains more or less a secret to the self-conceit which is the besetting temptation of all mental research. It is through such disguises and distances, as we saw above, that the genuine student must pass, if he is to touch the Life which alone gives meaning to the N T.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION

The pronunciation given immediately after the titles, when these are Hebrew proper names, is that preferred by FUNK & WAGNALLS New Standard Dictionary of the English Language. A comparison of this pronunciation with the transliteration of these names will show the difference between the modern English pronunciation of such names and the Hebrew pronunciation.

Throughout this book the Revised Scientific Alphabet, devised by the American Philological Association, the Modern Language Association of America, and the National Education Association by joint action in Committee, and used to indicate pronunciation in the New Standard Dictionary of the English Language has been employed for the same purpose. Its essential principle is that one symbol only is used for each sound, no matter what letters or combinations of letters are used in spelling to indicate that sound. For examples of these combinations, see below. Where two pronunciations are given the first is preferred. The pronunciations of simple title-words have been omitted as unnecessary.

The basic principle of the alphabet used to indicate pronunciation—namely, the use of the fundamental vowels and their original Roman values—has been used to indicate pronunciation in dictionaries for more than fifty years. This principle was adopted by the United States Geographic Board, the Royal Geographical Society of England and the other learned bodies named above.

In its treatment of pronunciation, this dictionary aims to reflect the best usage of the English-speaking world, but it should be remembered that the English-speaking world is now so vast in extent and the variations of perfectly respectable utterance so numerous, that no authority can be final and no treatment of pronunciation exhaustive.

A

AARON, ʾārʾon (אֲרֹן, 'ahārōn): Son of Amram and Jochebed, descendant of Levi through Kohath, and three years older than his brother Moses (Ex 6 16 ff.; Nu 33 39).

1. The Historical Aspect. The Biblical representation of his character is negative and shadowy as compared with that of Moses. A clue to the seemingly contradictory delineations of A. is found in the documentary analysis (see HEXATEUCH). (a) The account of E. E., with the point of view of N. Israel, where the tribe of Levi had no vested rights (cf. I K 12 31), does not represent A. as a sacrosanct priest. He comes to meet Moses (Ex. 4 14), supports him in war (Ex 17 12) and jurisprudence (Ex 24 14). He yields to the people and makes the calf (Ex ch. 32), and with Miriam mutinies against Moses (Nu ch. 12). He is present at the sacrificial covenant meal between Israel and the Kenites (Ex 18 12). The account of his death in Dt 10 6 (from E) is different from that in Nu 20 22 ff. (P). According to Dt it occurred at Moserah, seven stations from Mt. Hor (cf. Nu 33 30 ff.), in the early months of the wandering because of the sin of the golden calf. In E Joshua, instead of A., serves in the Tent (Ex 33 11).

(b) The account of J. J records only the covenant meal on Sinai (Ex 24 1, 2, 9-11) and the vague charge that Aaron 'let the people loose' (Ex 32 25). Aaron seems to be an afterthought in J's plague narrative (cf. Ex 8 25). In both J and P Moses is the viceregent of deity and Aaron is Moses' prophet (Ex 4 16, J; 7 1, P).

(c) The view of the Law of Holiness and of Ezekiel. In Lv chs. 17-26 A. appears only in redactional passages connecting the Law of Holiness with its present context. In Ezk chs. 40-48 Zadok, not A., is the eponym of the priestly line (44 15, etc.).

(d) View of P. The Priestly Document (see HEXATEUCH § 27) seeks to place A. more nearly on a parity with Moses. He is joint-performer with M. of the wonders done before Pharaoh. Naturally P. could not deny the real leadership of M. which was so firmly fixed in tradition. But as P. viewed the priestly-sacrificial system as the supreme element of the revelation at Sinai it was natural that he should consider A. the first high priest, as but little inferior to Moses.

2. The Official Aspect. In Ex chs. 25-30 and 35-40, and in Lv and Nu Aaron's name occurs frequently, evidently to impress upon the people the importance of the priesthood (cf. the usage in Ezk). What was done to and for Aaron was what should be done with any high priest. The ceremonial endowment prescribed in Ex chs. 28, 29 and Lv ch. 8 is a manual for the sanctuary ritual. That A. was Moses' brother and that he was the ancestor of a priestly family may rest on valid tradition, but we must recognize that the prominence of his name in Ex and Nu reveals the necessity felt for prescriptive rights for the later 'Aaronic' priesthood. See PRIESTHOOD.

A. S. C.—O. R. S.

AARONITES. Only in AV of 1 Ch 12 27, 27 17; cf. RV and PRIESTHOOD, §§ 6-9.

AARON'S ROD. In two places in P. particular reference is made to Aaron's rod (i.e., staff). In the first (Ex 7 9-12, 19 f., 8 5, etc.) it is Aaron's (not Moses', as in E. at Ex 4 17 and 14 16) rod with which the miracles and plagues are wrought before Pharaoh. In the second (Nu ch. 17) A.'s rod, representing the tribe of Levi, alone of the thirteen rods left in the Tabernacle overnight buds, blossoms, and bears fruit. This story was intended to teach and prove the Divine choice of Levi as the priestly tribe. It perhaps indicates that the exclusive claims of the Levites were once challenged and so understood the basis of the story may date back into the preexilic age (see PRIESTHOOD, § 4, end). The older tradition said that this rod was laid up before the Ark (Nu 17 10, cf. 1 K 8 9). Later it was said to have been within the Ark (He 9 4).

E. E. N.

AB, ab: The fifth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3. For the syllable 'Ab' in proper names see ABI.

ABADDON, ʾa-bad'n (אֲבַדּוֹן, 'ābhaddōn), only in Rev 9 11 as the Hebrew original of Apollyon, 'Destroyer'. In the OT, however, A. is not a person, but simply the process of decay, destruction or loss (Job 26 6, 28 22, 31 12; Pr 15 11; Ps 88 11; also Wis 18 22, 25). By synecdoche the word is made the name of Sheol; by personification acts are attributed to Sheol, thus arises the later identification of A., with an angel of destruction (Apollyon, q.v.). See also ESCHATOLOGY, § 18.

A. C. Z.

ABAGTHA, ʾa-bag'tha (אֲבַגְתָּה, 'ābhaghtā): A chamberlain who served in the presence of Ahasuerus. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

ABANAH, ab'ā-nā (אֲבָנָה, 'ābhānāh, Abana AV; see II K 5 12): A cold swift stream rising in Mt. Anti-Lebanon. Breaking out into the plain a few miles W. of Damascus, it divides into seven streams whose waters irrigate the plain and supply the city. It loses itself in the swampy Meadow Lakes 20 m. E. of Damascus on the edge of the desert. Its right name was probably Amana (RV mg.). The modern name is Barada. See also DAMASCUS. E. E. N.

ABARIM, ab'a-rim (אֲבָרִים, 'ābhārim), 'those-on-the-other-side': The name of the mountain range in NW. part of Moab. (The term, however, according to G. A. Smith (HGHL, p. 548; EB I 4) is applicable to the whole E. Jordan range.) Mt. Nebo is the best-known summit, and Abarim is used by metonymy for Nebo (Nu 27 12; Dt 32 49). In Jer 22 20 ('passages' AV) Abarim is a more exact synonym of Bashan. The Heb. text of Ezk 39 11 also contains the word Abarim, but it is more literally translated 'they that pass by.' A. C. Z.

ABBA, ab'ā (אָבָא = אָבָא): Aramaic for 'Father,' transliterated into Greek and thence into English. It occurs three times in the NT (Mk 14 36; Ro 8 15; Gal 4 6). From the fact that it is invariably followed by the explanatory addition 'father' it has been argued that it had come to be regarded as one of the proper names of God. For this there is no direct evidence. More probably it was used as a familiar liturgical expression, which Jesus and Paul adopted with particular emphasis on its essential content, developing into rich suggestiveness. A. C. Z.

ABDA, ab'dā (אֲבִדָּא, 'abhdā'), 'servant (of J')': 1. The father of Adoniram, Solomon's tribute-master (1 K 4 6). 2. The son of Shammua (Neh 11 17, called Obadiah in I Ch 9 16).

ABDEEL, ab'di-el (אֲבִדְיֵאל, 'abhd'ēl), 'servant of God': The father of Shelemiah (Jer 36 26).

ABDI, ab'doi (אֲבִדִּי, 'abhdī'), 'servant (of J')': 1. The father of Kishi or Kish (I Ch 6 44; II Ch 29 12, or Kushaiah in I Ch 15 17). 2. One of the 'sons of Elam' (Ezr 10 26).

ABDIEL, ab'di-el (אֲבִדְיֵאל, 'abhd'ēl), 'servant of God': A Gadite (I Ch 5 15).

ABDON, ab'don (אֲבִדֹן, 'abhdōn), 'servant': I. 1. One of the minor judges of Israel, son of Hillel (Jg 12 13, 15). See also BEDAN. 2. A son of Shashak (I Ch 8 23). 3. A son of Jeiel, father of Gibeon (I Ch 8 30, 9 36). 4. A son of Micah (II Ch 34 20, called Achbor in II K 22 12).

II. A Levitical city in Asher (Jos 21 30; I Ch 6 74) called Ebron (Hebron AV) in Jos 19 28. Map IV, E 6.

ABEDNEGO, a-bed-nū-gō (אֲבִדְנֵגוֹ, 'ābhēdn'gōhō), from Abed-Nebo, 'servant of Nebo': The Babylonian name of Azariah, one of Daniel's three companions (Dan 1 7, 2 49, etc.).

ABEL, ē'bel (אֵבֶל, hebbel), formerly thought to mean 'breath', later translated 'son', possibly 'leader of a herd': Adam's second son, a shepherd, murdered by Cain (Gn ch. 4). Why the sacrifice of A. was more pleasing to J' than Cain's is not stated; the implication may be that Cain's bloodless offering, like that of the agricultural Canaanites to their Baals, displeased J', who preferred pastoral life. In the N T A. is pictured as a martyr for righteousness (Mt 23 35; He 11 4; I Jn 3 12). In He 12 24 the blood of Jesus, which meant salvation, is said to speak better than that of A., which cried only for vengeance (Gn 4 10). O. R. S.

ABEL, ē'bel (אֵבֶל, 'ābhēl), 'meadow' (II S 20 14-18): 1. See A. of BETH-MAACAH. 2. According to the Heb. text of I S 6 18, followed by AV, the name of a locality near Beth-shemesh. The LXX. reads instead 'stone,' which is followed by RV.

E. E. N.

ABELCHERAMIM, ē'bel-ker'a-mim (אֵבֶל כְּרָמִים, 'ābhēl k'rāmim), A.-Keramim (Jg 11), 'meadow of vineyards': A locality in Ammon (AV 13 33), probably near Rabbah of Ammon (later called Philadelphia). Map III, K 5. A. S. C.—O. R. S.

ABEL-MAIM, ē'bel-mē'im (אֵבֶל מַיִם, 'ābhēl mayim) 'meadow of waters': A variant, or text-corruption, for Abel-beth-maacah (II Ch 16 4).

ABEL-MEHOLOAH, ē'bel-mi-hō'lā (אֵבֶל מְחֹלָה, 'ābhēl m'hōlāh), 'meadow of dancing': A city with its surrounding district possibly on the headland lying just N. of the lower course of the Wādī Farah (Map III, D 3), the ordinary identification (Map III, H 3) being improbable. It was Elisha's residence (I K 19 16). The 'lip' of A. (Jg 7 22) has been identified as modern el Mahrūk near the junction of Wādī Farah with the Jordan. O. R. S.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, ē'bel-miz'ra-im (אֵבֶל מִצְרַיִם, 'ābhēl mitsrayim), 'meadow of Egypt': The stopping-place of Jacob's funeral cortege (Gn 50 11). Probably 'ābhēl is a mistake for 'ēbbel (אֵבֶל) and the meaning of the name is 'Egyptians' lament'. On the location, see ATAD. A. S. C.—O. R. S.

ABEL OF BETH-MAACAH, ē'bel ov beth-mē'a-ka or ka (אֵבֶל בֵּית מַעַכָּה, 'ābhēl bēth hamma'ākhāh) 'Abel of Beth-Maacah': A fortified city in N. Palestine, probably modern Abil el Kamh (White Abel), W. of Dan; the stronghold of Sheba's insurrection (II S 20 14-22). In II S 20 14 we should read 'Abel of Beth-Maacah', as in v. 15, altho here and in II K 15 29 LXX. takes Abel and Beth-Maacah as two different places. It was besieged by Ben-hadad (I K 15 20) and Tiglath-Pileser III (II K 15 29). Map IV, E 4. See BETH-MAACAH. O. R. S.

ABEL-SHITTIM, ē'bel-shit'im (אֵבֶל שִׁטִּים, 'ābhēl hashshūlīm), 'acacia-meadow': A locality in the lowlands of Moab (Nu 33 49; cf. Mic 6 6). Map III, H 5.

ABEZ, ē'bez. See EBEZ.

ABI, ā'bī (אֲבִי, 'ābhī), 'father': Compound personal names in which 'Abi' (often shortened to 'Ab') forms the first element are of two general classes:

(a) In which the second part is a noun, generally the name of a deity; (b) in which it is an adjective or a verb. In cases under (a) Abi is generally the predicate, as Abi-jah, i.e., 'Jah (=Jehovah) is father.' In cases under (b) it is the subject, as Abinadab, i.e., 'the father (=God) gives.' The 'i' of Abi is probably not the pronominal suffix 'my,' but an old ending serving merely as a connective. The syllable 'ab' at the end of a proper name has the same significance; e.g. Eliab is the same as Abiel (each means 'God is father'), Joab is the same as Abijah (each means 'J' is father). The number and variety of these compounds in which 'Ab' or 'Abi' means the divine father show that the conception of God as father goes back to very early times in Israel. At first the idea may have been of a physical fatherhood, or of deity as the father of the tribe or people as a whole. Later it was refined into something more individual and spiritual. See G. B. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, pp. 22-34 and 75-86). E. E. N.

ABI, ʿbai (in II K 18 2). Shortened from Abijah. See ABIJAH, 7.

ABIA, ʾa-baiʾa, ABIAH, ʾa-baiʾā. See ABIJAH.

ABIALBON, ʿbi-alʾbon (אֲבִיאלְבֹן, ʾābhīʾalbhōn): One of David's heroes (II S 23 31, Abiel in I Ch 11 32).

ABIASAPH, ʾa-baiʾa-saf. See EBIASAPH.

ABIATHAR, ʾa-baiʾa-thār (אֲבִיאתָר, ʾebhiyāthār), 'father of abundance': A son of Ahimelech, priest at Nob. When Saul massacred Ahimelech and his household for harboring the fugitive David (I S 22 11-20), A. escaped and joined David at Keilah, reporting to him what Saul had done. As he also brought the ephod with him, David appointed him to be the priest of his company, and consulted J' through him (I S 30 7). Thenceforward Abiathar remained with David, and, when the latter became king, was associated in the priesthood with Zadok (II S 15 24, 20 25). He survived David, and by Solomon was deposed and banished to Anathoth for abetting and assisting in Adonijah's plot to wrest the kingdom from him (I K 1 7, 19, 25, 2 22, 28, 27). A. C. Z.

ABIB, ʿbīb (אֲבִיב, ʾābhīb), The 'earring' month of the old Hebrew year. See TIME, § 3.

ABIDA, ʾa-baiʾda (אֲבִידָא, ʾābhīdā), Abidah AV), 'the father (God) knows': The ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33).

ABIDAN, abʾi-dan (אֲבִידָן, ʾābhīdān), 'the father (God) is judge': A prince of Benjamin (Nu 1 11, 2 22, 7 60, 65, 10 24).

ABIEL, ʿbī-el (אֲבִיֵּל, ʾābhīʾēl), 'the father is God': 1. Grandfather of Saul and Abner (I S 9 1, 14 51). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 32, Abialbon in II S 23 31).

ABIEZER, ʿbī-ʾezār (אֲבִיעֶזֶר, ʾābhīʾezer), 'the father (God) is help': 1. The clan of Abiezrites of Manasseh, to which Gideon belonged (Jg 6 11 ff., 8 2, 32), reckoned genealogically to Machir through Gilead (Jos 17 2; I Ch 7 18; Nu 26 30, where the form is Iezer, Iezerite [Jeezer, Jeezerite AV]). 2. An Anathothite, one of David's heroes (II S 23 27; I Ch 11 28, 27 12). E. E. N.

ABIEZRITE, ʿbī-ezʾrait. See ABIEZER, § 1.

ABIGAIL, abʾi-gēl (אֲבִיגַיִל, ʾābhīghayil) 'father (God)? is rejoicing': 1. The wife of Nabal, later of David (I S 25 3, 42), mother of Chileab (or Daniel, I Ch 3 1), David's second son (II S 3 3). 2. David's sister, the wife of Jether and mother of Amasa (I Ch 2 10); in II S 17 23 called Abigail the daughter of Nahash, but 'daughter of Nahash' is probably a gloss from ver. 27. A. S. C.—O. R. S.

ABIHAH, abʾi-hēʾil (אֲבִיהָ, ʾābhīhāyil), 'the father (God) is strength': 1. The father of Zuriel (Nu 3 35). 2. The wife of Abishur (I Ch 2 29). 3. A Gadite (I Ch 5 14). 4. Niece of David, and mother-in-law of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 18). 5. The father of Esther (Est 2 15, 9 20).

ABIHU, ʾa-baiʾhiū (אֲבִיהוּ, ʾābhīhū), 'the father is He': Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu are mentioned together as summoned to come up to Mt. Sinai with Moses (Ex 24 10, 9; but the || 19 24 mentions Aaron only). In P Abihu and Nadab are sons of Aaron (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2, etc.), later made priests (Ex 28 1) but afterwards slain for offering 'strange' fire (Lev 10 1 ff.; Nu 3 4, 26 61; I Ch 24 2). E. E. N.

ABIHUD, ʾa-baiʾhūd (אֲבִיהוּד, ʾābhīhūd), 'the father (God) is glory': A son of Bela (I Ch 8 3).

ABIJAH, ʾa-baiʾja (אֲבִיהָ, ʾābhīyāh, ʾābhīy-yāh), 'J' is my father': 1. King of Judah, the son of Rehoboam, and Maacah, the daughter of Absalom. In I K 14 31, 15 1 ff., the name is spelled Abijam (an error). During his reign of three years he waged continual war with Jeroboam. The story in I K produces the impression of a prolonged campaign, while the Chronicler [in his characteristic way (see CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF, § 4)] records only a single decisive battle (II Ch ch. 12). With 400,000 troops he met Jeroboam with 800,000 at Mt. Zemaraim. He upbraided Jeroboam and Israel for rebellion against the Davidic dynasty, for apostasy, and the expulsion of the priests and Levites. Caught at a disadvantage, the men of Judah prayed to Jehovah, who granted them a signal victory. His character was not exemplary, for he walked in the sins of his father, and his heart was not perfect with Jehovah. 2. A son of Jeroboam I. He died in fulfilment of Abijah's prediction (I K 14 1 ff.). 3. A son of Samuel (I S 8 2, Abiah AV). 4. The ancestral head of the eighth course of priests, to which Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, belonged (Lk 1 5 [Abia AV]; I Ch 24 10, 26 20; Neh 10 7, 12 4). 5. A son of Becher (I Ch 7 8, Abiah AV). 6. The wife of Hezron (I Ch 2 24, Abiah AV). 7. The wife of Ahaz and mother of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 1). J. A. K.

ABIJAM, ʾa-baiʾjam. See ABIJAH, 1.

ABILENE, abʾi-lī-nī (Αβιλενη, Αβελινη, WH.): The tetrarchy of Lysanias (Lk 3 1) in the Anti-Lebanon. Abila. 18 Roman m. NW. of Damascus on the Abanah River, was its chief city, and has been identified with the ruins at Suk Wādy Baradā. Josephus (Ant. XX, 71) speaks of a tetrarchy of Lysanias, and in XIX, 51 of 'Abila of Lysanias.' See LYSANIAS.

C. S. T.

ABIMAEL, ʾa-bimʾa-el (אֲבִימָאֵל, ʾābhīmāʾēl), 'the father is God': One of the descendants of Joktan (Gn 10 28). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ABIMELECH, ʾa-bimʾi-lek (אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, ʾābhīmelekh), 'my father is Melech (Molech)': 1. A Philistine king of Gerar, a locality near Gaza. Struck by the beauty of Sarah, and being deceived by Abraham as to her true relationship, he took her to wife. Obedient to a warning from God in a dream, he returned Sarah to her husband with costly gifts, at the same time pleading his integrity and upbraiding Abraham for his deception (Gn 20 1-18, E.). Later, their quarrel over the possession of a well was finally settled by the making of a covenant at Beer-Sheba (Gn 21 22-34, J and E). A similar story combining both incidents is related of Abimelech and Isaac (Gn 26 7-11, 26-33, J). Critical scholarship looks upon these accounts as doublets.

2. A son of Gideon by a woman of Shechem. He made the first attempt to found a monarchy in Israel. The Shechemites made him king after he had murdered all of Gideon's sons but Jotham. His reign of three years ended in a revolt. Abimelech took Shechem, and burned it with its citadel and temple. Later, at the siege of the citadel at Thebez, his skull was fractured by a millstone thrown from the wall by a woman. His armor-bearer thrust him through at his own request (Jg 8 31, ch. 9).

3. A Philistine king (Ps 34: title—probably an error for Achish, cf. I S 21 10). On the error in I Ch 18 16 see ABIMELECH, § 1

J. A. K.

ABINADAB, ʾa-binʾa-dab (אַבִּינָדָב, 'ābhīnādābh), 'my father is generous': 1. A man of Kiriath-Jearim, to whose house the Ark was brought from Beth-Shemesh (I S 7 1), where it remained until David carried it to Jerusalem (II S 6 3 f.; I Ch 13 7). 2. The second son of Jesse (I S 16 8), who followed Saul against the Philistines (I S 17 13; I Ch 2 13). 3. A son of Saul, perhaps also called Ishvi (I S 14 40), slain by the Philistines in the great battle of Mt. Gilboa (I S 31 2; I Ch 8 33, 9 39, 10 2). 4. See BEN-ABINADAB.

C. S. T.

ABINOAM, ʾa-binʾo-ʾam (אַבִּינֹעַם, 'ābhīnōʾam), 'the father (God) is pleasantness': Father of Barak (Jg 4 6, 12, 5 1, 12).

ABIRAM, ʾa-baiʾrām (אַבִּירָם, 'ābhīrām), 'the father is the High One': 1. A Reubenite (Nu 16 1 ʿ, etc.). See DATHAN. 2. Eldest son of Hiel of Bethel (I K 16 34). See also HIEL.

ABISHAG, ʾabīʾshag (אַבִּישָׁג, 'ābhīshagh): A young Shunammite woman, nurse of David in his old age (I K 1 3, 15). Adonijah's request for her after David's death led to his execution (I K 2 17 ʿ).

ABISHAI, ʾā-bīʾshai (אַבִּישַׁי, 'ābhīshay; in Ch אֲבִישַׁי, 'ābhshay): One of the ruthless sons of Zeruiah. He was Joab's elder brother, chief of staff during David's outlaw period and the leader of the Thirty (I S 26 6 ʿ; II S 23 18 ʿ). His great exploits were the slaughter of 300 Philistines, the rescue of David from Ishbi-benob (II S 21 17), and the subjugation of Edom (I Ch 18 12, but cf. II S 8 13). Without the calculating ferocity of Joab, he is consistently portrayed as the inciter of David to acts of fierce reprisal (I S 26 8; II S 16 9). He disappears from history shortly after Absalom's rebellion.

A. S. C.—O. R. S.

ABISHALOM, ʾa-bīshʾa-lem. See ABSALOM.

ABISHUA, ʾa-bīshʾu-a (אַבִּישׁוּעַ, 'ābhīshūa'), 'the father (God) is noble?': 1. A priest, son of Phinehas (I Ch 6 4 f., 50; Ezr 7 5). 2. The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 8 4).

ABISHUR, ʾa-bīshʾūr (אַבִּישׁוּר, 'ābhīshūr'), 'the father (God) is a wall': A son of Shammai (I Ch 2 28 f.).

ABITAL, ʾabīʾ-tal (אַבִּיטָל, 'ābhīṭal'), 'the father (God) is dew': A wife of David (II S 3 4; I Ch 3 3).

ABITUB, ʾabīʾ-tub (אַבִּיטוּב, 'ābhīṭūbh'), 'the father (God) is good': A son of Shaharaim by Hushim (I Ch 8 11).

ABIUD, ʾa-baiʾod (אַבִּיאוּד): A son of Zerubbabel (only in Mt 1 13).

ABJECTS (אֲבִיטִים, 'smitten ones' Ps 35 15): The RV margin 'smitters' אֲבִיטִים gives better sense, but is incorrect. Some would read אֲבִיטִים 'strangers' (impious Israelites). The Hebrew term occurs only here and is of uncertain meaning. E. E. N.

ABNER, ʾabʾnēr (אַבְנֵר, 'abhnēr; or, as in I S 14 50, אֲבִינֵר, 'ābhīnēr), 'the (divine?) father is a lamp': Son of Ner the brother of Kish the father of King Saul. So I S 14 50 f. The text of I Ch 8 33, 9 39 is probably faulty (cf. 9 36). Abner seems to have been the leader of Saul's adherents (I S 17 57, 20 25, 26 5, 14, 15). At Saul's death he espoused the cause of Ishbosheth (Eshbaal), Saul's son. After his defeat at Gibeon he was pursued by Asahel, whom he slew, thus starting the feud with Joab and Abishai, Asahel's brothers (II S 2 8 ʿ). When Ishbosheth accused A. of misconduct with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, A. entered negotiations with David. After A. had gone Joab called him back to Hebron and there murdered him. David mourned publicly the death of A. and later had the head of the murdered Ishbosheth buried in his grave (II S 3 6 ʿ, 4 12). In I K 2 5 f., David is represented as having assumed the duty of blood revenge, which was carried out by Solomon. O. R. S.

ABOMINATION renders Heb. terms as follows: (1) tōʿēbhāh, broadly that which gives offense either to God or to men, possibly because of inherent repulsiveness (e.g., Gn 46 34; Lv 18 22), or a violation of established customs (e.g., Pr 6 16, 11 1). (2) shiqqūts, that which is hated as a religious offense. The term is frequently applied in contempt of the idols of the heathen (I K 11 5; Jer 13 27, etc.). (3) sheqets, i.e., 'taboo,' used only in Lv 11 10-42. (4) piggul, sacrificial flesh which has become stale and hence loathsome and unfit for food (Lv 7 18, etc.). In general, these terms, especially the first, are used for any object which J' abhors because it is opposed to His law of righteousness or to the ritual He prescribes for His worship. (The Greek term [used in LXX.] βάβυλασμα is generic, and means approximately the same as the English 'abomination.') A. C. Z.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (Τὸ βέβυλασμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως) only in Dn (9 27, 11 31, 12 11; 'that maketh desolate,' AV; 'astonisheth,' AVmg.) and in the 'Apocalypse of Jesus' (Mt 24 15; Mk 13 14). The latter, however, is a direct reference to the former. The original in Dn may mean 'the abomination that desolates' or 'the abomination that appalls' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. אֲבִיטִים). The term, moreover, which is translated 'abomination' (shiqqūts) strictly means 'image of a false god' (cf. I K 11 5; II K 23 13). What the author of Dn had in mind was the setting up in the Temple of a heathen idol, the presence of which there struck the devout Israelite dumb with amazement and at the same time profaned the sacred precincts, and was the signal of a terrible distress. This distress is conceived of as laying waste the country (ἐρημώσις, 'desolation,' Dn 9 28; Lk 21 21). The conception of Dn seems to have created an apocalyptic figure about which is centered all enmity against the true God and His will. The figure is used under different names in subsequent apocalyptic compositions. It is probable that the 'Man of Sin' in the 'Little Apocalypse' (II Th 2:1-2) is one of these. The fact that Jesus points to the appearance of this figure as a sign by which His followers should recognize the definite beginning of the final stage of the Messianic era has led many persons to identify the abomination of desolation with some historic person, event, or thing, e.g. the Roman army (B. Weiss), desecration by zealots (Bleek and Alford), a statue of Caligula, the Roman standard with the figure of the eagle, etc. But such identifications are futile, inasmuch as apocalyptic figures are embodiments of ideas whose concrete appearance in the form of historical facts or personages is not necessarily bound to individuals, but occurs with every realization of the idea. The abomination of desolation is actualized whenever its conception as above defined becomes an objective fact. A. C. Z.

ABRAHAM, ʾēbra-ham (אֲבְרָהָם, 'abhrāhām): The meaning and derivation of the word are uncertain. For Abram (אֲבְרָם, i.e., Abiram [?]), cf. analogies in Abimelech, etc. Abē-ramu occurs on contract-tablets prior to Hammurabi (c. 2100 B.C.) and the form Abu-raham occurs in A.'s time. 'Father is a lofty one' (or 'exalted father') is a probable translation. Abraham is perhaps an amplified form, and אֲבִי אֲרָם an otherwise unused variant of אֲבִי (Oxf. Heb. Lex.), altho a connection with אֲבִי, love, is possible (Int. Stand. Bib. Enc.). 'Father of a multitude' (Gn 17:5) is a word-play between אֲבִי and אֲרָם.

A. holds a prominent place in the thought of both the O T and the N T. His name occurs repeatedly in the formulas of inheritance (Dt 1:8; II K 13:23), and in the assertion of the continuity of the religion (Ex 3:15; I K 18:36). By the prophets he is seldom mentioned, perhaps never in a preexilic passage, but this is hardly significant, considering the clear national consciousness. The prophets assume his personality; he is God's 'friend' (Is 41:8; cf. II Ch 20:7); he was 'one' (Is 51:2; Ezk 33:24; possibly Mal 2:15); Abraham and Sarah are progenitors (Is 51:2; cf. also Is 29:22, 63:16; Jer 33:26; Mic 7:20). The N T recognizes A. as a race-father (Mt 3:9; Jn 8:33, 37, 39), but it is more deeply conscious of his profound significance as a hero of faith (He 11:8-11), his intimacy with God (Jn 8:56), and his spiritual fatherhood (Lk 16:22; Ro 4:11 ff.).

The present form of the narrative in Gn is due to the writer's desire to picture an ideal figure, embodying supreme religious conceptions. The following is the analysis: (1) Gn chs. 12-14, A.'s character and greatness. (2) Gn 15:1-22:19, the trials through which character was achieved. (3) Gn 23:1-25:8, the final acts of a well-rounded life. The thought of the covenant is ever dominant, but first is shown how exalted the hero was. He marches across the ancient world from the Euphrates to the Nile, his possessions increase in Canaan, he is able to overthrow the army of a world-conqueror.

The offering of Isaac, the crowning test of his faith, taught positively the need of a consummate sacrifice for the final ratification of the covenant, and negatively, that J' did not desire human sacrifice.

The site could hardly have been the Temple-mount, because (1) Jerusalem seems to have been already occupied (Gn 14:18) and (2) is much less than three days' journey (Gn 22:4) from Beer-sheba.

While some maintain the absolute historicity of the entire Abrahamic narrative, others treat it as a myth, personalized tribal history, or the outgrowth of religious reflection. For A.'s actual existence, the persistent national tradition is a witness. On the other hand, the narrative is so artistic as to indicate idealization. The minute particularizations (e.g., Gn ch. 18) seem hardly consistent with literal history, and we should distinguish between the present form and the original substratum. Probably under the name of A. are preserved traditions of great tribal movements which began in Arabia, followed the Euphrates, crossed to Haran, and ended for the time in Canaan. The leader may well have been named Abraham, but the clan was originally the concrete reality. While his name nowhere occurs as a clan title, on an inscription of Shishak the 'field of Abram' is mentioned (PEFQ, Jan., 1905, p. 7); cf. 'field of Moab' (Nu 21:20). For a theory of the two names Abram and Abraham, see Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine, pp. 25-46.

It is now the general consensus that the names of the four kings (Gn ch. 14) are historical, but all have not been identified with certainty. Gunkel argues for the historicity of Melchizedek also. The forms, however, of the Elamite and Babylonian names have suffered much in transmission. The synchronism with Hammurabi (Amraphel) postulates a date earlier than was formerly assigned to A. (But see AMRAPHEL.) The chapter forms the fitting conclusion to the picture of Abraham's greatness.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 38.

ABRAM. See ABRAHAM.

ABRECH, ʾābrek (אֲבִרֶכְךָ, 'abhrēkh): The Hebrew original of 'bow the knee' in Gn 41:43. The meaning of the term is uncertain. The Greek and Old Latin versions translated 'herald' and made it the subject of 'cried before him.' The Targums and Syriac translated 'father and ruler.' Only Aquila among the ancient translators conjectured that the word was derived from Heb. bārakh, 'bend the knee,' from which comes the translation of the Vulgate and EVV. This is now universally rejected as impossible. Friedrich Delitzsch and Sayce have suggested that this is the Babylonian word abarakku, the title of a high official; but, in spite of the Tell-el-Amarna letters, we should hardly expect an Egyptian officer to receive a Babylonian title. Numerous Egyptian etymologies of the term have been suggested, the best of which is that of Spiegelberg, who thinks that it represents Egypt. 'b r-k, 'Thy heart to thee,' a cry of attention. L. B. P.

ABRONAH, ʾa-brō'na (אֲבְרֹנָה, 'abhrōnāh, Ebronah AV): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33:44 f.). Site unknown.

ABSALOM, ab'sa-lom (אֲבִשָּׁלֹם, 'ābhshālōm, Abishalom in I K 15 2, 10), 'the (divine?) father is peace,' perhaps so named as a good omen of David's growing power: David's third son, born at Hebron of Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (II S 3 3). His character is delineated consistently throughout as fierce, revengeful, and treacherous. Evidently he inherited his traits from his mother's wild mountain ancestry. His first outbreak follows Amnon's outrage of Tamar (II S ch. 13), and self-exiled, he appears to wait in Geshur a vindication of his act. Joab's ruse to bring him back (II S ch. 14) seems to embody an attempt to secure the abrogation of the right of private blood-revenge. Absalom's recall was, therefore, equivalent to a legal enactment on the subject (II S 14 11). But his confinement thereafter to his own quarters was an affront which his untamed spirit could not brook, and which precipitated the insurrection wherein he perished (II S 18 14). The narrative (II S chs. 13-19) is intended to show how the folly of each of the presumptive heirs to the throne wrought their ruin and thus cleared the path for the youthful Solomon. Abijam (I K 15 2; but cf. II Ch. 13 2) and Asa (I K 15 10) were Absalom's descendants through his daughter Maacah.

ABYSS (ἄβυσσος), 'a place of great depth': The word occurs frequently in the LXX, as the translation of the Hebrew hōm, 'deep'. It is found in the Grk. of the Book of Enoch 21 7, etc., and in magical papyri. In Enoch it refers to the place of fiery punishment. In the N T it is the name of Hades, the place of the dead (Ro 10 7; Lk 8 31; Rev 9 1, 2, 11, 17 8, 20 1, 3. In AV of Rev, it is always rendered 'the bottomless pit'). See also ESCHATOLOGY, § 48.

A. C. Z.

ACACIA. See PALESTINE, § 21.

ACCAD, ak'ad (אַכַּד, 'akkadh): One of the four cities which, according to Gn 10 10, were the starting-point of the dominion of Nimrod in Babylonia. In the inscriptions the same word-form usually designates not a city but the division of the country lying N. of the district about Babylon. The form Agade, however, is written as the name of a very ancient city, also in N. Babylonia, and supreme over the whole country about 2800 B.C. This is doubtless the same name as Accad, the g of Sumerian being regularly represented in proper names by k (c) in Semitic Babylonian.

Accad was the chief center of the Semites in Babylonia, hence their language, which resembled Hebrew, was known as Accadian. Sumer, or S. Babylonia, remained in the hands of the primitive non-Semitic inhabitants, who for this reason are known as Sumerians, and their language as Sumerian. Down to Assyrian times Accad and Sumer continued to be the names of N. and S. Babylonia respectively.

ACCO, ak'o (אַכּוֹ, 'akkō, Accho AV; in Acts 21 7 called Ptolemais; Arabic, 'akka): A Canaanite city in the territory of the tribe of Asher (Jg 1 31), whose inhabitants were not driven out by Israel. Fortified and situated on the seacoast at the N. end of the Bay of Acre, and on the main road along the coast, it was important for controlling the roads inland to the fertile plain of Esdraelon and to lower Galilee. From the earliest times down to the Crusades its possession was considered of great strategic value, altho politically it was inferior to Tyre and Sidon. (See PALESTINE, § 4.) At the close of the 3d cent. B. C. its name was changed to Ptolemais. Map IV, B 6.

C. S. T.

ACCURSED: The RV translation of קִלְקָלָה (Dt 21 23) and לָלֵךְ (Is 65 20), from the root qālal, meaning 'to esteem lightly.' The AV has 'accursed' in most O T passages, where the RV has 'devoted' or 'devoted thing.' In the place of the AV 'accursed' the RV in N T reads 'anathema,' the transliteration of the Greek word. See ANATHEMA; DEVOTED; and CURSE.

ACCUSATION. See SUPERScription.

ACELDAMA. See AKELDAMA.

ACHAIA, a-kē'yā (Ἀχαΐα): In Homer the country inhabited by the Achæans, that is, all Greece. In the classical period only a narrow strip of coastland along the S. of the Gulf of Corinth. The Romans (after 27 B.C.) adopted the Homeric usage, and their Provincia Achaia (capital, Corinth) included all Greece along with Thessaly, Acarnania, Ætolia, Eubœa, and the Cyclades. This is N T usage, e.g. 'Gallio, Proconsul of Achaia' (Ac 18 12; cf. also 18 27; Ro 15 26, etc.). J. R. S. S.*—J. M. T.

ACHAICUS, a-kē'i-kus (Ἀχαϊκός): Mentioned in I Co 16 17 with Stephanos (q.v.) and Fortunatus (q.v.). From the exhortation in ver. 16 we infer that A. and the others mentioned occupied some important position in the Corinthian Church. They brought communications from Corinth and may have been the bearers of the present I Co to Paul in Ephesus (see Zahn, Int. N. T. Vol. I p. 268, n. 8.) Their attitude of friendliness relieved Paul's anxiety (ver. 18) particularly in view of the shortcomings of the church (ver. 17b).

J. M. T.

ACHAN, ē'kan (אֲחִישָׁר, 'akhān, called Achar, I Ch 2 7): A member of the tribe of Judah, who appropriated treasure from the spoils of Jericho, thus violating the law of the ban (herem) (see CURSE, § 2), according to which spoils of war were sacred to J'. This sin brought defeat on Israel at Ai. By lot Joshua discovered Achan to be the offender. In the valley of Achor he and his family were stoned to death, while all his property was burned (Jos 7 1-26).

ACHAZ, ('Αχας, Mt 1 9, Gr. for אֲחָז). See AHAZ, 1.

ACHBOR, ak'bōr (אֲכַבּוֹר, 'akhbōr), 'mouse': 1. The father of Baal-hanan, a king of Edom (Gn 36 38 f.; I Ch 1 49). 2. An official under Josiah and Jehoikim (II K 22 12-14 [but cf. II Ch 34 20]; Jer 26 22, 36 12).

ACHIM, ē'kim (אַחִישָׁר, 'akhish): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 14).

ACHISH, ē'kish (אֲכִישָׁר, 'akhish): The Philistine king of Gath who befriended David (I S 21 10 ff.) and later gave him Ziklag. He demanded David's aid against Saul, but yielded to the objections of the Philistine princes (I S chs. 27-29). He was still king at Solomon's accession, according to IK 2 39, but this creates a difficulty in view of David's conquest of Gath (II S 8 1; cf. I Ch 18 1), and of the lapse of time involved. E. E. N.

ACHMETHA, ak'mi-thā (אֲחֻמְתָּה, 'ahm'thā'): A royal city in Media where the roll was found containing a copy of Cyrus' decree permitting the return of the Jews (Ezr 6 2). The word is the Aramaic equivalent of the Pers. Haḡmatana or Ecbatana, as the Greeks spelled it. The site of the city mentioned in Ezra is somewhat uncertain, but Ecbatana, now called Hamadan, used by the Persian kings as a summer residence, was probably the city meant in Ezr 6 2 and To 6 5. See A. V. W. Jackson, Persia, Past and Present (1906), pp. 144-174. E. E. N.

ACHOR, ē'kōr, VALLEY OF (עֵקוֹר, 'ēmeq 'ākhōr), 'valley of trouble': The valley near Jericho where Achan was stoned (Jos 7 24-26). Identification with the Wādī-el-Kelt is unsatisfactory. Jos 15 7 implies a more southern, Is 65 10 a more spacious valley. Hos 2 15 plays on the meaning of the term. E. E. N.

ACHSAH, ak'sa (אֲחִישָׁה, 'akhshāh, Achsa AV), 'anklet': A daughter of Caleb (perhaps in reality a clan) given to Othniel for conquering Kiriath-sepher. The springs mentioned lay a few miles north of Debir (Jos 15 16 ff.; Jg 1 12 ff.; I Ch 2 49). E. E. N.

ACHSHAPH, ak'shaf (אֲחִישָׁפַת, 'akhshāph), 'sorcery': A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25) whose king was confederate with Jabin of Hazor against Joshua (Jos 11 1, 12 20). Site uncertain, as possibly there were two towns of the same name. E. E. N.

ACHZIB, ak'zib (אֲחִזְבִּי, 'akhzīb), 'winter torrent' (?): 1. One of the 22 towns of the tribe of Asher (Jos 19 29) on the seacoast S. of Tyre; the inhabitants were not driven out by Israel (Jg 1 31). Map IV, B 5. 2. A town in the Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Keilah and Mareshah (Jos 15 44), with Mareshah and Adullam (Mic 1 14); the same as Cozeba (I Ch 4 22) and Chezib (Gn 38 5). Map II, D 1. C. S. T.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, THE: 1. Introductory. The book of Acts is unique. Without it any consecutive knowledge of the Apostolic Age could not be attained, even with the aid of the Pauline letters. With it as background, all other data fall into order and unity in a way which speaks loudly for its historic worth. As, then, our hopes of constructing a sure picture of primitive Christianity depend largely on Ac, it is essential to form a correct idea as to its historicity. How far does it satisfy modern requirements? One thing must be borne in mind: its author, alone of N T writers, claims to write history (καθεξῆς γράψας), and to have satisfied the conditions of accurate inquiry (καθὼς . . . ἀκριβῶς) necessary to give the reader a sense of security (ἵνα ἐπιγνῶς . . . τὴν ἀσφάλειαν) touching the matters of Christian faith (τῶν περὶληροφημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων). Such is the claim of the preface (Lk 1-4) to his work in two parts, of which Ac is the second. It was meant as serious history, occasioned too by the consciousness that existing narratives dealing with the same class of facts were not satisfactory in this very respect, as a basis of rational historic assurance.

But, it will be said, there is history and history. We need to know how far Ac is an objective record of objective facts. As to the objectivity of its author's attitude, Ramsay is probably right in claiming for Ac a place among histories of the first rank, in which nothing is allowed consciously to deflect the historian from stating things as they really occurred. Only this does not mean the dead, superficial fidelity of a photograph, giving no guidance to the beholder by light and relief. Our author gives an interpretation of the story, particularly of its religious meaning, in order to aid one seeking in his own day for religious truth, so far as this can find expression in history. But this need not make him inaccurate, or ready to suppress facts material to the line of exposition selected, in keeping with the total effect of all known to the writer, altho much can not be brought in for reasons of space and perspective. Whether all that reached him as 'facts,' or even all that he recorded as himself an eye-witness, were really objective facts—at least as we should interpret them to-day—is another question. This can not here be discussed, save as regards the probability that our author was himself really witness of a large number of them—and these often, as Harnack points out, of the same 'supernatural' order as those which he records on the evidence of others. Approach, however, to all such problems lies through a consideration of the general drift of Ac, and of its verisimilitude or otherwise. The question of its Scope will lead on to those of its Sources, Aims, Occasion and Provenance, Date, and Authorship. The final test here, as in all history, will be coherence in our theory as the simplest way of unifying an immense complex of phenomena, literary and psychological.

2. Scope and Plan. Ac sets forth in orderly sequence (καθεξῆς) how the Divine Society constituted by the Gospel spread, in ever-widening circles, from its native home in Jerusalem even unto Rome, the distant capital of the world. This appears from the commission (1 8) given at the final interview between Jesus and those who as 'witnesses' were to continue His ministry, and who, as so commissioned, were 'apostles' in the wider sense, as distinct from the Twelve (see I 6, 14 f., 21; Lk 24 33 ff., and I Co 15 7, τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πάνσιν). We gather that their horizon was still confined to a Messianic Kingdom for Israel (1 6); and, in fact, down to ch. 15 we find traced, with a care implying a very primitive standpoint (for A.D. 70 effaced such shades of distinction), the gradual steps by which they accepted the logic of Divine facts, even when running counter to preconceived theory, in the annulling of Jewish restrictions upon membership in God's Kingdom. The one secret of this triumph of the Divine over human limitations—as of all those triumphs which constitute the moral of the book and its high argument—lay in the power of the Holy Spirit upon and through the Lord's witnesses. This is surely true to life. Here, too, lay the continuity between our author's two books: the same Spirit qualified the Master and His disciples (Lk 4 14, 24 49; Ac 1 1 f., 8, 2 33, cf. 16 7, 'the spirit of Jesus') both to do and endure; for the pathway of 'glory through suffering' was God's counsel for both (Lk 24 26, 46; Ac 14 22, cf. 5 41). The traditional Jewish forms of thought touching the mode of the Kingdom's consummation within the generation then living (Lk 21 32, cf. 9 27; Ac 1 11, 3 20 f.), and the natural assumption that Jewish forms of worship and ritual still held good, did not suddenly fall away. The Gospel did not 'destroy' save through being seen to 'fulfil.' These things simply faded away in the growing light which spread from the new luminary of the spiritual world; and the subjective power to appropriate all in Him turned on the Messianic gift, the 'Spirit of the Lord' in new form and fullness, which constituted the New Israel out of the Old in spite of its wonted stiff-necked resistance to the Holy Spirit (7 51). Israel was then a 'crooked generation,' from which 'salvation' was needful (2 40, 4 12, cf. 13 26-41).

Accordingly, the Messianic outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost holds the same determinative place in Ac as the coming of the Holy Spirit to Jesus Himself in the Gospel, as unfolded in the discourse in the synagog at Nazareth (Lk 3 21 f., 4 14-30). The Anointed himself becomes the Anointer of God's new People (2 33), through whom He continues 'to do and teach' (1 1, 8) on earth; and the living link between them is that 'holy Spirit' wherewith it is His prerogative to baptize His own (1 5, 2 4, 33, 38, 10 44-47). The parallel is all the closer in that in both cases rejection by Judaism follows, because the conditions of the Kingdom are presented as purely spiritual, so that birth confers nothing but prior opportunity. Thus Ac depicts, first, the Divine power and spirituality of life manifest in the nucleus of the coming Kingdom, the new and true Congregation (Ecclesia) of God's People; while Judaism passes self-judgment upon itself, step by step, by hardness of heart to the Spirit's appeal (chs. 3-5). Anon we are shown a certain differentiation within the Ecclesia itself, between the less and the more progressive types—those strictly 'Hebrews,' and those in fuller sympathy with Israel's wider heritage owing to experience of the Greek world, the 'Hellenists.' The spokesman of the latter is Stephen, whose speech before the official representatives of Judaism indicates the principles at issue, and foreshadows the line of development for the Ecclesia. Then the shaking of persecution (chs. 6, 7) providentially spreads the true seed beyond Jerusalem, in various soils more and more remote from those heretofore held fit for the reception of God's word. Thus the Samaritans respond to Philip the Evangelist, and are solemnly adjudged by God worthy of the Messianic gift, through the agency of Peter and John—most authoritative of 'apostles': an imperfect proselyte (a eunuch) is by special Divine action admitted, less publicly, through Philip: there follow proofs of God's hand with His new Ecclesia, in the conversion and early ministry of Saul, the leader of the recent persecution, and next in typical incidents taken from Peter's missionary work in Judea; and then the latter is led to sanction the admission of a group of proselytes—in sheer deference to God's manifest will in the gift of the Spirit. This case is made the more significant by being challenged at Jerusalem and successfully vindicated by Peter, on the ground that God had acted and could not be gainsaid. Thus 'to the Gentiles had God given repentance unto life' (11 18).

This occurred at Cæsarea, just beyond the borders of the Holy Land of Judea proper (12 10), and might not have been tolerated nearer to Jerusalem. Further it affected but few in the first instance, and was probably not expected to extend very far numerically. But in both respects God was already on the way to transcend Jewish-Christian thought even more signally. Yet here too progress was gradual, and no sharp breach was actually caused with the Palestinian Ecclesia. This, so far, had conceived of itself as 'the Ecclesia,' made up of 'the saints' proper (9 13, 32, 41; 26 10; also I Co 16 1; Ro 15 25), while non-Jewish adherents were Messianic proselytes on the skirts of Israel (as with orthodox Judaism). Such a conception would be helped by the sense that all was still provisional. 'The Lord was at hand,' and He would perfect all in His Ecclesia. But the conception was menaced as soon as membership in the Ecclesia extended far beyond Palestine, and included large masses of persons hitherto assumed to be exceptions by special Divine bounty. This is what happened at Antioch, which therefore is treated as the second home of the Gospel, and then as the starting-point of the Gentile Mission proper. According to the contrast demanded by 11 19 f., the 'great number' who there hastened to believe were 'Greeks' (not 'Hellenists' and therefore Jews of a kind, cf. 6 1). So great a change in relative proportions would in itself warrant the sending of some one to examine and report; and appropriately Barnabas, himself a 'Hellenist,' or Jew of Greek culture, born among Gentiles in Cyprus (4 36), like some of the preachers, was chosen, not Peter and John (as for Samaria).

The extension to Antioch, standing midway between the Jewish and Greek spheres, was a momentous step; and there, significantly, the disciples of Jesus first obtained the name distinguishing them from Jews proper, 'Christians.' There too begins the association of Saul with Barnabas, which marks the next stage of advance—still without loss of touch with the old center, Judea (11 27-30). But before leaving the fortunes of the Gospel in its first home, we are shown how attempts to harm it ever turned, by God's grace, to the confusion of its foes (ch. 12): then, with a verse reestablishing sequence with ch. 11, we pass on to the beginnings of the real Gentile mission, with its base at Antioch.

And now Saul—who at the psychological moment (13 9) is given his Gentile name, Paul—comes out in his true rôle as the main agent of the Divine counsel in the wider destiny of the Gospel, as surely as Peter had been the pioneer in its more restricted field. The 'turning to the Gentiles' is narrated very emphatically in 13 46-48; while the moral of the whole mission is pointed in 14 27, 'how that He (God) had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles.' It was seemingly the news of this great extension of Gentile Christianity on principle that drove the more reactionary wing of the Jerusalem church (now including Pharisees, 15 5) to action in Antioch, where it was felt that the issue had to be fought out (see 8 below, and GALATIANS, § 3). With the Jerusalem Concordat, which settled it for the time, i.e. as it arose in Antioch and its province, Syria-Cilicia, where the Jewish element side by side with the Gentile was large, the story, as so far told, reaches its natural conclusion (15 35). Hitherto it has been treated in the main from the Jewish standpoint, from which the conditions of intercourse in the Ecclesia between Jew and Gentile set forth in 15 20, 29, seemed to be minimum concessions (ταῦτα τὰ ἐπιτάγας) to unity on the part of the latter (see 8 below). Hereafter, however, the horizon widens enormously; new interests and conditions arise; the old platform becomes too narrow in practise, where Gentiles more and more outnumber Jewish converts in typically Gentile regions. Antioch and its associations are largely left behind; and the history gathers round the career of the Apostle of the Gentiles, whose personal commission determines his conduct in regions to which, in his judgment, the Jerusalem compact was inapplicable.

3. Sources of Acts. At this point the sources of the narrative in Ac demand notice. The subject has been much discussed and is still far from settled (see Foakes-Jackson and Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, II, pp. 121-175). As regards what precedes, it is clear that something more than oral tradition must lie behind our Ac; for both in the forms of thought and phrasing and in matters of pure style chs. 1-12 and 15 are more Jewish-Christian than can be due merely to the author of Ac as a whole. Many scholars distinguish at least two written sources, one Judean, the other Antiochene, in origin, as of primary interest. But really there is very little serious linguistic difference between the various sections of Ac 1-15 (op. cit. p. 128), a fact to which C. C. Torrey's recent theory (untenable as it seems itself to be) strongly testifies, when he contends that 'Ac chs. 1-15 is the careful . . . translation . . . of an Aramaic document.' Linguistically, then, the use of one Hellenistic source embodying oral Aramaic traditions would account for the bulk of the first half of Ac; but some of its contents require a less obvious explanation. No theory, indeed, at present commands general assent. Yet a method combining the study of form and content in a living way promises ere long a real solution of the problem.

The best approach is through the author's own hints in his Preface to his continuous work in two books (Lk 1 4). 'Inasmuch as a number of persons have essayed to draw up an account of the assured facts of our religion, on the basis of the traditions passed on to us by the original eye-witnesses who became also ministers of the Message; it seemed good to me, too, as one who had traced all the story, from its very start, with care, to write it for you in order, most excellent Theophilus, so as to let you know, as touching what you have been taught, the certain truth.' This surely suggests special personal contact with those who were in a position to give him virtually eye-witness information, as his main advantage over others; and this would hold good in proportion as the story comes nearer to his own day. That is, he virtually passes on what he had received, and as he had received it, from selected and trustworthy informants. Part of this tradition, perhaps the greater part, some 'minister of the message' may have already written down himself or, more probably, dictated to our author at his request as he sought to 'trace the course' of things 'from the first.' Such a consecutive written source seems to underlie alike the special element in the Lucan Gospel and the account in Ac of the early Jerusalem and Judean activity of the apostolic circle of 'witnesses,' esp. Peter and John (cf. Lk 22 7); and its real author may well have been Philip 'the Evangelist' or Preacher of the Gospel (Ac 21 8), whom Luke met at Caesarea. But further, Luke had probably taken down from his lips, or from those of others, detached notes of other incidents; and these he would have at hand as supplemental material for his continuous narrative, when later on he thought of writing it to meet the needs of the time. This he did on the basis of the primary written source (in more or less connected form) just mentioned, supplementing it as he was thus able, and carrying on the story of the Church's origin and growth yet further. When the primary source ended, as it probably did where 'the Word' finally goes beyond Judea, it was already overlapping with his own personal knowledge of the Antiochene stage (11 30-32, 12 23-13 4, 14 15) and of the developments starting afresh therefrom (chs. 13-14 and 16 ff.).

For the early Judean days (ch. 1-5) Luke's other impressions derived, e.g., from informants in Antioch (cf. 13 4) and Ephesus, ran parallel in part with matter in his chief Caesarean (or Philip) source. They seem also to have included an account of the Day of Pentecost which, as current at a distance of place and time, contained a mistaken view (2 4, 40-41) of the 'speaking with other (different) tongues' (2 4), as if this meant foreign languages; whereas both the scoffing remark in v. 13 and Peter's reply thereto, as also the references to this spiritual phenomenon in 10 47, 11 14 f., imply that it was a special ecstatic form of emotional utterance (see 1 Co 14). In the use of his written materials, including the more consecutive Caesarean source—to which Luke adheres closely in the Gospel (even when it differs from Mark's narrative), and so probably in Ac also—our author naturally adapts the wording, particularly at the beginning and end of each section, to the needs of the new setting as meant for 'Theophilus.' Similar dovetailing of Palestinian with Antiochene materials recurs in what follows chs. 1-5, where the 'Hellenists'—more liberal or Grecizing Jews—come on the scene, first in 6 1-8 (Stephen and Philip) and later in 11 19-30 (Antioch), while in between come the conversion and early ministry of Saul (9 1-30), preparatory to the latter or Antiochene events. Attached to 6 1-8 4 are some Palestinian episodes (8 4-9), where Philip, the Hellenist colleague of Stephen, appears as an actor (and probable informant, cf. 'Peter and John' in 8 13 with 3 4, 4 13, 19). Similarly in 9 32-11 30 we have a long Petrine section—probably from the main Caesarean written source—on which follows the first Antiochene episode (11 19-30). The sections on Herod as persecutor (12 1-19), perhaps gathered from Mark, see 13 4, and the Divine judgment on him (12 19-25) bring the story back to Caesarea.

Finally Luke's Caesarean memorandum, which included in its interests the extension of the Gospel beyond Judaism, seems to have gone on (after 11 30) to describe the climax of that process in the Concordat between Jerusalem and Antioch (cf. Ac 15 1-23). The intervening matter seems to come from other sources. The story of Peter's imprisonment by Herod and his escape points (12 13, the maid's name, Rhoda) to Mark as its ultimate witness; while chs. 13 and 14 suggest, alike in their subject-matter and their vivid detail, the eye-witness of the latter part of Acts (In 14 22 we get even a 'we' passage), who was probably Luke himself, the author of Ac as a whole.

The above suggestions may be summed up roughly as follows: (1) Luke's main or continuous written source (largely Caesarean tradition), as in the Gospel; covering broadly 1-11 26, 12 1-24, 15 1-33. (2) Detached episodes in Luke's note book and memory, mainly obtained at Antioch; e.g. 2 5, 8b-11, 11 25-30, 12-14, 15 35. The author's editorial hand throughout has to be allowed for in various ways, especially in (2).

For the latter part of Ac all is due to Luke's memory or notes, as the case may be; nor is the absence of 'we' any sure disproof of his presence, as its occasional occurrence may have merely a psychological or emotional significance.

4. Aims. The motifs underlying the narrative, and causing selection from a larger mass of materials, are varied. The central one, the universal spirit of Hebrew religion, and its Divine origin—in spite of Jewish blindness and hardness of heart, now as in former days (cf. Stephen's Speech)—persists from first to last, with its climax at Rome (28 17-28). But with it blends more and more another idea, its counterpart, viz., the witness borne by the attitude of typical representatives of the Gentile world, the Roman Empire in the widest sense, that the hostility of actual Judaism was vexatious and groundless. Further, so far as Judaism might try to crush its rival by suggesting that it was an element of disorder and even of disloyalty in the Empire, the early history of the Christian Church and its relations to the Roman State, and its law and order, refuted the charges. Such troubles as had arisen were in fact due to Jewish jealousy. All these lines of thought meet in Paul himself, and in his attitude, whether to his national religion or to Roman citizenship. To both he was essentially loyal. This explains the long and at first sight unduly prolix story of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem and its issues, particularly the repeated speeches of defense. Paul, indeed, was the embodied apologia of the Church in the Roman Empire, over against all its traducers (cf. Von Soden, Early Christian Literature [1906], pp. 230 ff.).

The occasion of Ac, then, like that of all N T writings, is practical. It is determined by pressing religious needs, not by abstract or scientific interests. It is an apology for the religion of Jesus, addressed primarily to men of faith, yet a faith distressed both by bitter opposition and by some perplexities of thought, not as yet quite at home with the deeper ideas of the new religion—as one of power shown through suffering, not through prosperity (the notion of ancient religion generally). But while primarily meant for actual faith, Luke's writings, perhaps alone in the N T, look also to potential faith outside, in 'men of good-will' who need only to know the facts in all the impressiveness of their true order—so that their real meaning jumps to the eye—in order to believe in the 'Kingdom of God.'

5. Provenance. Where, then, was such a work likely to arise? Internal evidence suggests that the region in which its first readers were most interested was the Roman province of Asia (note references to Paul's abortive wish to visit it and Bithynia in 16 ff.), where the concrete narrative becomes most detailed and the topography most minute (18 24-21; contrast the verses given to the last visit to Greece, 20 2-5).

Note in particular the forecast (20 26-36) of future dangers at Ephesus. Observe too the allusiveness of the reference to 'the School of Tyrannus' ('a certain' was soon added to soften it) in 19 9, as the self-explanatory for 'Theophilus' and his circle (cf. the abrupt reference to 'Alexander' in 19 33); also the triviality of the itinerary in 20 13-25, save for those familiar with the coast between Troas and Ephesus.

Here reference may be made to some of the most striking of the readings in Codex Bezae, etc. A whole series of them betray special acquaintance with Asia Minor (Ramsay); and these are among the oldest of the so called 'Western' or  $\beta$  text. But they are never more than intelligent glosses, showing that Ac was read with more than usual interest in the region (cf. the  $\beta$  gloss in 11 28 due to local interest in Antioch).

Finally, consider the correspondence between this environment and the motifs of Ac, as already described: the numbers and influence of the Jews in Asia (referred to in 21 27, 24 19 as prime causes of Paul's arrest); the bitterness of their hostility to the Christians in the later Apostolic age (Rev 2 9 f.); the interest for this region of the modus vivendi of Ac 15 20, 29, in the light especially of Rev 2 6, 14 f., 20; and the problem of the true relations of Judaism and Christianity there as late as Ignatius' day. These things constitute strong cumulative evidence for Asia, and Ephesus in particular, as the original home of Ac. Dr. B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels, has recently argued for Rome as the home of Luke's Gospel and Ac. But he has not discussed Ephesus, especially as to Ac; and the above evidence for it seem stronger than any he adduces for Rome.

6. Date. If this be granted, it will add also to our evidence for date, in so far as the tone of Ac is optimistic touching Rome's attitude to Christians, apart from Jewish envy and slander. It assumes that Rome may continue its old policy of treating Christianity as a form, the most legitimate form, of Israel's religion, and as sharing its status as a religio licita. When exactly the course of events in Asia, the center of fanatical Caesar-worship, rendered such hopes untenable, it is hard to say; but relatively early, we may be sure, apart even from the evidence of Rev, the date of which is itself an open question. Harnack thinks a date about 80 A. D. most probable: the present writer inclines to a date earlier in the Vespasian era, as better suiting the words of the Gospel (21 32, cf. 9 28 f.) touching the fulfilment of 'all things' before the passing of the original generation of Christ's hearers. The experiences of the era of the siege and fall of Jerusalem seem clearly implied in the wording of Luke 21; but the 'times of the Gentiles' have yet to run out (21 24, 28). Still 'redemption draweth nigh,' and some of Christ's generation will see it.

The argument for a date about 100 A. D. derived from parallels with Josephus' Antiquities is quite 'in the air' (Harnack, op. cit., p. 18). It does not account for the divergences in the case either of Theudas (5 36, e.g., the number 400)—whatever be made of the account in Ac—or of Herod (12 23 ff.). On the other hand, it is unsafe to argue, as has been done afresh quite recently, from the point at which Ac ends (61-62 A. D.). For (1) the author's own reiteration of Paul's words at Miletus (20 25) to the effect that he would not again visit his Asian churches, contains the hint that his course was nearly run (see TIMOTHY and TITUS, EPISTLES to); (2) the narrative has reached its natural climax when the Gospel is preached by Paul in Rome. Paulus Romæ apud Evangelium. Nothing of equal significance could be added. The heroic age, in which the Divine power working in Christ's witnesses was most manifest, was already well-nigh over.

7. Authorship. Finally, a date between 75 and 80 A. D. best suits the most probable theory as to authorship, viz., that the whole work, as distinct from a supposed Travel-diary—cropping out here and there between chs. 16 and 28—comes from Luke, 'the beloved physician,' companion and helper in the Gospel to Paul, who is the hero of the book's most moving sections (see 'The Case for the Tradition,' in Beg. of Christianity, II, pp. 265-297). Harnack has accepted and restated in Luke the Physician the arguments used by scientific defenders of the traditional authorship,<sup>1</sup> such as Hobart in The Medical <sup>1</sup>This is supported, for Luke's Gospel, by very early and wide-spread evidence, going back as far as Marcion (c. 140 A. D.). Such is natural, if Harnack be right in saying that a work with a Prolog must from the first have had its author's name in the title. Evidence of the use of Ac is probable (so Holtzmann) in Ignatius of Antioch and Polycarp of Smyrna, c. 115 A. D., and perhaps even earlier in Clement of Rome (xviii, 1, cf. Ac 13 27).

Language of St. Luke (1882), and Sir J. C. Hawkins in Horæ Synopticæ (1899), as regards the stylistic unity of Ac generally (see J Th S. XXIV, p. 361 ff. for a recent vindication of this argument). At present, then, as far as linguistic evidence goes, this view may be said to hold the field. The weakness of the counter view, which assigns Ac to about 100 A.D. (see 'The Case against the Tradition,' op. cit., pp. 298-348), is seen in the paradox to which it is driven, in order to account for certain Hellenistic features in the warp and woof of the book, that its final author was a 'Hellenistic Jew' (so Wendt and B. W. Bacon). The form of the preface to both works, and their whole feeling when dealing with Greco-Roman matters (cf. Ramsay), make this most unlikely. Luke, however, altho born a Gentile (whether Syrian or Greek in race), would naturally have much of the Hellenist in his training—he may have been a Jewish proselyte to begin with—which suits the complex conditions of the problem, both of style and thought, completely. Early tradition touching him is well summed up in the Monarchian Prolog to Luke's Gospel: 'Luke, a Syrian by race, an Antiochene,<sup>2</sup> by profession a physician, . . . departed this life at the age of seventy-four, in Bithynia.' The latter statements, in no way suspicious in themselves, agree well in all respects with the foregoing theory.

8. Relation to the Pauline Letters. One confirmation of Luke's authorship lies in the apparent non-use of the Pauline letters, which any one save a companion of Paul's would eagerly study for data. Particularly striking is the case as regards the Epistle to the Galatians, which runs parallel to much in Ac, and the absence of exact harmony with which is by some made a prime reason for denying Lucan authorship. As this case is crucial for the historicity of Ac, we must deal with it somewhat fully, instead of trying to discuss minor problems of like order.

Some still regard Ac 15 and Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> as both historically trustworthy versions of the same incident, in spite of their marked differences. Such differences are, e.g., (1) their ostensible occasion; (2) the privacy implied in Gal 2 (where it was important for the purpose of Paul's argument to emphasize the public vindication of his own Gospel, if it had then occurred); (3) the practical conditions laid down for keeping the two separate missions in sufficient touch with each other—as to which Paul's language in Gal 2<sup>10</sup>, 'only,' etc., formally excludes any other terms than those he specifies; (4) the clear implication both of Paul's logic (which does not leave him free to pass over any visit between Gal 1<sup>10</sup> and 2 without explanation) and of the statement that he remained still unknown by face to the churches of Judea (1<sup>21</sup>), to the effect that no visit to Jerusalem fell between his Gal 1<sup>18</sup> and 2<sup>1</sup>, whereas Ac 11<sup>27</sup> records a relief visit to Judea after Gal 1<sup>18</sup>; (5) the contrast between the attitude of Peter, and yet more of Barnabas (after his Gentile experiences in Ac chs. 13-14), in Gal 2<sup>11</sup> ff., with what we should gather of them in Ac ch. 15 (esp. 8-22). Those who see their way through these differences must be allowed to take their own course; but they can not fairly cite Lightfoot's authority since the 'South-Galatian' theory, which makes Paul in Galatians address a totally different body of readers from that contemplated by him, has become so widely accepted, even by defenders of Ac ch. 15—Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>. This changes the whole perspective. In particular it makes the natural assumption that Paul is defending the independent authority of his Gospel as proved prior to his 'begetting' his readers by its agency—an assumption involved by Lightfoot's 'North-Galatian' theory—tell heavily against Ac ch. 15—Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> on the current theory.

Turning, then, to those who agree in regarding the foregoing historical equation impossible, we have two types of theory. The one frankly denies any real historicity to Ac 15, and in most cases performs a critical operation on its organic unity, separating the conditions contemplated in 15<sup>20</sup>, cf. 21<sup>20</sup>, from the narrative as a whole, and relegating them to some later occasion, real or supposed. This leaves Ac thoroughly discredited, and its Lucan authorship out of the question. Here Harnack's present position is untenable. As Schürer pressed home in the TLZ (1906, cols. 406 f.). He must unify his literary and historical results somehow. The other theory challenges the traditional dogma that Ac ch. 15 must be meant to refer to the same visit as Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>, and sets about finding an earlier stage in the story of the Gospel's extension in Ac with which it may be correlated. Thus there is no reason why a private conference should not have taken place between the Antiochene and Jerusalem leaders touching their respective missions—with a view to anticipate public difficulties such as a Paul would readily foresee (cf. Gal 2<sup>2</sup>)—prior to the emergence of public occasion for the deputation of Ac 15<sup>2</sup> ('and certain others'). Distinguite tempora. As yet the problem was not one present to the rank and file at all, only to Paul himself in the first instance—leading him up 'by revelation,' to make sure of the 'pillar' apostles. On this occasion these devout followers of the finger of God (cf. Ac 11<sup>17</sup>), and later 15<sup>8</sup>, 12-17 felt the unity of the Divine working visible in both types of mission, and simply requested that Paul should see to it that he and his converts 'should remember the poor,' in keeping with the best traditions of Jewish piety (cf. Acts 2<sup>44</sup> ff.). It is just here that the second theory divides into alternative forms. Ramsay, followed by V. Weber and others, sees in the wording of Gal 2<sup>10</sup> a reference to Paul's being in Jerusalem for the very purpose of showing the Antiochene mindfulness of the poor saints in Judea (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>). But the present writer considers this identification exegetically forced, and views that Relief visit rather as an early proof<sup>3</sup> of Paul's zeal for the principle agreed on in Gal 2<sup>10</sup>. It is simplest and best to assume, as we are free to do—since the account in Ac is so far from professing to be a complete narrative—that the visit of Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> is an otherwise unrecorded visit (perhaps due to the 'revelation' of II Cor 12<sup>1-4</sup>, cf. Gal 2<sup>2</sup>), preparing the way privately for that other and public concordat which was occasioned by overt controversy in Antioch some years later (but see GALATIANS, § 3). Thus there is no necessary clash between Ac 15 and Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>; and, with similar allowance for different perspective, we may say the same for Ac 9 and Gal 1<sup>18-21</sup>, touching Paul's movements in the first years after his conversion.

ADADAH, ad'a-da (אָדָּאָה, 'adh'adhāh). A town on the S. border of Judah (Jos 15 22). Probably the Aroer (q.v.) of I S 30 28.

ADAH, e'd'a (אָדָּה, 'adhāh), 'beauty': 1. A wife of Lamech (Gn 4 19 ff.). 2. The Hittite wife of Esau (Gn 36 2 ff.).

<sup>3</sup>At best, Paul's account could apply only to a private conference at the time of Ac ch. 15, but not there recorded; while yet Paul lays all the stress on it (but see GALATIANS, § 3).

ADAIAB, a-dē'ya or -yā (אֲדַיָּא, 'adhāyāh), 'J' has adorned: 1. The maternal grandfather of King Josiah, of Bozkath in the Shephelah of Judah (II K 22 1). 2. A Levite of the sons of the Kohathites (I Ch 6 41). 3. A Benjamite of the family of Shimei (Shema ver. 13), (I Ch 8 21) of Jerusalem. 4. A priest dwelling in Jerusalem (I Ch 9 12). 5. The father of Maaseiah (II Ch 23 1, here spelled אֲדַיָּא). 6. A man of the family of Bani of the postexilic Jewish community who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 29). 7. Another of same family and guilty of same offense (Ezr 10 39). 8. A descendant of Perez, son of Judah (Neh 11 5). 9. A priest, son of Jeroham, in the post-exilic list of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; probably the same as 4 (Neh 11 12). C. S. T.

ADALIA, ad'ā-lai'ā (אֲדַלְיָא, 'adhalyā'): One of Haman's ten sons (Est 9 8).

ADAM, ad'ām אָדָם, 'adhām, from root אָדָם, 'to build,' 'produce'?): I. According to the creation story of Genesis the name of the first man of the race. The Hebrew word used without the article is the name of the first man (Gn 4 25, 5 1, 3-5; I Ch 1 1; also Gn 2 20, 3 17, 21?); with the article, it should be translated 'the man,' as it is in most instances in RV, where AV has 'Adam.' It is used as the name of the first man where it is necessary to distinguish him from his descendants. In the N T the Greek transliteration 'Αδὰμ is used as the name of the first man (Jude ver. 14), who is looked upon as the father of the whole human race, so closely connected with all men that he involved all in his acts (Ro 5 14a; I Co 15 45a; I Ti 2 13 f.). In Ro 5 14b (5 12 f.), I Co 15 22 Paul brings out the historical connection of Adam with humanity, in representing him as being the author of sin and death for all by his one act of disobedience; in this he is a type—tho by contrast in result—of Christ, who by His one act of obedience is the conqueror of sin and death. In I Co 15 45 Paul seems to go from the influence exerted historically to nature, i.e., to the relation in which they stand to humanity; Adam the first sensuous, earthly man, Christ the second and last, the spiritual and heavenly man.

II. The name of a city in the Jordan valley, near the mouth of the Jabbok, where the waters were dammed up when Joshua led Israel into Canaan (Jos 3 16). Map III, H 4. C. S. T.

ADAM, THE BOOKS OF: This general title is given to a number of apocryphal and apocalyptic productions (by Christian hands on the basis of Jewish originals), embodying semi-religious romances in which Adam and Eve figured as the chief characters and the story of Gn ch. 3 is supplemented and embellished by legendary or mythical accretions. The exact titles and contents of these documents can not be definitely identified at this stage of the investigation. It appears most probable, however, that the Adam literature is traceable to two original Jewish works, viz., (1) The Apocalypse of Adam (called by some The Testament of Adam and The Penitence of Adam) and (2) The Life of Adam and Eve (Latin, Vita Adae et Evae, or The Narrative of the Citizenship of Adam and Eve, ed. Tischendorf, 1867). The data are scattered over a large number of patristic writings. But see M. R. James, The Lost Apocrypha of the O. T., (1920), p. 8; also Charles, Apocr. and Pseudep. of the O. T., vol. II, (1913).

ADAMAH, ad'ā-mā (אֲדָמָה, 'adhāmāh): A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 36). The identification, Map IV, G 7, is uncertain.

ADAMANT. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 3.

ADAMI-NEKEB, ad'ā-mai-nek'eb (אֲדָמִי נֶקֶב, 'adhāmī hanneqebh): A town on the NW. border of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). Its site is uncertain.

ADAR. See TIME, § 3, and ADDAR II.

ADBEEL, ad'bi-el (אֲדָבִיִּל, 'adhb'ēl): A 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29). An Arabian tribe Idiba'il near Egypt is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions.

ADDAN, ad'dān (אֲדָן, 'addān): The Babylonian home of certain exiles who were unable to prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 59). Called Addon in Neh 7 61 ff. Site unknown.

ADDAR, ad'dūr (אֲדָר, 'addār): I. Ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 8 3). Cf. Ard in Gn 46 21; Nu 26 40. II. A town on the S. border of Judah, site unknown (Jos 15 3 Adar, AV). In Nu 34 4 it is combined with Hebron into Hazar-Addar. E. E. N.

ADDER. See PALESTINE, § 26.

ADDI, ad'dai (אֲדָדַי, 'addai): An ancestor of Christ (Lk 3 28).

ADDON. See ADDAN.

ADER. See EDER.

ADIEL, ad'i-el (אֲדִיֵּל, 'adhī'ēl): 1. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 36-40). 2. A priest (I Ch 9 12). 3. Father of Azmaveth (I Ch 27 25).

ADIN, ad'in (אֲדִין, 'adhīn): The ancestral head of a large postexilic family (Ezr 2 15, 8 6; Neh 7 20, 10 16).

ADINA, ad-dai'nā (אֲדִינָה, 'adhīnā'), 'delightful': A Reubenite chieftain in David's army (I Ch 11 42).

ADINO, ad-dai'no (אֲדִינוֹ, 'adhīnō): II S 23 8 reads 'Adino the Eznite' as a second name of David's mightiest hero. The text is doubtless corrupt; the true reading is perhaps preserved in I Ch 11 n 'he lifted up his spear.' E. E. N.

ADITHAIM, ad'i-thē'im (אֲדִיתַּיִם, 'adhithayim'): A city of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15 36). Site unknown.

ADJURE. See OATH.

ADLAI, ad'lē-ai (אֲדַלַּי, 'adhlay): Father of Shaphat (I Ch 27 29).

ADMAH, ad'mā (אֲדָמָה, 'admāh): One of the cities near the Dead Sea that rebelled against Chedorlaomer (Gn 10 19, 14 2, 8). A. with Zeboim was destroyed (Hos 11 8), according to Dt 29 22 at the same time with Sodom and Gomorrah. Nothing is known of its site. E. E. N.

ADMATHA. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

ADNA, ad'nā (אֲדָנָה, 'adhnā'), 'pleasure': 1. One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab' (Ezr 10 30). 2. A priest (Neh 12 15).

ADNAH, ad'na (אֲדָנָה, 'adnāh): 1. A Manassite who deserted Saul for David (I Ch 12 20). 2. A captain under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 14).

ADONIBEZEK, a-dō'nai-bi'zek (אֲדוֹנִיבֶזֶק, 'ādhōnī-bhezēq), 'lord of Bezek': A Canaanite king defeated by Judah and Simeon at Bezek. He escaped, but was pursued, captured, and mutilated. He died afterward in Jerusalem (Jg 1 5-7). A. C. Z.

ADONIJAH, ad'o-nai'ja (אֲדוֹנִיָּא, 'ādhōnīyāh), 'my Lord is J': 1. The fourth son of David. His mother was Haggith (II S 3 4). Near the close of David's reign he assumed royal state, hoping to become his father's successor. Joab and Abiathar were his active supporters. He made a feast at the Stone of Zoheleth, near Jerusalem, and invited all the king's sons and nobility, except Solomon and his partisans, Benaiah, Zadok, and Nathan. Here he disclosed his plot for seizing the throne. At this critical juncture Nathan advised Bath-sheba to remind David of his promise to appoint Solomon as his successor. David acted with characteristic energy, commanding Solomon to ride on his own mule to Gihon, there to be anointed by Zadok and proclaimed king under the protection of the bodyguard. A. and his guests heard the acclamations of the populace, and Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, informed them of the coronation. A. took refuge at the altar, but Solomon graciously pardoned him. Later, he preferred a request to Solomon through Bath-sheba for Abishag, David's concubine. As the harem of a king belonged to his successor, Solomon rightly considered this an act of treason, and had him put to death (I K chs. 1 and 2). 2. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 3. Ancestral head of a family of Levites (Neh 10 16) called Adonikam (q.v.) in Ezr 2 13, etc. J. A. K.

ADONIKAM, ad'o-nai'kəm (אֲדוֹנִיקָם, 'ādhōnī-kām), 'the Lord is risen up': Ancestor of a large post-exilic family (Ezr 2 13, 8 13; Neh 7 13). Called Adonijah in Neh 10 16.

ADONIRAM, ad'o-nai'rəm (אֲדוֹנִירָם, 'ādhōnīrām), 'the Lord is high' (abbreviated (?) into Adoram and Hadoram): Overseer of the men forced to work on public works under David and Solomon (II S 20 24; I K 4 6, 5 14). He was stoned to death in N. Israel (I K 12 18; II Ch 10 18). E. E. N.

ADONIS, PLANTINGS OF. The ERV mg. at Is 17 10 for 'pleasant plants' in AV and ARV. If the Hebrew word na'āmānīm is a proper name, the equivalent of the more usual Tammuz, the Greek Adonis, the reference is to the so called 'baskets of Adonis' i.e., baskets or pots planted with quick-growing plants which, subjected to a forced growth for eight days, symbolized the life-giving power of Adonis. Isaiah implies that this form of nature-worship was practised in N. Israel. He emphasized the weakness inherent in such forced growth as indicative of the lack of any real power or help in these strange deities and their cults. Cf. The New Century Bible or The Cambridge Bible on Is 17 10. See also TAMMUZ. E. E. N.

ADONIZEDEK, a-dō'nai-zī'dek (אֲדוֹנִיזֶדֶק, 'ādhōnī tzedeq), 'lord of righteousness': King of Jerusalem when Joshua conquered Ai; he entered into a league with four other Canaanite kings to fight against the inhabitants of Gibeon, which had made peace with Israel. He was defeated and put to death by hanging (Jos 10 1, 3, 26). Perhaps the same as Adoni-bezek (Jg 1 6). C. S. T.

ADOPTION (αἰσθεσις: A legal term appropriated by theology. Its Biblical usage is limited to the Pauline epistles (Ro 8 15, 23, 9 4; Gal 4 5; Eph 1 5). Here it signifies the act by which the privileges of a child of God are conferred upon the believer in Jesus Christ. In the Roman judicial system a place was made for a formal act of adoption. In Israelite history cases of adoption also occur. Esther was adopted by Mordecai (Est 2 7, cf. also the cases of Moses, Ex 2 9, and of Genubath, I K 11 20). But no formal act is mentioned. According to the Roman law, on the other hand, the person to be adopted was publicly sold to the prospective parent before witnesses, and thenceforth became a member of the latter's family, exactly as if he had been born into it.

The Apostle's use of the Roman legal term is designed to show that the redeemed saint not only is changed inwardly but also secures the privileges of a child of God. But it may be that the act is the important thing in the Apostle's mind; in such a case adoption is a separate and distinct stage of redemption. A. C. Z.

ADORAIM, ad'o-rē'im (אֲדוֹרַיִם, 'ādhōrayim): A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam, about 6 m. W. of Hebron (II Ch 11 9). Map II, E 2.

ADORAM. See ADONIRAM.

ADRAMMELECH, a-dram'ī-lek (אֲדַרְמֶלֶךְ, 'ādhrammelekh): 1. One of the gods of Sepharvaim (II K 17 31), or Sippar in Assyria, possibly Adar (Adrammelech = Adar-King); but a god Adar is unknown in the Assyrian pantheon. 2. One of the two sons of Sennacherib, who murdered their father on his return from the unsuccessful campaign against Jerusalem (Is 37 38; II K 19 37; in the latter passage, however, the word 'son' does not occur). A. C. Z.

ADRAMYTTIUM, ad'ra-mit'ī-om (Ἀδραμύττιον and Ἀδραμύττιον): A city of Mysia in the Roman province of Asia, situated at the head of the Gulf of Adramyttium and at the base of Mt. Ida. There is no authentic record of its foundation, but it was reputed to have been founded by Adramys, brother of Cresus. It may have been originally an Athenian settlement. Under the Romans it attained the rank of a metropolis and was the seat of an Assize (conventus juridicus). The modern village of Edremid stands some miles inland in the center of an olive and vineyard district, and exports raisins, olive-oil, and timber from Mt. Ida. In Ac 27 2 reference is made to 'a ship of Adramyttium.' S. A.

ADRIA, ā'dri-a (Ac 27 27), Gr. Ἀδρια, Lat. Hadria, Hadriaticum mare: The name may have been derived from the town of Adria, or Atria, near the mouth of the Po, and was ordinarily applied to the gulf between Italy and Illyria. But geographers contemporary with the N T extended it to include not only the Ionian Gulf, but also the section of sea between Crete and Sicily. Strabo, e.g. (§ 123), says that the older name was used for 'part of what is now called Adrias' under which he includes the Ionian Gulf and the Sicilian Sea. Ptolemy distinguishes the Adriatic Sea from the Adriatic Gulf, and Pausanias applies the name to the sea between Sicily, Malta, and Crete. Luke conforms to this later usage—possibly, as Ramsay suggests, following the sailor's nomenclature—in using the term 'the Adria' for the sea in which Paul's company drifted westward for fourteen days. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

ADRIEL, ʾdri-el (אֲדִרְיֵל, 'adhri'el): 'God is my helper'(?). A Meholathite who married Saul's daughter Merab, already promised to David (I S 18 19). His five sons were given up to the Gibeonites (II S 21 8 [Michal here by mistake for Merab]).

E. E. N.

ADULLAM, ʾdol'am (אֲדֻלָּם, 'adhullām): The ancient tradition concerning Adullam (Gn ch. 38) is to the effect that in early times clans or families of Judah consolidated with Canaanitish clans (Adullamites) near Adullam. The statement in Jos 12 15 that the city and its king were conquered by Joshua is late and conflicts with the earlier accounts of the conquest. From the notices in Jos 15 35; Mic 1 15; Neh 11 30, its general location is made certain (Map II, E 2). David frequently used its stronghold or citadel as his headquarters (I S 22 1; II S 23 13, where the true reading is 'stronghold,' not 'cave'; cf. ver. 14 and 5 17). Rehoboam strengthened its fortifications (II Ch 11 7). It was recaptured by Jews early in postexilic times (Neh 11 30). (See G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 229.)

ADULTERY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 4.

ADUMMIM, ʾdum'im, THE ASCENT OF (אֲדֻמִּים הַרְעָלָה, ma'ālēh 'adhummīm, thus named, perhaps, on account of the red-colored stone in the pass): It lay on the road most traveled between Jerusalem and Jericho, and on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 7, 18 17). On a height NE. of the pass was the Chastel Rouge of the Crusaders. Map II, G 1. C. S. T.

ADVERSARY: In the O T the term most often used to designate opponent in general (tsar); but in I S 1 6 this signifies the rival wife. In Nu 22 22; I S 29 4; II S 19 22; I K 5 4, 11 14, 23, 25, it is the translation of the noun and in Ps 71 13, 109 20, 29 of the verb from the root יָצַח ('satan'), meaning to 'accuse' or 'oppose.' In Job 31 35 it means an opponent in a case at law. In the N T it often designates the general idea of opponent, but in Mt 5 25; Lk 12 58, 18 3; I P 5 8, that of legal opponent. C. S. T.

ADVOCATE (παράκλητος, i. e., 'pleader' or 'intercessor'; applied to Jesus explicitly only in I Jn 2 1, but cf. Jn 14 16; Ro 8 34; Heb 7 23. See also HOLY SPIRIT.

ÆNEAS, I-nē'ās (Αἰνέας, Eneas AV): A paralytic at Lydda healed by Peter (Ac 9 33-34).

ÆNON, I'nen (Αἰνών, 'springs'): A place near shean (Scythopolis). But Conder's identification (Tent Work, Vol. II, p. 57 f.) with the springs between Salim (Map III, F 3) and Ainūn in the Wādī Fār'ah (Map III, G 3) is more probable.

J. M. T.

AGABUS, ag'-bos (Ἀγαβός): A Christian prophet (Ac 11 27 f.) who came down from Jerusalem to Antioch and predicted 'a great famine over all the world' (probably the famine in the reign of Claudius c. 46-48 A.D.). In the diary source Ac 21 10 f. A. appears in Cæsarea and predicts Paul's arrest and deliverance to the Gentiles (see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6; also PROPHET, § 14.).

J. M. T.

AGAG, ʿgag (אַגַּג, 'āghāgh): King of an Amalekite tribe. Samuel commissioned Saul utterly to exterminate the tribe with their king, because of past hostility to Israel (cf. Ex 17 8-16), thus putting Agag under the ban (herem). See CURSE, § 2. But Saul saved the king and also much booty. Samuel, highly displeased at this disobedience, carried out the Divine commission by hewing Agag to pieces (I S ch. 15). In Nu 24 7 read Og for Agag. J. A. K.

AGEE, ʿgī (אָגִי, 'āghē): A Hararite, father of Shammah (II S 23 11).

AGRICULTURE: 1. Israelites Originally not Agriculturists. The Israelites first learned agriculture in Palestine. According to the patriarchal legends their ancestors were essentially nomadic, and became agriculturists only incidentally, as in the course of their wanderings they came upon land adapted to farming purposes (Gn 26 12, 37 7; cf. 30 14). Gn 4 20, with its peculiar appreciation of the nomadic life, is not the only thing which reminds us of the fact that the Israelites were once nomads; the Rechabites also, who tried to retain artificially the old conditions which had long since disappeared, bear witness to the fact that the nomadic life was for them the genuine Israelitic life (Jer 35 7). See NOMADIC LIFE.

2. Transition to Agriculture After the Conquest. The nomadic situation, however, changed after Israel had settled in the W. Jordan country. Here the conditions demanded that they take up a settled life the chief employment of which was farming—an art they learned from the Canaanites; for Canaan had been a well-cultivated country long before Israel settled there. The lowlands especially had from very ancient times been tilled, tho the cultivation of the hillsides was also old, in spite of the fact that the house of Joseph are bidden to clear the hill-tops of their forests (Jos 17 15-18). The importance which agriculture had for Israel from the very beginning of its settlement in Canaan is seen not only in even the oldest. After the tribe had by conquest secured a place of habitation for itself, every family probably received a certain piece of land, which was marked off definitely, generally by stones, the removal of which was subjected to curse (Hos 5 10; Dt 19 14, 27 17; Pr 22 28). The land was measured according to 'acres, literally 'yokes,' tsmedh: i.e., the unit of measurement was as much ground as one yoke of oxen could plow in a day (I S 14 14; Is 5 10), as it is to-day with the fellāhīn, whose measure is the feddān (i.e., literally, 'yoke of oxen'). According to Lev 27 16, land was also appraised at times by the quantity of seed used in sowing (cf. I K 18 32).

3. The Soil. In Dt 11 10 f., as an especial advantage over against Egypt, the point is emphasized that Israel is not compelled to irrigate the land, but that Jehovah pours out upon it rain and dew; as in other ways the brooks, springs, and lakes were esteemed for their importance with reference to fertility (Dt 8 7). There must have been, therefore, in early times, as to-day, very little irrigated land.

Thorough manuring of the soil was unknown. In II K 9 37; Jer 9 22, 16 4, reference is made merely to the excrement of animals, especially of the oxen and asses used in plowing, which lay upon the fields; and such passages as Dt 23 13 f.; I K 14 10; cf. Ex 29 14, show the practise of thorough fertilization to have been most unlikely. Moreover, manure was dried and often used as fuel (Ezk 4 15). This custom is still prevalent among the fellāhīn of Palestine (cf. ZDPV, IX, 29). Instead of manure the people employed for fertilization straw and stubble, which like thorns and thistles were burned (cf. Ex 15 7; Is 5 24, 47 14). Of significance for the fertility of the land is the regulation in Ex 23 10 f. that farms, vineyards, and olive orchards were to lie fallow in the seventh year. This hardly indicates that there was a fixed fallowing year for the whole country—a requirement which could not have been carried out in the earlier days except with the greatest hardship to the people—but each field had its own definite fallowing year, as was formerly the custom in Germany.

4. Tillage. In the tilling of the soil it was necessary to wait till autumn, when the early rains, mōreh—termed early because the old civil year began in autumn—softened the ground which had grown dry and hard as stone in the summer sun. As the soil to-day in certain localities is worked with the mattock (q.v.), so it was perhaps, here and there, in early times (I S 13 20; Is 7 25); but the ordinary way was to use the plow (q.v.); and very likely the practise then, as now in Judea, was not to plow till after the sowing. The sower scatters the seed rather thinly over the fields, and it is then through the plowing turned under and covered to a depth of about three to four inches. Furrows (Job 39 10; Ps 65 10; I S 14 14) can not be understood of a deep trench as in Western agriculture. The plow does not do much more than break up the surface of the ground; so that it is not sufficiently freed of weeds.

For example, in the fertile plain of Philistia there are weed-roots as thick as one's finger, spreading out a yard or more in all directions, and at a depth that can not be reached by the plow. The ox was generally used to draw the plow, the ass also being probably used on lighter soil. The prohibition in Dt 22 10 leads to the conclusion that at one time both were yoked together. A single plowing did not suffice for fallow land. Upon the first plowing in winter there followed a second in the spring, and a third in summer; indeed, the careful farmer plowed in the late summer a fourth time; cf. Wetzstein in Delitzsch's Isaiah<sup>2</sup>, 389 f. Whether harrowing was known in early times is a question. Perhaps the word which is generally so translated (שָׂרָר) means rather a sort of plowing (cf. Hos 10 11; Is 28 24). For leveling off the fields (Is 28 25) a box with open front is used to-day in Palestine (ZDPV, IX, 38).

5. Seeding. It is likely that the difference between winter and summer seeds was recognized, as it is to-day. The former consist of wheat and barley, the latter of millet, sesame, melons, cucumbers, etc. Seeding could not be begun until the early rains had set in, which come toward the end of October, at first intermittently and generally at night. Barley was sown first, followed by the wheat. Seed was usually sown with the hand (Mt 13 3-8); the more valuable varieties, such as barley, wheat, and spelt, were at times laid in the furrow by a sower who followed behind the plowman, as is still done to-day, and then plowed in, to protect them from the large ants of which there are great numbers in Syria and Palestine, and which are fond of carrying off the grain into their holes (ZDPV, IX, 30, note). It was perhaps also done to keep the seed from drying up, since a period of from four to five weeks of dryness sometimes elapses after the sowing (ZDPV, IX, 29 f.).

The summer grain was sown at the end of January and in February. The later rain, malōsh, which falls in March and at the beginning of April, was of great importance for the ripening of the grain. If it failed, or if it came too late, or if it was too scanty, the grain did not mature properly. Another enemy of agriculture was the hot east or southeast wind (qādhīm, Arab. chamsin), which scorched, shādaph, the ears (Gn 41 6; ), so that they turned yellow, shiddāphōn, yērāqōn (Dt 28 22; Am 4 9; I K 8 37). The crops were frequently destroyed by grasshoppers also (Am 7 2; Jl 1 4), and at times by hail (Ps 78 47; Hag 2 17). If the harvest-time were near, those crops which were especially valuable were protected by watchmen (Jer 4 17); but it was permitted one who was hungry to pick ears in passing by (cf. Dt 23 25; Mt 12 1). On the general subject of this paragraph see PALESTINE, §§16-23.

6. Harvesting. The harvest, qātsīr, began in April with the cutting of the barley, at which time lentils and fitches were also ripe. Two or three weeks later followed the harvest of wheat and spelt; but of course the harvest-time varied according to the climatic conditions of each region. In the hot lowlands about Jericho the barley harvest began near the first of April; on the coast it was eight and in the mountains fourteen days later. The grain harvest generally lasted about seven weeks, from Passover to Pentecost. The grain was reaped with the sickle, hermēsh, maggāl, as is still done (Dt 16 9). The reaper, qōtsēr, grasped a number of stalks with one hand (Is 17 5; Ps 129 7) and with the other cut them off some distance from the ground. The grain that had been cut remained lying in swaths, āmīr, behind the reaper, and was bound by the sheaf-binder, m'asēph (Jer 9 22) into sheaves, ālummāh (Gn 37 7), ōmer (Lv 23 10, etc.; Gn 37 7), which were gathered into shocks, gādhīsh (Ex 22 6). In Lv 19 9, 23 22, every one is forbidden, in the interests of the poor, to harvest his field to its limits. The laborers refresh themselves, while harvesting, with roasted kernels of grain, qālī, and bread dipped in a sour drink, hōmets (Ru 2 14).

7. Threshing and Storing. The grain was generally threshed, dūsh (I Ch 21 20), or hābhāṭ (Jg 6 11), in the open air, however, which was possible inasmuch as the harvest-time is free from rain (I S 12 16 ff.). During threshing-time the harvest men spent the night, as is still the custom, upon the threshing-floor, in order to guard it (Ru 3 6; Robinson, Pal. II, p. 446). The threshing-floors, gōren, were either permanent locations on mountains or hills or else placed, if possible, upon a somewhat elevated spot. There were different modes of threshing: cattle were driven over the sheaves, which were piled knee-deep in layers upon the floor, until they had trodden out the kernels of grain with their hoofs and reduced the straw to chaff, in which operation the ox was not to be muzzled (Dt 25 4; cf. I Co 9 9; I Ti 5 18); or the threshing-sledge, mōrāgh, mōrāgh hārūts, or hārūts (τρίβολον, tribulum of the ancients), was used (Am 1 3; Is 28 27; II S 24 22). This sledge was made very likely, as to-day, of wooden planks joined together, in the under-side of which were set stones or knives (now called nawrag, cf. ZDPV, IX, 41). In addition there was the threshing-wagon, āghālāh, 'cart wheel' (Is 28 27 ff.), which consisted of several rollers running parallel, each of which was provided with three or four iron disks, so arranged that the disks of one roller extended into the spaces left by the others (cf. ZDPV, IX, 44). After threshing the chaff, mōts, was separated from the kernels of grain, bar, by winnowing, zārāh, i.e., by throwing the chaff and grain into the air, with a fork, mizreh (Is 30 24), sometimes furnished with two but generally with several curved prongs. This was done toward evening and at night (Ru 3 2); for the sea wind blows from four o'clock in the afternoon till half an hour before sunset, and carries away the light chaff. The kernels were then sifted with a sieve (Am 9 9), and thrown together into larger heaps by means of the winnowing-shovel, rahath (Is 30 24). In the earlier period there were no barns, strictly speaking; the stores of grain were stowed away in pits resembling cisterns, which were carefully covered up, as is still done at the present time in Palestine (Jer 41 8). In later times storehouses seem to have been in use (II Ch 32 28; Pr 3 10; Jer 50 26; Jl 1 17).

8. Variety of Yield. The yield varies greatly. On soil which has been fertilized, and which is advantageously located, under favorable conditions wheat may yield thirty-fold and barley a hundred-fold (cf. Mt 13 8). On unfertilized land, in the plain of Esdraelon, wheat does not yield at the most more than tenfold and, on the average, seven to eight fold; barley at most not more than tenfold and, on the average, sixfold. In the mountains of Judah wheat yields twofold, barley threefold. AGUE, BURNING. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (1).

AGUR, ē'gur (אגור, āghūr): The reputed author of the whole or part of Pr ch. 30. Nothing is known of his personality, but the similarity of Pr 30 1-6 to parts of Job favors the conjecture that hammassā ('the oracle,' ver. 1) is the name of a region S. of Judah. Its unique literary character makes it reasonable to attribute the entire chapter to Agur.

AH, ā, AHI, ē'hai (אחי, āhī, āhī), 'brother' or 'my brother': In compound personal names 'Ah' or 'Ahi' may refer (1) to the deity as 'brother,' or (2) to the common human relationship. Names of class

(1) are very common, e.g., Ahijah, 'Jah (Jehovah) is brother.' Examples of (2) are much more rare and of more obscure meaning, e.g., Ahab (= 'father's brother?'). See ABI, and cf. G. B. Gray, Heb. Proper Names, pp. 34-41, 75-86. E. E. N.

AHAB, ʿhāb (אָהָב, 'ah'ābh), 'father's brother': 1. The second king of the Omri dynasty and early Israel's most conspicuous and potent ruler (876-855 B.C.). Two alliances give special interest to his reign: his own marriage to the Phœnician princess Jezebel, and that of their daughter Athaliah to Jehoram of Judah. Through the former he gained the support of the richest trading people of antiquity, and by the latter the old schism of the Hebrew people seemed in the way of being healed. Altho this hope was doomed to disappointment, Israel and Judah were joined by close bonds for over a century.

But the Phœnician alliance brought with it the cult of the Tyrian Baal, which Jezebel zealously promoted. The names of Ahab's children—Ahaziah, Jehoram, Athaliah—indicate indeed the strength of the J' religion, but the growing syncretism aroused Elijah and the other prophets of J', who accomplished the downfall of the Omri dynasty (II K ch. 9). The gross disregard of personal rights shown in the seizure of Naboth's vineyard (I K ch. 21) was undoubtedly a potent element in this downfall.

Two important synchronisms meet us in this period: (1) The Moabite Stone, lines 6 and 7, refers to Ahab, and suggests that even in his reign Moab began struggles for independence, which culminated under Jehoram (see MESA). (2) Ahab ascended the throne as the vassal of Damascus (I K 20 4), but at the battle of Aphek he threw off the yoke and a three years' peace followed (I K 22 1). In this period occurred the invasion of Shalmaneser III., who records that Ahabbu of Sirla (Israel) appeared with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers at Karkar, 854 B.C., and together with the allied Syrian kings suffered a crushing defeat. The battle must have been indecisive, however; for it was not followed up, and Ahab's military establishment gave him confidence to seek to wrest Ramoth-gilead from Damascus, in which enterprise he perished (I K ch. 22). A's political sagacity was greater than that of the prophets, who rebuked him for sparing Ben-hadad (I K 20 31-43). The alliance with Damascus enabled Israel to keep out the Assyrian invader. Twelve years later, after the prophets had broken up the coalition, Shalmaneser exacted tribute from Israel. (See Olmstead, Hist. of Assy., pp. 132-139).

2. A prophet, denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 29 21 f.). A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

AHARAH. See AHIRAM.

AHARHEL, a-hūr'hel (אָהַרְהֵל, 'āharhēl): The ancestor of certain families of Judah (I Ch 4 8).

AHASAI. See AHZAI.

AHASBAI, a-has'bai (אָהַסְבַּי, 'āhasbay): The father of Eliphalet (II S 23 34; cf. I Ch 235).

AHASUERUS, a-haz'yū-i'rus. See ESTHER, § 1, and DARIUS, § 2.

AHAVA, a-hē'vā (אָהַוָּה, 'ahāwā'): A town or district (still unidentified) in Babylonia used to designate a river (or canal); also the name of the river, on the banks of which Ezra gathered the Jews preparatory to their return to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 15, 21, 31).

AHAZ, ʿhāz (אָחָז, 'āhāz), 'He (i.e., J') has seized': 1. Son of Jotham and king of Judah, c. 736-721 B.C. See CHRONOLOGY of O T.

Tiglath-pileser III. (746-728) received tribute from Ahaz (called Jauhāzi, i.e., Joahaz) in 734 B.C. (cf. II K 16 7). In 732 B.C. he deposed and slew Pekah and thus broke up the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance (cf. II K 15 37, 16 5). Damascus fell, Rezin was slain, and Tiglath-pileser held a great levee as 'King of kings' in the captured city, at which Ahaz was present (according to II K 16 10).

At Damascus Ahaz saw a great altar and ordered Urijah to construct one like it. W. R. Smith (Rel. Sem. 2 p. 487) considers this a great permanent altar-hearth, whose ritual, described at length in II K 16 13 ff., was thereafter dominant. Olmstead (Hist. of Assy., pp. 196-199) thinks A. had offered his son to J' to escape the danger from Syria and Damascus (II K 16 3; II Ch 28 3). When it seemed that deliverance came not from J', but from Assyria he introduced Assyrian gods, which he felt had proved mightier than his own.

Some of the most striking sections of Isaiah belong to this period. Children and babes are their rulers, he declares, in a fierce invective against the turbulence of the state (Is 3 4). The Syro-Ephraimitic invasion called forth the Immanuel prophecy (Is 7 1-9 7), a declaration that God's purpose to be with His people was invincible (see IMMANUEL). Ahaz's weak, short-sighted policy can be largely accounted for by his youth and inability to cope with the deep-seated corruptions of his predecessors' régimes.

2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 33 f., 9 41 f.).

A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

AHAZIAH, ʿhā-zai'a (אָחַזְיָה, 'āhazyāh), 'J' hath grasped': 1. King of Israel c. 853-852), son of Ahab and Jezebel. His character was on a level with that of his parents. He was a devotee of Baal and also followed in the sin of Jeroboam. During his reign Moab rebelled, and probably became independent. Mesha says: 'But I saw my pleasure upon him, and on his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction' (Mesha inscription, l. 7. See MESA). Seriously injured by falling through a latticework, he sent to Ekron to inquire of Baal-zebub. Elijah met his messengers and bade them return with the prediction of the king's death (see also ELIJAH). He made a commercial alliance with Jehoshaphat for the purpose of sending ships to Tarshish. The vessels were destroyed, and the enterprise came to naught (I K 22 51-53; II K 1 1-18; II Ch 20 35-37).

2. King of Judah c. 841-840), son of Jehoram of Judah, and grandson of Ahab through his mother, Athaliah. The Chronicler speaks of him as the youngest son, as the Arabians had slain all the others (II Ch 22 1, called Azariah in ver. 6). As an ally, he went to war with Jehoram against the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead. At Jehoram's assassination by Jehu, he was severely wounded, but made his escape to Megiddo, where he died (II K 8 25-29; 9 16-23, 27).

J. A. K.

AHBAN, ā'ban (אֲבָן, 'ahbān): A son of Abishur by Abihail (I Ch 2 29).

AHER, ē'her (אֲחֵר, 'ahēr): A Benjamite (I Ch 7 12; text obscure, see AHIRAM).

AHI, ē'hai (אֲחִי, 'āhī), contraction for Ahijah: 1. A Gadite (I Ch 5 15). 2. An Asherite (I Ch 7 34). Also see AH.

AHIAH. See AHIAH.

AHIAM, ā-hai'om (אֲחִיָּאֵם, 'āhī'ām), 'mother's brother' (?), cf. Ahab, 'father's brother': One of David's heroes (II S 23 33; I Ch 11 35).

AHIAN, ā-hai'an (אֲחִיאָן, 'ahyān), 'cousin': A Manassite, son of Shemida (I Ch 7 19). Possibly the name of a town.

AHIEZER (ē'hai-i'zer (אֲחִיעֶזֶר, 'āhī'ezer), 'the brother (God) is help': 1. A prince of Dan (Nu 1 12, 2 25, etc.). 2. A Benjamite, chieftain of a body of archers who deserted Saul for David (I Ch 12 3).

AHIHUD, ā-hai'hud (אֲחִיהוּד, 'āhī'hūdh), 'the brother (God) is praise': 1. A prince of Asher (Nu 34 27). 2. A name occurring in the genealogy of Benjamin (I Ch 8 7, text obscure).

AHIJAH, ā-hai'ja (אֲחִיָּה, 'āhīyāh), 'J' is brother': 1. A prophet of Shiloh, who incited Jeroboam to head the revolt of N. Israel against the house of David (I K 11 26 ff.), but afterward condemned him for his disloyalty to J' and foretold the ruin of his house (I K ch. 14). The story of Ahijah's dealings with Jeroboam in the LXX. varies considerably from that of the Massoretic Hebrew text reproduced in our Eng. version. The reason assigned for A.'s opposition to Solomon by the author of I K favors too much of the viewpoint of the editor-author himself to be taken as strictly accurate. Solomon's lavish expenditures, the heavy burdens he laid on the people, his innovations and his efforts to make the new sanctuary at Jerusalem the chief sanctuary of the kingdom probably stirred the aged prophet of Shiloh in N. Israel to resentment against what he considered disloyalty to the best traditions of the past. And it was this same devoted loyalty to the ancient tradition and custom that led him to oppose Jeroboam's innovation of setting up the calf-images as a mode of worship of J'. 2. See AHIMELECH, 1. 3. Father of King Baasha (I K 15 27). 4. A son of Shisha (I K 4 3, Ahiah AV). 5. A son of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 25). 6. One who helped Gera to carry away captives (I Ch 8 7, Ahiah AV). 7. A Pelonite; one of David's valiant men (I Ch 11 36). 8. According to the Heb. text a Levite, caretaker of the sanctuary treasures under David (I Ch 26 20), but, according to LXX., instead of 'Ahijah,' we should read 'their brethren.' 9. One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 26).

AHIKAM, ā-hai'kam (אֲחִיקָם, 'āhīqām), 'the brother (God) riseth up': One of the officials Josiah delegated to consult Huldah (II K 22 14 ff.). He was a friend and protector of Jeremiah (Jer 26 24 ff.). His son Gedaliah was governor after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 14).

E. E. N.

AHILUD, ā-hai'lud (אֲחִילוּד, 'āhīlūdh), 'a brother is born': 1. The father of David's recorder, Jehoshaphat (II S 8 16, 20 24; I K 4 3; I Ch 18 15).

2. The father of Baana, one of the victualers of Solomon's household (I K 4 12).

AHIMAAZ, ā-him'a-az (אֲחִימָאז, 'āhīma'ats), 'my brother is wrath': 1. A son of Zadok, David's priest. In David's flight from Jerusalem, A. and Jonathan were sent back to act as spies and couriers. A., with his companion, was despatched by Hushai to warn David. Eluding their pursuers, they reached David and delivered the message which enabled the king to escape. After the battle with Absalom, A. desired to bear the tidings to David. At first Joab refused, and sent a Cushite. A. finally secured permission, outran the Cushite, and delivered his message first (II S chs. 15, 17, 18). 2. The father of Saul's wife, Ahinoam (I S 14 50). 3. A prefect and son-in-law of Solomon (I K 4 15).

J. A. K.

AHIMAN, ā-hai'man (אֲחִימָן, 'āhīman), 'my brother is a gift': 1. One of the three sons of Anak at Hebron, offspring of the Nephilim, and of such gigantic stature that they terrified the spies (Nu 13 22 ff.). They were conquered by Caleb (Jg 1 10, 20; Jos 15 13 ff.). Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmi were most probably clan names. There may be a mythological touch in the reference to the Nephilim. 2. A Levite porter 'at the king's gate eastward,' who returned from Babylon (I Ch 9 17).

J. A. K.

AHIMELECH, ā-him'i-lek (אֲחִימֶלֶךְ, 'āhīmelek), 'the (divine) king is brother': 1. A priest descended from Eli through Ahitub (I S 22 9, cf. 14 3; I Ch 24 3). His son Abiathar was priest under David (I S 22 20, etc.). After the defeat of Israel by the Philistines (I S ch. 4) the priestly house of Eli removed with the Tabernacle from Shiloh to Nob. A. was the head of this establishment in the days of Saul and was slain by Saul for assisting David (I S ch. 21 f.). In Mk 2 26 Abiathar is a mistake for Ahimelech. In II S 8 17, I Ch 18 16 and 24 6 read 'Abiathar son of Ahimelech,' in 24 3, 31, 'Abiathar' for 'Ahimelech.' Ahijah in I S 14 3 is probably to be identified with Ahimelech. See also PRIESTHOOD, § 2 (a). 2. A Hittite in David's service (I S 26 6).

E. E. N.

AHIMOTH, ā-hai'meth (אֲחִימֹת, 'āhīmōth): A son of Elkanah, a Levite (I Ch 6 25). (In ver. 35 and II Ch 29 12 called Mahath.)

AHINADAB, ā-hin'a-dab (אֲחִינָדָב, 'āhīnādābh), 'the brother (God) is generous': A prefect under Solomon (I K 4 14).

AHINOAM, ā'hin'o-am (אֲחִינֹם, 'āhīnō'am), 'the brother (God) is pleasantness': 1. The wife of Saul (I S 14 50). 2. A woman of Jezreel (in Judah, cf. Jos 15 56), wife of David and mother of Amnon, his eldest son (I S 25 43, 27 3, 30 5; II S 2 2, 3; I Ch 3 1).

AHIO, ā-hai'o (אֲחִיֹּ, 'ahyō): 1. A son of Abinadab (II S 6 3 f.). 2. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 14). 3. A Benjamite of Gibeon (I Ch 8 31, 9 37).

AHIRA, ā-hai'ra (אֲחִירָא, 'āhīra): A prince of Naphtali (Nu 1 15, 2 29, etc.). The name is of peculiar formation. The syllable 'ra' may be a scribal error for 'ram' (see AHIRAM), or it may preserve the Egyptian 'Ra' and the word be a relic of the period of Egyptian supremacy.

E. E. N.

AHIRAM, a-hai'ram (אֲחִירָם, 'āhīrām), 'the brother (God) is high': Ancestral head of the Ahirmites, a clan of Benjamin (Nu 26 33; Ehi in Gn 46 21; Aharah in I Ch 8 1; also cf. Aher, I Ch 7 12).

AHISAMACH, a-his'a-mak (אֲחִישָׁמַח, 'āhīshāmākh) 'the brother (God) sustains': A Danite, father of Oholiab (Ex 31 6, 35 34, 38 23).

AHISHAHAR, a-hish'a-har (אֲחִישָׁהָר, 'āhīshahār), 'the brother (God) is dawn': The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 10).

AHISHAR, a-hai'shar (אֲחִישָׁר, 'āhīshār): The overseer of Solomon's household (I K 4 6).

AHITHOPHEL, a-hith'o-fel (אֲחִיתֹּפֶל, 'āhīthōphēl), 'brother is foolishness' (?): Accounted the wisest man in Israel (II S 16 23), a counselor of David, possibly the grandfather of Bath-sheba (II S 23 34, cf. 11 3). He was a co-conspirator with Absalom (II S 15 12, etc.), but when his advice was rejected he committed suicide, for which his name has perhaps been stamped with the opprobrious epithet תֹּפֶל, tōphēl, 'foolishness.'

A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

AHITUB, a-hai'tob (אֲחִיטוב, 'āhīṭūbh), 'the brother (God) is goodness': 1. A priest, descended from Eli, and the father of Ahimelech (I S 14 3, 22 9). 2. The father of David's priest Zadok (II S 8 17; I Ch 6 7 f., 18 16; Ezr 7 2). 3. A priest descended from Zadok (I Ch 6 11 f.). 4. A priest, ruler of the Temple in postexilic days (I Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11).

AHLAB, ā'lab (אֲחֻלָּב, 'āhlābh): A Canaanite town in Asher. Site unknown (Jg 1 31).

AHLAI, ā'lai (אֲחֻלַּי, 'āhlay): 1. A child of Sheshan (I Ch 2 31, cf. ver. 34). 2. The father of Zabad (I Ch 11 41).

AHOAH, a-hō'a (אֲחֻהָא, 'āhōah): The head of the Ahohites, a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 4) to which Zalmon (II S 23 28, Ilai in I Ch 11 29) and Dodo, or Dodai, (I Ch 11 12, 27 4) belonged.

AHOLAH, AHOLIAB, AHOLIBAH, AHOLIBAMAH. See OHOLAH, etc.

AHUMAI, a-hū'mai (אֲחֻמַּי, 'āhūmay): The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 2).

AHUZZAM, a-hū'zam (אֲחֻזָּם, 'āhuzzām, Ahuzam AV), 'possession' (?): A son of Ashur (I Ch 4 6).

AHUZZATH, a-hoz'ath (אֲחֻזָּת, 'āhuzzath), 'possession': The 'friend' (i.e., 'adviser') of Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gn 26 26).

AHZAI, ā'zai (אֲחֻזַּי, 'āhazay, Ahasai AV): A priest (Neh 11 13); possibly = Jahzerah (I Ch 9 12).

AI, ai (אֵי, 'ay, in Hebrew always with the article; Jos 7 2 f.; Ezr 2 28; [LXX., Γαι]): An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, situated 'beside Bethaven on the E. side of Bethel' (Jos 7 2; Gn 12 8), destroyed by Joshua (Jos 8 28); best identified with certain obscure ruins just S. of the modern Dēr Diwān (Map III, F 5). Hai (Gn 12 8, 13 3, AV), Aija (Neh 11 31), and Aiath (Is 10 28) are but variant forms of the same name. The Ai of Jer 49 3 was probably a city, not yet identified, E. of the Jordan. G. L. R.

AIAH, ē'ya (אֵיָא, 'ayyāh), 'falcon': 1. An Edomite tribe (Gn 36 24; I Ch 1 40, Ajah AV). 2. The father of Rizpah (II S 3 7, 21 8-11).

AIATH, ē'yath, AIJA, e-ai'ja. See AI.

AIJALON, ai'ja-len (אֵיָלֹן, 'ayyālōn, Ajalon AV), 'hart': 1. A broad valley NW. of Jerusalem leading down to the seacoast plain (Jos 10 12). Map III, E 5. 2. A town in this valley (Jos 19 42, 21 24; Jg 1 35; I S 14 31; I Ch 6 66, 8 13; II Ch 11 10, 28 18) mentioned in the Amarna letters as Ailuna. Now called Yalo. Map III, E 5. 3. A town in Zebulun, site unknown (Jg 12 12).

AIJELETH HASH-SHAHAR, ai-jē'leth hāsh-shē'hār. See MUSIC, § 6.

AIN, ē'in (אֵין, 'ayin), 'spring': 1. A place on NE. border of Canaan, near Riblah (Nu 34 11). Robinson identifies it with the sources of the Orontes River, but this may be too far N. 2. A place in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15 32), assigned to Simeon (Jos 19 7) and apparently the same as the Levitical city (Jos 21 16). Should perhaps be read with Rimmon (Jos 15 32) as one word. See EN-RIMMON. C. S. T.

AKAN, ē'kan. See JAAKAN.

AKELDAMA, a-kel'da-ma (Ἀκελδαμά, Acel-dama AV): The Greek transliterates an Aramaic word meaning 'field of sleep' (cf. κοιμητήριον, cemetery), and is given as the name of a piece of land that Judas purchased with the blood-money paid to him for the betrayal of Jesus and upon which he committed suicide (Ac 1 19). In Mt 27 7 f., it is said that the high priests and elders purchased the field with the money returned by the remorse-stricken Judas, and that the field was used for the burial of strangers, and called 'the field of blood.' The place is identified with the modern Hakk-ed-Dumm, S. of the Pool of Siloam, on a level spot, half-way up the hill. The RV reading is based upon the assumption that the 'Akeldamach' of the Greek text is a mistake for Ἀκελδαμά, the transliteration of אֶקֶל דָּמָא, 'field of blood.' A. C. Z.

AKKUB, ak'kub (אֶקֶב, 'aqqubh): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 2. The head of a postexilic family (I Ch 9 17 = Ezr 2 42; perhaps = Neh 7 45, 11 19, 12 25). 3. The head of a postexilic family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 45). 4. One of the Levites who helped to expound the law read by Ezra to the people (Neh 8 7). C. S. T.

AKRABBIM, ak-rab'im (אֶקְרָבִים, 'aqrabbīm), 'scorpions': The 'Ascent of the Scorpions' which led up from the region about the S. end of the Dead Sea to the highland of S. Judah (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3, Maaleh-akrabbim AV). The exact location is uncertain, see Map II, F 5.

ALABASTER (origin of word unknown): Mineral carbonate of lime. A white stone much used in antiquity to ornament buildings and for vases and small bottles for holding precious ointment (Lk 7 37; Mk 14 3 = Mt 26 7). E. E. N.

ALAMETH, al'a-mefh. See ALEMETH, I, 2.

ALAMMELECH, a-lam'i-lek. See ALLAMELECH.

ALAMOTH, al'a-mofh. See PSALMS, § 3 (4).

ALARM. See WARFARE, § 4.

ALCIMUS, al'si-mus (Ἀλκιμος, probably the Greek form of Eliakim; Josephus, however, calls him Ἰάκιμος, the Greek equivalent of Jakim): A leader of the Hellenistic party, and opponent of Judas Maccabæus, c. 162 B.C. (I Mac 7 5). He was appointed high priest by Demetrius I., and a Syrian army under Bacchides was sent to Judea to put him in power and take vengeance on Judas. Because A. was of the 'seed of Aaron' (I Mac 7 14) he was accepted by the scrupulous ASSIDEANS (q.v.), but a treacherous murder of sixty of them in one day caused a deep revulsion of feeling, and after Bacchides returned to Syria, Alcimus was unable to maintain himself as high priest (I Mac 7 21) and appealed to Demetrius for aid. Judas defeated the first army sent under Nicanor, and Alcimus fled. But a second large Syrian force (I Mac 9 1) vanquished Judas at Eleasa (161 B.C.). A. now came to full power and a determined policy of Hellenizing the land was carried out. While taking down the dividing wall in the Temple, in order to blot out the distinction between Jew and Gentile, he was stricken with paralysis and died, B.C. 160 (I Mac 9 5 4 f.). Such is the account in I Mac. Both Josephus (Ant. XII., 9 7, 10 1-6; XX., 10) and II Mac (14 3 ff.) disagree with I Mac on some important details. II Mac says Alcimus had held the office of high priest at some time previous to his appointment by Demetrius. Josephus says he was appointed by Antiochus V. Most scholars prefer to follow I Mac. J. S. R.—E. E. N.

ALEMETH, al'i-meth (אֱלֶמֶת, alemeth): I. 1. A descendant of Jonathan (I Ch 8 38, 9 42). 2. A descendant of Becher, the Benjamite (I Ch 7 8, Alameth AV). II. A town in Benjamin. See ALLEMETH.

ALEXANDER, al'egz-an'der (Gr., 'defender of men'): 1. Alexander the Great. Alexander III., called 'the Great,' was born at Pella (Macedonia) in 356 B.C., and died in Babylon in 323 B.C. Brief as was his career, it was one of the most brilliant of ancient history, not simply because of the irresistible power of his military genius, but also because of the policy which he followed in reference to his conquests, of bringing to them the riches and stimulus of Greek culture. With him Hellenism virtually began. Our interest in him in this brief article is concerned entirely with his contact with the Jews.

The battle of Issus (333 B.C.), in which he defeated Darius III., made him master of Asia. Soon thereafter he went to Syria. Damascus, Sidon, Tyre, and Gaza fell, one after another, before his victorious forces. Josephus' remarkable story (Ant. XI. 8 3), of Alexander's visit to Jerusalem to punish the Jews for refusing submission and how, met by a procession of priests, his attitude changed so that he adored the name of God on the breastplate of the high priest, and entering Jerusalem, offered sacrifice, and gave the Jews the favors which they asked is not considered reliable, as no such account is found in the Greek historians who are our sources for Alexander's career (see Niese, Geschichte der griechischen und Makedonischen Staaten, I, p. 837). It is improbable that A. visited Jerusalem. Palestine was made a province of Cœle-syria. It may well be that A. was favorably disposed toward the Jews, giving them large privileges in Alexandria (Josephus, Cont. Ap. II. 4, B. J. II. 18 7) and that many enrolled themselves in his army. He is expressly mentioned in I Mac 1 1-7, and 6 2, and cryptically referred to in Dn 7 7, 23, 8 5 ff., 21, 11 3 f. See G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, vol. II., ch. XV.

2. Alexander Balas (bē'las) figures in Jewish history in the time of Jonathan Maccabæus. He was a man of obscure origin who palmed himself off as the son of Antiochus Epiphanes and laid claim to the Syrian throne occupied by Demetrius I. His remarkable likeness to Antiochus V., son of Antiochus Epiphanes, led many to believe in him, and he was supported in his pretensions by Ptolemy VI. of Egypt, Attalus II. of Pergamum, and Ariarathes V. of Cappadocia; also by the Romans (Polyb. XXXIII. 14, 16). Both of the rivals, Demetrius and A., bid for the support of Jonathan (153 B.C.), who gave his allegiance to the latter and received in return high honors, and the title of 'the high priest of thy nation, and friend of the king' (I Mac 10 18-50). After his victory over Demetrius I., A. married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy VI. and seemed to be firmly established on the throne of Syria. But he proved, however, totally unfit for the high position which he had gained and after varying fortunes during five years (150-145 B.C.) he incurred the enmity of Ptolemy, who gave his aid to Demetrius II, son of Demetrius I. A. was defeated in battle and fled to Arabia, where he was slain (I Mac 11 1-19).

3. Alexander, the son of Simon of Cyrene and brother of Rufus (Mk 15 21).

4. Alexander, one of the kindred of the high priest (Ac 4 6). Nothing further regarding him is known.

5. Alexander of Ephesus, who was 'brought out of the multitude' by the Jews, to make a defense for them (Ac 19 33). The purpose of this was most likely to save the Jews from being mixed up with the Christians in the vengeance of the people. He may or may not have been the same as A. the copper-smith.

6. Alexander the coppersmith (χαλκεύς), of whom it is said in II Ti 4 14 that he did Paul 'much evil.'

7. Alexander, an early Christian, 'who made shipwreck concerning the faith,' and whom Paul 'delivered unto Satan' (I Ti 1 19 f.). Attempts have been made to identify 5, 6, and 7, but identification is simply a matter of conjecture.

ALEXANDRIA, al'egz-an'dri-ə: A city of Egypt, situated 14 m. W. of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, founded by Alexander the Great 332 B.C. It lay on a strip of land 2 m. wide, with Lake Mareotis on its southern side, and the sea on the northern. Running out from the mainland to an island 1 m. distant (Pharos Island) was the Heptastadium, an artificial mole. On either side of this were two spacious harbors. A canal joined Lake Mareotis with the Canopic branch of the Nile. The city, which was regularly and beautifully built, was divided into five districts. The Jews, who occupied the northeastern section, were granted large privileges. Owing to lack of information it is impossible to trace the development of the city, but under the early Ptolemies it became a noted center of commerce, learning, and civic splendor. Its famous museum and library were promotive of research, and made A. foremost in science. In this Hellenistic center Judaism and Greek culture came into very close contact and here the first endeavors were made to adjust the O T to Greek conceptions; it was here that the Septuagint translation of the O T was made; it was here that the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, of which Philo (c. 20 B.C.-40 A.D.) was the most distinguished exponent, was developed—all because of the close touch of Judaism and Hellenism. In the Roman period A. was second only to Rome in importance. A. is not mentioned in the N T, except in the phrase 'of Alexandria' (a proper adjective in the Grk. original). Cf. Ac 6 9, 18 24, 27 6, 28 11. Tradition tells us that Mark went to Egypt and established churches in the famous capital. J. S. R.—E. E. N.

ALEXANDRIA TROAS or TROAS, τρώας ('Αλεξάνδρεια ἡ Τρωάς or Τρωάς): The chief city of the Troad district on the NW. coast of Mysia, in Rom. province of Asia. Antigonos founded it as an enlargement of the older Sigia and gave it the name of Antigonia Troas. About 300 B.C. it was much enlarged by Lysimachus and renamed Alexandria Troas. Under Augustus it was constituted a Colonia. Later emperors embellished the city and added greatly to its importance. In Byzantine times it was the seat of a bishopric. The extensive ruins have suffered from being used as a quarry. Many of its marble columns have gone into the construction of the Yeni Valideh Jami mosque in Constantinople. Among the extant ruins are those of the city wall, the temple, theater and baths, and an aqueduct. It was probably at Troas that Paul first met Luke, Ac 16 8 ff. ALGUM-TREE: The almuġ-tree. See PALESTINE, § 21.

ALIAH, ā-lai'a (אֲלִיָּה, 'alyāh): A 'duke,' probably a clan, of Edom (I Ch 1 51). Alvah in Gn 36 40.

ALIAN, al'i-an (אֲלִיָּאן, 'alyān): A Seirite clan (I Ch 1 40). Alvan in Gn 36 23.

ALIEN. See GENTILES.

ALLAMMELECH, al-lam'i-lek or āl'lām-mē'lek (אֲלַמְמֶלֶךְ, 'allammelekh, Alammelech AV): A place in Asher (Jos 19 26). See Map IV, B 7.

ALLEGORY: The description of one thing under the forms of another. Essentially, an allegory is an extended metaphor. In the original text of the Bible the word does not occur as a substantive. The verb derived from it is used in Gal 4 24 and may mean that the affair allegorized was intended as such, or that the interpreter is at liberty to see in it a meaning different from that on the surface. As the object of the Apostle in the passage in question is practical and homiletical rather than doctrinal and pedagogical, it is probable that he used the word to designate the process of appropriating to a specific use by allego-rizing what was originally intended in a different sense. The allegorical method of interpretation was common in Alexandria among the followers of Philo, and without committing himself to its underlying principles the Apostle could use it in illustrating and enforcing Gospel truth by O T utterances. Other instances of similar allegorizing by Paul are the use of Dt 25 4 in I Co 9 9 referring to the muzzling of the ox employed in threshing; of Ex 17 6, Nu 20 11, Ps 78 15 in I Co 10 4 referring to the rock, and of Ex 34, 33, 35 in II Co 3 13. More akin to the typological use are the references in the Epistle to the Hebrews to O T passages regarding Melchizedek and other matters. As a class these may be called allegories read into the O T.

Allegories designed to be such at the start are kindred to parables (q.v.) and metaphors. It is impossible to draw the line sharply between these similar and allied figures of speech (cf. Trench on Parables). Nathan's story to David (II S 12 1-14) may be construed either as a parable or as an allegory. The figures of the Vine (Jn 15 1-8), of the Bread of Life (Jn 6 32-42), and other kindred narratives are more clearly allegories. A. C. Z.

ALLELUIA, al'i-lu'ya. See HALLELUJAH.

ALLEMETH, al'i-meth (אֲלֶמֶת, 'allemeth, Alemeth AV): A Levitical city in Benjamin (I Ch 6 60). Called Almon in Jos 21 18, Map II, F 1.

ALLON, al'on (אֵלֹן, 'allōn, 'oak': I. A prince of the tribe of Simeon (I Ch 4 37). II. A city in Kadesh Naphtali (Jos 19 33 AV), translated 'oak' in RV.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, al'men-dib'lā-thā'im (אֲלֹמֹן דִּבְלַתַּיִם, 'almōn dibhlāthāy'māh): One of Israel's encampments in Moab, between Dibon and the mountains of Abarim (Nu 33 46). Beth-diblathaim (Jer 48 22, and Mesha-stone, line 30) may be the same place. E. E. N.

ALMOND, ūm'ond (אֲמֹנָה, shāqēdh [from אֲמֹנָה, 'to keep watch,' or 'to be alert'], so called from its early blossoming, as if watching for the spring; cf. the play on the name in Jer 1 11): The almond, a native of W. Asia, was well known in Palestine and was a delicacy much esteemed in other countries, such as Egypt, to which it was exported from S. Palestine (Gn 43 11). The almond blossom was imitated in the making of the golden candlestick (Ex 25 33 ff., 37 19 ff.), each of the bowls being shaped like its calyx (so Dillmann). In Ec 12 5 the words 'the almond-tree shall blossom' seem to be, on the whole, the correct rendering. The white (really pink-white) blossoms are made the symbol of the white hair of the aged man. See also PALESTINE, §§ 21 and 23; FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5. E. E. N.

ALOES, al'ōz, LIGN-ALOES: The rendering of two Heb. words אֶלֶף āḥālōth (Ps 45 8; Song 4 14) and אֶלֶף āḥālīm (Nu 24 6; Pr 7 17) and of the Gr. ἀλόη (Jn 19 39). In all but one (Nu 24 6) of these ref. a perfume (or fragrant wood) is meant, and in none is the common bitter aloes intended. The two

ALPHABET: The hieroglyphic signs of Egypt and the cuneiform characters of Babylonia had been used in writing for centuries before the alphabet was invented. It is first found in use among North Semitic peoples, and altho it may not have originated with them, it was developed by a Semitic people, and became the source from which almost all systems of alphabets can be derived. Petrie (The Formation of the Alphabet, 1912) would modify somewhat this view that all alphabets come from an original Phœnician alphabet by deriving the latter and all others from a 'very widespread body of signs—or signary—in more or less general use' by a process of selection. From the Tell el-Amarna letters, discovered in 1887-88 and dating from about 1400 B.C., it is evident that the Babylonian characters and language were then in use in Canaan. By 1000 B.C., however, they had been displaced by Semitic alphabets and languages, which had developed with the growth of the more or less independent national life of the various Semitic peoples. In each people both alphabet and language, altho having an origin in common with that of all the others, became changed and thus adapted to its individual needs.

1. Date of Alphabet. The material for the study of the development of the Semitic alphabet is found in a few inscriptions, principally on stones, seals, and coins. Perhaps the earliest inscription is that on a bronze bowl of Phœnician origin. It is dedicated to Baal-Lebanon by a servant of Hiram, King of the Sidonians, and may date from about 1000 B.C. From the middle of the 9th cent. comes the inscription of Mesha, King of Moab, called the Mesha Stone (see illustration). An early Hebrew inscription was found in the Siloam tunnel, built probably by Hezekiah, and therefore dating from the end of the 8th cent. (see illustration), but even earlier may be an inscription on a small tablet, found by R. A. S. Macalister at Gezer in 1908. It seems to be some kind of agricultural calendar cut in limestone perhaps by a simple peasant. Lidzbarski, G. B. Gray, and others (PEFQ, 1909) ascribe it to a date not much later than the Mesha Stone. To these may be added inscriptions on seals from the 4th to the 1st cent. (see illustrations), and on coins from the Maccabean era and later (see illustrations). The important Aramaic inscriptions are from Zinjirli in N. Syria (8th cent.), Nerab, SE. of Aleppo (7th cent.) and others (8th to 3d cent. B.C.) (see cols. 6, 7, 8 of Plate). Comparison reveals a common origin, and also a period of development in the individual alphabets covering several centuries, which were, however, slight. The earliest forms of the Greek alphabet, especially where the writing is from right to left as is the case with the Semitic alphabet, show that these also were derived from the same source. It is therefore evident that the original alphabet must have come into use some centuries earlier than the dates of the inscriptions cited, certainly by 1200 B.C.

Son of Azariah.
The Hebrew inscription reads:

2. Origin of Alphabet. Attempts have repeatedly been made to find the source of the Semitic letters in the Egyptian or Babylonian characters. J. Halévy (Revue sémitique, 1896, pp. 47-65; 1901, pp. 356-370) derives the forms directly from the monumental hieroglyphs; whereas E. de Rougé (Mémoire sur l'origine égyptienne de l'alphabet phénicien, 1874) obtains them from the early hieratic characters through a cursive development of the hieroglyphs. Isaac Taylor (The Alphabet, Vol. I) accepts this view. On the other hand, W. Deecke (ZDMG, xxxi. 102 ff.) and Hommel (Gesch. Babyloniens u. Assyriens, p. 50 ff.) contend that the forms of the Semitic alphabet were derived from certain cuneiform characters. Fr. Delitzsch (Die Entstehung des ältesten Schrift-Systems, p. 221 ff.), however, contents himself with the attempt to prove only a free dependence of the Semitic letters on the Babylonian writing. H. Schäfer ("Die Vokallosigkeit des phönizischen Alphabets," in Zeitschrift für d. ägyptische Sprache, LII, 1915, 95 f.) ascribes an Egyptian origin to the Phœnician alphabet as both Egyptian picture-writing and Semitic writing using the alphabet lack vowels, whereas all other forms of writing found it necessary to provide vowels. The lack of vowels would not be felt by one accustomed to picture-writing in which the grammatical form must be determined from the context by the reader. A. H. Gardiner ("The Egyptian origin of the Semitic Alphabet," in Journal of Egyptian Arch., III, 1916, 1 f.) also urges in favor of Egyptian influence the alphabetic and non-vocalic character of Semitic writing. Whereas the Babylonian and Mediterranean (Cypriote) scripts were syllabic and non-alphabetic, 'the Egyptian hieroglyphic system eschews vowels and comprises a full alphabet of consonants besides biliteral and triliteral signs.' Gardiner also points out the affinities of the curious Sinai script with Egyptian writing, and giving the Sinai script an early date makes it the progenitor of the Phœnician. J. H.

Breasted (The physical processes of writing in the early Orient and their relation to the origin of the alphabet, in AJSL, XXXII, 1916, 230 f., [see also his History of Ancient Egypt, 1908, p. 337]) bases an argument in favor of the Egyptian origin of the alphabet on the fact that the 'pen-ink-and-paper' method of writing, introduced into Asia from Egypt, was spreading in the very region where the alphabet was appearing and coming into common use, and this system of writing was the only one which possessed an alphabet and was written without vowels. Neither system can as yet be proved to be the direct source of all the letters of the Semitic alphabet. Petrie (op. cit.) finds beginnings of an alphabet in signs which in his opinion pre-date pictographic writing, and Evans (Scripta Minora, 1909) emphasizes the influence of Crete through the Philistines on Phœnician civilization and claims that the alphabet was largely dependent upon Cretan sources. Evans and also F. Melian Stawell (AJA, 1924, 120 f.) allow for Babylonian and Egyptian influences in the choice of the letters and their forms. The Egyptian influence was felt directly in the civilization of Crete, and some of its signs depend upon Egyptian sources. The acrophonic element of the later Egyptian characters, however, may have suggested the alphabet to its inventor, for a letter is represented in its earliest form by the picture of the object, the name of which begins with the letter represented.

The inscription reads: John the High Priest and the Council of the Jews.

3. Names and Origin of Individual Letters. At present it is impossible to give the etymological explanation of all signs used in the Semitic alphabet, but several are certain: among them are the following (consult Plate): א (a) 'ox-head,' Heb. 'eleph; ב (b) 'house,' Heb. bayith; ג (l) 'ox-goad,' malmadh (Lidzbarski, Ephemeris, Vol. I, p. 263, gives, as the name of ג, a Hebrew word beginning with ב, prefixed to a stem which begins with ל; in use this initial ב was dropped); ד (m) 'water,' mayim; ע (i) 'eye,' ayin; פ (p) 'mouth,' peh; ק (r) 'head,' r'osh; ש (s, sh)

'row of teeth,' shēn; ת (t) 'sign,' tāw. Noldeke (Beiträge zur sem. Sprachwissenschaft, 1904, pp. 124-136) and Lidzbarski (Ephemeris, Vol. II, Heft 2, 1906) have published interesting contributions on this point. A study of the Greek names, which evidently were derived from the original Semitic forms, may assist in this investigation. Stawell (op. cit. 123 f.) suggests that the names of the letters which have no Semitic meaning are derived from Cretan (Greek) prototypes, and that possibly the names of other letters are more closely connected with Cretan words than with Semitic. The Aramaic form of the names of the Hebrew alphabet may point to an Aramaic origin of the alphabet. It is almost certain that a few names were given after the original significance of the character had been forgotten and without the use of the principle of acrophony, further than that the name should begin with the letter designated. Perhaps certain letters were developed out of other letters, as e.g., ה from ח, ס from ט, ט from ת, the last-named by enclosing the original form, a cross, in a circle. There is, however, no evidence to prove that the North Semitic alphabet ever had less than the 22 characters used in the inscriptions. All the letters were originally consonants, but י, ה, ו, and א came to represent vowels in Hebrew. The Greek alphabet used some of its forms for vowels and added three new signs. The phonetic demands of the South Semitic peoples led to the production of many additional forms, some at least derived from older characters.

4. Order of Letters. The names of the letters show that the characters were derived from parts of the human body, from animals, and things with which people had most to do. The arrangement of these letters in the alphabet may have been due in part to the tendency to place together things related, e.g., י = hand, כ = bent hand, ע = eye, מ = mouth, and to other mnemonic motives. Luckenbill ("Possible Babylonian Contributions to the So-called Phœnician Alphabet," in AJSL, XXXIV, 1919-20, 27 f.) bases the order of the letters in part on the order in Syllabary A of Babylonian signs. Petrie (op. cit.) ascribes the order to a system whereby the letters of the alphabet were grouped according to their nature in columns on a sort of hornbook in the order of vowels, labials, gutturals, and dentals, the liquids being placed on a possible handle. Then in reading across the columns the order of the letters in the alphabet would be given. We know the order of the Hebrew alphabet from that of the Greek, from the numerical value of each letter, and also from the initial letters of the verses in the alphabetic Psalms (111, 112, 119; Pr. 31 10 ff., and La 1).

5. Alphabet Used by the Hebrews. Apart from the origin of the Semitic alphabet, the changes in the alphabet used by the Hebrews are of especial interest. The letters of the Siloam alphabet (Plate, col. 4) show a tendency to a more cursive character than is found in the Mesha Stone (col. 2); but the letters on the seals (col. 3) and coins (col. 5) retain essentially the forms of the Siloam inscription. The older Hebrew forms were used on the Maccabæan coins, perhaps to emphasize the feeling of national independence.

6. Samaritan Writing. The Samaritans continued to use a form of the old Hebrew alphabet which shows its close relation to the original, and proves that until the separation of the Jews and Samaritans (about 400 B.C.) the older form had maintained itself. The accompanying illustration reproduces a few lines of a Samaritan MS. (Dt 1 44-46) of the Pentateuch, written in 1219 A.D., but retaining essentially the forms used by the earlier Samaritans. In certain respects the Samaritan writing is more cursive, while at the same time the characters are more ornamental, as in a codex.

7. Hebrew Square Characters. The Aramaic alphabet was undergoing a development to the north and east of Palestine (see Plate, cols. 6, 7, 8), and out of it developed the square letters characteristic of the Hebrew alphabet, best known to us from its use in the MSS. of the O.T. It was not a development within the Hebrew alphabet; but was used by that people, as they had adopted the earlier Aramaic forms, familiar to them from their residence in Babylon. The Aramaic writing did not at once displace the old Hebrew alphabet, but both were in use, the Aramaic characters finally securing the preference in copies of the books of the O T. Strack (PRE<sup>3</sup>, Vol. 17) gives as explanation for this that the Aramaic characters were considered holy, the Hebrew profane. At the time of Christ we have evidence (Mt 5:18) that this square alphabet was in use, for ' is the smallest letter. The changes in the forms of the letters were largely due to the attempt to obtain cursive forms, which were as simple as possible and could be made without removing the pen, and also to the similar effort to join the letters of words. This form of writing gave two forms for five letters: final forms, ך, ך, ך, ך, ך; and forms for use before other letters of a word, ך; and by bending the perpendicular lines to the left, ך, ך, ך. In other letters, and in a similar way, horizontal bars have arisen out of the vertical lines of the primitive forms, cf. ך, ך, ך, as well as ך, ך, ך, of column 1. By the opening of the upper portion of closed loops, and the straightening of zigzags of earlier forms, the upper bars of ך, ך, ך, ך, ך are obtained. In order to avoid the confusion of characters in other letters the vertical lines were left, cf. ך and ך. The form ך results from the opening of the upper part of the original circle, and extending the right-hand line toward a following letter. The square Hebrew characters were obtained by isolating each letter from all others in a word, and retaining the form thus resulting. This alphabet, with slight modifications, has been used in all O T manuscripts, the oldest of which dates from the end of the 9th cent. A.D.

ALPHAËUS, al'-fi-us or al-fi'-us (Ἀλφαῖος, WH Ἀλφαῖος): 1. The father of the second James in the apostolic lists (Mk 3:18; Mt 10:3; Lk 6:15; Ac 1:13). A. has been identified with Clopas, husband of Mary, mentioned in Jn 19:25 but apparently without sufficient linguistic warrant (see Zahn, Forsch. VI, p. 343, and compare Dimant in Hastings, DCG, vol. 1, p. 45-2). Eusebius (HE, III, 11, 2) quotes Hegesippus to the effect that Clopas was a brother of Joseph, thus making James the son of A. a cousin of Jesus. But in view of the uncertain identification of A. and Clopas no great weight can be given to this statement (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). 2. The father of Levi (Matthew), (in Mk 2:14, according to most MSS., but D reads 'James' instead of 'Levi').

ALTAR: 1. The Primitive Semitic Altar. The term 'altar' is the usual rendering of the Heb. mizbeah and the Gr. θυσιαστήριον, both of which mean 'place of sacrifice,' i.e., the place where the sacrificial victim is slain or offered, or both, the primary idea of the root of both terms being that of slaying. The ancient legislation (Ex 20:24) requiring that altars should be of earth, or, if not, of unhewn stone only, seems to indicate that the primitive altar often consisted simply of a heap of earth. In any case, there can be no doubt that the earliest altars were of the most simple type. The sacred stone (the matsebhah, 'pillar'), also, was essentially an altar, in the sense of being a place where some recognition of the presence of deity could be made (by smearing with oil, cf. Gn 28:18, or blood, cf. I S 14:31-35). This early narrative in I S 14:31 ff. is instructive as to the intimate relation between the sacred stone and the altar. Saul, horrified by the news that the people were slaying the captured animals and eating them 'with the blood'—i.e., without a proper sacrificial disposal of the blood—had a large stone placed before him to which the people were ordered to bring their animals for slaughter. This stone was both a sacred stone, set up in commemoration of Jehovah's deliverance of His people, and an altar—a mizbeah, 'sacrifice' (i.e., slaughter-) place.' The main idea regarding the sacred stone was that it either was actually the abode of deity or indicated the near-by presence of deity (cf. Gn 28:16-18). The main idea regarding an altar was that it was the place of sacrifice (i.e., slaughter, since originally every slaughter was a sacrifice) as its Heb. name mizbeah indicates. These two ideas are brought together in the most ancient O T legislation regarding altars (Ex 20:24 f.). Wherever J' 'recorded' His name was a legitimate place for an altar; that is, wherever J' manifested His presence, as by a theophany, by a dream, by giving victory to His people, etc. Such conceptions betray themselves in all that is said of altars in the patriarchal stories in Gn and in the stories in Jg and I S. In all these a comparatively simple state of society is presupposed, and all usages are correspondingly simple.

Every Canaanite high place had its altar, and as the main function of the altar was to furnish a place for the proper disposition of the blood, remains of such high-place altars generally show a number of cup-like depressions on the top with one or more drains to collect and carry off the blood (see the reports of excavations at Gezer in PEFQ, 1902-06). The heap of earth, or pile of stones, or even a large single stone, was also used as the fire-hearth (cf.

Ezk 43 15) where the victim (whole or in part) was burned, as was the case with the great majority of animal sacrifices in the O T. For illustrations of ancient Hebrew rock-altars see H. B. Greene in Bib. World, May, 1897, and see also G. L. Robinson's account of the Edomite high place of Petra, ibid., Jan., 1901.

The Kingdom period with its development of city life and the establishment of royal sanctuaries (e.g., at Jerusalem, Beth-el, and Samaria), with their temples and more elaborate cultus, brought about a corresponding development of the altar probably with more or less extensive adoption of foreign types (Phœnician, Assyrian, etc.). In some Canaanite ently because it was customary for more elaborate altars to have such. The original significance of these is not known. W. R. Smith (Rel. Sem., p. 436) thinks that they were a survival of the practise of actually placing the head (with the horns) of the sacrificial victim on the altar and leaving them there to hang votive offerings, etc., on. The horns appear to have been thought the most sacred part of an altar (cf. Ex 29 12; Lev 16 18; I K 1 50). The altar was doubtless provided with drains, etc., but of these nothing is said. Its location was 'before Jehovah' (II K 16 14), i.e., directly E. of the porch of the Temple.

In Solomon's Temple there was another 'altar,' cities altars of elaborate form were in use before the Conquest. One such was found at Taanach by Professor Sellin (July, 1902), with ornamented corners and faces, with horns, a cup for sacrifices, etc. (see PEFQ, Oct., 1902).

DOLMENS (PRIMITIVE ALTARS) IN EASTERN PALESTINE.

2. The Altars of the Temple and Tabernacle. The detailed information regarding altars in the O T concerns mainly those of the Tabernacle and the temples of Solomon and of Ezekiel's vision. For his Temple Solomon discarded David's altar and had a new bronze altar constructed. It is probable that this altar was erected on the site of David's sacrifice on the occasion mentioned in II S 24 18-25 (cf. I Ch 22 1; II Ch 3 1), the place supposed now to be covered by the famous Dome of the Rock (see JERUSALEM, §§ 4, 25). The description of this altar has been omitted in I K, ch. 7 (altho reminiscences occur in 8 64 and 9 25). According to II Ch 4 1, it was 20 cubits in length and breadth with a height of 10 cubits. Its general shape was probably like that of the altar of Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 43 13-17). It 'rose in terraces, contracting by means of two inlets [ledges] toward the top.' The altar Ch is describing may be, however, the altar Ahaz had constructed, after the pattern of an altar he saw at Damascus (II K 16 10 ff.), which displaced the smaller bronze altar of Solomon. Ahaz' altar was in use, probably, until the destruction of the Temple in 586 B.C. By some Ezekiel's (ideal) altar is taken as an exact reproduction of Solomon's but the figures given in Ezk seem to make a structure 18 cubits square by 12 cubits high, instead of 20 cubits and 10 cubits (see Davidson's Com. on Ezk in Camb. Bible). The altar was ascended by a flight of steps on its east side. Its faces were probably ornamented with figures of various kinds. Little is said of its structure in detail. The material is said to have been brass (bronze). Whether this refers to the whole or only to its covering or plating is not known. It had horns, appar-

that of the showbread (I K 6 20) made of cedar, overlaid with gold. This is called a 'table' in Ezk (41 22). Something similar to this has been found portrayed on the Assyrian monuments. (See the cut in Benzinger, 1st ed., p. 387). In K, Ch, and Ezk there is no specific mention of an altar of incense.

When the exiles returned, one of their first acts was to build an altar (Ezr 3 3) probably of unhewn stones (cf. I Mac 4 47) in stricter accord with the old law of Ex 20 25 than the altars of Solomon, Ahaz, or Ezekiel had been. This altar was in use as the altar of the Second Temple until it was desecrated by the command of Antiochus Epiphanes (I Mac 1 54). When the Jews regained possession of Jerusalem they carefully pulled down the desecrated altar, laid away its stone and built a new one, also of unhewn stone (I Mac 4 44-47). It is thus seen that Ezekiel's plan of a magnificent altar was not followed, altho it is probable that the altar of Herod's Temple, in which everything was on a much more elaborate scale than before, conformed more nearly to Ezekiel's plan.

The description of the Tabernacle in Ex, chs. 25-31 and 35-40, largely of postexilic date, states ideals rather than facts. It combines the conceptions of Ezekiel with the actual practises of the postexilic Temple in one ideal presentation. According to this description the Tabernacle had three altars: (1) 'The altar,' i.e., the altar of burnt offerings, a small portable structure, hollow, of wood overlaid with bronze, 5 cubits square and 3 cubits high. It was furnished with horns and with a bronze grating or network, perhaps intended for carrying away the blood, rather than for the ashes (Ex 27 1-8). (2) The table for the showbread (Ex 25 23-30). (3) The altar of incense (Ex 30 1 ff.). The account of this last seems to belong to a secondary stratum of the narrative in Ex, chs. 25-31 and, since even Ezekiel says nothing about such an altar, was probably added at a later time in the postexilic period after the altar of incense had been added to the furniture of the Second Temple. When that was no one can say, except that it took place before the Maccabæan period (cf. I Mac 4 49). Of the altars of Herod's reconstructed temple little is definitely known. See also TEMPLE; TABERNACLE; and SACRIFICE.

ALUSH, ʿalūsh (ʾalūsh): An encampment of Israel (Nu 33 13 f.). Site unknown.

ALVAH, al'va; ALVAN, al'væn; See ALIAH, ALIAN.

AMAD, ʿmad (ʾam'adh): A town of Asher (Jos 19 26). Site uncertain.

AMAL, ʿmal (ʾāmāl): A son of Helem, an Asherite (I Ch 7 35).

AMALEK, am'ə-lek (ʾāmālēg): The grandson of Esau (Gn 36 12), whose nomad descendants are described in Nu 24 20 as 'the first of the nations,' i.e., the most powerful. The reference in Gn 14 7 to 'all the country of the Amalekites' as smitten by Chedorlaomer and his allies does not necessarily carry them back in history to the days of Abraham, but rather defines their locality in the time of the author. They are not alluded to in the 'Table of Nations' (Gn 10). Geographically, they occupied the desert region S. of Canaan, extending from Beersheba beyond Kadesh-barnea far into the peninsula of Sinai and probably also into northern Arabia. They withstood the Israelites, when the latter under Moses migrated from Goshen to the Promised Land, attacking them in the rear (Dt 25 17-19). At Rephidim, in the wilderness of Sinai, they were defeated by Joshua (Ex 17 8-16). When the spies returned they reported that the Amalekites dwelt 'in the land of the South' (Nu 13 29). Not long after this they are spoken of as occupying 'the valley,' presumably the valley S. of the Dead Sea (Nu 14 25). Altho powerful at the time of Israel's exodus, they must have become somewhat reduced through the secession of the Kenites (cf. I S 15 6). In the time of the Judges, however, they seem to have possessed a foothold in Ephraim (Jg 5 14, according to the present [uncertain] text) and to have continued their marauding expeditions (Jg 6 3). They were among the inveterate enemies of Israel (Ex 17 14-16; Ps 83 7).

Saul was commissioned to exterminate them utterly, but he spared Agag, their king (I S 15). In David's day Amalekite robbers made a raid upon Ziklag and took it, but they were overtaken by David and so completely decimated that they seem never to have recovered (I S 30). In Hezekiah's reign 'the remnant of the Amalekites that escaped' were smitten by the Simeonites, who dispossessed them of Mount Seir (I Ch 4 43). No trustworthy data concerning them are to be found outside the O T. Neither Assyrian nor Egyptian records allude to them.

AMANA, ā-mā'nā (ʾāmānāh): The southern portion, probably, of the Anti-Lebanon mountain range (Song 4 8).

AMARIAH, am'ə-rai'a (ʾāmāryāh), 'J' hath promised': 1. A son of Meraioth and grandfather of Zadok (I Ch 6 7 f.; Ezr 7 3). 2. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Kohathite Levites (I Ch 23 19; cf. 24 23). 3. Chief priest in Jerusalem under Jehoshaphat (I Ch 6 11; II Ch 19 11). 4. A Levite assistant to Kore, the porter at the east gate who was over the free-will offerings of God, in the time of Hezekiah (II Ch 31 14 f.). 5. Ancestor of Zephaniah, possibly son of Hezekiah King of Judah (Zeph 1 1). 6. A man of Judah, one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 42). 7. One of the priests that sealed the covenant of Nehemiah's time (Neh 10 3). 8. A Judahite who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh 11 4). 9. One of the priests of Zerubbabel's band which returned from Babylon (Neh 12 2, 13).
J. A. K.

AMASA, am'ə-sə (ʾāmāsā): 1. A son of Jether and David's sister Abigail (I Ch 2 17). He deserted David for Absalom who appointed him captain of his forces (II S 17 25). After David's victory he gave A. the place held by his cousin Joab (II S 19 13 f.), probably in order to allay disaffection in Judah. Very soon after this A. was assassinated by Joab (II S 20 4-12; I K 2 5, 32). 2. An Ephraimite (II Ch 28 12).
E. E. N.

AMASAI, a-mas'ai (ʾāmāsai): 1. A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 6 25, 35; II Ch 29 12). 2. One of David's captains (I Ch 12 16-18, perhaps the same as Amasa, 1). 3. A priest (I Ch 15 24).

AMASHSAI, a-mash'sai (ʾāmashšay, Amashai AV): A priest (Neh 11 13), called Maasai (I Ch 9 12).

AMASIAH, am-ə-sai'a (ʾāmāsyāh), 'J' bears': One of Jehoshaphat's captains (II Ch 17 16).

AMAZIAH, am'ə-zai'a (ʾāmātsyāhū), 'J' strengthens': 1. Son of Joash and king of Judah, c. 798-790 B.C. Altho he executed his father's murderers he refused to follow custom and spared their children. This action was looked upon as a precedent and was probably the origin of the law as formulated in Dt 24 16. Having reduced Edom once more to subjection to Judah, he rashly engaged in war with Jehoash of Israel, but was utterly defeated. Jerusalem was captured, its walls partly demolished, while A. retained his throne only through paying a heavy indemnity and giving hostages. Judah was thus reduced practically to the condition of subjection to Israel. After this, disaffection showed itself and, like his father, A. was murdered by conspirators (II K 12 21, 13 12, 14 1-22; II Ch ch. 25). A. is said to have reigned twenty-nine years (II K 14 2). This is probably a mistake and he actually reigned but nine years. See OLD TEST. CHRONOLOGY (table). 2. Priest of Beth-el, 'the royal sanctuary,' under Jeroboam II., who attempted to prevent Amos from prophesying in Israel (Am 7 10 f.). 3. One of the descendants of Merari (I Ch 4 34). 4. A Levite (I Ch 6 45). E. E. N.

AMBASSADOR: In O T the equivalent of (1) mēlūs (II Ch 32 31). Properly, 'interpreter' (cf. Gn 42 23; Is 43 27 [RVmg.]; Job 33 23). (2) mal'ākh (II Ch 35 21; Is 30 4, 33 7; Ezk 17 15), 'One who has been sent,' 'a messenger.' (3) tsūr (root idea 'to go'), ambassador in a technical sense (Is 18 2, also 57 9; Jer 49 14, 'messenger' AV); parallel to 'messenger' (Pr 13 17). In Jos 9 4, the Heb. form is verbal, not substantive.

In N T only as a rendering of the verbal form πρεσβεύειν (II Co 5 20; Eph 6 20). J. M. T.

AMBER, am'bər: This word occurs in the AV of Ezk 1 4, 27, 8 2, as the rendering of the Heb. לְשָׁמַל, hashmal. The RV replaces it with the term 'glowing metal,' which is as satisfactory a rendering as can be suggested, since the meaning of the term is uncertain. E. E. N.

AMBUSH, AMBUSHMENT. See WARFARE, § 4.

AMEN, ē'men' or (Mus.) ā'men': The transcription of a Hebrew word with the root idea of 'confirming,' 'supporting.' It is used only as an interjection, 'so be it,' 'so it is.' (1) In the O T: (a) Initially; in affirmation of a preceding statement, which the speaker solemnly makes his own (I K 1 38; Jer 28 6; cf. Rev 7 12, 22 20). (b) Detached, as an oath (Nu 5 22; Dt 27 15; Neh 5 13). (c) Liturgical; at the close of public prayer and benediction (I Ch 16 38; Neh 8 6; Ps 106 48). (2) In N T: (a) In the Epistles, commonly a response to public or private prayer (I Co 14 16; Rev 5 14). (b) In Rev 3 14 (cf. II Co 1 20; Is 65 13; RVmg.) it is used as a proper name—Jesus as the Word affirming the truth of God's promises. (c) In the Gospels its use is confined to the utterances of Jesus. Luke usually employs instead of it the expressions, 'of a truth,' 'truly,' or 'I say.' Jesus uses it not as an answer, but in solemn affirmation. The truth of His utterance must be accepted on His own testimony (cf. 'Yea' in Mt 11 9, 20). In John's Gospel only the double term 'verily, verily' (i.e., 'amen, amen') occurs. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

AMETHYST. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

AMI. ēmai ('אִמִּי, 'āmī, Amon in Neh 7 59): Ancestral head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59).

AMINADAB. See AMMINADAB.

AMITTAI, a-mit'ai ('אִמְתַּי, 'āmīttay): The father of the prophet Jonah (II K 14 25; Jon 1 1).

AMMAH, am'ā ('אִמָּה, 'ammāh): A hill, II S 2 24, near Giah in the wilderness of Gibeon, where Abner, supporting the claims of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, was defeated by Joab, the leader of David's forces. C. S. T.

AMMI, am'moi ('אֲמִי, 'ammī [or אֲמִי, 'ām, when at the end of a word]): An element in the composition of proper names, which, since this word may mean 'kinsman,' or 'people,' may refer to the divine Being (as chief kinsman), or to one's relatives or people. For illustrations see the significance of the various names compounded with 'ammi' (or with the suffix 'am'). Cf. G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, pp. 41-60 and EB, s.v. NAMES.

E. E. N.

AMMI, am'moi ('אֲמִי, 'ammī), 'my people': The designation of Israel as restored to divine favor (Hos 2 1, 23); the opposite of Lo-ammi, 'not my people' (1 9, 2 23), the symbolic name of Hosea's third child which was indicative of the separation that had taken place between Israel and J'. E. E. N.

AMMIEL, am-mi-el ('אֲמִיֵּל, 'ammī'ēl), 'God is kinsman': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 12). 2. The father of Machir of Lo-debar (II S 9 4 t, 17 27). 3. The father of David's wife Bathshua (I Ch 3 5), the same as Eliam, father of Bath-sheba (II S 11 3). 4. A Levite (I Ch 26 5).

AMMIHUD, am-mai'hud ('אֲמִיחֻד, 'ammīhūd), 'kinsman is glory': 1. The father of Elishama, prince of Ephraim (Nu 1 10, 2 18, etc.; I Ch 7 26). 2. A Simeonite (Nu 34 20). 3. A Naphtalite (Nu 34 28). 4. A Judahite, the son of Omri (I Ch 9 4). 5. For II S 13 37 see AMMIHUR.

AMMIHUR, am'mi-hur ('אֲמִיחֹר, 'ammīhūr, Ammihud AV): Father of Talmi, King of Geshur (II S 13 37).

AMMINADAB, a-min'a-dab ('אֲמִינָדָב, 'ammīnādhābh), 'the [divine] kinsman gives': 1. The ancestral head of a family or clan of Judah (Nu 1 7, 2 3, etc.; Ru 4 19 t; I Ch 2 10). 2. The name of one or more Levites, descendants of Kohath (I Ch 6 22 [elsewhere called Izhar, vs. 2, 18, 38; Ex 6 18, etc.], 15 10 t.). A., the father of Aaron's wife (Ex 6 23), was probably a Levite. The reference to Nahshon in both Ex 6 23 and Nu 1 7, etc., may indicate some intermarriage between Levite and Judahite families. E. E. N.

AMMINADIB, a-min'a-dib ('אֲמִינָדִיב, 'ammīnādhīb): A name which occurs in the AV of Song 6 12, but RV reads 'my princely people.' The Heb. text is obscure and difficult. E. E. N.

AMMISHADDAI, am'mi-shad'da-ni ('אֲמִישַׁדַּי, 'ammīshadday), 'Shaddai is kinsman': Father of Ahiezer, prince of Dan (Nu 1 12, etc.).

AMMIZABAD, am-miz'a-bad ('אֲמִיזָבָד, 'ammīzābhādh), 'kinsman has made a gift': An officer, son of Benaiah, David's hero (I Ch 27 6).

AMMON, am'an ('אֲמֹן, 'ammōn; always אֲמֹנִי, 'ammoni, 'children [sons] of Ammon,' except in I S 11 u; Ps 83 7). In Assyrian inscriptions bīt-ammanu: The termination 'on' ('om'), seen also in the name of their chief god, Milcom, may be an Ammonite linguistic peculiarity, and Ammon ('populous') like Milcom ('kingly') a qualitative designation of the divine ancestor, Ben 'Ammī ('son of my people') in Gn 19 30 ff. The Ammonites may have countenanced the union of father and daughter, as did some other Eastern peoples. Dispossessing the Zamzummim (Dt 2 20), they settled E. of the Jordan. Their boundaries were indefinite; the Jordan was claimed as the W. border (Jg 11 13); and to the E. lay the uncharted desert. When Israel entered Palestine the A. lived around the E. end of the Jabbok (Nu 21 24; Dt 3 18). Rabbah ('Rabbah of the children of Ammon,' Dt 3 11), now Ammān, on the Jabbok, was the capital (see RABBAH).

The term 'children of Ammon' suggests nomadic characteristics, and while towns are vaguely referred to, Rabbah is the only one named. Jg ch. 11 gives the first detailed account of their fortunes; Jephthah repudiated their claims on Gilead and drove them E. of the Jabbok. When they again attempted to humiliate Israel, Saul defeated them (I S ch. 11). David was at first friendly to A., but because of the insult to his ambassadors (II S 10 1 ff.), besieged and captured Rabbah, and disrowned Milcom (II S 12 30 mg.); Jotham reduced them to tribute (II Ch 27 5). Later we find them at times in a coalition against Babylon (Jer 27 3), at other times tributary. They once attacked Jerusalem (II K 24 2), and later exulted over her fall (Ps 83 7). The prophets bitterly denounced them (Am 1 13; Jer 49 1 ff.; Ezk 25 2 ff.; Zeph 2 8 f.). In postexilic days Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 2 10) was an opponent of Nehemiah. In 164 B.C., under a leader, Timotheus, they were defeated by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 6-8). The name finally disappears in the 3d cent. A.D.

AMNON, am'nēn (אֲמֹנִי, 'amōnī): 1. David's eldest son, slain by Absalom for violating his sister Tamar (II S 3 2, 13 1-39). 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 20).

AMOK, ē'mek (אֲמֹק, 'amōq), 'deep': A post-exilic priestly family (Neh 12 7, 20).

AMON, ē'mōn (אֲמֹן, 'āmōn), 'master-workman':

1. King of Judah, son of Manasseh, and father of the godly Josiah. Of his brief reign of two years (641-639 B.C.) little is known. Like his father he was devoted to the worship of Assyrian deities. He was assassinated by some of his courtiers, but the people took vengeance upon his assassins. Scholars connect these events with a religious struggle between the prophetic and reactionary parties in Judah. The former, having put the king to death, was not strong enough to maintain its position (II K 21 18 ff.). 2. The governor of Samaria, under Ahab (I K 22 26). 3. One of Solomon's temple slaves whose descendants returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Neh 7 59). 4. An Egyptian god, originally a local deity of Thebes, but with the rise of that city to a position of preeminence as the capital, A. became the head of the Egyptian pantheon, the successor of the sun god Ra, and bore the name Amon-Ra (Jer 46 25; cf. Nah 3 8).

J. A. K.

AMORITE, am'o-raiṭ (אֲמֹרִי, 'ēmōrī, always sg., from Bab. Amurru): The early inhabitants of Palestine. In the O T the name designates the non-Israelitish inhabitants in general, being practically synonymous with the Canaanites (e.g., Gn 14 7, 13, 15 16, 48 22; Dt 3 8, 10, 4 48, 20 17; Jg 6 10; I S 7 14; I K 21 26; II K 21 11); or mountain-dwellers as distinguished from the Canaanites, who lived on the coast and in valleys (Nu 13 29); or the people of a Palestinian state, of which Sihon was king (Nu ch. 21; Dt 1 4, 4 46; I K 4 19; Ps 135 11, 136 19).

The early history of the Amorites is obscure, but they played a large part in the ancient development of the 'Fertile Crescent' (i.e., Tig-Euphr. Valley, Syria, and E-Med. coast region). The Bab. Amurru (Sumerian Martu) is the name of (1) a city some 30 miles N. of Beirut, (2) a territory extending from Palestine to Mesopotamia, (3) a god, (4) a Semitic people. In the 3d millenium B.C. the Amorites were so powerful in W. Asia that the Babylonians called Syria and Palestine 'the land of the Amorites.' They may have constituted a large, unified state. Near the close of the 3d millenium some Amorites pushed SE. and established in Babylonia the 1st dynasty, of which Hammurabi the lawgiver (by many identified with Amraphel of Gn 14 1) is the most prominent. To him a 'king of the Amorites' was subject and there seem to have been several small states ruled by Amorite kings. The Hittites brought an end to Amorite domination. During the XVIIIth Egyptian dynasty the Amorites were vassals to the Pharaoh, as shown by the Amarna Tablets. At the weakening of Egypt they transferred their allegiance to the Hittites. When the 'Sea-people' after crushing the Hittites, went through Palestine against Egypt they took the Amorite king with them (see PHILISTINE). They were defeated decisively by Rameses III of the XXth dynasty and the Amorite king was captured (c. 1200 B.C.). The Amorites appear last as a kingdom in the defeat of Sihon by the Israelites.

Racially the Amorites were not unified; some were fair and some dark. They are pictured in the monuments with beards and shaved upper lips. The Hebrews undoubtedly possessed Amorite blood (Ez 16 2, 45).

AMOS, ē'mās (אֲמֹשׁ, 'āmōš), 'bearer' or 'borne' (by God?): 1. The prophet Amos, a tender of sycamores, and a native of Tekoa, south of Bethlehem (Am 1 1, 7 14). That he was also a shepherd, as nōqēdh is commonly translated, has been questioned (JBL 35, 280). In the loneliness of his native mountains, as with Elijah (I K 19 12 ff.), God's voice was more clearly heard and His words more perfectly understood. So he was impelled to go to Beth-el to preach against N. Israel his God-given message. His activity may be dated some time about 750 B.C. He repudiated the name nābhī', prophet (7 14), but only because of Amaziah's implication that he prophesied for gain and belonged to a venal gild (7 12). Yet he is the first of the writing prophets, the originator indeed of a new school of prophecy.

The analysis of the Book of Amos, externally, is simple. We may distinguish four sections: I. 1 2-2 16. Indictment of the kindred peoples for sins against common humanity, culminating with Israel, who has broken a holier law. II. 3 1-6 14. Oracles in which are reiterated the folly of formalism and the futility of national hopes, while luxury, extravagance, and crime are rampant. To this belongs also 8 4-14, which interrupts its present context. III. 7 1-9 8a. Five visions of judgment with a historical appendix. These visions are climacteric in arrangement, altho the order is broken first by 7 10-17, and second by 8 4-14. First, we have two visions of remediable evils, 7 1-3, 4-6; then the hopeless internal perversity, 7 7-9; and finally the impending consummation, 8 1-3; with earthquake and extermination, 9 1-4. IV. 9 8b-15. Epilog. The picture of a happy future follows ver. 8a abruptly and differs in phraseology, conception, and outlook from the rest of the prophecy. It can hardly have been the original conclusion of Amos's visions of judgment. The five visions seem to be the original kernel of the book, and with them is associated the story of Amaziah's protest, and the prophet's probable expulsion (7 12). The other sections, artistically elaborated as they are, may well have been written later by Amos and committed to posterity.

Prophecy began a new era with A. Whatever his predecessors may have done, he first wrote for posterity the outlines of an ethical theory of the world. The Hebrew term טוב, 'good,' attained with him a distinct moral significance (5 14; cf. ver. 6). The essence of the Law was equity and not sacrifice (5 7, 11, 22-25, 8 4-7). The Day of Jehovah was not to be one of national aggrandizement but of searching judgment (5 18 ff.). Above all rises the conception of the God of Hosts transcendent in power, inflexible in justice, whose dictates are founded not upon arbitrary will, but upon the very constitution of the world (7 7 ff.). It would, perhaps, be too much to say that Amos had a system. It would be inaccurate to characterize him as a teacher of ethical monotheism. He was one upon whom the reality of God had powerfully impressed itself, and to the expression of this, monotheism was but a corollary. If one attribute of the divine nature appealed to him with more intensity than another, this enabled him to present with startling clearness the truths that there can be no religion where human rights are not recognized, and that the claims of justice between men find their original counterpart in the nature of God Himself. In his view of the relation of man to man in society, Amos has not been outgrown, nor have his conceptions of deity become antiquated. See ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, § 18.

2. An ancestor of Joseph (Lk 3 25).

AMÖZ, ʿēmez (אִמּוֹז, 'āmōts), 'strong': Father of Isaiah (Is 1 1, etc.).

AMPHIPOLIS, am-fip'o-lis: A city of Thrace, in a bend of the river Strymon (ἀμφί, περί, and a post on the Via Egnatia. Under the Romans it was a free city and the capital of the first of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided. It is mentioned once in the N T (Ac 17 1).

J. R. S. S.*—J. M. T.

AMPLIATUS, am'pli-ē'tus (ἀμπλάτος, WH 'Αμπλάτος, Amplias AV [am'pli-us], 'Αμπλάτος): A Christian greeted in Ro 16 8 as 'My beloved in the Lord.' The name, probably that of a slave, occurs in inscriptions. Cf. CIL 5154. J. M. T.

AMRAM, am'ram (אַמְרָם, 'amrām): 1. According to the late priestly document, the grandson of Levi, through Kohath, and father of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Ex 6 18-20; Nu 26 59). His descendants were the Kohathite Levites called Amramites (Nu 3 27). 2. One of the 'sons of Bani' who had taken strange wives (Ezr 10 34; cf. ver. 10). 3. See HEMDAN.

E. E. N.

AMRAPHEL, am'ra-fel (אַמְרָפֶּל, 'amrāp̄el):

The king of Shinar who, with two other kings, invaded Palestine under the leadership of Chedorlaomer, King of Elam (Gn 14). A. has been identified by many with Hammurabi, or Ammurapi, (see BABYLONIA, § 15), who is known to have been king of Babylon and therefore of Shinar, or Babylonia proper, and to have thrown off the yoke of Elam about 2120 B.C. Serious difficulties in the way of the identification are the initial ' instead of ' which should correspond to Bab. h, also the l at the end of the Heb. name. Leading Babylonologists, such as E. Meyer, Bezold, Jensen, King, Barton, doubt whether the two names have any connection. F. M. T. Böhl, ZATW, XXXVI, 65 ff., suggests that the name should be read Amur-apil (LXX, Ἀμυραπίλ), that Shin'ar = Shanhar, a district on the upper Euphrates, and that the episode belongs at the time of the Hittite supremacy ca. 1250 B.C. See ARIÖCH, CHEDORLAOMER, TIDAL.

AMULET. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2.

AMZI, am'zai (אַמְצִי, 'amtzi): 1. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 46). 2. A priest (Neh 11 10, 12).

ANAB, ʿnab (אָנָב, 'ānāb), 'grapes': A town of Judah, eight m. SW. of Hebron (Jos 11 21, 15 50). Map II, D 3.

ANAH, an'a (אָנָה, 'ānāh): The ancestor of a Horite clan of the same name (Gn ch. 36; I Ch 1 38-41). In vs. 2 and 14 read 'Anah the son of Zibeon the Horite' as is required by vs. 20, 24 ff.

ANAHARATH, a-nē'hə-rath (אָנָה־רָת, 'ānāhārath): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 19). Site uncertain.

ANAIHA, a-nai'a (אָנִיָּה, 'ānāyāh), 'J' has answered': 1. An assistant of Ezra (Neh 8 4). 2. One of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 10 22).

ANAK, ʿnak, ANAKIM, an'a-kim (אֲנָק, 'ānāq).

Anak was the legendary ancestor of the gigantic Anakim of SW. Palestine (Nu 13 22 ff.; Dt 2 10 f.; Jos 15 12 f.; Jg 1 20, etc.). The references are too vague to be of much historical value. See also PALESTINE, § 27. E. E. N.

ANAMIM. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ANAMMELECH, a-nam'i-lek or [ā'nām-mē'lek (אָנָמֶלֶךְ, 'ānammelekh): A deity worshiped by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim (Sippara), at times with human sacrifice (II K 17 31). The text of this passage is somewhat uncertain and A. may be a later gloss. The name A. is explained by King (in EB) as equivalent to Anu-malik ('Anu is the decider or prince'), Anu being the name of one of the principal Babylonian deities. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 8.

E. E. N.

ANAN, ʿnan (אָנָן, 'ānān): One of those that sealed the covenant (Neh 10 26).

ANANI, a-nē'nai or a-nā'nī (אָנָנִי, 'ānānī). One of the sons of Elioenai (I Ch 3 24).

ANANIAH, an'a-nai'a (אָנָנִיָּה, 'ānanyāh): 'J' is a cloud': I. The father of Maaseiah (Neh 3 23). II. A town in Benjamin mentioned along with Nob and Ramah (Neh 11 32). The common identification, Map II, F 1, is disputed by Albright (Bul. ASOR, Feb., 1923) who favors Bethany, just E. of Jerusalem. E. E. N.

ANANIAS, an'-ə-nai'əs ('Ανανίας, Heb. אֲנָנִיָּא), 'J' hath been gracious': 1. A member of the early Church, who attempted to enhance his reputation by a show of liberality. Having sold a piece of property he offered to the Church a part of the amount received, pretending that he gave the whole sum. Peter detected the deceit and laid bare the enormity of the sin to the guilty conscience of A., who is represented as having died from the shock (Ac 5 1-11). 2. A Christian disciple living in Damascus who baptized Paul (Ac 9 10-18, 22 12-16). 3. The high priest before whom Paul was brought by Claudius Lysias (Ac 23 1 ff.; cf. Ac 24 1 ff.; Jos., Ant. XX, 62, etc.; BJ II 17 6, etc.). Consult Schürer, GJV<sup>3</sup>, Vol. II, p. 219. J. M. T.

ANATH, ə'nəth (אֲנָת 'ānāth): Father of Shamgar (Jg 3 31, 5 6). Anath is well-known as the name of a goddess worshipped quite widely over the ancient Semitic world. This may indicate that Shamgar was not an Israelite. See SHAMGAR. E. E. N.

ANATHEMA, ə-nath'-i-mə. See CURSE, § 3.

ANATHOTH, an'-ə-thoth (אֲנָתוֹת, 'ānāthōth): A name connected with that of the Semitic goddess Anat. I. A city of Benjamin (Jos 21 18) where the priestly family to which Abiathar belonged had its estates (I K 2 26) and the home of two of David's heroes (II S 23 27, Anethothite AV; I Ch 11 23, 12 3, Anathothite, Antothite AV). It was also the home of Jeremiah where the family had property (Jer 1 1, 32 6-15). Its inhabitants once threatened the prophet's life (Jer 11 21-23). After the exile it was reoccupied by the Jews (Ezr 2 23; Neh 7 27, 11 32). Map II, F 1.

II. 1. A Benjamite, the son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 2. A leader of the men of Anathoth who sealed the covenant (Neh 7 27, 10 19). E. E. N.

ANCHOR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

ANCIENT OF DAYS: The incorrect translation of 'atliq yōmīn', 'atliq yōmayyā' 'an aged one.' An apocalyptic name of God, first used in its Aramaic form in Dn (7 9, 13, 22). It was chosen probably not in order to suggest the eternity of the divine Being, but to show that profound veneration was due Him, and to assure the persecuted righteous that their God was incomparably superior to all others. The figure implies a strongly anthropomorphic conception and was taken up by later apocalyptic usage (cf. Ethiopic Enoch 47 3, 48 2-6). The description of the Son of Man in Rev 1 14 is also probably based upon this figure. A. C. Z.

ANCIENTS. See WISDOM, WISE MEN, § 2; and ELDER.

ANDREW ('Ανδρέας, 'manly'): Son of John, of Bethsaida Julius, brother of Simon Peter, with whom he lived in Capernaum. He was the first called of the disciples of Jesus, to whom he was sent by John the Baptist, and became one of the inner group of four among the Twelve (Mk 13 3). In the lists he is always next before his friend and fellow-townsmen Philip, with whom he is also associated on two important occasions in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 6 7, 8, 12 22). After Ac 1 13 he disappears from view, but tradition has it that he evangelized Scythia (becoming thus Russia's patron saint) and was martyred in Achaia. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

ANDRONICUS, an'-dro-nai'kūs ('Ανδρόνικος): A Jew—as is apparent from the term 'kinsman'—converted before Paul, with whom he probably shared imprisonment (Ro 16 7). He is referred to as 'of note among the apostles,' i.e., possibly well-known in the circle of the apostles, tho more probably 'apostle' is here used in the wider sense of that term (see APOSTLE, and cf. Burton ICC, Galatians, p. 372). R. A. F.—E. C. L.

ANEM, ə'nem. See ENGANNIM.

ANER, ə'nər (אֲנֵר, 'ānēr): I. An Amorite prince, with whom Abraham entered into covenant (Gn 14 13, 24). Since, however, Eschol and Mamre are names associated with localities, it is quite likely that the same is the case with Aner. If so, it may be identical with Neir, a range of hills (or a valley) near Hebron.

II. A city west of the Jordan (I Ch 6 70). Site unknown. A. C. Z.

ANETHOTHITE, an'-i-theth'ait. See ANATHOTH, I.

ANGEL: 1. Scope. The scope of this article is determined principally by the English word, which always refers to superhuman beings. The Greek ἄγγελος, from which angel is derived, and the Hebrew מַלְאָךְ, mal'ākḥ, mean 'messenger', without any distinction between human or superhuman messengers except such as may be indicated by the context. Some titles practically equivalent are also noticed here. For other superhuman beings see the articles, CHERUBIM, SERAPHIM, SONS OF GOD.

2. Preexilic Period. It was natural that the Hebrews should have thought of God as surrounded by a court or retinue, which accounts for the use of the plural pronoun in the creation narratives. The growing idea of monotheism brought the numerous other spirits whose existence was assumed into subordination to the one true God; but there is in these early writings a remarkable degree of restraint in speaking of angels. They are brought into play only when needed in some critical time. They bring instruction and encouragement from God to those for whom He has some special message. They are all nameless; they have no individuality of their own. They are simply God's agents, the means by which He communicates with men. It was held that man could not see God himself and live (Ex 33 20). Except in the late writings the appearances of angels are all to be found in the narratives of Abraham and Jacob, the guiding experiences of the Exodus, the stories of Balaam, of Gideon, and of the parents of Samson, the destroying angel in the time of David (II S 24), and in one incident in the life of Elijah (I K 19 6). In all these places the word is singular except in the revelation to Abraham of the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the appearances to Jacob on his journeys.

3. Angel of Jehovah. There are a large number of passages in which the 'angel of Jehovah', or the 'angel of God', is spoken of. Is this an appearance of J'' himself, or is the angel simply a messenger whose self is so lost in his message that he may properly be identified with the sender of the message? Twice those who see the angel say that they have seen God (Gn 32 30; Jg 13 22). Certainly the writers felt that this angel represented God so fully that in dealing with him they were actually dealing with God. This may be said to be a fore-shadowing of the Incarnation in the sense that God was trying to reveal Himself in an intelligible way. But the idea of some older theologians that the 'angel of J'' is the second person of the Trinity in distinction from created angels has no basis in the O T. Except for the somewhat doubtful references in Ps 148 and Neh 9 6, the notion that angels were created does not appear until we reach the Book of Enoch.

4. Postexilic Period. When the great prophets come on the scene they are the sole medium of communication between God and man. They receive their messages directly in the fellowship of spirit with spirit, and there is no need for angelic appearances. But with the exile there came a growing belief in the transcendence of God. He was too great and too far removed from earth for this personal touch with men, and in some of Ezekiel's visions angels reappear, altho they are termed 'men.' In Zechariah there is a special interpreting angel different from the others. Thus we are introduced to the idea of orders and ranks which played so large a part in later angelology. In Dn 4 13, 17, 23, the term watcher is used, and in the same verses as well as Ps 89 5, 7; Job 5 1, 15, 16; Zec 14 5, we find the term 'holy ones' (AV 'saints'). The first term is descriptive of function like messenger and the second descriptive of nature, as sharing one of the unique characteristics of deity. The expressions 'holy ones' and 'host' I K 22 19; Ps 103 21, 148 2; Is 24 21; Dn 8 10, refer to the court by which God is surrounded, and with these are to be associated the seraphim of Is 6 2, which are not angels in the ordinary sense of messengers. They attend upon J'' and share in His counsels. They form that great and glorious company whose presence in heaven helps us to conceive of the majesty and royal splendor of God.

The later angelology, both in the O T and in the Jewish books of the last two centuries B.C., was influenced by the thought of the Persians in such matters as personality and the divisions into good and evil spirits. At first the messengers of evil had been represented as doing God's will, as in I S 16 14, 23; II S 24 16; I K 22 19-23. But later there arose a conception of a class of superhuman beings who were essentially evil. The first clear reference to fallen angels is in the Book of Enoch, chs. 6-15, a lengthy account which furnishes the basis of Jude 6 and II P 2 4. There are some traces of a primitive Semitic demonology in the O T, which comes out particularly in the scapegoat ceremony, Lv ch. 16. And the figure of Satan (the 'accuser') arising first as one something like a 'prosecuting attorney' among the Sons of God, Job 1 6-12; Zec 3 1-5, is finally developed into that of the leader of the hosts of evil, because this furnished a convenient escape from the idea that God was the author of all evil. Compare II S 24 1 with I Ch 21 1. See SATAN. As the angels developed distinct personalities some of them came to have names, and the gods of the heathen nations apparently became the angelic leaders of those nations. Daniel speaks of Gabriel as the revealing angel, and he takes the same role in the first chapter of Luke. Michael is mentioned in Dn as the guardian angel of Judah, and he reappears in Jude 9 (as an Archangel) and Rev 12 7. The book of Tobit speaks of Raphael (12 15) as one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and the angel who appears to Esdras (II Es 4 1) is called Uriel. In the apocalyptic literature 'the imagination ran riot on the rank, classes, and names of angels.' In Enoch 61 1 we first have winged angels. In the O T they appear in human form, and are sometimes called men throughout a narrative, even tho recognized as supernatural visitants. On the other hand there was in this period a skeptical tendency with regard to even the existence of angels, which culminates in the attitude of the Sadducees in the N T.

5. Angels in the N T. In the N T the general belief in angels is assumed, but it is significant that many extravagances of the current Jewish literature are set aside. Jesus is substituted for the angels as the intermediary between God and man. The Epistle to the Hebrews lays special emphasis upon the fact that angels are created, and that they are subordinate to Christ. The same thought is expressed in Eph 1 21 and I P 3 22. They are not inferior deities, but fellow servants to man (Rev 19 10, 22 9) and are therefore not to be worshiped. Paul especially rebukes angel-worship (Col 2 18) which was one of the errors at Colossæ and became more widespread in later centuries (see Gnosticism). Paul's disparaging references to principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, etc., have to do with the speculations about various ranks of angels. The law was thought to have been given through the agency of angels (Ac 7 53; Gal 3 19; He 2 12) and this is one of the reasons advanced by Paul and the author of Hebrews for the superiority of the revelation through Christ. The thought is not definitely to be found in the Hebrew O T, but was probably developed from the LXX. of Dt 33 2 which reads, 'On His right hand angels with Him.'

There was a popular idea that each person had assigned to him a special guardian angel, and it is to this that Jesus refers in Mt 18 10. In the story of Peter's escape from prison (Ac 12 15) is an illustration of the thought that when such guardian angel appeared on earth he took the form of the person guarded. The angels of the seven churches in Asia (Rev 1, 2, 3) have been variously explained. Some think that these are angels in the ordinary sense, as in the rest of the book, some that they are the representatives or bishops of the churches. It is much more likely that they are the personifications of the spiritual character of each church. This falls into line with the popular beliefs just mentioned, and this conception is found in Persian thought. The fravashi in the Avesta is the complete spiritual counterpart of a nation or community (see HDB iv, 991).

LITERATURE: Of the various Bible Dictionary articles the best are those by G. B. Gray in EB, and A. J. Maclean in DAC. See also A. C. Knudson, Religious Teachings of the OT, and various works on OT Theology. E. C. L.

ANGLE. The old Eng. rendering of the Heb. ḥakkāh, 'hook' in Is 19 8 and Hab 1 15.

ANIAM. əni'am (אֲנִי'אָם, 'āni'ām): A Manassite clan or family (I Ch 7 10).

ANIM. ənim (אֲנִים, 'ānim): A town of Judah (Jos 15 50). Map II, E 3.

ANIMALS. See PALESTINE, §§ 24-26.

ANISE. See PALESTINE, § 23.

ANKLETS, ANKLE-CHAINS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2.

ANNA, an'ə (אַנְנָא): An aged propnetess, daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher, belonging to the circle of the 'Pious' (see SIMEON), who hailed the babe Jesus in the Temple as a sign of the coming deliverance of Jerusalem (Lk 2 36-38).

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

ANNAS, an'as (אַנְנָאָס; Heb. אֲנָנִיָּא, 'merciful,' in Josephus Ἀνναῖος): Appointed high priest by Quirinius in 6 A.D., deposed by Valerius, 15 A.D., who later appointed Simon, a son of A. In 18 A.D. his son-in-law Caiaphas (q.v.) was appointed to the office (Jn 18 13; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII 2 2). As head of the family A. still retained influence, which explains why Jesus was led first to A., probably only for an informal hearing, and then to the high priest (Jn 18 13). For the same reason A. is called the high priest in Ac 4 6 altho the actual high priest at the time must have been Caiaphas, or another of A.'s sons, either Jonathan or Theophilus (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 4 3, 5 3). J. M. T.

ANOINT (māshay, whence 'Messiah,' is employed both literally and figuratively; χρίειν [χρίμα, χριστός], always of God's spiritual anointing; the other terms [ἁλείπειν, etc.] are used only in the physical sense).

1. Practical. The application of scented oils was a common toilet operation (Ru 3 3; Ps 104 15; Pr 27 9), which was discontinued in time of mourning (II S 14 2; Dn 10 3; cf. Mt 6 17). It was also a mark of welcome to an honored guest (Ps 23 5; Lk 7 46; Jn 12 3). Ointments were frequently applied as remedies for sores and wounds (Is 1 6; Lk 10 34). The anointing of the dead (Mk 14 8; Lk 23 56) seems to have been a token of respect, rather than an embalming process (cf. Jn 11 39). Oil was rubbed upon the leather of shields to preserve them (Is 21 5; II S 1 21). See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 7.

2. Symbolical. As a sign of dedication, sometimes with resulting inspiration (I S 10 1 f., 16 13), oil being symbolic of the Divine Spirit. Jacob poured oil upon the pillar at Beth-el (Gn 28 18). The Tent and its furniture were sanctified with 'holy anointing oil' (Ex 30 22 f.). See ONTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1. Priests were consecrated by anointing (Lv 8 12, 30; cf. 4 3; Ps 133 2), and the early kings were thus designated (I S 10 1, 16 13; II S 19 10; II K 9 3 f.) and inaugurated (II S 2 4, 5 3; I Ch 29 22). The king was 'J''s anointed,' and thus a sacred status was his which was quite different from that of other men (cf. e.g. I S 26 9 f.). Probably the anointing in Mk 6 13 and Ja 5 14 was a symbol of consecration preparatory to divine healing.

3. Metaphorical. Signifying divine selection and endowment for some particular service. In this figurative sense, Cyrus (Is 45 1), and the prophet-patriarchs (I Ch 16 22; cf. Gn 20 7) were said to be 'anointed.' Thus also, Israel (?) was Jehovah's anointed (Hab 3 13; Ps 89 38; La 4 20), and Christians received the unction of the Holy Spirit (II Co 1 21; I Jn 2 20, 27). For Christ as the Anointed One (Is 61 1 = Lk 4 18; Ac 10 38), see MESSIAH, § 7. See also BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 1.

ANT. See PALESTINE, § 26.

ANTELOPE. See PALESTINE, § 24.

ANTHOTHIAH, an'tho-thai'jā (אַנְתּוֹתִיָּהוּ, 'an-thōthīyāh, Antothijah AV): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 24).

ANTICHRIST, THE MAN OF SIN. 1. The Name Antichrist. The actual name Antichrist is first found in the Johannine epistles (I Jn 2 18, 22, 4 3; II Jn 7), but the main idea underlies St. Paul's description of the 'Man of Lawlessness' ('Man of Sin' EVV) in II Th 2 1-12; while, from the manner in which both writers refer to this mysterious figure, it is evident that they had in view an oral tradition current at the time (I Jn 4 3 'ye have heard,' II Th 2 6 'ye know'). Any attempt, therefore, to understand the doctrine of A. as it meets us in the NT must naturally begin with this tradition, so far as it is now possible to trace it.

2. Possible Connection with Babylonian Myth. Here, according to the latest view, we are carried far back. Bousset, in his elaborate monograph, Der Antichrist (1895, Eng. transl. The Antichrist Legend, 1896), adopting and developing the suggestion of Gunkel in his Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), would have us see in the A. legend an anthropomorphic transformation of the Babylonian Dragon Myth, according to which the monster (Tiamat), who had opposed the Creator at the beginning, would again in the last days rear its head in rebellion, only, however, to be finally crushed. It is impossible to examine here in detail the evidence adduced in support of this position, but it seems practically certain that this myth had reached Palestine, and may, therefore, have had a share in familiarizing the Jews with the idea of an arch-enemy of God, and of His cause. Beyond this, with the data at our disposal, we can hardly go at present, and we are on surer ground when, for the early history of this belief, we turn to the evidence supplied by the Scriptures themselves.

3. Antichrist in Old Testament. In the O T we have ample proof of a general Jewish belief in a fierce attack to be directed against Israel in the end of the days by some hostile person or power, while this attack is frequently so described as to supply later writers with their language and imagery in depicting the last attack of all against God's people. See, e.g., Psalm 88 (89), many of whose words and phrases are reechoed in II Th chs. 1 and 2 (cf. Bornemann, Thess. p. 356 f.), or the account of the fierce onslaught by Gog from the land of Magog (Ezk chs. 38, 39; cf. Rev 20 7 f.).

It is, however, in the Book of Daniel (168-165 B.C.) that we find the real starting-point of many of the later descriptions of A., and especially in the picture that is there presented of Antiochus Epiphanes. No other foreign ruler was ever regarded by the Jews with such hatred on account both of his personal impieties and of his bitter persecution of their religion, and, accordingly, he is here portrayed as the very impersonation of all evil. Some of the traits indeed ascribed to him are of such a character (7 8, 11, 20, 21, 25, 11 36-45) that it has been thought the writer had not so much Antiochus as the future Antichrist directly in view. And, altho this is not exegetically possible, it is easy to understand how this description influenced the Apostolic writers in their account of the arch-enemy of God and man (cf., e.g., II Th 2 4 with Dn 11 36 f. and Rev 13 1-8 with Dn 7 8, 20 f., 25, 8 24, 11 23, 30 and see Driver, Daniel, p. 271 f.). With the fall of Antiochus and the rise of the Maccabæan kingdom, the promise of deliverance, with which Daniel had comforted God's people during their dark days, received its proximate fulfilment; but, when the nation again fell under a foreign yoke, the old fears were once more revived and received a fresh coloring from the new powers by which the Jewish nation now found itself opposed.

4. In Later Writings of the Jews. In determining the Jewish views regarding A. during this period much difficulty is caused by the uncertainty regarding the exact date of some of the relative writings, and the possibility of their having received late-Christian interpolations. The following references however, deserve notice:

'In the Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon (48-40 B.C.) Pompey, as the representative of the foreign power that had overthrown Zion, is described as the personification of sin ( $\delta \alpha \mu \alpha \rho \tau \omega \lambda \delta \varsigma$ , 2 1), and even as the dragon ( $\delta \delta \rho \acute{\alpha} \kappa \omega \nu$ , ver. 29); while in IV Ezr 5 1-6, which, altho belonging to the last decade of the 1st cent. A.D., is a characteristically Jewish work after an enumeration of the signs of the last times and the shaking of the kingdom that is after the third power (i.e., the power of Rome), we read of one who 'shall rule, whom they that dwell upon the earth look not for'—a mysterious being generally identified with the future A. Compare also the description of the destruction of the 'last leader' of the enemies of Israel in Apoc. Bar. 40 1 f., where again Pompey may be thought of.

In none of these passages, it will be noticed, have we more than a God-opposing being of human origin, but it has recently been pointed out with great cogency by Dr. Charles (The Ascension of Isaiah, pp. lv ff.) that, in the interval between the O T and the N T, a further development was given to Jewish belief in A. through the influence of the Beliar myth.

In the O T 'belial' is never, strictly speaking, a proper name, but denotes 'worthlessness,' 'wickedness,' tho, from its frequent occurrences along with another noun in such phrases as 'sons of Belial' (Dt 13 13; Jg 19 22, etc., AV), the idea readily lent itself to personification, until in the later pseudepigraphical literature, the title regularly appears as a synonym for Satan, or one of his lieutenants.

Thus in the Book of Jubilees (2d cent. B.C.) we read, 'Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be lifted up upon Thy people, . . . and let not the spirit of Beliar rule over them' (1 20, ed. Charles), and similar references to Beliar as a Satanic spirit are frequent in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (2d cent. B.C. in part at least), in which see, e.g., Test. Reub. 4, 6.

The most interesting passage, however, for our purpose is contained in the third book of the Sibylline Oracles, in a section which in the main goes back to the same early date, where Beliar is depicted as a truly Satanic being, accompanied by all the signs that are elsewhere ascribed to A. (see Orac. Sib. iii, 63 ff., ed. Rzach). And with this there should also be compared Orac. Sib. ii, 167 f., where it is stated that 'Beliar will come and do many signs to men,' tho here the originally Jewish origin of the passage is by no means so certain.

In the same way it is impossible to lay too much stress in the present connection on the speculations of Rabbinical theology regarding the person of A. in view of the late date of our authorities. But we may accept, as in the main reflecting the views of the Jews about the beginning of the Christian era, the conception of a powerful ruler to be born of the tribe of Dan (cf. Gn 49 17; Dt 33 22; Jer 8 16, and see further Friedländer, Der Antichrist in den vorchristlichen jüdischen Quellen [1901] c, ix) and uniting in himself all enmity against God and hatred against God's people, but whom the Messiah will finally slay by the breath of His lips (cf. Weber, Jüd. Theologie [1897] p. 365).

5. In Christ's Teaching. We can at once see how readily this idea would lend itself to the political and materialistic longings of the Jews, and it is only, therefore, what we would expect when we find our Lord, true to His spiritual ideals, saying nothing by which these expectations might be encouraged, but contenting Himself with warning His hearers against false teachers, the 'false Christs,' and the 'false prophets' who would be ready 'to lead astray, if possible, even the elect' (Mt 24 24; Mk 13 22). Even, too, when in the same discourse He seems to refer to a single A., the reference is veiled under the mysterious figure derived from Daniel of the 'abomination of desolation standing ( $\epsilon \pi \tau \eta \rho \epsilon \sigma \tau \alpha$ ) where he ought not' (Mk 13 14; cf. Mt 24 15); while a similar reticence marks His words as recorded in Jn 5 43, if here again, as is most probable, He has A. in view.

Slight, however, altho these references in our Lord's recorded teaching are, we can understand how they would direct the attention of the Apostolic writers to the traditional material lying to their hands in their treatment of this mysterious subject, and, as a matter of fact, we have clear evidence of the use of such material in the case of at least two of them.

6. In Pauline Epistles. Thus, apart from his direct reference to the Jewish belief in Beliar in II Co 6 15, Paul has given us in II Th 2 1-2 a very full description of the working of A., under the name of the 'Man of Lawlessness,' in which he draws freely on the language and imagery of the O T and on the speculations of later Judaism. The following are the leading features in his picture: (1) 'The mystery of lawlessness' is already at work, altho for the moment held in check by a restraining person, or power, apparently to be identified with the power of law or government, especially as these were embodied at the time in the Roman State. (2) No sooner, however, has this restraining power been removed (cf. II Es 5 4; Apoc. Bar. 39 7) than a general 'apostasy' results, finding its consummation in the 'revelation' of 'the man of lawlessness.' (3) As 'the opposer' he 'exalteth himself against all that is called God' (cf. Dn 11 36 f.) and actually 'sitteth in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God'—the description being again modeled on the Danielic account (cf. Dn 8 13, 9 27, 11 31, 12 11); while (4) the 'lying wonders' by which his working is distinguished are illustrated by Orac. Sib. iii, 64 f.; Asc. Isaiah 4 6. (5) And yet, powerful as this incarnation of wickedness seems, the Lord Jesus at His parousia will 'slay him with the breath of his mouth,' the words being a quotation from Is 11 4, a passage which the Targum of Jonathan afterward applied to the destruction of Armilus, the Jewish A., and whose use here Paul may well have drawn from the Jewish tradition of his time (cf. the use of the same passage in Pss. Sol. 17 27, 39; II Es 13 10).

The whole description is thus of a very composite character, but, at the same time, is so definite and detailed that it is hardly to be wondered at that there has been a constant endeavor to find its suggestion in some historical personage of the writer's own time. But, altho the sacrilegious conduct of Caligula (cf. Tacit., Hist. v, 9) may have influenced the writer's language in ver. 4, the real roots of the conception lie elsewhere, and it is rather, as we have seen, in the O T and in current Jewish tradition that its explanation is to be sought.

7. In the Apocalypse. The same may be said, in part at least, of the various evil powers which meet us in the Johannean Apocalypse. The wild Beast of the Seer (Rev chs. 13-20) vividly recalls the horned wild Beast of Dn chs. 7 and 8, and the parallels that can be drawn between the language of John and of Paul (cf. Rev 12 9, 13 1 f. with II Th 2 9 f.; Rev 13 5 ̣., 14 11 with II Th 2 4, 10 ̣.; Rev 13 3 with II Th 2 9 ̣.) point to similar sources as lying at the roots of both. On the other hand, the Johannean descriptions have a direct connection with contemporary secular history which was largely wanting in the earlier picture. This is seen noticeably in the changed attitude toward the power of Rome. So far from this being regarded any longer as a restraining influence, it is rather the source from which evil is to spring.

And we can understand, therefore, how the city of Rome and its imperial house supply John with many of the characteristics under which he describes the working of A. until, at last, he sees all the powers of evil culminate in the Beast of ch. 17, who, according to the interpretation of Bousset (adopted by James in HDB), is partly representative of an individual 'who was and is not, etc., that is, Nero redivivus; partly of a polity, namely that of Rome.

8. In Johannean Epistles. There remain only the references in the Johannean Epistles, in which, in keeping with the writer's main object, the spiritual side of the conception is again predominant. Thus, after indicating some of the main elements in Christian truth, John passes in I 2 18 to the conflict into which, at 'a last hour,' truth will be brought with falsehood, and in token of this points to the decisive sign by which this crisis will be known, namely, the 'coming' of A.—the absence of the article in the original showing that the word has already come to be used as a technical proper name. Nor does 'Antichrist' stand alone. Rather he is to be regarded as 'the personification of the principle shown in different Antichrists' (Westcott, ad loc.), who, by their denial that 'Jesus is the Christ,' deny in like manner the revelation of God as Father (2 22) and, consequently, the true union between God and man (4 3).

9. Present Significance of Antichrist. It is, therefore, into a very different atmosphere that we are introduced after the strange symbolism of the Apocalypse, and the scenic representation of the Pauline description. And one likes to think that the last word of Revelation on this mysterious topic is one which leaves it open to every one to apply to the spiritual workings of evil in his own heart, and in the world around him, a truth which has played so large a part in the history of God's people in the past, and which may still pass through many varying and progressive applications before it reaches its final fulfillment in the 'dispensation of the fulness of the times' (Eph 1 10).

LITERATURE: In addition to the special literature referred to above, see articles on Antichrist by Bousset in ERE, by James (under the title Man of Sin) in HDB, by Ginsburg in JE, and by Sieffert in PRE, and the Excursus by Bornemann and Findlay and Frame (ICC) in their Commentaries on the Thessalonian Epistles; see also E. Wadstein, Die eschatologische Ideengruppe: Antichrist-Weltsabbat-Wellende und Weltgericht (1896). The argument of the foregoing paper will be found more fully stated with the text of the passages referred to in the Additional Note on The Biblical Doctrine of Antichrist in the present writer's commentary on The Epistles to the Thessalonians (1907) see also Charles, ICC, The Revelation of St. John, Vol. II pp. 76 ff (1920) and Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John pp. 393-411 (1919).

ANTIOCH, an'ti-ok (Ἀντιόχεια). 1. Pisidian A. (ad Pisidiam), so distinguished from other cities of the same name founded by Seleucus Nicator (301-280 B.C.), and named in honor of his father. Inscriptions show that the surrounding population were Phrygian, against whom and the Pisidian mountaineers it was a garrison center composed of Greek, Jewish and Anatolian races. On the fall of the Seleucid power Antioch was made a free city by the Romans in 189 B.C.; in 39 B.C. Antioch and the whole of Pisidia were given by Antony to Amyntas of Galatia; in 25 B.C. it was incorporated into the province of Galatia, to which it belonged till at least 198 A.D., if not to 295 A.D. when Diocletian constituted the separate province of Pisidia, of which it became the capital. About 6 B.C. the city was made a Colonia Casarea Antiocheia by Augustus. Lying on the borders of Phrygia and Pisidia it might be reckoned to either. Thus Strabo describes it as a city of Phrygia toward Pisidia, while the majority of writers speak of it as Pisidian. In Paul's day it was a city of Galatia in the district of Phrygia. Here he inaugurated the mission to the S. Galatian churches (Ac 13 49); and among 'the churches of Galatia' (Gal 1 2) Pisidian Antioch is to be included. Cf. also Ac 14 19 ff., 15 36, 16 4 ff., 18 23. The ruins in the vicinity of Yalowadj were first identified as ancient Antioch by Arundell (Discoveries in A. M., I, p. 268 ff.). Antioch has furnished rich epigraphical material of considerable importance, for which see e.g. Sterrett, Epigr. Journey in A. M., p. 121 f.; C. I. G., Nos. 3979-81; C. I. L., III, 289 f.; Ephem. Epigr., V, 575-80; Le Bas-Waddington, Voyage, III, 1189 ff.

2. Syrian Antioch, the most important of the Seleucid foundations. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, 301 B.C., on the left bank of the Orontes, 15 miles inland, with Seleucia as its port. Subsequent Seleucids and the Romans enlarged and adorned this city till it became the third in rank in the Rom. empire (after Rome and Alexandria). In 83 B.C. it passed from the Seleucids to Tigranes of Armenia who remained 14 years master of Syria, until in 64 B.C. Pompey annexed Syria, making Antioch the capital. For centuries Antioch was an important center of commerce, education, and culture. Its suburb, Daphne, 5 miles distant, was the pleasure-resort of Antioch and noted for its beauty, luxury, and licentiousness. The city was repeatedly visited by devastating earthquakes during the first six centuries. In 538 it was sacked by Chosroes, and in the next century, 637, it fell under the Arab conquest from which it never recovered. The squalid village of Antakiyeh marks the spot of Antioch 'the great' and 'the beautiful.' The city occupied an honorable place as the mother-church of Gentile Christianity and the center of the missionary enterprise which carried the new faith to Europe (Ac 13 ff.). Here, too, Jesus' followers were first called 'Christians' (Ac 11 26). It was also the center of several church councils. S. A.

ANTIOCHUS, an-tai'-o-kus ('Αντίοχος), the father of Seleucus I (312-281 B.C.), the founder of the Seleucid line of Kings of Syria. The name was borne by a number of Kings of the House of Seleucus of whom the following are of interest to the Bible student.

Antiochus III, the Great, (223-187 B.C.). By his victory over the Egyptians at Paneas in 198 B.C. Palestine came under the control of Syria. A. compelled the Egyptian king (Ptolemy IV) to accept his daughter Cleopatra as the bride of the heir to the throne of Egypt (Ptolemy V) hoping thereby to make Egypt more completely subordinate to Syria. But in this he was disappointed for the daughter became pro-Egyptian. This struggle between Antiochus III and Ptolemy IV is told in veiled terms in Dn 11 11-17. At first the Jews were favorable to the Syrian domination, but a growing party in the nation opposed the Greek influences furthered by the Syrian monarchs. A. was overwhelmingly defeated by the Romans in 190 B.C. losing thereby control over Asia Minor. He died three years later in a vain attempt to retrieve his fortunes in the Eastern part of his realm (cf. Dn 11 18-19). A. was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopater (187-175), who reigned eleven years. Near the close of his reign a rupture took place in the hitherto friendly relations of the Jews to their Syrian sovereigns (cf. II Mac 3 1-4 6). A crisis came under Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), who succeeded his brother Seleucus in 175. He was a brilliant but moody man—a strange combination of intellectual power and moral weakness. With unflagging zeal he sought to Hellenize Palestine, and this brought on the Maccabæan revolt (see MACCABEES). At the very first he decided against the high priest Onias III in favor of Jason, the leader of the Hellenizing party (I Mac 1 10 ff., cf. II Mac 4 7 f.). Disappointed bitterly in his effort to control Egypt (being forbidden by Rome to follow up his victory over the Egyptian army) and enraged at the Jews for their opposition to his Hellenizing policy, he vented his rage on Jerusalem and issued a decree forbidding the Jews to worship God according to their Law (I Mac 1 16-64; II Mac 4 7-7 42; cf. Dn 11 21-35). The efforts to carry out this decree involved him in the Maccabæan war in which one Syrian army after another was defeated by the brilliant Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 3 10, 4 35). A. then entrusted the subjugation of Judea to the regent Lysias, and embarked on his disastrous expedition to the East on which he died (164). Dn 11 40-45 is a forecast of the fate of A., but is not in accord with the known facts. See DANIEL, BOOK OF.

Antiochus V (Eupator) was only nine years old when his father died, and Lysias, the governor of the provinces, undertook the guardianship of the young boy. Together they made an expedition into Judea and at the battle of Bethzacharias they defeated Judas Maccabæus. The outlook for the Jews was dark, when suddenly the war was terminated by the attempt of Philip, foster-brother of Antiochus IV, to secure the Syrian throne. Hastily concluding a peace, Lysias and A. hurried back to Antioch and suppressed Philip. In the following year (162) A. was betrayed into the hands of Demetrius Soter, his cousin, and put to death (I Mac 6 1-7 4).

The next Antiochus (VI), brought as a child from Arabia by Tryphon, a Syrian general, as a claimant to the throne, was a son of Alexander Balas, a pretender to the throne who reigned 150-145. Tryphon was successful and A. was crowned, but the real power of the government was Tryphon, who used the young king as a tool and finally had him murdered in order to be himself made king. During all the rivalries and intrigues of the Syrian court up to this time, Jonathan Maccabæus (q.v.) had been able by clever diplomacy to further the interest of the Jews, but he fell at last a victim to the treachery of Tryphon in 143 B.C. (I Mac 11 39 f., 54 ff., 12 39-13 32).

In 138 Antiochus VII, a great-grandson of Anti-ochus III (called Sidetes from the place of his education, Side in Pamphylia), drove Tryphon out and took the throne. To win the favor of the Jews, former privileges were confirmed, and further concessions granted (I Mac 15 1-9), but as soon as A. felt himself secure upon his throne he changed his attitude and demanded of Simon (Jonathan's successor) the surrender of all the principal fortresses. On Simon's refusal A. sent an army to enforce obedience. This army was so disastrously defeated that A. troubled Simon no further (I Mac 15 26-16 10).

In the time of Hyrcanus (135) A. himself marched upon Jerusalem. After a long siege a satisfactory peace was arranged (Jos., Ant. XIII, 8 2-3). Sidetes fell (125) in a battle with Arsaces, King of the Parthians (Jos., Ant. XIII, 8 4).

Altogether distinct from these Syrian kings is an Antiochus mentioned in I Mac 12 16, 14 22 as father of a certain Numenius, one of the ambassadors sent by Jonathan Maccabæus to Rome.

ANTIPAS, an-ti-pas ('Avr[ε]ῖπας): 1. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great. See HEROD, § 5. 2. An early Christian martyr of Pergamum (Rev 2 13).

ANTIPATRIS, an-tip'a-tris ('Αντιπατρις): A city built (or rebuilt) by Herod the Great, and named after his father Antipater, on the main road from Cæsarea to Lydda (Ac 23 31). It was held to mark the NW. limit of Judea. Map I, C 7. See APHEK, 1.

ANTONIA, an-tō'ni-ā: A strong fortress situated at the NW. corner of the Temple area, the 'castle' of Ac 21 34, etc. See JERUSALEM, § 38, and TEMPLE § 26.

ANTOTHIJAH. See ANTHOTHIJAH.

ANTOTHITE, an-toth'ait. See ANATHOTH, I.

ANUB, ē'nub (אַנּוּב, 'ānūbh): A Judahite person or clan (I Ch 4 8).

ANVIL: The rendering of Heb. pa'am, lit. 'stroke,' in Is 41 7. The Targum renders 'mallet.' The exact meaning is somewhat uncertain. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10.

APE: This animal does not belong to the fauna of Palestine and is mentioned only in the account of Solomon's riches, where it is said that his navy brought apes, peacocks, etc., once every three years (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). The Heb. אֵפֶס, qōph, rendered 'apes,' apparently a loan-word from the Sanskrit kapi (see Oxf. Heb. Lex.), was general in meaning, so that it is impossible to determine what species of monkey was meant. The animals were probably purchased by Solomon's agents in S. Arabia, altho they may have been of African or Asiatic origin. Ancient literature (Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions, the Amarna letters) contains references to apes or monkeys, showing that they were well known and prized as curiosities. E. E. N.

APELLES, ā-pel'liz ('Απελλής): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a greeting as 'the approved in Christ' (Ro 16 10). Nothing more is known of him.

APHARSACHITES, APHARSATHCHITES, ā-fār'sak-uits, af'er-sath'kuits (אַפְרָסַחִי, 'āpharsathkhāyē'): In Ezr 4 9 the term signifies, according to some, a class of Persian officials, a meaning that suits the other two passages also (5 6, 6 6), but as yet no satisfactory explanation has been suggested. The different spelling is probably due to scribal errors.

E. E. N.

APHARSITES, ā-fār'saits (אַפְרָסִי, 'āphārsāyē'): A term of uncertain meaning, indicating probably either a class of subordinate officials or the Persian colonists in Syria (Ezr 4 9).

APHEK, ā'fek (פֶּזֶק, 'āphēq), variant APHIK, ā'fik. Three, probably four, cities whose identity is doubtful: 1. A town under Philistine control and used as a base in two important campaigns against Israel (I S 14, 29 1). The reference in Jos 12 is late and of no historical value. The site continued to be occupied until into the Roman period. Antipatris is now thought to have been built on the same site where extensive views and many evidences of an ancient city abound (see Bul. ASOR, Oct., 1923). 2. In the territory of Asher, never wrested from the Canaanites (Jos 19 30; Jg 1 31, Aphik). 3. Identified with Afqa, NE. of Beirūt (Jos 13 4). 4. The modern Fik, on a hill East of the Sea of Galilee (I K 20 26, 30; II K 13 17). G. L. R.—E. E. N.

APHEKAH, ā-fi'ka (פֶּזֶקָה, 'āphēgāh): A town of Judah apparently not far from Hebron (Jos 15 53).

APHIAH, ā-fai'a (פִּיָּה, 'āphīah): One of the ancestors of King Saul (I S 9 1).

APHIK, ē'fik. See APHEK.

APHRAH, af'ra. See BETH-LE-APHRAH.

APHSES, afsīz. See HAPFIZZEZ.

APOCALYPSE, ā-pōc'ā-lips. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. 1. The Nature of Apocalyptic Literature. The phrase designates a group of writings in which the mode of presentation is that of the apocalypse. The term apocalypse itself (ἀποκάλυψις from ἀποκαλύπτω, 'to uncover, unveil') may mean the matter revealed, the form of the revelation, or the writing in which the revelation is recorded. It is in a sense including practically all these senses that it must be understood in the phrase Apocalyptic Literature.

Apocalyptic Literature is a specific variety of prophetic composition. It differs from prophecy pure and simple (a) in that it clothes the divine message in the form of a vision or series of visions. The vision form was obviously the most natural to suggest itself if the prophet was to present his message as an apocalypse. Accordingly, altho there are apocalypses in which the vision form is not used, in general a prophetic message which is given in the form of a vision is likely to be apocalyptic. (b) More distinctive of the apocalypse is the subject matter presented in it. Whereas prophecy deals with the will of God on all sorts of interests, the apocalypse is a revelation of matters that in their nature can not be reached except by disclosure from above. Such are the inner and hidden arrangements of the universe, the method and original conditions of the creation, but preeminently the future of the world and the destinies of God's people and of the world. (c) In method of presentation the apocalypse resorts to symbolism more freely than normal prophecy. Principles and ideas are clothed in the garb of the figures of living beings (eagles, sheep, goats, bulls, etc.). Some of these are composite, the characteristic features of various creatures being brought into a mixed figure, in order to express the exceptional nature of the forces at work. Similarly symbolical numbers such as 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, etc., are used for the same purpose. (d) The Apocalyptist's view of the world is generally akin to that of the prophet; but whereas the latter thinks of God as working in the world constantly side by side with and against the evil forces, the apocalyptist views the world as largely under the control of the forces of evil and God as reserving his interference for the future. It is this that gives the apocalypses their prevailing eschatological content. It is this also that brings into them the doctrine of the division of duration into ages ('the Present Age'  $\delta\alpha\iota\omega\nu\ \sigma\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$ , 'the Coming Age,'  $\delta\alpha\iota\omega\nu\ \delta\epsilon\ \epsilon\pi\chi\omicron\mu\epsilon\nu\omicron\varsigma$ ). (e) The prophet speaks for large variety of purposes. He aims to stir the conscience to a clearer appreciation of righteousness, to warn against the displeasure of God, to direct the affairs of state, to rebuke and exhort to good deeds; the apocalyptist generally addresses himself to the task of comforting and encouraging God's people in distress. He therefore predicts the triumph of God over the evil forces, the relief of the persecuted and suffering saints and the glories and favors reserved for them in God's plan. (f) The apocalyptist generally chooses some ancient sage, favored of God with special intimacy, and makes him the central figure of his composition and the vehicle of the divine revelation. Enoch, Noah, Moses, Isaiah, Daniel Ezra, Baruch, are the seers, tho not necessarily the authors, of the most prominent apocalypses.

2. The Period when Apocalyptic Literature flourished. The apocalyptic form of writing was incipient in the earlier prophetic groups. There are passages in Isaiah (chs. 24-27), and Zechariah (chs. 1-8) which are, generally speaking, of this type. But Apocalyptic Literature had the most currency between 200 B.C. and 150 to 200 A.D. During the early part of this period the conditions were specially adapted to its use as the prophetic vehicle of address. The people had been subjected to the domination of a foreign power (the Seleucid dynasty of Syria). They struggled manfully to regain their independence. They did so at last, but meantime they endured the stress of severe persecutions. The apocalyptic form of writing was adapted to convey to them encouragement in the form of great world pictures, showing that their oppressors were destined to collapse and Israel to rise into dominion under the Messiah. These pictures were so drawn as to be understood by them, but to prove unintelligible to their oppressors.

3. The Apocalyptic Books (for details see separate articles on these books).

In strict usage a list of Apocalyptic writings should include the Canonical Books of Daniel and Revelation. But altho the apocalyptic form of these is never questioned; and in fact, it is because of the technical identification of the term 'apocalypse' with the latter that the phrase 'apocalyptic literature' has developed and come into use, nevertheless it is more common in making up the list to place in it only the uncanonical writings of the type. This is due to the fact that the canonical apocalypses are given a sufficient amount of attention and study as parts of the Canon.

(1) The Books of Enoch. The name of Enoch is attached to two books known as the Ethiopic and the Slavonic. Of these (a) The Ethiopic (R. H. Charles) consists of at least three separate original compositions, viz., (1) A Book of Enoch (= Eth. En., chs. 1-35), (2) The Book of Similitudes (= Eth. En., chs. 36-72), (3) A Book of Noah (= Fragments inserted in Eth. En., chs. 73-105). The dates of these documents vary from 120 B.C. to possibly 90 B.C. The Book as extant was recovered in an Ethiopic version. Since then portions of it have been found in a Greek version. The original language was probably Hebrew. Its content is partly an exposition of cosmology, partly a sketch of history. (b) Slavonic Enoch ('Book of the Secrets of Enoch') so called because it was first made known to modern scholars in a Slavonic translation (1895). The original language was undoubtedly Greek. It was made in the first half of the 1st century A.D. in Alexandria. Its content is like that of the preceding, partly cosmological and partly eschatological.

(2) Assumption of Moses. So called because it purports to give an account of the words of Moses to Joshua just before his passing into the presence of God. It is in the form of a prediction of the events that were to befall the people of Israel. It was written in the days of Herod.

(3) Second Esdras (Fourth Ezra) contains an account of seven visions seen by Ezra on the ruins of Jerusalem. The purpose of these visions is to reassure the Jews in their distress that they are not forgotten by God. Altho His ways are inscrutable, His favor to Israel is constant and in due time He will bring an era of prosperity and power. The Book consisted originally of chs. 3-14. To these chs. 1-2 were prefixed as an introduction and chs. 15 and 16 as an appendix. It is one of the Apocalyptic Books which in a Greek and Latin translation was incorporated among and used along with the O T Apocrypha from the earliest times. It was composed about the end of the first century A.D., probably in Hebrew.

(4) The Syriac (Apocalypse) of Baruch. It is so much like Second Esdras that it has been called its 'twin.' The resemblance extends even to the use of phraseology. It was written in Hebrew or Aramaic at the beginning of the second century A.D.

(5) The Greek (Apocalypse) of Baruch. Its content is cosmological. It purports to describe a journey of Baruch through five heavens (in the manner of Slavonic Enoch); first published in 1897, altho a short recension was known as existing in 1886; composed in Hebrew, but edited in Christian times.

(6) The Sibylline Oracles, Book III. Is an imitation of the Sibylline literature of Roman and Greek origin. Its claim to a place among the Apocalypses is its portraiture of the fortunes of the Jews under foreign domination, ending with the downfall of the last of the oppressing empires, the judgment day and the dawn of the Messianic age.

(7) The Psalms of Solomon (especially Pss 17 and 18), in which the Messianic age and the Messiah himself are foreshadowed. They were probably written before the fall of Jerusalem in 63 B.C.

(8) Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. A series of predictions put upon the lips of the twelve sons of Jacob and given to their respective children (in imitation of Gen. 49) as they themselves were about to die. They contain visions (Test. Lev.) and look forward to the coming of a Messiah.

(9) The Ascension of Isaiah. This is undoubtedly a composite work, consisting of two original documents, viz., the Martyrdom of Isaiah and the Vision of Isaiah. The latter only is apocalyptic in form, and foreshadows the coming of the Messiah. It is a post-Christian production.

(10) The Book of Jubilees. The claim of this work to a place among the apocalypses is based on the name Apocalypse of Moses given it by Syncellus. Its content purports to have been given by angels to Moses on Mt. Sinai. Otherwise the book is a collection of legends concerning the characters of Genesis, the history given in that book being arranged in cycles of 49 years each ('jubilees').

APOCRYPHA OF O T AND N T: 1. The Term.

The word 'apocrypha' (ἀπόκρυφος, 'hidden') passed through several stages of meaning before it received the sense that we now give to it. At first it meant literally rolls which were put away, because worn out or containing faults in writing. They were thus 'withdrawn from publicity,' 'hidden' (see O T Canon, §§ 10, 12). Books might also become 'hidden' because they were unfit for public reading. Such, e.g., was the story of Susannah. In this early use of the word no other discrediting of the book as to authorship, or teaching, was implied. A much wider application was given to the word by early ecclesiastical writers in denoting by it that which was mysterious, secret, esoteric. It was thus used to classify all such books as aimed to disclose to the favored few 'the hidden things' of nature, of the future, of wisdom, and of God. The Book of Enoch and the Assumption of Moses are illustrations of this kind of literature. Their contents were reputed to be handed down through secret tradition by the few from those whose names are given as their authors. In II Es 14 44-46 will be found an account of the miraculous production of seventy esoteric books of this kind. This meaning of the word 'apocrypha' was restricted at first to the pseudepigraphical books. The claims of Gnostic leaders to the possession of just such hidden disclosures gradually added another modification to the word 'apocrypha,' and that was the meaning 'heretical,' and this opened the way to the use of the word with which we are familiar, viz.: to mark the non-canonical books found in our English bibles between the O T and the N T. Cyril of Jerusalem was, as far as we know, the first who applied the name 'apocrypha' to the books which we place under this description.

2. List of O T Apocrypha. The following list comprises the books usually classed as O T Apocrypha (e.g., in the edition published by the Revisers in 1896): I Esdras; II Esdras; Tobit; Judith; Rest of Esther; Wisdom of Solomon; Ecclesiasticus; Baruch (Chap. VI—Epistle of Jeremiah); Song of the Three Holy Children; History of Susannah; History of Bel and the Dragon; Prayer of Manasses; I Maccabees; II Maccabees.

These works may be classified as follows: I. Works of a Historical Character: I Mac, II Mac, I Esdras. II. Works of a Reflective Type: Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus. III. Legendary Works: Tobit, Judith, Rest of Esther, Song of the Three Children, History of Susannah, History of Bel and the Dragon. IV. Works of a Prophetic Type: Baruch. V. Apocalyptic Works: II Esdras. Of all these the following were without doubt originally in Hebrew: I Mac, Tobit, Judith, and Ecclesiasticus.

3. General Character of the Several Books. A full description of these various works will be found under the separate titles. The purpose here is to give only a general idea of each. I Esdras (sometimes called the Third Ezra) is a revision of the canonical Ezra with the following changes: Ezr 4 7-24 is removed to an earlier place; ch. 3 1-5 6 interpolated; Neh 7 73-8 13 is added at the close. II Esdras (also called Fourth Ezra). This work is composite. Chs. 3-14 formed the original work and they contain seven visions given to Ezra; the work is thus apocalyptic in character. The other chapters were added by a later hand. The whole has come down to us in Latin, Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Armenian versions. The original language was Greek. Tobit, a legendary (Haggadic) narrative whose scenes are from the captivity, was written to lead the Jews to adhere strictly to the Law. The work exists in several versions, Aramaic, Greek, and Latin. Judith, a narrative of the same kind as Tobit. It recounts the bravery of Judith, a Hebrew widow, in delivering the city of Bethulia from the Assyrians under Holofernes. The Greek text is a translation of a Hebrew (Aramaic) original. The Rest of Esther. These additions to the Book of Esther mention three times the divine name in the particulars with which they fill out the Bible story. This seems to be the primary purpose of these additions—to give distinct recognition to God. The original language was Greek. The Wisdom of Solomon is a fine example of Hellenistic literature written by an Alexandrian Jew, and containing, besides a setting forth of the glory and value of Wisdom, an earnest warning against the folly of idolatry. Ecclesiasticus. This work is of the same general character as the Wisdom of Solomon. Its fundamental thought is Wisdom, and it seeks to give instruction therein by a multitude of rules for the regulation of life in all varieties of experience. It was originally written in Hebrew; a considerable portion of this Hebrew original has been lately brought to light. Baruch. The book in its preface (1-14) describes its origin, and then in three distinct parts gives us (a) the confession of sin and prayer of the Jews in exile (1-3 s), (b) an admonition to the people to return to the fountain of Wisdom (3-4 s) and (c) the promise of deliverance (4-5 s). The first half of the book (1-3 s) was originally Hebrew; the latter half was Greek. The Epistle of Jeremiah, added to Baruch as a sixth chapter, is a warning against idolatry. It purports to be a letter from the prophet Jeremiah to the Jews in Babylon. The Song of the Three Holy Children. This is one of the additions found in the Greek text of the Book of Daniel. It gives the prayer of Abednego, uttered in the fiery furnace, and the song of the three children because the prayer was heard. The History of Susannah. This story glorifies Daniel, who saves the beautiful Susannah from death, to which she had been condemned under false charge of adultery made by two elders, to save themselves when discovered by Susannah as they were peering at her in her bath. The History of Bel and the Dragon. This third addition to Daniel (after ch. 12) is made up of two independent stories, both of which show the prowess of Daniel and at the same time set forth the worthlessness of idolatry. All these additions to Daniel are found in the Septuagint, also in the version of Theodotion. The Prayer of Manasses. This prayer, attributed to Manasseh, King of Judah, was composed as a completion of II Ch 33. It is a confession of sin and a cry for pardon. In most MSS. it is in the appendix to the Psalms. I Maccabees. A reliable history of the period 175-135 B.C. It is extant in Greek. II Maccabees, originally written in Greek, is an epitome of the work of Jason of Cyrene and covers the period 175-160 B.C. The work is a mixture of history and story told for religious edification.

4. The Position Assigned to the Apocrypha. A brief outline history of the position given to the O T Apocrypha by the Jews, the early Christian Fathers and the Christian Church generally will reveal their conception of its authority and value. It is safe to say that the Jews never have recognized as belonging to the Canon of Scriptures any other books than those which now constitute our O T. In Alexandria some of the apocryphal books were read in public, but even here canonical authority was not attached to them. They (the Jews) have always recognized a difference between these works and the O T (see O T CANON). As for the N T the most that can be said is that there are interesting parallels found in James and Paul with Ecclesiasticus and the Book of Wisdom (see these titles). The Apostles held to the same canon as their Jewish brethren. Owing to the fact that in their Greek bibles the early Christian writers found apocryphal books joined with books of the Hebrew Canon, they used them, citing them sometimes as Scriptures. Their very connection with the canonical Scriptures gave them very honoring consideration. So Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen used them. At the same time when investigation into the matter was carried on we find emphasis placed upon the number 22 (24) as the number of books in the Hebrew Canon. A series of writers thus support the Jewish Canon as distinct from the Alexandrian—Melito of Sardis, Origen (despite his own habit of citing apocryphal books), Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory Nazianzen, and Jerome. Critical judgment was at variance with common usage even among scholars and for a long time the books were cited. Eastern learned opinion excluded them from the Canon. In the West, Jerome made the most determined stand for the Hebrew Canon, but the common usage of the apocryphal books, made possible by their inclusion in the old Latin versions, and the inconsistent practise of the Fathers left the matter undecided. At the time of the Reformation the question was finally settled in different ways. The Protestant Church, following Luther's lead, gave the position of inferior authority to the A., and from that time the word 'apocrypha' has had the meaning which Protestantism now gives to it. The Council of Trent (1545) made these books of equal authority for the Roman Catholic Church with those of the O T proper. Coverdale was the first to translate the A. from Greek into English. He placed them between the O T and the N T, in which position they have appeared in later versions. The English Church recognizes the A. in its lessons, but only for edification and not as authoritative in the sense that the canonical books are. The A. have no recognition in non-Episcopal churches.

In refusing to receive the apocryphal books as canonical, Protestantism has by no means declared them to be of no value. On the contrary, their worth for certain purposes has always been recognized. To the student of the centuries just preceding the Incarnation, they are of deep interest as reflecting the life and thought of Judaism in one of its most eventful periods.

5. The Apocrypha of the New Testament. The aim and general character of the N T Apocrypha are quite different from those of the A. added to the O T. The latter seek to give the history or reflect the thought of the period from which they come. The N T Apocrypha, on the other hand, are deliberate attempts to fill in the gaps of the N T story in the life of Jesus, to further heretical ideas by false claims of authority, and to amplify the prophecies of Jesus by revelations given the Apostles. Works of this description were very numerous. They may be classified under four heads:

I. Gospels. These have as their object either to offer a narrative which shall rival the canonical Gospels or to add something to their story. It does not fall within the scope of this article to discuss the questions which they severally present; rather to give a brief, concise idea of those which were more prominent. (1) First to be noted is The Gospel according to the Hebrews. The fragments of this gospel have been brought together and discussed by Nicholson in his edition of it. It seems to have existed in two forms—the Nazarene and the Ebionite, the latter being more heretical. It contains additions to the canonical narrative and gives us some new alleged sayings of Jesus.

(2) The Gospel according to the Egyptians. This gospel shows marked Gnostic tendencies. Fragments of it are found in Clement, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius. The extant fragments are in the form of conversations between Jesus and Salome who figures largely in apocryphal literature.

the corrupt will in Christ that was denied.<sup>1</sup> It is quite possible that the Monothelites, in their translations and copies of the letter of Honorius, introduced slight alterations, so as to give a complete Monothelite significance to the phrase, unam voluntatem, etc. But the Greek text which we have still before us cannot be regarded as falsified; for, when this Greek translation was read aloud in the twelfth session of the sixth Ecumenical Council, it was compared by the Roman deputy, Bishop John of Portus, with the Latin original which lay in the patriarchal archives at Constantinople, and was found correct.<sup>2</sup> Moreover, the successors of Honorius in the Roman see never contested the genuineness of these letters, although they knew that the Monothelites appealed to them, and that the sixth Ecumenical Synod wanted to pronounce, and did pronounce, an anathema upon Honorius on account of these letters.<sup>3</sup>

Thus there remains for us the result: The two letters of Pope Honorius, as we now possess them, are unfalsified, and show that Honorius, of the two Monothelite terms ἐν θέλημα and μία ἐνέργεια, himself used (in his first letter) the former; but the latter, and also the orthodox expression δύο ἐνέργειαι, he did not wish to be used. If, in his second letter, he repeated the latter (the disapproval of the expression δύο ἐνέργειαι), yet here he himself recognised two natural energies in Christ, and in both letters he so expressed himself, that it must be admitted that he did not deny the human will generally, but only the corrupt human will in Christ; but although orthodox in his thought, he did not sufficiently see through the Monothelite tendency of Sergius, and expressed himself in such a way as to be misunderstood, so that his letters, especially the first, seemed to confirm Monothelitism, and thereby practically helped onward the heresy.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> In establishing this result also there is some deviation from the first edition. In that it is said: "Thus there remains for us the result: The two

In this manner is settled the question respecting the orthodoxy of Pope Honorius;<sup>1</sup> and we hold, therefore, the middle path between those who place him on the same grade with Sergius of Constantinople and Cyrus of Alexandria, and number him with the Monothelites,<sup>2</sup> and those who, allowing no spot in him, have fallen into the misfortune of nimum probantes, so that they would prefer to deny the genuineness of the Acts of the sixth Œcumenical Council and of several other documents,<sup>3</sup> or even to ascribe to the sixth Council an error in facto dogmatico.<sup>4</sup> In opposition to the latter, the letters of Honorius, as we now have them, are unfalsified, and do not bear the interpretatio suavis which it is wished to give them. They show that, of the two heterodox terms ἐν θέλημα and μὴ ἐνέργεια, Honorius actually used the former, and placed the latter on the same line with the watchword of orthodoxy, ὁμοῦ ἐνέργεια, and rejected both. They show also, however, that the fundamental conviction of Honorius, the foundation of his argument, and at the same time himself, was orthodox in heart, and his error consisted only in an incorrect representation of the dogma, and in a defect of logical consistency.

<sup>1</sup> Similar is the judgment of an anonymous writer in the Katholik (1863, S. 689 f.), thus: "The fault of Honorius consisted in this, that he did not discover the tricks of Sergius, which he ought to have suspected; that he did not sharply define and sanction the true meaning of the expression, "two energies"; that he placed this expression on the same line with that of "one energy"; that he treated the whole question in a superficial manner, as a mere strife of words; and finally, that, with the greatest want of prudence, he spoke of one will in a manner which, if it admitted of a good meaning, yet under the prevailing circumstances might easily be mistaken, and give occasion for great errors. He played with the fire which others had kindled; and thus made the fire stronger, and shared the blame of the inventors and adherents of the heresy, although he did not himself share their error." Added to second edition.

appellants (Jansenists) came forward with the argument: If you maintain that the sixth Œcumenical Council fell into an error facti, we may maintain the same also in regard to Pope Clement XI. and his Constitution Unigenitus. But there is a great difference between the appellants and those apologists of Honorius. The latter proposed (a) their view out of reverence of the holy see, and (b) from this proceeded to the view that the letters of Honorius, or even the letter of Sergius, which Honorius answered, were afterwards falsified, and in false copies were laid before the sixth Œcumenical Synod, so that this formed a quite correct judgment in rejecting the (certainly pseudo-) Honorius.<sup>1</sup> Or (c) they contested, like Pennacchi, the Œcumenical character of the sentence of the sixth Council against Honorius. See below, sec. 324.

The middle path, which we hold to be the right one, and have explained above, is, however, essentially different from that which Garnier supposed he had discovered,<sup>2</sup> and on which so many distinguished theologians and scholars followed him. According to this, it is conceded that the sixth Œcumenical Synod did really and properly anathematise the letters of Honorius, but not as containing anything heretical, for they were entirely free from this, but only ob imprudentem silentii œconomiam, because Honorius, by requiring this silence, had given powerful assistance to the heresy.<sup>3</sup> In opposition to this we maintain, (a) Honorius gave assistance to the heresy, not merely by requiring silence, but much more by the unhappy expression, unde unam voluntatem fatemur Domini nostri Jesu Christi, as well as by his disapproval of Abbot John, had not been known to the Synod. That the better instructed Pope Leo II., on the contrary, had not completely approved of the anathema of the Synod on Honorius, but had anathematised him, not on the ground of heresy, but of negligence. See below, sec. 324. The judgments of the different savants on Honorius, his guilt or innocence, are collected pretty completely by Schneemann in his Studien über die Honoriusfrage, Herder, Freiburg 1864, S. 25 ff.

the orthodox term δύο ἐνέργειαι. The Monothelites rested upon this, and not upon the silence enjoined. (b) At the same time, the letters of Honorius, especially the first, are not so entirely without fault as this hypothesis assumes; they contain, at least in their literal meaning, erroneous teaching. (c) Finally, we shall see (sec. 324) that the sixth Œcumenical Synod pronounced anathema on Honorius by no means merely on account of an imprudens silentii œconomia.

Gfrörer (Kirchengeschichte, Bd. iii. pt. i. S. 54) supposed that the letters of Honorius were the stipulated return for the great complacency shown to him not long before by the Emperor Heraclius. None of the previous Popes, not even Gregory the Great, had succeeded, in spite of repeated efforts, in uniting again with Rome the metropolitan see of Aquileia-Grado, with its ecclesiastical province, which had been in a state of schism since the controversy of the Three Chapters. But Honorius, more fortunate than his predecessors, had carried through the great work, had expelled Fortunatus, the schismatical archbishop of Grado, and had placed Primogenius, "a partisan of Rome," on the metropolitan chair of Istria—by means of armed assistance from the Greek exarch. "Can it be doubted for a moment," exclaims Gfrörer, "that the subjection of the Istrian Church under the see of Peter was the price for which Honorius entered the Monothelite league? One hand washes the other."

I cannot bestow upon this hypothesis the commendation which it has received from Kurtz in his Manual of Church History (1853, Bd. i. S. 181). Apart from the fact that Primogenius is very inaptly named a partisan of Rome (he was a subdeacon of the Roman Church), the substructure of Gfrörer's edifice is untenable; for it is not correct to say that none of the Popes before Honorius had succeeded in uniting the see of Grado. Such a union, in fact, took place in the year 607. The see of Aquileia-Grado received in Candidian an orthodox metropolitan; and all the bishops of this ecclesiastical province, whose sees lay in the imperial territory, forsook the schism.<sup>1</sup> What, then, happened under Pope

Honorius? The schismatic Fortunatus had, with the help of the Longobardi, possessed himself of the see of Grado, and endeavoured to renew the schism. His suffragans were indignant at this, and the imperial governor (exarch) at Ravenna also threatened him, so that Fortunatus found it well to flee into the country of the Longobardi, first stealing the treasure of the Church (629 or 630). Pope Honorius now placed the Roman subdeacon Primogenius in the see of Grado, and demanded of the Longobardi, vainly, indeed, the surrender of those valuables of the Church of Grado. We still possess<sup>1</sup> his letter on this subject to the bishops of Istria, at the close of which the passage occurs which Baronius misunderstood: "In similar cases the fathers of the Christianissima respublica would do the like," i.e. give up stolen goods that had been brought into their country. Baronius thought that by Christianissima respublica Venice was to be understood; but Muratori, long ago, correctly remarked (History of Italy, vol. iv.) that quite commonly this expression is used to designate the Roman Empire. From what has been said, however, it is clear that the union of the see of Grado and its suffragans was earlier than the time of Pope Honorius, and that under him only a temporary disturbance of the union was ended. This disturbance, in itself untenable through the opposition of the suffragans, did not need to be bribed with the blood-money of the consent to heresy.

We have already seen, to some extent, from the apology of John IV., what judgment was formed of Honorius at Rome. In agreement with this, Martin I. and his Lateran Synod, A.D. 649, and so Pope Agatho and his Synod in 680, did not reckon Honorius among the Monothelites, but rather held his memory in honour, and expressed themselves as though all previous Popes had been opponents of the heresy. We shall could not be seized by the Longobardi; and the metropolitans now took the title of "Aquileia at Grado." Of the cities belonging to this ecclesiastical province, however, some remained in the power of the Emperor; others had been seized by the Longobardi. The bishops in the Longobardian territory would not enter the union in the year 607; and then appointed for themselves a special ecclesiastical head with the title of "Patriarch of Aquileia."

see more fully (sec. 324) how they spoke of Honorius in Rome after the sixth Œcumenical Council.

On the question: Whether the two letters of Honorius were put forth ex cathedrâ, as it is called, or not, the views among his defenders are very different. Pennacchi maintains that they were put forth auctoritate apostolica (l.c. p. 169 sqq.), whilst Schneemann (l.c. S. 63) holds the opposite opinion. For my own part, I confess myself here on the side of Pennacchi, since Honorius intended to give first to the Church of Constantinople, and implicite to the whole Church, an instruction on doctrine and faith; and in his second letter he even uses the expression: Ceterum, quantum ad DOGMA ECCLESIASTICUM pertinet, . . . non unam vel duas operationes in mediatore Dei et hominum definire debemus.<sup>1</sup>

SEC. 299. The Ecthesis of the Emperor Heraclius, A.D. 638.

The answer of Constantinople to the synodal letter of Sophronius was the Ecthesis (setting forth of the faith) of the Emperor Heraclius. The successor of Sergius, Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople, says on this subject in his disputation with Maximus: "The unseasonable letter of Sophronius has rendered it necessary for us (in Constantinople), against our will, so to act," i.e. to put forth the Ecthesis.<sup>2</sup> That Sergius was its composer is uncontested, and is by the Emperor Heraclius himself declared. In order to separate the discontent of the Westerns, on account of the Ecthesis, from his person, he wrote in the beginning of the year 641 to Pope John IV.: "The Ecthesis is not mine, and I have not recommended its promulgation, but the Patriarch Sergius drew it up five years ago, and on my return from the East petitioned me to publish it with my subscription."<sup>3</sup>

For the authorship of Sergius, moreover, there is the testimony of the great inner relationship between the Ecthesis and his letter to Pope Honorius (see above, p. 22).

Maximus professes to know that Sergius and his friends had obtained the publication of the Ecthesis by means of presents to the Emperor;<sup>1</sup> and the biographer of S. Maximus appears to indicate that the consent to the marriage of the Emperor with his niece Martina was the price at which the patriarch bought the Ecthesis.<sup>2</sup> But this uncanonical marriage was concluded in the year 616. When Walch adds (Ketzerhist. Bd. ix. S. 142), it was designated by Sergius as incest, it is certainly true that the patriarch disapproved of it; but it is still undeniable that he showed himself weak, and crowned Martina.<sup>3</sup>

That the Ecthesis was drawn up in the course of the twelfth year of indiction was declared by Pope Martin I. at the Lateran Synod of the year 649.<sup>4</sup> That twelfth year of indiction began with September 1, 638; and as Sergius died in the December of the same year, the Ecthesis must necessarily be placed between September and December 638, and not in the year 639. Pagi showed this (ad ann. 639, n. 2 and 8) in opposition to Baronius. It is preserved for us in the third secretarius (session) of the Lateran Synod already mentioned,<sup>5</sup> bears the form of a creed, explains first the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, then passes on to the Incarnation, treats this in the sense of Chalcedon, and then proceeds to the principal subject, namely, (a) the prohibition of the expressions μία and δύο ἐνέργειαι, because both were explained in a heretical sense, and (β) asserting one single will (θέλημα) in Christ. The principal passages run: "In regard to the mystery of the Person of Christ is the ἑνωσις κατὰ σύνοθω (see vol. iv. sec. 263) to be confessed without σύγχυσις and διαίρεσις. It preserves the property of each of the two natures, but shows one hypostasis and one person of God the Logos with (united with) the reasonably quickened flesh; whereby not a Quaternity is introduced instead of a Trinity, since there is not a fourth Person added to the Trinity, but the eternal Logos thereof has become flesh. And not another was HE who worked miracles, and another who endured sufferings, but we acknowledge one and the same Son, who is at the same time God and man, one hypostasis, one person, suffering in the flesh, impassible in the Godhead; to Him and the same belong the miracles and the sufferings, which HE voluntarily endured in the flesh. . . .

“ All divine and human energy we ascribe to one and the same Incarnate Logos, and render one worship to Him, who, for our sake, was voluntarily and truly crucified in the flesh; and rose from the dead, etc.; and we do not at all allow that any one should maintain or teach one or two energies of the Incarnate Lord, but demand that there should be confessed, as the holy and Œcumenical Synods have handed it down, that one and the same only-begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, works both the divine and the human, and that all Godlike and manlike energy proceeds from one and the same Incarnate God the Logos without mixture and without separation, and refers back to one and the same. Because the expression, one energy, although some of the Fathers use it, yet sounds strange to the ears of some, and disquiets them, since they are made suspicious lest it should be used in order to set aside the two natures which are hypostatically united in Christ; and (since) in the same way many take offence at the expression, two energies, since it is not used by any of the holy Fathers, and then we should be obliged, as a consequence, to teach two mutually contradictory wills, as if God the Logos, aiming at our salvation, was willing to endure suffering, but His manhood had opposed itself to this His will, which is impious and foreign to the Christian dogma—when even the wicked Nestorius, although he, dividing the Incarnation, introduced two Sons, did not venture to maintain two wills of the same, but, on the contrary, taught the like willing of the two persons assumed by him; how can, then, the orthodox, who worship only one Son and Lord, admit in Him two, and those mutually opposed wills?—therefore must we, following the Fathers in everything and so also in this, confess one will of our Lord Jesus Christ, the true God, so that at no time His rationally quickened flesh was separated, and, of its own impulse (ὁρμή), in opposition to the suggestion of God the Logos, hypostatically united with it, fulfilled its natural motion (that of the flesh), but only at the time and in the manner and in the measure in which the Word willed. These dogmas of piety have been handed down to us by those who from the beginning have themselves seen the Word, and have been with Him, serving Him; and also by their disciples and successors and all later God-enlightened teachers of the Church, or, which is the same, the five holy and Œcumenical Synods, etc. And we ordain that all Christians shall thus think and teach, without adding or taking away anything."

We see that the Ecthesis, in its contents, agrees with the letter of Sergius to Honorius; and the patriarch of Constantinople did not, therefore, first come to these views in opposition to the Synodica of Sophronius, but had done so a considerable time before its appearance. On the contrary, the agreement of the Ecthesis with the two letters of Honorius is only apparent. The latter certainly also disapproves of the expressions μὴ and δύο ἐνέργειαι; <sup>1</sup> but he stumbles only at the word, not at the thing; for in his second letter he says himself: "The divine nature works in Christ the divine, and the human accomplishes the human." He thus teaches, in fact, two energies, although he objects to the employment of the term. And so his phrase, Unam voluntatem fatemur is, in its meaning, essentially different from the like-sounding thesis of the Ecthesis (see above, p. 35).

SEC. 300. Two Synods at Constantinople, A.D. 638 and 639. Adoption of the Ecthesis.

It was naturally the wish of the Emperor that the Ecthesis should be universally received, and there was a prospect of this, especially as Sophronius, the chief representative of Dyothelitism, was prevented from taking part in the controversy on account of the siege and capture of Jerusalem by the Arabs, A.D. 637, and died before the appearance of the Ecthesis, and his chair had come into the hands of the Monothelite Bishop Sergius of Joppa.<sup>2</sup> It was also hoped that the other patriarchs would assent. Macedonius of Antioch, whom we have not hitherto met, was uncanonically appointed and consecrated by Sergius. His episcopal city, threatened, and in the year 638 actually taken by the Arabs, he had not entered, but had remained in Constantinople, and had here taken his stand on the Monothelite side.<sup>1</sup> Sergius, however, held, in the last months of A.D. 638, a Synod at Constantinople (perhaps ἐνδημούσα), which approved the Ecthesis, as harmonising with the apostolic doctrine, and ordered its universal acceptance, threatening that, if any one should, in future, teach one or two energies, if he were a bishop or cleric, he should be deposed; if a monk or a layman, he should be excluded from the holy communion, until he amended.<sup>2</sup> Soon afterwards Sergius died, in the December of the same year. His successor, Pyrrhus, who ascended the throne in January 639, was a Monothelite, and held also a Synod at Constantinople in the year 639, which not only confirmed the Ecthesis anew, but provided that even the absent bishops should be required to accept it.<sup>3</sup>

In Alexandria, Cyrus with great joy read the Ecthesis which the patriarch of Constantinople had sent to him accompanied by a letter, and had hymns sung, because God had sent His people so wise an Emperor, as he relates in his still extant answer to Sergius.<sup>4</sup>

We learn from this that the imperial official (magister militum) Eustachius, who had been sent with the Ecthesis to Italy to the Exarch Isaac, so that the latter should obtain the subscription of Severinus, travelled by way of Alexandria, and communicated to Cyrus a transcript of that imperial copy for Isaac. Walch (l.c. S. 144) brought up the question, why the Emperor had not himself sent the Ecthesis to Cyrus, and supposes that Alexandria had been seized by the Saracens, so that Cyrus was no longer a subject of Heraclius. On the other hand, the hierarchical union of Alexandria with the patriarch of Constantinople had continued, and therefore Sergius had written to Cyrus.—This hypothesis is unfounded. It is true that the Arabs had invaded Egypt by the year 634, but Alexandria was first seized by them in

SEC. 301. Death of Pope Honorius. The Ecthesis is rejected at Rome.

When the copy of the Ecthesis sent to Italy arrived there, Pope Honorius had already died, in October 638. We must even conclude, from the letter of Cyrus to Sergius just referred to, that the intelligence of the death of Honorius and the election of Severinus had come to Constantinople before the sending out of the Ecthesis. The election of Severinus took place soon after the death of Honorius, and the representative of the imperial exarch Isaac seized the opportunity of taking possession of the papal Lateran palace, in order to plunder it. The newly elected Pope and others in vain offered opposition; Isaac now himself came to Rome, had all the gold and valuables removed from the palace, and shared them with the Emperor.<sup>1</sup> In order to obtain the imperial confirmation of the election which had been made, the Roman clergy sent several representatives to Constantinople. They were detained there for a considerable time, and at last received the declaration that the confirmation of the new Pope was not to be obtained, unless they promised to persuade him to the acceptance of the dogmatic document (the Ecthesis), which was handed to them. In order to draw themselves out of the snare, they pretended to agree, and promised to inform the Pope of this demand, and to bring him that document. The imperial confirmation of the election was now drawn up, and an order given for the consecration of Severinus.<sup>2</sup> It took place May 28, 640; but the Pope died two months and four days afterwards, after he had rejected Monothelitism, and had, as is supposed, held a the year 641 (Pagi, ad ann. 639, n. 11, and 641, n. 13), and a glance at the end of the letter from Cyrus shows that Alexandria was then still in possession of the Emperor, and not long before had been delivered out of danger. Besides, Walch might have known from Nicephorus (Breviar. l.c., ed. Bonn, p. 30), that, soon afterwards, Cyrus was summoned by the Emperor Heraclius to Constantinople, and deposed (thus treated as a subject), because he was suspected of an understanding with the Saracens. The succeeding Emperor reinstated him.

Roman Synod for this purpose, A.D. 640.<sup>1</sup> What is certain is, that his successor, John IV., who was consecrated December 24, 640, soon after his elevation, and even before the death of the Emperor Heraclius (†February 11, 641), at a Roman Synod, pronounced anathema on Monothelitism. The Acts of this Synod have not come down to us, but Theophanes and the Synodicon speak of it.<sup>2</sup> The latter professes to know that their anathema was pronounced upon Sergius, Cyrus, and Pyrrhus, at Rome. As, however, Pope John IV., in a somewhat more recent letter to the Emperor, refers to the departed Sergius with the words venerandæ memoriæ episcopus, and in the same way the succeeding Pope, Theodore, calls Pyrrhus sanctissimus, we must assume that the Synod pronounced anathema on the heresy, and not on certain persons.

Pope John IV. is said (by the Synodicon) to have acquainted the two sons of the Emperor, David and Heraclius, with the decision of this Roman Synod, and sent them a statement (τύπος) of the orthodox doctrine. It seems to me that this must mean the letter to be next described, which the Pope, after the death of the Emperor Heraclius, addressed to his sons. The Synodicon also says that "he sent this later." On the other hand, he gave the Patriarch Pyrrhus of Constantinople immediate notice of his sentence against the Ecthesis, and thereby occasioned the Emperor Heraclius to shift the fault of its composition from himself on to the departed Sergius, in that letter to which we referred above (p. 61). Soon afterwards the Emperor Heraclius died of dropsy, February 11, 641 (Pagi, ad ann. 641, 2), and there succeeded him, in accordance with his arrangement, his two eldest sons, Heraclius Constantinus (from his first marriage), and Heraclius the younger, or Heracleonas (from his second marriage). Both were required to do honour to Martina, the mother of the latter, as mother of both.<sup>1</sup>

When Pope John IV. received intelligence of this change in the throne, he sent a letter of some length, which is still extant, to the two young Emperors, in order to explain to them the true doctrine on the energies and wills in Christ, and, at the same time, to vindicate the orthodoxy of his predecessor, Honorius. Pyrrhus of Constantinople, he says in this letter, circulated, as he heard, in the whole of the East, a letter in which new doctrine was taught and maintained. Pope Honorius had also been said to be of the same view. After John IV. had opposed this, and had sought to vindicate Honorius in the manner explained above (p. 52), he proceeds: "The doctrine of one will is heretical. Ask only the defenders of this doctrine, which this one will is, whether the human or the divine?" If they say the divine, they are contradicted by the true manhood of Christ, and they fall into Manichæism. If, however, they maintain that the one will of Christ is human, they will be condemned with Photinus and the Ebionites as deniers of the Godhead of Christ; if, again, they adopt a mingled will, they at the same time mingle the natures, and with the expression una operatio they, like Eutyches and the Severians, say, unam naturam Christi operari. I have learned, he says in conclusion, that the bishops have been required to subscribe a document with new doctrines (certainly the Ecthesis), to the prejudice of the Epistola of Leo and the Synod of Chalcedon; but the Emperors will certainly have this foisted-in document torn away, and restrain the innovators, for the report of this has troubled the West and the faithful of the chief city.<sup>2</sup>

What impression this letter made we know not, but Zonaras rightly maintains<sup>3</sup> that the Emperor Heraclius Constantinus was orthodox, and had not inherited his father's error, and this must have had important consequences, if he had not died seven months afterwards. It was believed that his stepmother Martina had him poisoned, in order to obtain the empire exclusively for her own son, Heracleonas. The Patriarch Pyrrhus is also said to have been implicated in this crime.<sup>1</sup> But Heracleonas was himself, after six months, overthrown by a revolution, his nose and his mother Martina's tongue being cut off, and both exiled. The Patriarch Pyrrhus fled to Africa, and the throne was taken by Constans II., named also Constantinus, the son of Heraclius Constantinus, a grandson of the elder Heraclius, who soon gave a friendly answer to the letter of the Pope to his father, mentioned above, with the assurance that he was orthodox, and that he had ordered the condemned document to be removed.<sup>2</sup>

SEC. 302. The Synods of Orleans and Cyprus. Pope Theodore.

Pope John IV. had rightly asserted that the West rejected the Monothelite view. Outside Italy this was now shown already in France and Africa, whilst other provinces of the West, e.g. Spain, took notice later of the new heresy. In France it was rejected by a Synod at Orleans even before the year 640. A foreigner, pulsus a partibus transmarinis,<sup>3</sup> had come to the city of Autun, and had endeavoured to disseminate the Monothelite doctrine. When this came to the ears of S. Eligius, then master of the mint at the Frankish Court at Paris, he discussed the subject with his friend S. Audenus and other orthodox men, and procured the summoning of a Synod at Orleans by King Chlodwig II. Like a serpent, the heretic, for a considerable time, was able to escape from the arguments of the orthodox, until, to the general joy, Bishop Salvius overcame him and convicted him.

<sup>2</sup> For this we have not merely the authority of the less trustworthy Eutychius (archbishop of Alexandria in the 10th century) in his Annales Ecclesiæ Alexandrinæ, but it is mentioned also by Pope Theodore in his letter, hereafter to be noticed, to the Patriarch Paul of Constantinople. Cf. Pagi, ad ann. 641, 4.

Upon this the sentence of the bishops against him was published in all the cities, and he was banished from Gaul. Thus relates S. Audænus (Ouen), in the biography of his friend Eligius (in Surius, ad December 1); and as, according to his account, all this happened before Eligius became bishop of Noyon, and Audænus archbishop of Rouen (both were consecrated May 21, 640), the Synod, with respect to the date of which so many mistakes have been made, must be placed before the year 640, probably in 638 or 639.<sup>1</sup>

John IV. died in Rome, October 11, 642, and his successor, Theodore I., like him, opposed decidedly the heresy, without allowing himself to be imposed upon by Greek cunning. The new Patriarch, Paul of Constantinople, raised to the throne after the banishment of Pyrrhus, had recourse to Rome in order to obtain recognition of his election. His letter is lost, but we still possess the answer of Pope Theodore, and see from this that Paul wished the Romans to believe that he was different and better and more orthodox than the banished Pyrrhus, whilst practically the Ecthesis remained in force in the East, and the promise given by the Emperor, to have it everywhere suppressed, had not been fulfilled. The Pope writes: "We inform you that we have received the synodal letter of your fraternity. It appears from this that you have entered upon the episcopal office with a mingled feeling of fear and hope, and rightly, for that is a great burden. . . . That which Pyrrhus undertook against the true faith is deprived of power, as well by the declaration of the apostolic see under our predecessor as by command of the Emperor (in having the Ecthesis suppressed). Why, then, has not your fraternity removed that document which was posted up at public places, since it is now quashed? If you say yourself that the undertaking of Pyrrhus is to be rejected, why, then, have you not removed this paper from the wall? No one ever honours that which he abhors. But if you, which God forbid, receive this document, why have you been silent on this subject in your synodal letter? . . . Moreover, we wondered that the bishops who consecrated your fraternity called Pyrrhus sanctissimus, and remarked that he had resigned the Church of Constantinople because the people hated him and rose up against him. We thought, therefore, that we should postpone the granting of your request (the confirmation) until Pyrrhus has been formally deposed. For hatred and a riot of the populace cannot deprive one of his bishopric. He ought to have been punished canonically, if your consecration was to be faultless and valid. . . . You must, therefore, hold an assembly of bishops, in order to examine his affair, and our archdeacon Sericus, as well as our deputy and deacon Martin, will be our representatives there. Pyrrhus need not himself be personally present, as his fault and his heretical writings are universally known; and for these he may certainly be condemned. For he heaped praise upon Heraclius, who anathematised the orthodox doctrine, subscribed his sophistical edict (the Ecthesis), seduced other bishops to the same, and allowed that document to be posted up to the disparagement of the Council of Chalcedon. . . . In case, however, your fraternity should apprehend that the adherents of Pyrrhus might hinder such a judgment in Constantinople, we have petitioned the Emperor by letter to send Pyrrhus to Rome, that he may be judged here by a Synod. A number of contentions may spring up on account of your elevation, unless they are cut at the roots by the canonical sickle. . . . That document, however (the Ecthesis), we declare, with all our powers, as invalid and anathematised, and we abide by the old doctrine. . . . Your fraternity, in agreement with us, will teach and proclaim the same by word and deed.”<sup>1</sup>

A second letter which Pope Theodore sent at the same time to Constantinople bears, in Anastasius, the superscription Exemplar propositionis, and it is nowhere said or indicated for whom it was destined. But from the expression Fraternitatis vestræ, which is in the context, we must conclude that it had been addressed to bishops, or at least to clergy,—perhaps to the clergy of Constantinople, or to the bishops present there. Possibly it was an Encyclical to all the bishops of the East, and it contains the demand, that what Pyrrhus had done in opposition to the Chalcedonian Council should be rejected, even as the Pope abhorred his rash innovation, and anathematised the document which was posted up in public places.<sup>1</sup>

Finally, the Pope wrote also to the bishops who had consecrated Paul. He rejoices that he has come in the place of Pyrrhus, but he cannot conceal that the latter ought to have been deposed in a canonical manner, so that objections should not afterwards arise, and divisions be occasioned. And, in fact, good grounds would be alleged for his canonical deposition, inasmuch as he commended Heraclius, who yet anathematised the Catholic faith, confirmed the sophistical heterodox document, led astray other bishops to subscribe it, and posted it up in public. What should now be done was contained in the letter to Paul.<sup>2</sup>

As a consequence of this energetic action, the metropolitan Sergius of Cyprus, in his own name and in that of his brethren, as it appears, despatched to the Pope a letter resolved upon at a Cyprian Synod (of May 29, 643), to the effect that his, the Pope's, orthodox ordinance left nothing to desire; that the Cyprian bishops acknowledge with Leo: Agit utraque forma cum alterius communione, quod proprium est, and that they, supported by the Pope, were ready to endure martyrdom in behalf of the orthodox faith. On the other hand, all that had been written in opposition to the Council of Chalcedon, to the letter of Leo, and to the wisdom of the present Pope, should be annulled. Hitherto they had been silent, as their former metropolitan, Arcadius of blessed memory, who was quite orthodox (see p. 12 f.), was in hope that those who had erred would still come to a better mind; but now they must no longer look on while tares were being sown. "This," says the metropolitan at the close, "is the mind of the holy Synod assembled around me (τῆς καθ' ἡμᾶς ἐκπᾶς συνόδου. . . . I and all who are with me greet you in the Lord."<sup>3</sup>

SEC. 303. Abbot Maximus and his Disputation with Pyrrhus.

In the meantime the Abbot Maximus, who was henceforth to be the most valorous champion, and even a martyr for the cause of Dyothelitism, indignant at the progress of the heresy in the East, had left Constantinople in order to go to Rome. Although the name of this remarkable man has already been frequently mentioned, still it is yet in place to recall the earlier events of his life. Born about the year 580 of an old and distinguished family of Constantinople, he had by his remarkable talents and bearing attracted the attention of the Emperor Heraclius, and became his chief secretary, a man of influence and consideration. But in the year 630 he forsook the path of worldly honours, and became a monk in the convent at Chrysopolis (now Scutari), on the opposite shore from Constantinople, as it is thought, both from love of solitude and from dissatisfaction with the position which his master took in the Monothelite controversy. When Sophronius first came forward (A.D. 633) against the new heresy in Alexandria, Maximus was in his company, as he says himself in his letter to Peter.<sup>1</sup> The incompleteness of the Vita Maximi, written by one of his admirers,<sup>2</sup> leaves it doubtful whether he was abbot at that time. It does not mention this first journey to Africa, and speaks only of the second, which drew after it the disputation with Pyrrhus, A.D. 645, and the holding of several African Synods, A.D. 646. On the authority of the Chronicle of Nicephorus (Pagi, ad ann. 642, 1), it is believed that the Patriarch Pyrrhus was formerly abbot of Chrysopolis, and so the predecessor of Maximus, so that when Pyrrhus in the year 639 ascended the patriarchal throne, Maximus became his successor as abbot.<sup>3</sup> But apart from the fact that the Vita Maximi (c. 5) speaks of his predecessor in such a manner that we can see he has died, and refers to him in the most respectful manner, which it would not have done in reference to Pyrrhus,—apart from this, Pyrrhus says expressly, at the beginning of his disputation with Maximus, that "previously he had not known him by sight." Pyrrhus, then, could not have been the abbot of Maximus nor his predecessor in the rule of the convent.

When the Monothelite heresy spread more and more in Constantinople, Maximus resolved to betake himself to Rome, and on the way thither came for the second time to Africa. During a protracted residence there he had much intercourse with the bishops of those parts, and also found a patron in the imperial viceroy, Gregory,<sup>1</sup> and gave general warnings against the Monothelite heresy. To this time also belongs the remarkable disputation between Maximus and the deposed and banished Patriarch Pyrrhus of Constantinople, which, according to the superscription, took place somewhere in Africa, in July 645, in presence of the imperial viceroy and many bishops. The complete Acts have come down to us,<sup>2</sup> and contain a very complete discussion both of the orthodox Dyothelite doctrine and of the objections from the other side. Maximus showed in this much dialectical ability and great superiority to Pyrrhus, whom at times he treated with scant courtesy.

Pyrrhus opened the discussion with the words: "What have I, or what has my predecessor (the Patriarch Sergius), done to you that you everywhere decry us as heretics? Who has honoured you more than we, although we did not know you by sight?" Maximus replied: "The latter is correct; but since you have violated the Christian dogma, I was forced to place your favour behind the truth. . . . The doctrine of one will is contrary to Christianity; for what is more impious than to maintain that the same will by which all things were created, after the Incarnation, longed for food and drink?" Pyrrhus: "If Christ is only one person, this one so willed; thus there is only one will." M. "That is confusion. In truth, the one Christ 'is God and man at the

"That you have certainly maintained in your writings; but it is absurd. Assuming that it were so, that two wills presuppose two willers, then it must be, vice versâ, that two willers should have two wills. If you apply this to the Trinity, you must either say with Sabellius, that because in God there is only one will, there is therefore only one Person (one Willer) in the Godhead; or you must say with Arius, because there are three willing (persons), there must therefore be in God three wills, and so three natures,—for the difference of wills, according to the teaching of the Fathers, comes from the difference of natures."<sup>1</sup> P. "But it is not possible that there should be in one person two wills that do not contradict each other." M. "By this you will allow that there may be two wills in one person, only it is necessary that they should contradict each other. But whence comes then the contradiction? If from the natural will (in itself), then it would come from God, and God would be the Author of the conflict. But if it comes from sin, then this contradiction could not be in Christ, because He was free from all sin." P. "The willing is then a matter of nature." M. "Certainly the simple willing." P. "But the Fathers say the saints had one will with God; are they, then, of the same nature as God?" M. "Here is a lack of distinction, and you interchange the object of the will (the thing willed) with the will in itself. The Fathers, by that expression, had only the object of willing in view, and used the expression will, not in the proper sense of the word." P. "If the will is a matter of nature, then we must often change our nature, for our will changes often, and we must be of a different nature from other men; for they often will differently from ourselves." M. "We must distinguish the will (as such) from the concrete willing of a definite thing, as we must distinguish sight from the seeing of a definite thing, e.g., whether right or left, upwards or downwards, etc., etc., they are modi of the use of the will or of sight, and by these modi one is distinguished from another." P. "If you confess two natural wills in Christ, you take away His freedom; for what is natural is necessary." M. "Neither the divine nor the human rational nature of Christ is other than free; for the nature which is endowed with reason has the natural power of rational desire, i.e. the θέλησις (the willing of the rational soul). But from the proposition, "the natural is necessary," there follows an absurdity. God is natura good, natura Creator, then was it of necessity that HE should be Creator and good. And were he not free who has a natural will, then, conversely, he must be free who has no natural will, therefore that which is lifeless." P. "I concede that there are in Christ natural wills; but, as of two natures ἐν τῷ σύνθετον is acknowledged by us, so must we also of two wills admit ἐν τῷ σύνθετον; and therefore they who acknowledge two wills, because of the duality of nature, should not contend with those who assume only one will because of the closest union,—it is only a strife of words."<sup>1</sup> M. "You are mistaken, because you do not perceive that unions (syntheses) take place only in things which are immediately in the hypostasis (as the natures), but not in things which are in another (as the wills in the natures). If, however, we assume a union of the wills, we should also be forced to assume a union of all the other properties of the natures, thus, e.g., a union of the created with the uncreated, of the limited with the illimitable, of the mortal with the immortal. and so come to absurd assertions." . . . P. "Have not, then, the properties of the natures something in common, like the natures themselves?" M. "No, they have nothing in common (i.e. the properties of the one nature have nothing in common with those of the other), but the one hypostasis." P. "But do not the Fathers speak of a communion of glory and a communion of humiliation when they say, the communion of the glory has one source, and another that of the ignominy?" (Thus said Leo the Great, see vol. iii. sec. 176, c. 4, where he speaks of this, that the common honour of the Godhead and manhood in Christ has a different source from the common ignominy of both.) M. "The Fathers speak here after the manner of ἀντίδοσις (of the communicatio idiomatum). This, however, presupposes two dissimilar things, since that which naturally belongs to the one part of Christ (e.g., to Him as God) is ascribed to the other part (the Son of man). And if, after the manner of the ἀντίδοσις, you call the θέλημα of Christ a κοινόν, you confess thereby not one but two wills." P. "How? Was not the flesh of Christ moved by the suggestion of the Logos united with it?" M. "If you say this, you divide Christ; for by His suggestion also Moses was moved, and David, etc. But we say with the Fathers that the same highest God who unchanged became man, not only as God willed that which was suitable to His Godhead, but the same also as man willed that which was suitable to His manhood. As all things have the δύναμις of the existent, and this naturally is the ὁρμή (the inclination) to the profitable, and the ἀφορμή (drawing back, escaping) from the destructive, so also the Incarnate Logos had this δύναμις of self-preservation, and showed His ὁρμή and ἀφορμή through His energy: the ὁρμή in the use of physical things (yet without sin), and the ἀφορμή when He shrunk from voluntary death. Does the Church, then, do something unsuitable when it holds fast in the human nature also the properties innate in it, without which the nature cannot be?" P. "But if there is fear in the nature, then there is something evil in it, and the human nature (of Christ) is yet free from all evil." M. "You deceive yourself by similarity of sound. There are two kinds of fear, one according to nature and one not according to nature. The former serves for the preservation of nature, the other is irrational. Christ showed only the former; I say showed, because with Him all that was physical was voluntary. He hungered and thirsted and feared in truth, but yet not as we do, but voluntarily." P. "We should avoid all subtleties, and simply say, Christ is true God and true man, and abstain from everything else (i.e. the properties and wills of the natures.)”<sup>1</sup> M. “That would be a rejection of the Synods and Fathers, who have made declarations respecting not only the natures, but also their properties, teaching that one and the same is visible and invisible, mortal and immortal, tangible and intangible, created and uncreated. They also taught two wills, not merely by use of the number two, but also by the opposition of ἄλλο καὶ ἄλλο and by the relation of divine and human.” P. “We should speak neither of one nor of two wills, since the Synods have not done so, and the heretics misuse these expressions.” M. “If only the expressions of the Synods were to be used, then they would not say, μία φύσις τοῦ θεοῦ λόγου σεσαρκωμένη. Moreover, even if they would only hold by the Synods, they would be compelled from the two natures and their properties (which the Synod of Chalcedon taught) to infer two wills, and to recognise them. Among the properties of a nature we understand that which physically belongs to it, and to each nature of Christ there is a will akin to the nature (φυσικῶς ἐμπέφυκεν). And if the Synods anathematised Apollinaris and Arius, each of whom taught only one will, the former, because he declared that the σάρξ of Christ was of like substance with the Godhead, and Arius, because he, lowering the Son, ascribed to Him no truly divine will; how, then, can we hesitate to teach two wills? Further, the fifth Synod declared: ‘We recognise all the writings of Athanasius, Basil, Gregory,’ etc. Now, in these, two wills are clearly taught.” P. “Does not, then, the expression natural will seem objectionable to you?” M. “There are three kinds of life in creatures,—the life of the plant, the life of feeling, and the life of thought. It is the proper nature of the plant, to grow, etc.; of the creatures that feel, to desire; of the creatures that think, to will. All that is rational, then, must by nature be voluntary. Now, the Logos has assumed a rationally quickened humanity, therefore must He also, so far as He is man, be voluntary.” P. “I am convinced that the wills in Christ belong to the natures, the creaturely will to His created nature, etc., and that the two wills cannot combine into one. But those in Byzantium who oppose the natural wills maintain that the

Fathers had said that the Lord had a human will κατ' οἰκέλωσιν (appropriation)."<sup>1</sup> M. "There are two kinds of appropriation, namely, the essential, by which everyone has what belongs to his nature, and the relative, when we in a friendly manner appropriate something foreign to ourselves. Which appropriation is here meant?" P. "The relative." M. "How unsuitable this is will soon appear. The natural is not acquired; so, too, will is not acquired, consequently man has by nature the power of willing. . . . If, now, those persons maintain that Christ has assumed the human will only as something foreign, they must in consistency say that He also appropriated the other properties of human nature merely as something foreign, by which the whole Incarnation becomes an appearance. Further, Sergius anathematised everyone who admits two wills. Now, even the teachers of that οἰκέλωσις assume two wills, even if one of them is only the appropriated one, thus anathematising the friends of Sergius themselves. And when they, falsely indeed, maintain that two wills render two persons necessary, then the teachers of that οἰκέλωσις themselves bring two persons into Christ." P. "Did not, then, the Fathers teach that Christ had formed our will in Himself, ἐν ἑαυτῷ ἐτύπωσε?" M. "Yes, they also taught that HE had assumed our nature, but by that they did not mean κατ' οἰκέλωσιν." P. "But when they say, Christ formed our will in Himself, can a natural will be meant by this?" M. "Certainly; since Christ is also true man, He has in Himself and by Himself subjected the human to God, set up for us a pattern to will nothing but what God wills." P. "But those who admit only one will mean it not ill."<sup>2</sup> M. "Even the Severians say, they mean it not ill, when they admit only one nature. But which, then, should this one will be?" P. "They call it the gnomish, and γνώμη is, as Cyril says, the τρόπος ζωῆς, that we live virtuously or sinfully." M. "The manner of life is matter of choice; but by choice we will, therefore γνώμη is the willing of a real or supposed good. How can we now say, the will is gnomish, i.e. of a γνώμη? That means nothing else than that the will goes out from a will, which is not possible.

Moreover, if one ascribes to Christ a γνώμη (a choice), He is thus made a mere man, as though HE, like us, had not known what to do, had hesitated and deliberated. . . . Should we not rather say, as His personality was divine, He possessed, in His very being, the natural good?"<sup>1</sup> P. "Are, then, the virtues something natural?" M. "Certainly." P. "But why, then, are not all men equally virtuous, since all are of one nature?" M. "Because we do not develop the natural in like measure, nor in like measure strive after that for which we are born." P. "But yet we acquire the virtues by discipline?" M. "Discipline and the efforts following upon it only serve to drive away the deceptions of sin. When these disappear, the natural virtues come of themselves." P. "It is, then, blasphemy to assert one γνώμη in Christ." M. "The Fathers use γνώμη in a different sense, e.g., as counsel, as Paul, when he says: 'Concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord, yet I give my judgment (γνώμην),' or as advice, or as sentence, as opinion, view. I have found, in the Bible and in the Fathers, twenty-eight meanings of γνώμη. . . . Those, then, who maintain a gnomish, or choosing will, etc., must give it out for either a divine or angelic or human will. If they explained it as divine, they assume only a divine nature of Christ; if angelic, only an angelic nature; if human, then only a human nature."<sup>2</sup> P. "In order to escape all this, they say the will is neither matter of nature nor of gnome, but it is in us matter of dexterity (ἐπιτηδειότης, habilitas)." M. "This dexterity is either κατὰ φύσιν, and then that expression only leads back by a roundabout way to the natural will, or the dexterity is a matter of acquisition. In the latter case, they must maintain, in opposition to the Scriptures, that Christ did not know until HE learnt, and so fall into Nestorianism, which admits only one will in the two persons invented by it. If, however, they call that one will of Christ the hypostatic, then it belongs only to the person of the Son, and they maintain thereby that the Son has another will than the Father. If they call it παρὰ φύσιν, they thereby destroy the natures in Christ. I should like to ask them: Does God the Father will as God or as Father? If

He wills as Father, then His will is different from that of the Son, which is heretical. But if He wills as God, then it follows that the will is a matter of nature. Further, as the Fathers teach: Two, who have only one will, have also only one substance, so that the Monothelites are forced to maintain that the Godhead and the manhood in Christ are one and the same substance. Further, as the Fathers teach: Two kinds of substances (οὐσίαι) have not a common will, yet may they necessarily not maintain that the two natures of Christ had a common will; or if they do maintain it, they contradict the Fathers." P. "But they appeal to the Fathers." M. "Only the Nestorians and Monophysites, although opposites, teach one will, but not the recognised Fathers."<sup>1</sup> P. "But Gregory the theologian (Orat. 2, De Filio) says: His will was in nothing contradictory to God, quite deified. Does not this speak against two wills?" M. "On the contrary, as the kindled presupposes a kindler, so the deified a deifier. Moreover, the same Gregory similarly speaks of the human nature of Christ as deified. Must we therefore deny the two natures?" P. "You are right, but they also adduce Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. 1, De Resur.), who says of Christ: The soul of Christ wills, the body (of the sick man) is touched, and through both the sickness is driven away (S. Matt. viii. 3). Here, they maintain, Gregory teaches that the human soul of Christ willed through the divine will of the Godhead hypostatically united with it." M. "If one should say that the willing of the ψυχή comes from the Godhead, then we might also say with equal right, that even the bodily touch comes from the Godhead, which is absurd." P. "You are right. But they appeal also to Athanasius, who (Orat. major, De Fide) says, the (human) νοῦς of the Lord is not the Lord Himself, but His will, or His βούλησις or His energy upon anything." M. "This passage is evidence against them. For if the νοῦς of Christ is not the Lord Himself, then it is evidently not divine φύσει, but hypostatically united with the Lord, and therefore His θέλησις, βούλησις, or ἐνέργεια. Athanasius speaks here according to the usage of Clement of Alexandria (Stromat. lib. vi.), according to which θέλησις =

νοῦς ὀρεκτικός (desiring spirit), βούλησις = rational desire ; the expression ἐνέργεια πρὸς τι, however, was used by S. Athanasius because the Lord, in all His godlike acts (acts belonging to His divine nature), made use of the reasonable human soul hypostatically united with Him." P. "You are right ; but Athanasius says further : The Lord was born of woman, but without carnal θελήματα and λογισμοὶ ἀνθρώπων ; the θέλησις was only that of the Godhead." M. "Athanasius does not here at all speak of the will of Christ, but of this, that the Incarnation resulted purely from the divine will, without the will of the flesh, without the action of a man. Generally, the Fathers teach, like the Holy Scriptures, that the Lord willed and effected our salvation in His two natures." P. "Have the great kindness to show this."<sup>1</sup> M. "According to S. John i. 43, Jesus purposed to go to Galilee. He purposed to go where He was not yet. He was, however, only in His manhood, not in Galilee ; for as God He is everywhere. He purposed, therefore, to go to Galilee as man, not as God, and consequently had a will as man. So in S. John xvii. 24, HE willed as man that where HE was His disciples should also be ; for only as man is He in a certain place. In S. John xix. 28 and S. Matt. xxvii. 34, Jesus said : 'I thirst,' and would not drink the wine mingled with gall ; but evidently it is only the manhood that can thirst, and therefore it was only this that willed not to take the unsuitable draught. Also in S. John vii. 1 ; S. Mark ix. 29 ; vii. 24 ; 2 Cor. xiii. 4 ; S. Mark vi. 48 ; S. Matt. xxvi. 17 ; and Phil. (not Hebrews, as Maximus says) ii. 8, is the human will of Christ referred to. In Psalm xxxix. [xl.] 7, 8, it is said : 'Sacrifice and meat-offering Thou wouldest not ; but mine ears hast Thou opened [in the text, as in Hebrews x. 5, a body hast Thou prepared me]. . . . 'Lo, I come ; in the volume of the book it is written of me, that I should fulfil Thy will, O my God. I am content to do it.' That this refers to Christ as man no one denies ; and accordingly this passage ascribes a will to Him also as man. According to Gen. i. 26, man is made in the image of God ; and therefore human nature must have the power of freedom, like the divine. And if Christ did not assume a human will, as they maintain, then did He not save it, and we are not partakers of a complete salvation. But that the Lord had also a divine will is clear from S. Luke xiii. 34 and S. John v. 21.”<sup>1</sup> P. “This certainly proves two natural wills. But why did Pope Vigilius accept the letter of Mennas, which teaches only one will, after it had been shown to him in the cabinet of the Emperor (Justinian), and in the senate?” M. “I am surprised that you and your predecessors, being patriarchs, should venture to lie. Sergius said in his letter to Honorius, that Vigilius had received information respecting that letter, but not that it was shown him or delivered to him; but you say, in your letter to Pope John, that it had been shown and delivered to him. Which of you is one to believe?” P. “But Pope Honorius, in his letter to Sergius, maintained only one will.” M. “The drawer-up of that letter of Honorius, who was afterwards commissioned by John iv. to write to the Emperor Constantine, gives the assurance that he only said in the letter, that as man Jesus had only one will (the law of the Spirit), and not at the same time also the will of the members.” P. “My predecessor understood it differently.” M. “Nothing placed me at such a distance from your predecessor as his inconstancy. At one time he approved the expression, one divine will of Christ; at another, one βουλευτικὸν θέλημα; at another, one ὑποστατικόν; at another, ἐξουσιατικόν: again, προαιρετικόν; again, γνωμικόν; again, οἰκονομικόν. Moreover, by those documents (the Ecthesis) he has caused division.” (In that which follows, Maximus opposes the statement of Pyrrhus, that Sophronius of Jerusalem had begun the controversy.) M. “We will now, after ending the inquiry into the two wills, pass on to the two energies.”<sup>2</sup> P. “As the will is a matter of nature, so must also, per synecdochen, the operation be a matter of nature, and I recall my previous assertions in opposition.” . . . M. “In your writings I have found that you ascribe to Christ, as whole, only one energy. Now, as His whole being is His hypostasis, then this, His one energy, must also be hypostatic. But then, would it be different from the energy of His Father and His mother, as

He is hypostatically different from both?"<sup>1</sup> P. "If you maintain two energies on account of the difference of natures in Christ, and not one only on account of the unity of His person, then you must assume two energies in man on account of the substantial difference of body and soul, and consequently there would be in Christ three energies." M. "What you here allege against the properties of the natures (in Christ), the Monophysites turn against the natures themselves, and that which the Fathers have opposed to them we bring against you. You admit with us two natures in Christ, and not merely one on account of the unity of His person. If, however, you maintain two energies in man, because of the substantial difference of body and soul, you must also assume two natures in man, and accordingly three in Christ. But if you do not admit three natures in Christ, you have likewise no right to reproach us for not maintaining three energies. Moreover, that which is one in respect to the species (εἶδος) of man, is not also one by substantial unity of body and soul. Human nature is one because it is common to the whole species, and not because body and soul were one. So it is in regard to the energy. When we ascribe to Christ one human energy as such, we oppose the alternative of either ascribing the energy to the personality (hypostasis), or of recognising three energies in Christ, because the energy works according to the nature."<sup>2</sup> P. "Nestorius says that the persons correspond with the energies; therefore, by the doctrine of two energies, you fall into Nestorianism." M. "Above all, Nestorius taught, along with two persons, only one will. But even if what you say were true, that the persons correspond with the energies, then conversely, the energies would have to correspond with the persons, and you would then, on account of the three Persons, have to recognise three energies in the Trinity, or, on account of the one energy, only one Person. . . . So, too, we should have to say, because there are several Persons in the Trinity, there are also several human energies, whilst there is, in fact, only one human energy (κατ' εἶδος), and the Fathers (Gregory of Nyssa) say : That which has the same substance (οὐσία) has also the same energy. Further, if they maintain that persons correspond with energies, and if they themselves (elsewhere) say, Christ has many energies (the words of Honorius), it would follow that they would be forced to ascribe many persons to the one Christ. Further, if persons correspond with energies, then the latter cease when the former is removed. The Monothelites, however, now wish to remove the expression one or two energies, and therewith would, if they could, remove Christ Himself.<sup>1</sup> If we consider ourselves, we find that each of us can walk and think at the same time without, for this reason, becoming two men, and without mingling the energies corresponding to his two natures (body and soul). In the same way, a sword which is made red hot preserves its two natures (iron and fire), and their natural operations,—it cuts and it burns at the same time ; but it is yet only one sword, without its natures being mixed." P. "But there is (in Christ) only one Worker, and therefore only one operation, energy." M. "This one in person is twofold in natures, and therefore worked in a twofold manner as one, so that with the multiplicity of energies there was not also a multiplicity of persons brought in. If, however, we ascribed the energy, not to the natures but to the person, we should arrive at follies which have already been rejected. What would you say if another maintained : Because Christ is one person, He had only one nature ? Yet, if you admit only one energy, which shall this one be?—the divine or the human, or neither ? If the divine, then was Christ pure God ; if the human, then only man : if neither, then He was neither God nor man." P. "If we speak of one energy of the Godhead and the manhood, we do not mean that it is present in Him λόγῳ φύσεως, but τρόπῳ ἐνώσεως (by the union of the Godhead and manhood)." M. "If He has the energy, as you say, through ἐνωσις, then was HE before this ἐνωσις without energy, and thus created the world without energy and with constraint. Further : As the Father and the Holy Spirit are not also hypo-

statically united with the flesh, then would they, in consequence, have no energy, and would not also be Creator of the world? Further, you must call the energy either created or uncreated, for there is no third kind. If created, then it points to only one created nature in Christ; in the other case, only to one uncreated: and how could the energy of a created nature be an uncreated, and conversely?" P. "Do you agree, then, with those who understand the ἀποτέλεσμα (effect) of the actions accomplished by Christ under μία ἐνέργεια?"<sup>1</sup> M. "Different actions have different effects, and not one. Although, in the red-hot sword, the energy of fire and that of iron are united, yet the effect of fire is burning, that of iron cutting, even if they do not appear separated from each other in the burning cut or in the cutting burn. We cannot speak of one effect unless where there is one action. As, then, there are many actions of Christ, so you must admit countless effects; or if you will hold fast one effect, then must you also assume one action of Christ. But we have not to speak of the actions of Christ, nor of that which is ἔξω Χριστοῦ, but of that which is ἐν Χριστῷ, of the physical relation of the substances (οὐσίαι) of Christ, whether it was encroached upon by the union of the Godhead and manhood or not. . . . Moreover, you have not (as you would make believe) spoken with respect to the action (τὸ ἔργον, ἀποτέλεσμα), but with respect to the physical relation of the united natures of one energy, and so have produced the fabulous animal, the goat-stag. This is shown clearly by the capitula of Cyrus, which you have received, in which it is taught that Christ worked the divine and the human by the same energy. This contradicts Scripture and the holy Fathers, and even the nature of the thing; for no thing can have, along with its natural working, another opposed to it,—fire cannot make warm and cold at the same time. So one nature cannot work miracles and endure suffering."<sup>2</sup> P. "Yet Cyril says, Christ revealed μίαν συγγενῇ δι' ἀμφὸν ἐνέργειαν."<sup>3</sup> M. "Cyril was far from ascribing to the Godhead and the manhood only one φυσικὴ ἐνέργεια, for he teaches elsewhere: 'No rational person will assert that the Creator and the creature have one and the same energy.' On the contrary, he wished to show that the divine energy is one and the same, both apart from union with the manhood and in union therewith, just as the energy of fire is one and the same, whether with or without union with a ὕλη. The Father Cyril has not thus spoken of one energy of the two natures in Christ, but said that the divine energy was one and the same,—the same in the Incarnate Son as in the Father; and that Christ worked His miracles, not by an almighty command (=divine energy), but asomatically,—even after the Incarnation He is ὁμοεργός with the asomatically working Father,—but He also worked them somatically by bodily contact, ἀφ᾽ ἧς, and thus δι' ἀμφοῖν. The reviving of the maiden, accomplished by the word and the almighty will, and the healing of the blind, was connected with the healing which was accomplished somatically by contact. The divine energy did not dispense with the human, but made use of it for its own manifestation. The stretching out of the hand (at the healing of the blind), the mixture of spittle and earth, etc., belonged to the energy of the human nature of Christ, and God as well as man was acting in the miracle. Cyril, then, did not make a mistake about the property of each nature, but saw the creative divine energy and the ζωτική (i.e. the bodily energy worked by the human soul), as ἀσυγχύτως united in the Incarnate Logos." P. "You have well shown that S. Cyril did not contradict the doctrine of two energies, but, on the contrary, harmonised with it; but S. Dionysius the Areopagite speaks of a καινὴ θεανδρική ἐνέργεια."<sup>1</sup> M. "Do you hold this καινὴ θεανδρική ἐνέργεια as something quantitatively or qualitatively new?" P. "As quantitatively new." M. "Then there must have been assumed in Christ a third nature, θεανδρική; for a third energy (and it was that, if it was quantitatively new) presupposes a third nature, since the element of proper essential energy belongs to the idea of nature. If, however, the new is qualitatively new, this does not express a single energy, but the new mysterious way and manner of the human activities (energies) of Christ, which is a consequence of the mysterious union and perichoresis (=mutual interchange of movement) of the two natures in Christ. Even in the expression, θεανδρικὴ ἐνέργεια, the duality of the energies is also taught periphrastically (mediately), because it specifies the natures numerically. For if we remove the two opposites (divine and human in Christ), there remains nothing intermediate. And provided there were only a single energy in Christ, the θεανδρικὴ, then Christ, as God, would have a different energy from the Father, for that of the Father could not possibly be divine and human." P. "The proposition, 'That which is of like nature has also the like energy (as the three Persons of the Trinity), and that which is distinguished in the energy is also distinguished in the nature,'—this proposition has been adopted by the Fathers only in respect to the theology (nature of God), and not in respect to the economy (Incarnation)." M. "Thus, then, according to you, the Son, after His Incarnation, would not be of the same theology with the Father; He could then be no longer invoked with the Father, He would not be of one substance with the Father, and the passages of the Bible would be untrue which ascribe to Him the same energy as to the Father (S. John v. 17, 19, 21; x. 25, 38). Further, the continuous government of the world is the business of God, not only of the Father and of the Spirit, but also of the Son. Consequently, the Son, even after the Incarnation, has the same energy as the Father." . . . P. "When we speak of one energy, we do not mean to take away the human will of Christ, but in distinction from the divine energy it is called suffering." M. "Things are not known from their opposite by mere negation, otherwise we should have to call, e.g., human nature evil because the divine is good. And in like manner, we may not say that because the divine movement is energy (working), therefore the human is a suffering [active and passive]. The Fathers do not call human action mere suffering (passion), but also δύναμις, ἐνέργεια, κίνησις, etc., etc., not in opposition to the divine activity, but after its own way and manner which it has received from the Creator. So far as, e.g., it works holding, it is called δύναμις; so far as it is the same in all beings of the same species (ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ὁμοειδέσιν), it is called ἐνέργεια, etc., etc. And also, when the Fathers called the human action a passion, they did this, not in opposition to the divine action, but in respect to the way and manner of human working, itself implanted by the Creator. And when (Pope) Leo says, 'Agit utraque forma,' etc., this is nothing else than if it was said: 'After HE had fasted forty days, He was an hungered.' He granted, in short, to nature, when He would, that it should work that which was proper to it." P. "You have shown that it is improper to speak of one energy in whatever way that may be done. But forgive me and my predecessors. We have failed only from want of insight. Spare the memory of my predecessors." M. "We must anathematise the heresy, but be silent about persons." P. "But in that case I should have to reject Sergius and my own patriarchal Synod" (see sec. 300). M. "It was not a regular Synod." P. "If it must be, I will do it (anathematise the heresy), but I should like first to visit the graves of the apostles and the Pope, and transmit to the latter a statement on my error." Thus ended this disputation, and the information is added, that Maximus and the Governor Gregory agreed to this, and Pyrrhus with Maximus soon afterwards went to Rome, where Pyrrhus cast off his error, and by an orthodox confession united himself again with the Church.<sup>1</sup>

SEC. 304. African and Roman Synods for the condemnation of Monothelitism.

The biographer of S. Maximus relates (c. 14) that, on his admonition and counsel, the bishops of Africa and the neighbouring islands held Synods for the rejection of Monothelitism.<sup>2</sup> He evidently thinks that this took place at the same time with the Roman Council held by the Pope. As, however, the African Synods took place in the fourth indiction, so in the year 646,<sup>3</sup> a Roman Synod at that time is not known. Of the African assemblies in question, we have three synodal letters, and a fourth by Archbishop Victor of Carthage, among the Acts of the Lateran Synod of 649. The first of these is a united memorial from the three ecclesiastical provinces of Numidia, Byzacene, and Mauritania, to Pope Theodore, resolved upon at a general assembly of the deputies of those provinces, and drawn up in the name of all by the three metropolitans (primarium sedium episcopi), Columbus of Numidia, Stephen of the Byzacene province, and Reparatus of Mauritania. The provincia proconsularis, with the supreme metropolitan see of Carthage, is not named in it, because Fortunatus of Carthage, himself a Monothelite, was not yet deposed; or at least his successor Victor was not yet elected. This Fortunatus we shall meet again in the history of the sixth Œcumenical Council.<sup>1</sup>

After a very express recognition of the Roman primate, the African bishops go on: "The innovation which has arisen in Constantinople has become known to us also. We have hitherto kept silence, because we believed that the tares had already been plucked up by the apostolic see. When, however, we understood that it was obstinately spreading, and had read of the recantation of Pyrrhus, the former bishop of Constantinople, which he handed to you, we held it for necessary to write to Paul, the present bishop of Constantinople, beseeching him with tears to remove from his Church and himself the new heresy which one of its originators, Pyrrhus, had himself rejected, and to cause to be taken away the documents (copies of the Ecthesis) which had been publicly posted to the distress of the people. . . . Because, however, Africa had been brought into a certain suspicion at Constantinople by malevolent people (see below, in this section), we have sent to you first the letter to Paul already mentioned, and pray you to have it delivered in Constantinople by your representatives (responsales). If Paul perseveres in his error, the holy see will cut off the unsound member from the sound body. As we held special Synods in each province, we should have liked to despatch a plena legatio. Because, however, circumstances occurred to hinder us, deputies of the different provinces of Africa have taken the resolution to make you acquainted with the present state of things.”<sup>1</sup>

The second African synodal letter, by Stephen, bishop of the prima sedes in the Byzacene province, and his forty-two suffragans, addressed to the Emperor Constantine (Constans II., see sec. 301 ad fin.), first commends the care of the Emperor for the Church, and his orthodox zeal, and then prays, in the name of all the bishops of Africa, that he would extinguish the scandal of the new heresy, and admonish Bishop Paul of Constantinople to fidelity towards the orthodox doctrine. They said they had written to him, and had asked the bearer to deliver to the Emperor a copy of their letter to the Bishop.<sup>2</sup>

It may seem surprising that this letter is subscribed only by the bishops of the Byzacene provinces, and yet is addressed to the Emperor in the name of the cuncti Africae sacerdotes. Perhaps it was drawn up at the provincial Synod of the Byzacenes, and afterwards approved by the rest of the African bishops. Such, too, might be the case with the third document still extant, the letter to Paul of Constantinople, which, although subscribed only by the sixty-eight bishops of the proconsular province (at the time of the vacancy of the see of Carthage), was, like this, regarded as a general letter from the whole of Africa.<sup>3</sup>

In the synodal letter to Paul of Constantinople, it is said that the apostles had proclaimed only one, the true doctrine of Christ, but that the wicked enemy had sown tares, i.e. heresies. Even in Constantinople there had been published a poisonous document contrary to the doctrine of the Fathers and Councils, and they wonder that Bishop Paul has not immediately annulled it. They entirely reject the new doctrines proclaimed since Sergius, and give the assurance that, by God's grace, they will preserve inviolate what the holy Fathers had proclaimed, and the universal Church confesses, namely, that the one Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, took true human flesh with the rational soul, without loss or diminution of the Godhead, that He is God and man together, and as God has the divine nature, divine will, and divine operatio, and so also as man, the nature, will, and full operatio of man, but without sin and concupiscence, i.e. that in Christ there are two natures and two natural wills, as the Catholic Church has always taught. In proof of this, they adduce passages from Ambrose and Augustine.<sup>1</sup>

The fourth African letter, finally, somewhat later than the three mentioned, is that of Victor, the new bishop of Carthage, to Pope Theodore. It informs him that he had been raised to the see of Carthage on the 16th of July (646), then passes on to the Monothelite affair, explains his faith in two wills and operations, petitions the Pope for the suppression of the new heresy, and closes with the remark that he has not written to Paul of Constantinople, because Africa had been, by means of slanderers at Constantinople, brought into evil and false suspicion, as though this land had been guilty of some wrong (see below). But the Pope might have the synodal letter (mentioned above) presented to Paul by his responsarii.<sup>2</sup>

African Synods are also mentioned by the Libellus Synodicus, which enumerates a Byzacene, Numidian, Mauritanian, and a Carthaginian synod.<sup>3</sup> But it not merely interchanges the names of the metropolitans, but also makes the mistake of stating that, along with Sergius, Pyrrhus was anathematised here, whilst the genuine synodal letters show that Pyrrhus was commended, and the African bishops had as yet no information of his relapse into heresy. This took place some time afterwards at Ravenna, upon which Pope Theodore assembled the bishops and clergy in a kind of Synod in S. Peter's Church, at the grave of S. Peter, took some drops of the holy blood from the chalice, mixed it with ink, and subscribed with it the condemnation of Pyrrhus.<sup>1</sup>

Both in the letter of Victor and in the united African memorial, mention is made of a wicked suspicion to which Africa is exposed. This evidently refers to the rebellion of the imperial viceroy, Gregory, who came out, A.D. 646, as a usurper and Emperor of Africa, but was beaten by the Saracens in the very next year.<sup>2</sup> Victor and the other African bishops meant to say, either that they and the clergy generally had taken no part in the insurrection of Gregory, or that their assemblies and letters had preceded the formal outbreak of the insurrection, so that the evil rumours which had penetrated to Constantinople, respecting a revolt which had taken place in Africa, were untrue.

SEC. 305. Paul of Constantinople writes to Pope Theodore.

In accordance with the wish of the Africans, Pope Theodore addressed a letter of counsel to Paul of Constantinople, but only the answer of the latter is still extant. He boasts of his humility, will not answer hard words with hard words, and then says: "Your representatives have had long contentions with us, and have demanded that we should explain the notion of one will of Christ, and send this explanation to your reverence. . . . We present our view in the present letter. . . . We, i.e. the δικαιοδοσία (tribunal), and the Synod of our Church, confess one Son and Lord, . . . perfect in the Godhead, and perfect in the manhood, one person, one compound hypostasis, in two natures after the union, recognising the difference of the natures in their properties. In the one Christ are preserved the two natures, and they remain within the proper bounds of the substances, also in the ineffable connection of the hypostatic union. The Logos remained what HE was, and became what He was not. Therefore we say that all godlike and all manlike energy proceeds from one and the same Incarnate God, and refers back to one and the same. Thus no separation is introduced, and the mixture is avoided. . . . We confess that one and the same Incarnate God, the Logos, worked miracles and endured suffering in the flesh voluntarily for our sakes; so that we can say: God suffered, and the Son of man came down from heaven, on account of the inseparable union in the hypostasis. Therefore we also recognise also only ONE will of our Lord, in order not to ascribe to the ONE Person a contradiction or a difference of wills, or think of that Person as conflicting with Himself, and so as not to be forced to admit two willers. We do not this in order to mingle the two natures, or in order to remove one of them, but in order to show that the rationally quickened σάρξ of Christ is enriched through closest union with the divine, has acquired (ἐκέκτητο) the divine will of the Logos inseparably united with it, and is in all ways led and moved by it, so that it is at no time separated, or of its own impulse fulfils its natural movement in opposition to the spirit of the Logos hypostatically united with it, but at the time and in the manner and in the degree in which the Logos willed. Far be it from us to bring in a movement of the manhood in Christ constrained by physical necessity, such as is indicated by the words of Christ to Peter in S. John xxi. 18 (far be it from us to admit such a thing); although, literally taken, HE referred to suffering in a similar manner as Peter." At the close, Paul seeks to explain in a different sense the passage: "I came not to do My own will, but the will of Him who sent Me," and appeals to Gregory of Nyssa, Athanasius, Cyril, and Honorius.<sup>1</sup>

Upon this, Pope Theodore pronounced the deposition of Paul,<sup>2</sup> and at the same time nominated as apostolic vicar over Palestine, Bishop Stephen of Dor (in Palestine), whom Sophronius, years before, had sent as his envoy to Rome, in order to depose the Monothelite bishops who had been appointed by the intruded Patriarch Sergius (see above, sec. 300, and below, sec. 307), if they did not amend.<sup>1</sup> Maximus, too, proceeded to oppose Monothelitism;<sup>2</sup> whilst, on the other hand, Paul took vengeance on the papal representatives in Constantinople (sec. 215), and brought it about that the Emperor Constans II. put forth the unhappy Typus, A.D. 648.<sup>3</sup>

SEC. 306. The Typus.

As this imperial decree of the faith has come to us among the Acts of the Lateran Synod of A.D. 649, it lacks the title and superscription, but it is called unanimously τύπος, and also τύπος περὶ πίστεως by the ancients and by the Lateran Synod, and was undoubtedly published under that title. It runs: "As we are accustomed to do everything and to have regard to everything which can serve to the welfare of our Christian State, and especially whatever concerns the unfalsified doctrine upon which all our happiness depends, we perceived that our orthodox people had been greatly agitated because some, in regard to the economy (Incarnation) of God, recognised and maintained only one will, namely, that one and the same works the divine and the human,<sup>4</sup> whilst others admit two wills and two energies. The former defend their view by this, that the Lord Jesus Christ is only one person in two natures (and therefore) willing and working, without mixture or separation, both the divine and the human. The others (say): While in one and the same person two natures are united without separation, yet their difference from each other remains, and in accordance with the quality of the nature (προσφύως), the one and the same Christ works both the divine and the human. . . . We believed that, under God's guidance, we were bound to extinguish the flame of discord which had been kindled, and not allow it further to destroy souls. We declare, therefore, to our orthodox subjects that, from the present moment, they no longer have permission in any way to contend and to quarrel with one another over one will and one energy, or two energies and two wills. This we ordain, not to take away anything from the pious doctrines of the holy recognised Fathers in regard to the Incarnation of God the Word, but with the view that all further strife in regard to these questions should cease, and that we should follow only the Holy Scriptures and the five deliverances of the five holy Œcumenical Synods and the simple utterances and confessions of the approved Fathers, . . . without adding or taking away anything, and without explaining them in a manner opposed to their proper meaning. Moreover, there should everywhere be observed the form of doctrine (σχῆμα) existing before the controversies referred to, as it was when no such controversy had come into existence. But none of those who hitherto have taught one will and one energy, or two wills and two energies, shall for this reason be exposed to blame or accusation. . . . But in order to the complete union and communion of the churches, and that no further occasion may remain for the litigious, we ordain that the documents (the Ecthesis) posted up in the narthex [vestibule] of the great church of our residence city for some time, in regard to the controversies in question, be taken away. Whoever ventures to transgress the command now given is subject, above all, to the judgment of God, but he will also be liable to the punishment of the despisers of the imperial commands. If he is a bishop or cleric, he shall be deposed; if a monk, excommunicated, and banished from his place of abode (monastery); if he is a civil or military official, he shall lose his office and dignity; if he is a private person, he shall, if of the upper class, be punished in his property; if lowly, be chastised with corporal correction and permanent exile.”<sup>1</sup>

As Sergius drew up the Ecthesis, so did his second successor, Paul, draw up the Typus; but whilst the former gave to his work, not the form of an imperial edict, but the theological form of a creed, Paul showed himself more adroit, and gave to the Typus the external appearance of an imperial decree. That Constans hoped by this new edict to restore the peace of the Church, he tells us himself, and there is no reason to doubt it, for by withdrawal of the Ecthesis he visibly wanted to quiet the Westerns and those who held their opinions. It is also clear that, whilst the Ecthesis forbade the controversy on one or two energies, it yet proclaimed, inconsistently, the one will, and so Monothelitism, the Typus now consistently rejected the ἐν θέλημα along with the μία ἐνέργεια, and therewith wanted to be more impartial. This supposed impartiality is also the principal difference between the Typus and the Ecthesis, for in the fundamental thought, that the dogmatic development shall stop where it has been brought by the five Œcumenical Councils, and that further questions shall not be brought up, they are like each other. Moreover, that impartiality is only a false juste milieu which places orthodox Dyothelitism on one and the same line with the heresy, and prohibits the one as well as the other. Another difference between the Ecthesis and the Typus is shown in this, that the former required obedience only in general, whilst Constans threatened every transgression of his Typus with the severest civil penalties. That he also actually carried them out with all harshness the sequel will show.

SEC. 307. Pope Martin I. and the Lateran Synod of A.D. 649.

Soon after the promulgation of the Typus, and perhaps without having seen it, Pope Theodore died, May 13, 649; and on July 5, Martin I. was elected. He had been formerly a Roman priest, before that legate of the holy see at Constantinople, a man distinguished for beauty, virtue, and knowledge, destined by providence as martyr for the Dyothelite faith. The Acta S. Audoëni declare that the Emperor in a friendly manner requested the new Pope to agree to the Typus, but that he had rejected this request with all decision, and petitioned the King of the Franks to send wise and able bishops to Rome, so that the Pope, with them and the bishops out of all Italy, might prepare an antidote for the heresy. They relate that the King agreed to this, and assembled the bishops of his kingdom, in order to select deputies who should be sent to Rome. The election had fallen unanimously upon Audœnus of Rouen and Eligius of Noyon, but an accident hindered their journey.<sup>1</sup>

According to this, we should be forced to believe that Pope Martin had been required to receive the Typus immediately after he had taken possession of the see, and that, in order to be able to take more decisive steps, he had summoned a great Synod. But the Acta S. Audœni are a very dubious source, and in one of the points adduced are corrected by S. Audœnus himself, since he relates that it was after the Synod that the Pope made that request to the King of the Franks.<sup>2</sup> Bower and others maintain that the Emperor Constans II. immediately confirmed the new Pope, in order the more easily to gain him over to himself and the Typus.<sup>3</sup> Muratori,<sup>4</sup> on the contrary, supposes that, this time in Rome, they did not await the imperial confirmation, and consecrated Pope Martin without such approval. This comes out clearly, that the Greeks maintained subsequently that he irregulariter et sine lege episcopatum subripuisse.<sup>5</sup>

The first great act of the new Pope was the holding of that famous Synod, in importance almost œcumenical, which was opened on the 5th of October 649, in the Basilica of Constantine (Ecclesia Salvatoris) in the Lateran. It lasted until October 31, fell into five sessions, here called secretarii,<sup>6</sup> numbered 105 bishops, chiefly from Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia, with some Africans and other foreigners. There was no one present from Longobardian Italy, for Maximus of Aquileia, who was there, had his see at Grado, which belonged to the Byzantines (vol. iv. p. 364, note 2). The Pope presided, and had the Acts immediately translated into Greek, that he might be able to send them to the Emperor and the Oriental bishops. They have come to us in all completeness and in both languages, and it hardly needs to be said that, of the Greek documents received there and read at the Synod, e.g. the Ecthesis and Typus, the Greek text here presented to us is not a translation back from the Latin, but the original.

First of all, the first notary of the Roman see, Theophylact, as master of the ceremonies, spoke and invited the Pope to deliver an address. He spoke as follows:—"Christ has commanded the shepherds to be watchful. This applies also to us; and especially must we watch over the purity of the faith, as some bishops, who do not deserve this name, have sought of late to corrupt the Confession by newly invented expressions. All the world knows them, for they have come publicly forward to injure the Church, namely, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius of Constantinople, and his successors, Pyrrhus and Paul. Cyrus, eighteen years ago, taught in Alexandria one operation of Christ and proclaimed nine capitula from the pulpit. Sergius approved of this, somewhat later sent out the Ecthesis under the name of the Emperor Heraclius, and taught one will and one operation,<sup>1</sup> which leads to one nature of Christ. By the Fathers it is quite clearly taught (passages in proof from Basil and Cyril) that the operatio corresponds with the nature, and he who has like operatio must also be of like nature. As now the Fathers teach two natures in Christ, it follows hence that in one and the same Incarnate Logos two wills and operations are united without mixture or separation. That both are naturaliter one is not possible. Pope Leo, too, taught two wills (proof passages), and the Holy Scriptures (proofs) point to the same. He worked thus the divine corporeally, for He manifested it by His rationally quickened flesh: the human He worked divinely, because, for our sakes, He voluntarily took upon Him human weaknesses, but without sin.

"These men contradicted the doctrine of Leo and of the Council of Chalcedon, since Cyrus set forth the nine capitula, and Sergius the Ecthesis. Pyrrhus and Paul have spread the heresy more widely. Pyrrhus, in particular, by threats and flattery misled many bishops to subscribe that impiety. Later, to his shame, he came here and presented a letter to our holy see, in which he anathematised his earlier error. But he is like a dog returned to his vomit, and therefore is properly deposed. Paul, however, has outbid his predecessor, confirmed the Ecthesis, and opposed the true dogma. Therefore he has also been deposed by the holy see. In particular, imitating Sergius in order to hide his error, he gave the Emperor the counsel to send out the Typus, which annuls the catholic dogma, denies to Christ properly all will and all operation, and therewith also each nature, for the nature shows itself through its activity. He has done what no heretic has previously dared—destroyed the altar of our holy see in the palace, Placidia, and forbidden our envoys to celebrate there. He has persecuted these envoys, with other orthodox men, because they exhorted him to abandon his error, assigning to some imprisonment, to others exile, to others flogging. As these men (Sergius, etc.) have disquieted almost the whole world, there have come to us from different sides complaints in writing and by word of mouth, with the request to destroy the falsehood by the apostolic authority. Our predecessors exhorted these men to amendment, in writing and by their representatives, but without result. Therefore we have thought it necessary to call you together, in order, in consultation with you, to consider their case and the new doctrine.”<sup>1</sup>

At the request of the two representatives of Archbishop Maurus of Ravenna, his letter to the Pope was now read, as follows: “He had been requested by the Pope to appear at the Synod, but the garrison and the residents of Ravenna and the neighbourhood (Pentapolis) had earnestly entreated him not to leave them, on account of the invasions of the barbarians, and as no imperial exarch was present. He would therefore ask to be excused, and to be considered as present. He thought in no way differently from the apostolic see and the orthodox Church, condemned and anathematised the Ecthesis, and that which had been recently put forth in its favour (the Typus), acknowledged two operations and two wills, since one and the same, God and man, in one person worked both, the godlike and the human; he honoured the five holy Synods, and had sent deputies whose subscription against the Ecthesis, etc., he would recognise as valid."

After this letter had been embodied in the Acts, Archbishop Maximus of Aquileia-Grado (see vol. iv. secs. 267 and 283) showed that the denial of two wills and operations necessarily led to the denial of the difference of the two natures in Christ, and thus to the rejection of the Council of Chalcedon, and proposed to have the heretical writings of Cyrus, Sergius, Pyrrhus, and Paul read aloud, and to set up one or two public accusers against them. Bishop Deusededit of Calaris supported this proposal; and the Synod, in the interest of thoroughness, agreed to it, although it was clear that any one who maintained only one will and one operation violated the doctrine of the Fathers and Synods.<sup>1</sup> With this closed the first session.

In the second, on October 8, 649, Bishop Stephen of Dor (see above, sec. 305), at his own request, was introduced to the Synod, and his memorial addressed to it read. He says herein: "Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus, Sergius and his successors, have put forth false doctrines, and have distracted the Church. On account of the primacy of the Roman Church, Archbishop Sophronius of Jerusalem sent me to Rome, in order to give information respecting the erroneous doctrines of those men, and to obtain their condemnation. On Mount Calvary he bound me to this by a solemn oath, and I have fulfilled this commission immediately and faithfully. To-day I appear for the third time before the apostolic see, in order to pray for the condemnation of those heresies. On this account I have drawn the hatred of the opponents upon me, so that the (imperial) command has gone into all the provinces, to arrest me and to send me in chains (to Constantinople). Yet God protected me and awoke the apostolic bishops, so that they admonished those men (Sergius, etc.), although in vain. God awoke anew Pope Martin, who summoned this Synod for the preservation of the doctrines. I adjure you to bring the work to an end. The holy faith endures no defilement by innovation. If Christ is perfect God and perfect man, He must also have a divine and a human will, otherwise His Godhead and manhood were imperfect, and He would be neither true God nor true man. If we admit two natures, then we must, in consistency, teach also two wills and operations, and whoever denies this assails the Council of Chalcedon. Quite recently the opponents have invented something new, and Paul of Constantinople has persuaded the pious Emperor to publish the Typus, which prohibits the doctrine of the Fathers (of two wills) equally with that of the heretics (of one will). The same people who formerly taught one will now demand that we should not confess one, and declare Christ neither for God nor for man, as they would bring about the denial both of the human and the divine will. In the East, the heresy has carried destruction round it. Bishop Sergius of Joppa, after the departure of the Persians, has uncanonically, by secular power, taken possession of the see of Jerusalem, has ordained other bishops, and these, to maintain themselves, have acceded to the innovation. I acquainted the late Pope Theodore with these things, and was by him named as his representative in Palestine, with the commission to depose the bishops who would not amend. At my request, some of them gave a written declaration that they would adhere to the orthodox faith. I conveyed their documents to Pope Martin, and he confirmed several of them. I and the Orientals repeat now the petition of S. Sophronius, that you will condemn and root out the errors of Apollinaris and Severus, which have been renewed by the men whom I have named, and rejoice the world by a declaration of the genuine faith.”<sup>1</sup>

Thereupon thirty-seven Greek abbots, priests, and monks, who had resided for several years in Rome (probably driven into exile by the Saracens), were, at their request, brought before the Synod. At their head stood John, abbot on matters affecting the whole province; it might criticize the proconsul and appeal to Rome.

A. suffered greatly during the civil wars, especially at the hands of Antony, but recovered rapidly and was immensely wealthy during the first two centuries of our era. Her woolen industries and dyeing establishments (rugs and seamless garments) were famous, as also were her banks (cf. Rev. 1-3).

2. Bithynia. The boundaries of Bithynia (Ac 16 7; I P 1 1) varied much from time to time, but roughly speaking it was separated from Asia on the S. by the Rhyndacus and Sangarius, from Pontus on the E. by the Parthenius. In general mountainous, it has several broad plains and one large river (Sangarius). It still abounds in forests. In the Argonaut myth B. is inhabited by Bebrycians, who were displaced and absorbed by Thynian and Bithynian Thracians at a time unknown to history. The Thracians crossed the Bosphorus gradually and maintained their language and customs in their new home. The name Bithynii, alone used in historical times, is an expansion of Thynii. The Bithynians appear occasionally in early history as an independent, warlike, inhospitable people. In Persian times they were still under native chieftains, whose power grew gradually after the death of Alexander. Nicomedes I subdued all B., founded Nicomedia (264 B.C.), and extended his kingdom. Nicomedes III, the last king bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans 74 B.C.

B. was organized as a Roman province (65 B.C.) by M. Iuncus, governor of Asia, but after the overthrow of Mithridates by Pompey (66 B.C.) Pontus was annexed to B. (Pontus et Bithynia, 62 B.C.). B. was governed in imperial times by a proconsul of pretorian rank. Both B. and Pontus retained their νομό. Besides Priapus, the native god of the Bebrycians, the Bithynians worshiped Zeus on mountain-tops under the name of Papas, the Phrygian Attis, Ares, and the Thracian Bendis.

3. Cappadocia. Cappadocia, an Old Persian word katpa tuka ('land of Tucha') applied by Persians to the country NE. of the Taurus to the Euxine and from Lake Tatta to the Euphrates. The Assyrians called all C. Tabal. The inhabitants were also called Syrians, or White Syrians, as contradistinguished from the darker hued natives of Syria (perhaps a folk etymology). The Cappadocians were Aryans, altho probably there were Semitic settlements in C. The Persians divided C. into two satrapies, which ultimately became kingdoms: Cappadocia ad Taurum and Cappadocia ad Pontum (Pontus). C. became a Roman frontier province in 17 A.D. and was united with Armenia Minor in 72. C. became Christian at an early period (I P 1 1). To the Church it furnished Gregory of Nazianzus and St. Basil. The later capital of the Cappadocian priest kings was at Comana Aurea. It was the seat of the worship of Ma. Six thousand priestesses served in her temple.

4. Cilicia. By Cilicia was usually meant a country in south eastern Asia Minor, bounded on the E. by the Amanus range, on the N. and the W. by the Taurus range (Lycaonia, Isauria); but in earliest times C. (Assyrian, Khilaku from which its name was derived) lay N. of the Taurus range, extending N. to beyond the Halys River (Pteria) and E. to the Euphrates (Melitene). Cilicia proper ('The Plain') was always intensely fertile, populous, and wealthy. It is well-watered by the rivers Sarus, Pyramus, and Cydnus. The coast is marshy. The climate is intensely hot in summer, very malarious, and deadly to travelers. C. is difficult of access by land: on the N. the Cilician gates (a narrow crevasse-like cleft in Taurus 83 m. long) constitute a dangerous, easily defended passage; on the E. are the Syro Cilician gates and the Amanic gates, less difficult than the Cilician gates. The marshes pasture great herds of cattle and sheep. Western C., because mountainous, was called 'Rugged Cilicia' (Τραχεῖα, Τραχειωτική). Its chief river is the Calycadnus, where the Emperor Barbarossa was drowned.

After experiencing many vicissitudes C. became with Lycia, a Roman province, 100 B.C. It was reorganized by Pompey, 66 B.C., after his defeat of Mithridates and the pirates whom he settled at Soli (Pompeiopolis). In 22 B.C. it became an imperial province. Rugged Cilicia was long independent, under native kings, whose residence was at Olba. Under the Seleucid kings many Greeks settled in Tarsus, which became a center of trade and the seat of a school of philosophy. (See Tarsus).

5. Galatia. The Gauls, or Celts, appeared on the Adriatic coast about 300 B.C., and from 280 B.C. distracted the Roman world under Belgius and Brennus. After the repulse of Brennus at Thermopylae-Delphi, remnants of the mutinous army under Lutarius and Leonnorius crossed the Hellespont (278 B.C.) at the invitation of Nicomedes I (278-250 B.C.); helped him to subdue Bithynia, then settled in Lydia, Mysia, and Phrygia, whence they harassed western Asia Minor as far as Syria, which paid them tribute. They were defeated by Antiochus I (281-261 B.C.). They were afterward defeated by Attalus I (about 235 B.C.), who confined them to a part of Phrygia (from Pessinus to Tavium), thenceforth known as Galatia (from Γάλλοι, Γαλάται). They were divided into three tribes: Tolistobogii (in the Pessinus region), Tectosages (in the Ancrya region), Trocmi (in the Tavium region); each tribe was subdivided into four tetrarchies. This pasture region—famous for its Angora goats and cats—suited the Gallic pastoral nomads, who prospered, and, altho defeated, were independent and continued to be troublesome. They became amalgamated with natives, and adopted the Greek language so rapidly—tho still speaking Celtic in the time of Jerome—that the Romans called them Gallo-Greci. In 65 B.C. the tetrarch Deiotarus, Cicero's friend, was aided by Pompey in return for services rendered against Mithridates in suppressing the other eleven tetrarchs; Pompey made Deiotarus king of G. He died about 40 B.C., when Antony made Amyntas King of G., Pisidia, and parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia in 36 B.C. At his death (25 B.C.) G. became a Roman province, with Ancrya as the residence of the pretorian legate. This Provincia Galatia comprised G. proper and included portions of Phrygia, Lycaonia, Isauria, and western Pisidia to the Pamphylian frontier. Further territory was annexed from time to time: the principality of Deiotarus Philadelphus (western Paphlagonia) in 7 B.C., Sebastopolis in 2 B.C., Comana Pontica (Pontus Galaticus) in 35 A.D. All this was the country known by Paul as Galatia. See GALATIANS, EP. TO THE § 4.). The inhabitants still bear traces in their blue eyes and red hair of their Celtic descent.

6. Lycaonia. Lycaonia was situated on a high table land (3,000 ft.) N. of the Taurus range. Its boundaries fluctuated from time to time according to its varying political fortunes, but in general L. was bounded by Cappadocia, Phrygia, Pisidia, Isauria, and Cilicia. The northern part, in which Iconium is situated, is a vast, treeless, waterless (wells reach water at a depth of 20-30 ft.) plain or steppe (frequent mirages); the rivers that flow into this great land-locked basin disappear gradually and completely; the soil contains much salt and in places is semi-barren, but in general suitable for pasturing vast herds of fat-tailed sheep, of which Amyntas, King of Galatia had 300 herds. The Lycaonians were wild, warlike border-men, who maintained their independence in Persian times, but were conquered by the Macedonians. Their ethnical affinities are unknown.

In 35 B.C. Amyntas, King of Galatia, defeated Antipater Derbetes, robber prince of southern L. and annexed his principality to Galatia. After the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.), most of L. passed with the kingdom of Galatia into Roman hands, and along with Galatia proper, parts of Phrygia, and western Pisidia to the Pamphylian frontier, formed the Provincia Galatia.

The chief cities of L. were Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, Laodicea Combusta, Laranda, Parlais. The whole region S. of Iconium abounds in Christian inscriptions and ruins of Christian churches.

7. Lycia. Lycia (Ac 27 f) was bounded by Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and the sea. The country is very mountainous. The views from alpine highlands are the finest in Asia Minor. The mountain valleys are fertile. There is only one broad valley, that of the Xanthus, distinguished for its fertility and its many cities.

The first inhabitants of L., known as Solymi, were famed among the Greeks as builders of Cyclopean walls in Greece; they have left proof of their cunning in sculptures and rock-cut tombs which imitate wood construction. It is uncertain when L. became a Roman province. It espoused the cause of Caesar and was conquered by Brutus. L. was given freedom by Antony, but in 43 A.D. it was again a Roman province, under a legate. In Roman times L. had become thoroughly Hellenized in speech and manners, and her people were very prosperous, as the remains of magnificent theaters and other buildings attest.

8. Lydia. Lydia was named from Lydus, son of the sun-god Attis. In Assyrian the Lydians were called Luddi (660 B.C.). The earliest Greek name was Mæonia. The Greeks assigned two dynasties to L. in mythical times: Attyadæ and Sandonidæ, or Heraclidæ. The Sandonidæ dynasty reigned for about 450 years, and was supplanted by the Mermnadæ in the person of Gyges 687 B.C. Ardys, Gyges' son, was tributary to Assyria. Alyattes (612-563 B.C.) expelled the Cimmerians, destroyed the Phrygian Kingdom, and took the Greek cities of the seaboard, allowing them to retain their native institutions, altho they paid tribute. Alyattes' son Croesus became famous for his wealth (his gifts to Delphi alone aggregated $6,000,000). After ruling 15 years, he was conquered by Cyrus (546 B.C.), who annexed L. to Persia, when Sardis became the western capital of the Persian Empire. The Lydians, who hitherto had been brave and warlike, were made effeminate by the Persians. In 189 B.C. L. was given by the Romans to Eumenes, and at the death of Attalus III of Pergamum (133 B.C.) it was incorporated into the Provincia Asia. The Lydians were natural merchants, devoted themselves to commerce, and became business mediaries between Asia and Greece. The 'Lydian market' was famous and followed every army. They manufactured costly garments, rugs (Gjördiz, Ushak,) dyed woolen stuffs (madder, Turkey red), cast bronze, and were the first to coin money by stamping a rude ingot of electrum, which Croesus replaced by gold and silver. They were musicians, and also kept the first inns. They gradually lost their nationality and adopted the Greek language. They inherited from the Hittites the nature-worship of Cybele; and the sun-god Attis, the son-husband of Cybele, who mutilated himself and was therefore served by eunuch priests. His death by a boar meant that summer was slain by the boar-tusk of winter.

The chief cities of L. were Sardis (the capital and the terminus of the Persian 'Royal Road'), Philadelphia, Thyatira, Magnesia ad Sipylum, Hypæpa. L. was Christianized at an early period as a result of the labors of Paul and his companions.

9. Mysia. Mysia, a country in the northwestern corner of Asia Minor, whose boundaries fluctuated from time to time, but, loosely speaking, it was bounded by Lydia (Mt. Temnus), Phrygia, and Bithynia (Mt. Olympus, 6,000 ft.). It was divided into Troas (probably the first settlement of the Briges, or Phrygians, on Asiatic soil), Phrygia Parva on the Propontis (so named because subject to Phrygia when the Greeks were founding colonies), Æolis (Greek colonists), Teuthrania (Pergamum region), and M. proper, which in Lydian and Persian times was confined to the interior. The appellation Mysia was not applied to all this territory until Pergamenean and Roman times. The Mysians maintained their tribal independence under the Persian kings, altho they were never really an independent nation. Their language was a combination of Phrygian and Lydian. They appear first as allies of Troy. In 133 B.C. M. became a part of the Provincia Asia.

The interior of M. is a table-land, stepped by mountains running E. and W. It was once covered by forests, and had but few cities, but the whole seaboard was dotted with cities colonized by Greeks from Elæa in Æolis to Cyzicus. The most important city of the interior was Pergamum; among those on the coast were Cyzicus, Lampsacus, Abydus, Alexandria Troas, Assos, Adramyttium Myrina, Elæa. The inhabitants of M. were Phrygians, Trojans, Æolian Greeks, and Mysians proper in the interior: the latter were a pastoral folk, who played but a small role in history.

10. Pamphylia. Pamphylia, a name applied originally to the level coastal plain lying between Lycia and Cilicia, S. of the Taurus Mountains (Pisidia). The plain is about 75 m. long by 30 m. wide. At an early period Greek colonies were founded at Olbia (afterward Attalia) and Side, whose sphere of influence was extended inland to Perga, Sillenus, and Aspendus. The Pamphylians were never independent and never made their mark in history; they seem to have been an admixture of aborigines and Greek colonists; their language and institutions also were partly Greek, partly barbarian.

After the defeat of Antiochus III, P. was presented by the Romans to Attalus II, King of Pergamum, who made Attalia (Olbia) the capital of P. It passed, by the will of Attalus III (133 B.C.), to Rome, and at an uncertain date was united with Cilicia into a Roman province. Cicero was governor of Cilicia-Pamphylia-Cyprus. For a short time P. was a part of the kingdom of Amyntas of Galatia (36-25 B.C.). It formed a procuratorial province from 25 to 50 A.D. Both Cilicians and Pamphylians were notorious pirates, whose chief center and slave-market was at Side. These pirates were suppressed by Pompey (67 B.C.) and settled at Soli in Cilician territory. In summer the climate is deadly, giving rise to pernicious fever.

11. Phrygia. The original boundaries of Phrygia were vague, but in prehistoric times it included the whole western interior of Asia Minor, extending through Propontis to the Hellespont (Phrygia Parva). The Greeks considered the Phrygians the primeval people, who spoke the original language of man, while her kings were peers of gods. The Phrygian kingdom supplanted a part of the Hittite Empire (the Hittite road, afterward the 'Royal Road' of the Persians, passed near 'Midas-town'). The western part of P. was annexed to Pergamum in 189 (Phrygia Epictetus). It passed, by the will of Attalus III (133), to Rome, and was incorporated into the province of Asia.

The Phrygians were akin to the Greeks, who thought them akin to the Armenians. They probably came from Europe via the Hellespont to Asia Minor, tho some may have come overland via Armenia-Cappadocia. They were most famous in prehistoric times and made a profound impression on the Greek mind (cf. Midas, Gordius, Marsyas, Olympus, the flute). Their chief deities were Cybele (Matar Kubile, the 'Asiatic Mother,' associated with the nature-worship of procreative power in animals and plants) and her son-husband the sun-god Sabazius-Attis (i.e., Tammuz, the Greek Adonis). His autumnal festivals were sad, accompanied by orgiastic rites and self-mutilations, while in his spring festivals frenzied joy prevailed at the reappearance of the god, expressed by orgiastic dances, and bacchanalian wanderings in forest to the music of the flute. There was no real marriage, only temporary unions. Women gained dowries by prostitution before the deity, without losing caste; therefore descent was reckoned from the mother. P.

was converted to Christianity at an early period (entirely Christian by 300). But their early training in mysticism bore fruits in Montanism, which was strenuously opposed by Abercius, the great Phrygian saint.

12. Pisidia. Pisidia was a district of southern Asia Minor. Its boundaries fluctuated much at different times, especially in the western end. Loosely speaking, it was bounded by Isauria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, and Phrygia. The nationality of the Pisidians (first mentioned by Xenophon) is uncertain. Some regard them as Solymi, but Strabo says that the language of the Pisidians was distinct from that of the Solymi. They were brave, wild, lawless, liberty-loving border-men, who made frequent predatory incursions into neighboring territory. They offered a stubborn resistance to Alexander and continued to be governed by native dynasts, even when nominally a part of a Roman province. Indeed, up to 189 B.C. part of the western end of P. formed a separate principality (capital Cibyra). It belonged nominally to the Seleucids till 189 (the eastern end till 102). Under the Pergamenian kings it was united with Pamphylia. In 36 B.C. Antony made Amyntas king of Galatia, western Pisidia, and parts of Lycania and Pamphylia. At the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.) his kingdom (including western P.) became a Roman province with Ancrya as the residence of a pretorian legate. In 44 A.D. the western end of P. was added to Phrygia as part of Asia and in 72 A.D. to Lycia-Pamphylia.

P. is a rugged, impassable, alpine country, containing the highest peaks of the Taurus range with thrilling scenery, and a salubrious climate on its elevated table-lands. The memory of Paul's visit is still preserved in a village named Baulo, on a lofty plateau above the source of the Cestrus. The name was given to the place probably because Paul rested some time in the invigorating climate of Baulo, with its sublime views. P., strangely enough, had many important wealthy cities: Antioch, Sagalassus (on an elevated plateau at the foot of an overhanging mountain), Cremna (on very top of a lofty, inaccessible crag; streets still clear and distinct), Termessus, Selge.

Educated Pisidians adopted the Greek language, while the peasantry clung to the native tongue and had but a smattering of Greek. P. contains many magnificent ruins and Greek and Latin inscriptions, chiefly of the Roman period.

13. Pontus. Pontus, is not an ethnic but a territorial designation, applied after Alexander to the country lying between the River Halys and Colchis, part of which originally belonged to Cappadocia, while the rest remained independent under native dynasts. The real importance of P. begins with the kings of Persian stock named Mithridates (from 337 B.C. on). Mithridates VI (Eupator), the Great, 121-63, reigned over a kingdom which included most of Asia Minor and extended around the Black Sea to the Cimmerian Bosphorus (Tauric Chersonesus). Defeated by Pompey in 66, he retreated to Tauric Chersonesus, where, besieged by his son Pharnaces, he committed suicide (63 B.C.), which ended the kingdom of P. Nicomedes III of Bithynia bequeathed his kingdom to Rome (74 B.C.), and after the overthrow of Mithridates (66) P. was annexed to Bithynia (62), and the combined province was known as Bithynia et Pontus (a senatorial province in 27 B.C.). The rest of Mithridates' kingdom was given to native dynasts; Deiotarus received the western interior between the Iris and Halys rivers (Pontus Galaticus). Pontus Polemoniacus received its name because it was given by Antony (36 B.C.) to Polemon Eusebes of Laodicea ad Lycum, part of whose kingdom went with his widow Pythodoris (granddaughter of Antony) to Archelaus of Cappadocia (thenceforth known as Pontus Cappadocius). Polemon II ceded the kingdom to Nero 63 A.D., when P. became a separate province, but in 111 A.D. Pliny was consular legate with proconsular power in Bithynia et Pontus.

The people of P. were rude, warlike, barbarous, and known in earliest times by Greeks as 'white Syrians.' Amasia was the capital of Mithridates VI and from 7 B.C. the residence of the Roman governor. Comana Pontica, to distinguish it from Comana Aurea, was a seat of the worship of Ma, and the residence of independent priest-kings (cf. the Amazon myth.)

ASIARCH, ʔ'shi-ʔrk ('Ασιάρχης) 'the chief of Asia,' AV., 'chief officers of Asia' RV (Ac 19 31). There is much uncertainty about the exact nature and function of the Asiarchs. Space precludes discussion of the two main views, with diversity of details: (1) The A. were religio-political officials who presided over the annual assembly of civic deputies, the Commune Asiae, with which was combined a festival in honor of the reigning emperor and games (κοινὴ Ἀσιας). Thus they united ritual and administrative functions. The A. in office would be president of the Diet of Asia. They were identical with the ἀρχιερεῖς Ἀσιας. They were provincial high-priests of the temples of the imperial cult in Asia (So Mommsen. Marquardt, Lightfoot, Ramsay) (2) Brandis (in Pauly-Wissowa RE arts. Asiarches and Archiereus) denies their identity with 'the high-priests of Asia,' and reduces the A. from provincial officials to municipal delegates of individual cities to the provincial assembly. We read of similar dignitaries in other provinces, Bithyniarch, Syriarch, Galatarch, Lyciarch. The term of office was for a year (four years, according to Ramsay). The cost of the festivals was defrayed by the A., and hence only wealthy men were eligible. The dignity was so highly esteemed that it is often mentioned in inscriptions. The multiplication of temples of the cult of Rome and the emperor and the increasing number of these who had a right to the title reduced the A. to mere providers of festivals in honor of the emperor. The function became obsolete in 297 when Diocletian partitioned Asia into seven small provinces. It is significant that Paul had friends among those who, on either of the above views, should at least have been supporters of the imperial cult to which the Lordship of Jesus was an implicit challenge. cf. Mommsen Provinces I p. 344 ff.

ASNAPPER, as-nap'ar. See OSNAPPER.

ASP. See PALESTINE, § 26.

ASPATHA, as-pē'ṭha (ʔאֲפָתָה, 'ʔspāṭhā): One of Haman's ten sons (Est 9 7).

ASRIEL, as'rī-el (ʔאֲסִרְיֵל, 'ʔsrī'ēl): The ancestor of the Manassite clan of Asrielites in Gilead (Nu 26 31; Jos 17 2). The occurrence of the name in the variant genealogical notice in I Ch 7 14 (Ashriel AV) is probably a scribal error. E. E. N.

ASS: The ass was domesticated very early and is mentioned in the earliest literature of the O T as an animal with which the Hebrews were well acquainted and used extensively. The ox and the ass were the two animals that the ordinary Israelite, as a farmer, would be most likely to have (Ex 20 17, etc.). The horse came into use in Israel at a comparatively late period and then only as an animal for riding or for war, not as a work-animal (cf. the figures for the two animals at the Return, Ezr 2 68 f.). The ass, on the other hand, was used both for riding and for work. The O T distinguishes between (1) the ḥāmōr, (so called probably, from its predominantly reddish color) the male animal, the ordinary beast of burden (cf. Gn 42 26 ff., 49 14, etc.), also used for riding, frequently by women (cf. Ex 4 20; Jos 15 18; I S 25 23). (2) The 'āṭhōn, the she-ass, a favorite for riding (Nu 22 21 ff.; II K 4 22); white (or nearly so) she-asses were considered especially valuable (Jg 5 10). (3) The 'ayir or ass's colt i.e., probably a young in distinction from an old, worn-out animal, finds frequent mention (Jg 10 4; Is 30 8, 24; cf. Mk 11 2 and ||; Jn 12 15). The possessor of large herds of asses was a rich man (cf. Gn 12 16, 32 15; Job 1 3, etc.).

The wild ass, pere and 'arōdh, which goes in herds, but also loves solitude (Hos 8 9), untamable, rejoicing in its freedom (Job 39 5), is at home only in the desert (Job 24 5; Jer 22 4). See also PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

ASSASSINS ('murderers' AV): The RV so renders σικάρται, Sicarii (derived from sica, a curved sword, small enough to be carried under the cloak), meaning strictly 'daggersmen.' They were a semi-political party in the troubled period that culminated in the war with Rome and were called 'assassins' from their promptly resorting to murder to accomplish their ends. A band of such men led by the 'Egyptian' into the desert is referred to in Ac 21 38. Jos Ant., XX 8 5; BJ II, 13 3 ff., IV 7 2 ff. etc.

ASSEMBLY: I. In O T: The rendering of a number of original Heb. and Grk. terms of which (5) and (7) below are the most important. (1) mō'ēdh, an 'appointed' meeting (Ps 74 4; La 1 15, 2 6). (2) mōshābh, 'seat' (Ps 107 32). (3) miqrā, convocation (Is 1 13, 4 5). (4) šōdh, 'circle of intimate friends' (Jer 6 11, 15 17). (5) 'ēdhāh, an 'appointed' gathering (the congregation of Israel); in RV only in Pr 5 14. (6) 'ātsereṯh, a 'compulsory' meeting, generally rendered 'solemn assembly' (LV 23 30, etc.). (7) qāhāl, the 'assembly' of Is. as a theocratic unit, frequently used with (5) nearly always rendered 'assembly' in RV (Ex 12 6, 16 3, etc.). A derived word, q'hillāh, is used in Dt 33 4; Neh 5 7.

II. In N T: (1) ἐκκλήσις, the concourse in the theater (Ac 19 32, 41; cf. ver. 39). (2) συναγωγή, 'synagogue,' i. e., church meeting (Ja 2 2). (3) πανήγυρις, a 'whole assembly' (Heb 12 23). E. E. N.

ASSHURIM, a-šhū'rim. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ASSIDÆANS, as-'i-dī'aniz. See PHARISEES, § 3.

ASSIR, as'ar (אֲשִׁיר, 'aššīr), 'captive': 1. The name of two Levites (Ex 6 24=I Ch 6 22 and I Ch 6 23, 37). 2. In I Ch 3 17, AV (a son of Jeconiah). But RV has the more correct reading, 'Jeconiah the captive.' E. E. N.

ASSOS, as'os (Ἀσσός, Ac 20 13 f.): A town situated on a lofty hill on the southern coast of the Troad, 20 m. from Troas. Its ruins are extensive. The docks at Constantinople were constructed from its ancient buildings. The mole is still extant. It is now called Behram-Kalessi. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

ASSYRIA, a-sīr'-i-a: 1. The Name. Assyria is the Gr. form of Heb. אַשּׁוּר, Asshur, which designates in O T, for the most part, the Assyrian land and people, and also the extension of the kingdom as embracing the whole Assyrian Empire. In some later writings, the empires succeeding the Assyrian are referred to by the same name, e.g., the later Babylonian (Lam 5 6) and the Persian (Ezr 6 22), the reason being that Assyria was the original comprehensive type, and therefore a natural representative of a great Asiatic empire.

2. Earliest History. Asshur was first of all the name of the patron god of a community of Babylonian emigrants, who named after him their first permanent settlement, founded on the right bank of the Tigris, north of its junction with the lower Zab. This city remained for a time the principal seat of the new nation and was always the chief frontier station toward the south, the lower Zab being normally the border of Assyria proper. Gradually the colonists moved northward, and passing the upper Zab they established several fortresses between that river, the Tigris itself, and the Zagros chain of mountains to the north.

3. Nineveh and Its Group of Cities. The chief of these walled cities were Calah and Nineveh, which formed the center of the kingdom. This historical process is outlined in Gn 10 10, where Nimrod (cf. ver. 9) represents the eponymous founder (Mic 5 6) of Babylonian and Assyrian civilization and history. 'Out of that land he went forth into Assyria, and built Nineveh and Rehoboth-Ir and Calah and Resen between Nineveh and Calah.' In this list Rehoboth-Ir is Ribit Nina, the modern Mosul, and the site of Resen is unknown. No mention is made of the city of Asshur in the O T, perhaps because it had ceased to have any importance by the time when the Hebrew traditions took shape.

4. National Character. The Assyrians, as contrasted with the Babylonians, were a more hardy, warlike, independent people, with less general intellectual talent and enterprise, but with more political genius than the Babylonian or indeed than any other branch of the Semitic race. Their territory, being almost entirely mountainous or rugged, altho fertile, was not, upon the whole, as productive as the Babylonian. The struggle for existence was made keener by attacks from robber bands of the northern and eastern mountains. Wars on a larger scale with the Gutē and the Kasshites, or Cosseans, of the S. and E., and with many tribes and nations of the N., such as the Kurds, who still control the same region as of old, trained them for systematic military operations and gave these Romans of the East a discipline unprecedented among Oriental peoples.

5. Purity of Race. The Assyrians, in contrast with the Babylonians, represented also the idea of Semitic independence and exclusiveness. Their emigration was made either before or at the time of the subjugation of Babylonia by the Elamites. They successfully resisted the attacks of the Cosseans, who later ruled in Babylon for nearly five centuries.

Head of an Assyrian

Their religion, altho essentially Babylonian, was less adulterated with foreign elements. Their ancestors in N. Babylonia were of that genuine Semitic stock which has left no trace of 'Sumerian' influence either politically or in its oldest literary monuments. Finally, the numerous sculptured representations of Assyrian faces bear an unmistakable Semitic stamp.

6. Periods of History. The history of Assyria may be divided into three periods marked respectively: (1) by dependence upon Babylonia, (2) by a long struggle for supremacy, (3) by the attainment and maintenance of preeminent dominion.

I. PERIOD OF DEPENDENCY. 7. Dependence on Babylonia. The first period may be regarded also as a section of Babylonian history, for not only Assyria but the whole region W. to the Mediterranean was during most of the time under the control of Babylonia. The relations of friendship with the parent country were frequently disturbed, during the centuries between the founding of the colony and the era of the collapse of the old Babylonian world-empire, about 1746 B.C., when Babylonia proper came under the control of the non-Semitic Cosseans. During this period the supreme rulers were not 'kings,' but 'regents of the god Asshur.' Such an appellation implies semi-independence of Babylonia, which was wisely permitted under the regime of Hammurabi and his successors. Complete independence and the assumption of kingship on the part of the rulers begins with Puzur-Ashir I, about 2080 B.C.

II. STRUGGLE FOR SUPREMACY. 8. Rivalry with Babylonia. The second period (c. 1745-745 B.C.) shows Assyria as a rival of Babylonia and an increasingly aggressive power generally. The Cosseans domination in Babylonia gave the Assyrians the opportunity and justification for proclaiming themselves heirs of the old Babylonian dominion, and the great rulers of Assyria speak of themselves frequently as successors of the famous kings of the oldest dynasties of Babylonia. The inheritance naturally included the right first of all to the Mesopotamian territory through which passed the highways of western traffic. This was secured after several centuries of bitter conflict with the growing Aramean settlements E. of the Euphrates. Assyria on the whole became continually stronger and Babylonia continually weaker. Already in the 12th cent. B.C., under the great Tiglath-pileser I, Assyria had, in addition to Mesopotamia, subdued the most formidable nations of the northern and northwestern highlands as far as Cappadocia, and Assyrian armies had overrun Syria as far as the Phœnician coast-line. But these efforts could not be repeated; and it was not till the 10th cent. that they were systematically resumed. Meanwhile the Arameans had founded their great settlements W. of the Euphrates, and Palestine had come largely under the control of the Hebrews, while both Assyria and Babylonia were enfeebled and inactive.

9. First Contact with Israel. It was in consequence of another revival of Assyrian power and aggression that Israel first came in contact with the empire of the Tigris in 854 B.C. The situation created in that year was typical. Shalmaneser III (860-824 B.C.), whose annals are engraved on the famous black obelisk in the British Museum, was now king of Assyria. He was repeating and extending the conquests of his father, the warlike and cruel Assurnasirpal (885-860 B.C.). He was approaching Hamath from the N., and a combination of twelve of the western states was formed against him. The lead was taken by Ben-hadad II, the king of Damascus, by this time the most powerful nation on the Mediterranean coast-land. Damascus was also normally a bitter enemy of northern Israel; but just in that year the peace of Aphek (I K 20 33) had been concluded, and Israel under Ahab is mentioned by Shalmaneser as contributing a strong contingent to the defensive force. Other peoples represented were Ammonites and Arabians from E. of Palestine, and perhaps more remarkable still was a contingent from Que, the Cilician Plain. The battle which ensued was indecisive, but Shalmaneser was interrupted in his march of conquest.

10. Attempts on the West-land. As a result of subsequent campaigns the Assyrians succeeded in breaking the leadership of Damascus in the W., so that in 842 Jehu, the usurping king of Israel, found it to his interest to send gifts to Shalmaneser and thus become an Assyrian vassal. Assyria, however, was overstraining herself, and Damascus had a reprieve from attack for forty years, during which time the Syrians were able to exert their strength, especially under Hazael, against both Israel and Judah. But the Aramean capital was at last taken in 797 by Adad-nirari III (807-783) and never again became the seat of a first-class power. The strength of Assyria, however, became exhausted by strenuous attempts at extension in all directions, and for nearly half a century it had enough to do to maintain its hold even upon Mesopotamia.

III. ASSYRIA SUPREME IN SOUTHWEST ASIA.

11. Reorganization of the Empire. A series of insurrections in several important centers was ended in 745 B.C. by the accession to the throne of the most original and far-seeing of Assyrian rulers, Tiglath-pileser III (q.v.), also known in the Bible by his Babylonian name of Pul (II K 15 19). His policy was to put all troublesome states under direct Assyrian administration, and to hold the tributaries under a rigid system of probation whereby sedition or intrigue with outside peoples was punished with heavy fines and increase of tribute. Such penalties were usually so severe that insurrection was resorted to for relief, and direct annexation was the almost invariable reprisal. Thus the work of empire-building was reduced to a system for the first time in the world's history. His military policy was to keep in check the northern and eastern mountain tribes by occupying their territory, a process which involved terrible and frequent wars; to make Assyrian provinces of the recalcitrant states; to make tributaries of the rest by virtue of his rightful prerogative, since all of them had at one time or another become vassals or wards of Assyria; to bring Babylonia under Assyrian control; and to make Nineveh the capital of the Semitic world.

12. Achievements of Tiglath-pileser III. By 738 B.C. all northern and middle Syria had been made an integral part of the Assyrian realm. In that year Menahem of Israel bought off Tiglath-pileser with an immense sum of money (II K 15 17-20). In 734 the Assyrians returned to Palestine, where the new king Pekah had formed an alliance against the invaders and attempted to coerce Ahaz of Judah into joining the combination (Is ch. 7). Ahaz sought Assyrian protection. Tiglath-pileser, within the next two years, dethroned Pekah and put him to death, made a province of Israel N. of the plain of Jezreel, took the city of Damascus, extorted enormous tributes from the Phœnician seaports, and appointed his own creatures to rule over the Philistine cities (II K 15 29 ff.).

Hoshea, who was placed over the dismembered kingdom of Israel, kept up tribute-paying till the death of the great Assyrian, but he revolted at the instigation of the Egyptian princes of the Delta in 724, the third year of Shalmaneser V. Samaria was at once invaded and was taken at the close of 722. The principal inhabitants were deported to distant provinces of the empire (II K 17). The fall of Samaria coincided with the death of Shalmaneser and the accession of Sargon, the founder of the last and greatest Assyrian dynasty.

13. The Work Done by Sargon. The reign of Sargon (722-705 B.C.) was even more important than that of Tiglath-pileser, since he consolidated and confirmed the work of the latter. During his reign the empire assumed permanent shape and substantive existence. The west was carefully watched, and the way to Egypt prepared and guarded. A rebellion in Ashdod was put down in 711 (cf. Is 20), and Judah, now a recognized vassal state, was warned against intriguing with Egypt and the Philistines. More important was the work accomplished in Babylonia. There the priesthood of Babylon had been favorable to Assyrian intervention under Tiglath-pileser. But a formidable rival had arisen in the south, by the Gulf, where the Chaldean chiefs were asserting their claims against all intruders (see BABYLONIA, § 19). The famous Merodach-baladan (q.v.) had, in fact, made himself king of Babylon, and it was not until the twelfth year of Sargon that he was dislodged. Sargon then made himself regent of the country under the gods of Babylon.

14. Sennacherib. On the death of Sargon and the accession of his son Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) a great revolt was set on foot. It was headed by Hezekiah of Judah in the west with the cooperation of the Philistines and the backing of Egypt. In 701 Sennacherib invaded the country. The allies of Hezekiah were defeated, Judah itself ravaged up to the gates of Jerusalem, and many of its inhabitants carried into exile, while the capital was saved only after a terrible plague had decimated the Assyrian army when about to invade Egypt (II K 18 13-19 37). It is still not quite certain, but seems probable, that Sennacherib made two attempts to take Jerusalem, the first in 701, the second when he was making a campaign against Arabia and Egypt. It was in this second campaign that the plague occurred to which Herodotus (II, 141) was also making allusion under the figure of a plague of mice invading the Assyrian camp.

15. The Acme of Power. Politically this disaster to Assyria was only a minor incident, and Judah remained a vassal of Assyria until the fall of Nineveh. Esarhaddon (681-688), one of the greatest of the Assyrian kings, enlarged the empire by the annexation of Egypt. Assurbanipal (668-626) put down revolt in Egypt, but had to relinquish its sovereignty in or about 645 B.C. A great rebellion in Babylonia, headed by Assurbanipal's brother as viceroy, was put down with terrible severity, and Elam, which had long opposed the Assyrian advances in Babylonia, was finally conquered.

16. Fall of Assyria. This rounded out the achievements of Assyrian empire-building. But the majestic structure soon began to fall apart through internal strain and the assaults of the Scythians of the north; and at last its cornerstone, the mighty fortress of Nineveh, was stormed by the soldiers of the new and virile empire of the Medes. The city was besieged by Cyaxares, with Chaldean assistance, in 614 B.C., and fell by assault in August 612. An Assyrian noble, bearing the historic name of Ashur-uballit escaped and proclaimed himself king of Assyria with Harran as his capital. There he was attacked by Nabopolassar, and with help of the Medes driven out and his new capital sacked. He later appeared as an ally of Necho II when he invaded Asia, but is soon lost in obscurity. In his person the Assyrian Empire ceased.

17. Importance of the Assyrian Monuments. The resurrected monuments of Assyria, abundant and varied as they are, are perhaps of less importance to the student of civilization than the vast and ever-increasing array of Babylonian antiquities. They do, however, supply great defects and gaps in the Babylonian records, partly because the longer-lived nation had little taste for the chronicling of political and military events, and partly because much of the best Assyrian literature consists of transcripts of invaluable Babylonian documents whose originals have not yet been found. On the other hand, the Assyrian inscriptions, and especially the royal annals, are the most valuable material illustrative of the O T which antiquity has yielded up. By means of them we have obtained a reliable framework for Biblical chronology during the most important period of Hebrew history, and the history itself during the same period has been rearranged, readjusted, and made organically intelligible. More important still is the commentary upon O T prophecy which they afford. For example, the records of Assyrian warfare explain and vindicate the most powerful exposure and arraignment of imperialistic aggression ever made, and at the same time help us to understand, better perhaps than any modern instances, the other declaration of prophecy, that vainglorious national ambition and even international strife have a providential mission of chastening and humiliation. Perhaps most important of all is that we are now shown by the Assyrian annals how prophecy itself was conditioned by and shaped in accordance with the successive movements of Assyria upon the western lands, and the complications that resulted therefrom.

18. Art and Religion. The Assyrian people in the arts of architecture and sculpture alone excelled the contemporary Babylonians. Of more importance to us is their religion, not only because it affected the worship of Israel (II K 23 11 f.; cf. 16 11 f.), but also because it stands in such close causal relation with the political and military system of the Assyrians themselves. Just because the empire of the Tigris was a concentrated unit, ever striving to realize itself in action, the cult of Asshur, the patron god of the Assyrians, became more and more emphasized, as contrasted with that of the other gods whom they worshiped in common with the Babylonians, their political and military rivals. It is true that the foundation of their religious system was of Babylonian origin, and certain of the gods, such as the theoretical supreme triad, Anu, Bel, and Ea, Shamash the sun-god, Sin the moon-god, Adad the thunder-god, and Ishtar the deification of the female principle, were retained and honored. But their own deity, Asshur, who was not in the Babylonian pantheon, came to be looked on as the potential possessor of all the moral attributes of the other divinities.

Asshur was also first and foremost a war-god, because war was the most genuine and spontaneous expression of the national religion. Thus it happened that when Assyria passed away as an empire the cult of Asshur was ipso facto extinguished, while Marduk of Babylon survived the political destruction of Semitism under Cyrus and the Persians.

LITERATURE: For the history and civilization: Rogers, History of Babylonia and Assyria, 6th ed. 1915; Olmstead, History of Assyria, 1923, for relations to the Bible: Schrader, Die Keilinschriften und das alte Testament (2d ed. 1883, Engl. tr. by Whitehouse, is referred to as COT; 3d ed., a new work, by Winckler and Zimmern, 1903); McCurdy, History, Prophecy, and the Monuments, 1894-1901 (containing also a connected political history of the ancient Semites); Price The Monuments and the Old Testament, 1900; Pinches, The Old Testament in the Light of the Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1902; Rogers, Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament 1912. For the general subject the best résumés are Murison, Babylonia and Assyria (Bible Class Primers), 1900, and the articles on "Assyria" and "Babylonia" in EB by King; and for the religion, Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 1898. ASTRONOMY AND ASTROLOGY: 1. Scope and Nature. In the current cosmology of Biblical times, the earth is not a part of the starry universe, but a flat surface, on which the heavens rest like an inverted bowl. Astronomy does not therefore include an account of the earth, but only of the heavenly bodies. These were thought to be fixed in the firmament, not absolutely, for they move along certain paths in definite periods (Jos 10 12; Is 38 8), and can be detached thence and fall (Mt 24 29; Rev 9 1). The whole view is not animated by scientific interest and therefore can not be called a theory. It takes cognizance of those facts only which have practical bearings. This is true both of the O T and the N T. Winckler's theory, that the Semitic peoples, including the Hebrews, conceived of the world and human history as constituted upon and ruled by principles resident in the heavenly bodies (see Winckler, Himmel und Wellenbild der Babylonier, 1901; Die Babylonische Welterschöpfung, 1906) finds no support in Biblical data.

2. The Sun and Moon. The sun (shemesh, ἥλιος) is the most splendid of God's works (Ps 19 5-7). Its course is continuous and includes a section under the earth traversed at night (Ec 1 5). It is the source of heat and light for the earth. Its darkening is the sign and expression of great calamities. Hence, 'the sun shall be darkened at midday' may describe the occurrence of an eclipse, always an occasion of superstitious dread among unscientific peoples Is 13 10; Jl 2 10; Am 8 9; Mt 24 29; Mk 13 24; Rev 6 12). The moon (yārēah, poet., lbbānāh, σελήνη) is the substitute of the sun for the night period (Gn 1 16; Ps 121 6, 136 9). Eclipses of the moon may be alluded to in the expression the 'moon turned into blood' (Jl 2 31; Rev 6 12).

3. The Stars. Of the stars (kōkhābhīm, ἀστέρες) as objects of interest in themselves, no account is made. In a small number of allusions, however, it is possible to detect current astronomical notions. The whole of the starry firmament as a body is called 'the host of heaven' (Gn 2 1), altho that phrase does not always convey the same meaning (I K 22 19; II Ch 18 18). Of individual stars, including planets, Venus is mentioned under the name 'Day Star' ('Lucifer, son of the morning' AV, Is 14 12). Saturn appears under the name of Chiun (Am 5 26; AV and ERV, but ARV, 'the shrine'). But the fact that the star is alluded to as an object of worship renders the reference to Saturn quite probable (cf. also Ac 7 43, 'Rephan', (Gr. Ροφραμ, probably Saturn).

4. Constellations. The grouping of the stars into constellations appears in general (Is 13 10), and in the mention of individual constellations as follows: (1) Orion (k'sīl, Am 5 5) which according to the Semitic conception, represents a slow-witted giant chained to the skies; hence the question in Job 38 31, 'Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?' suggesting the impotence of man as compared with the omnipotence of God (cf. also Job 9 9). (2) The Great Bear (āsh, Job 9 9, 38 32, Arcturus AV). In the latter passage the sons of the Bear 'the train' RV) are the three stars in the tail of the constellation. By some, however, this constellation is identified with the Pleiades, which is compared to a hen with her brood. Schiapparelli argues convincingly (Astr. in O T, 1905, p. 54 ff.) for the Hyades. (3) The Pleiades (kīmāh, Job 9 9) is identified by its designation as a compact group. From this view we get the expression in Job 38 31, 'Canst thou bind the cluster ('chain' RVmg.) of the Pleiades?' making the parallelism of the clauses perfect. (4) Mazzaroth (Job 38 32). This seems to be not a constellation (Corona Borealis, Hyades) nor the circle of the zodiac (Job 38 32; AVmg. and RVmg.), with its twelve signs, but the planet Venus or the planets collectively (so II K 23 5, but mg. 'the twelve signs'). (5) The Chambers of the South (hadrē thēmān, Job 9 9), probably some constellation of the Southern hemisphere. (6) The Swift Serpent (nākhāh bārīah, Job 26 13). There is some uncertainty as to whether this phrase designates a constellation. It is certainly the name of a celestial phenomenon, and, if a constellation, it is probably the Dragon located between the Great and the Little Bear. (7) In Job 37 9, though EVV read 'north,' and mg. 'scattering winds,' there is reason to believe that the Hebrew m'zārīm designates the two constellations of the northern skies, the Great and the Little Bear (cf. Schiapparelli, p. 67 ff.).

5. Star of Bethlehem. The Star of Bethlehem (Mt 2 2 ff.) has been sometimes interpreted as a conjunction of planets (Kepler; cf. Munter, Stern d. Weisen, 1827), but was more probably either a comet or a meteor.

6. Symbolic Usage. Metaphorically, a star stands for a guide because stars are so often taken as guides in travel at night, and such expressions as 'sun of righteousness' (Mal 4 2), 'the bright, morning star' (Rev 22 16) are self-explanatory. The apocalyptic use of astronomical facts includes such instances as the 'seven stars' (Rev 1 16 ff.), symbols of the protecting spirit of the Seven Churches; the great star Wormwood (Rev 8 10 ff.), symbol of distress, and the moon subjected to the Church (Rev 12 1) with others less clear.

7. Religious Interest. That astronomy is in the Bible geocentric has already been intimated. It might better be called theocentric. It views the material heavens as the handiwork of God and the instrument of His pleasure in ministering to men. He created them in the beginning (Gn 1 1, 14 f.) in order to be the means of lighting the earth and marking the beginnings and endings of the seasons. They impress the mind by their multitude (Gn 15 5), their brilliancy, their elevation above the earth (Pr 25 3; Jer 31 37; Job 22 12). Poetically, they are conceived as personal beings, declaring the glory of God (Ps 148 3). They sing together for joy and in many other ways praise their Creator (Job 38 7).

8. Star Worship. This is in contrast with the ideas of the other peoples of Biblical lands. These in most cases worshiped the heavenly bodies. The contrast is all the more significant because it is certain that the cosmological and astronomical ideas of the Hebrews are vitally connected with those of Babylonia. The faithful Israelite was taught that the heavenly bodies as creatures could receive no homage from men; but lest he should be too dull to perceive that their creaturehood precluded their being worshiped, he was explicitly forbidden to offer it (Dt 4 19). Violations of this law were severely denounced by the prophets and prophetic writers (Jer 19 13; Ezk 8 16; II K 17 16; cf. also Ac 7 43, quoted from Am 5 26, 'star of the god Rephan').

9. Astrology. Astrology is the art of interpreting the motions of the heavenly bodies as portents of future events. It was practised probably among the majority, if not all, of the nations mentioned in the Bible; but like star-worship it found no favorable soil in Israel. Astrologers are spoken of as altogether outside of Israel. In Is 47 13 Babylon is challenged to save herself from the doom merited by her sin and invited to resort 'to the astrologers' ('dividers of the heavens' RVmg.), the star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators. All these terms appear to be synonymous and, as the words which follow indicate, are different names of men who professed to foretell the future by observing the stars. Jeremiah (10 2) counsels Judah not to be 'dismayed at the signs of the heavens.' Astrologers are named also in Dn 1 20, 2 2 AV, but RV renders more correctly 'enchanters.' The Hebrew word for astrologers (hōbhrē shāmāyīm, 'dividers of the heavens') suggests the method employed, which was the sectioning of the firmament and assigning a particular meaning to each section according to its relation to the object sought to be foreshadowed.

LITERATURE: Schiappatelli, Astron. in OT (1906); M. A. Stern, Die Sternbilder in Hiob 38<sup>1</sup> (in Geiger's Jüdische Zeitschrift III, 258 ff.). A. C. Z.

ASUPPIM, a-sup'im (אֲשׁוּפִים, 'asuppim): In I Ch 26 15, 17, AV, this word occurs as a proper noun, but it is given more correctly in RV as 'storehouse.' E. E. N.

ASYNCRITUS, a-sin'kri-tos (Ἀσύνκριτος): A Christian mentioned in Ro 16 14, to whom Paul sends a salutation, of whom nothing further is known. J. M. T.

ATAD, ē'tad (אֲתָד, hā'atād): 'The [threshing-] floor of Atad' (Gn 50 11 f.). Apart from the statement that it lay 'beyond (i.e., E. of) the Jordan' no information is given of its location. But these words are more likely a later addition, since to go from Egypt to Hebron one has no cause to cross the Jordan. E. E. N.

ATARAH, at'a-ra (אֲתָרָה, 'ātārāh): One of the wives of Jerahmeel, perhaps a clan-name (I Ch 2 26).

ATAROTH, at'a-refh (אֲתָרוֹת, 'ātārōth): 1. A city of Moab, occupied by Gad (Nu 32 3, 34 and Stone of Mesha, line 10). Map II, J 2. 2. A town on the S. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 2, in 16 5 A-Addar). Map III, E 5. 3. A town on the NE. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 7). Site unknown. 4. Atroth-beth-Joab, a locality belonging to the Calebites (I Ch 2 54). 5. Atroth-Shophan, a town of Gad (Nu 32 35). Site unknown.

ATER, ē'tar (אֲתָר, 'atēr): 1. The ancestral head of the 'sons' of Ater of Hezekiah, one of the large families of returned exiles (Ezr 2 16; Neh 7 21 10 17). 2. The ancestor of a family of gate-keepers (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45).

ATHACH, ē'thac (אֲתָח, 'āthākh): A place in S. Judah not yet identified (I S 30 30).

ATHAIAH, a-thē'ya (אֲתָיָה, 'āthāyāh): A Judahite, the son of Uzziah (Neh 11 4).

ATHALIAH, ath'a-lai'a (אֲתָלְיָה, 'āthalyāhū, 'J' is great': 1. A daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Jehoram, King of Judah. She introduced the worship of the Phœnician Baal into Judah. After the death of her son Ahaziah (q.v.) she usurped the throne, securing her position by murdering all the seed-royal except Joash, the infant son of Ahaziah, who was kept hidden in the Temple, under the tutelage of the priests, for six years. Finally Jehoiada, the high priest, taking advantage of the change of the palace guards on a Sabbath, assisted by the guards, proclaimed Joash king and put Athaliah to death (II K 11 1 ff.). 2. A Benjamite who dwelt in Jerusalem (see I Ch 8 26 and cf. ver. 28). 3. The father of Jeshaiiah who went up with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 7). J. A. K.

ATHARIM, ath'a-rim (אֲתָרִים, 'āthārīm): The only occurrence of this word (Nu 21 1) seems to imply that it was a place-name. Its use with the article, 'the way of [the] Atharim,' has led some to think of it as an appellative, e.g., 'the way of the spies,' AV (which rests on a wrong reading), or the 'caravan way' (Dillmann). Both the meaning of the word and the site remain uncertain. E. E. N.

ATHENS (Ἀθῆναι): The capital of Attica, first called Cecropia from Cecrops (autochthonous founder). Theseus (semimythical) united the outlying demes (Panathenæa). The Acropolis was the seat of worship of Athene and of the kings. After Codrus the kings were replaced by archons chosen from the family of Codrus, elected for life (1068-752 B.C.); then the archonship was open to Eupatrids chosen for ten years (752-682 B.C.). Later, there were nine annual archons chosen from the Eupatrids. The chief archon (epōnymos) gave the name to the year; the second (basileus) was chief priest; the third (polemarchos) commanded the forces; the other six were thesmothetæ (legislators). The Areopagus was supreme in religious matters. Draco codified the laws in 621 B.C. and Solon instituted the timocracy in 594; 6,000 judges, chosen by lot, controlled the officials, and a council of 400 aided the archons, whose presidents were called prytanēs. Pisistratus the tyrant (561 B.C.) embellished A., patronized literature and art, built the altar of the Twelve Gods (center of the state), Enneacronos, began the Olympieum, finished the old Hecatompedon and other buildings. Cleisthenes reorganized the tribes in 508 B.C. and introduced ostracism. A. sent twenty ships against Darius in 498 and defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490. Xerxes destroyed A., but was defeated in 480 by Themistocles. As head of the confederacy in 474 under Pericles, A. enjoyed her 'golden age,' when the Parthenon, Propylaea, Erechtheum, and Odeum were built. The liberties of Greece were crushed by Philip of Macedon at Chaeronea in 338 B.C. A. made abject submission to Antipater, regent of Macedonia, in 322 B.C. In 146 B.C. A. was included in the Roman province of Achaëa; in 86 B.C. is was sacked by Sulla. The Roman emperors were lavish in their benefactions to the city because of its glorious past. Under Byzantine rule, till 1204, it sank into insignificance. It belonged to the Latin Empire of the East 1204-1458, when it fell into the hands of the Turks under whose rule it remained until the emancipation of Greece in 1833. A. was the great home of literature, art, and science, and has been the school-mistress of Europe. It became in the Roman Empire the great university center which attracted men like Cicero, Horace, Atticus, Libanius, Philo of Alexandria, Julian 'the Apostate,' Basil, and Gregory of Nazianzus. The edict of Justinian in 529 put an end to its long career of a thousand years as the teacher of philosophy. Paul's work was a comparative failure in A., probably due to (1) the fact that this sojourn was not a deliberate arrangement of his mission program, but a result of his forced departure from Berea (Ac 17:3) and the necessity of awaiting his colleagues (17:15), and (2) A., not being one of the entrepôts of commerce, like Corinth or Ephesus, had not attracted a large Jewish settlement. ATHLAI, ath'la-oi (אַתְלַי, 'athlay): An Israelite who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10:28).

ATONEMENT. See RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 9.

ATROTH-BETH-JOAB, at'reth-beth-jō'ab, ATROTH-SHOPHAN, -shō'fan. See ATAROTH.

ATTAL, at'a-oi (אַטַּל, 'attay): 1. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel (I Ch 2:35-36). 2. A Gadite (I Ch 12:11). 3. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11:20).

ATTALIA, at'a-lai'a (אַטְאֲלִיָּא): A city on the coast of Pamphylia, founded by Attalus II on the site of Gliba (159-138 B.C.); the metropolis of Pamphylia. It was an important seaport. Paul and Barnabas embarked here for Antioch on their return from mission work in S. Galatia (Ac 14:25), but apparently made no long stay in the place.

AUGURY. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

AUGUSTAN BAND (σπειρα Σεβαστή) AUGUSTUS' BAND, AV: According to Schürer, GJV (3d.ed.) I p. 462 the special title of one of the five cohorts of provincial troops stationed in Caesarea (Ac 27:1; cf. Jos Ant. XX, 87; CIL VI, No. 3,508). The Italian Band (Ac 10:1) consisted of native Italian troops (CIL III, Suppl. No. 13,483a). Since the presence of the latter in Syria is not attested before 69 A.D. (Arch. Epig. Mittheilungen XVII, 218), reference in Ac 10:1 may be an anachronism. But see Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem? (1898) p. 260 f.

J. M. T.

AUGUSTUS: 1. The name. The word is cognate with augur and applied to sacred objects and the gods. It was conferred upon Caius Octavius, Jan. 16, 27 B.C. (cf. Lk 2:1). 2. Life. Caius Octavius, the first of the Roman Emperors, commonly called Augustus, was born Sept. 22, 63 B.C. He was renamed Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus when adopted by Caesar (47 B.C.). He was a student in Apollonia when Caesar was killed (44). Altho Caesar's heir his property was refused him by Antony. He defeated Antony (Mutina 43); became consul in 43; and forming a triumvirate (with Antony and Lepidus), defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi (42). In the distribution of provinces A. received Italy, and Antony Asia. He defeated Lepidus (36) and Antony at Actium (31). He was now master of the Roman Empire. He organized a standing army of 25 legions (300,000 men). Altho opposed to wars of conquest, he conquered Spain (27-19), the Parthians (20), and the Germans (16-9). His stepsons (mother Livia) were Tiberius and Drusus. He adopted Tiberius (4 A.D.) and died in 14 A.D., at the age of 76, having reigned 44 years. A. was cautious, mild, just, and forbearing, founded colonies, built roads, enacted laws in the interest of religion and morality. His autobiography is given on the Monumentum Ancyranum. AUL. See AWL.

AVA, ē'va, AVIM, ē'vim, AVITE, ē'vait. See AVVA, etc.

AVEN, ē'ven (אָבֵן, 'āwen), 'trouble,' 'wickedness' and then 'idolatry': 1. An Egyptian city (Ezk 30:17). Since the LXX reads Heliopolis ('city of the Sun,' i.e., On), Ezekiel probably wrote אָבֵן (On, cf. Gn 41:45, 50), which was later changed to Aven because of the idol-worship at On. 2. In Hos 10:5 (cf. ver. 5) high places of Aven' means probably 'high places of idolatry'—tho many take it to refer ironically to Bethel as in ver. 5. 3. Am 1:5, 'Valley of Aven' may indicate some place in Syria not yet identified, or the name of a deity. E. E. N.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

AVITH, ē'vith (אָוִיִּת, 'āvīth): An ancient capital of Edom (Gn 36:35; I Ch 1:46). Site unknown.

AVVA, av'va (אָוּוּ, 'āvūwāh): A city somewhere in the Assyrian Empire whence colonists (Avvites) were imported to Samaria (II K 17:24, 31, called Ivvah [Ivah AV] in II K 18:34, 19:13; Is 37:13). E. E. N.

AVVIM, av'vim, AVVITES, av'voits (אֲוִיִּם, 'aw-wim): 1. An ancient people dispossessed of their territory by the Caphtorim (Dt 2 23). In Jos 13 3 they are counted with the Philistines. 2. The Avvim (i.e., 'the ruins'), a place of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Site unknown.

AWL (אֵל, martsēa', from אָלָה, rātsa', 'to pierce'): A small boring instrument (Ex 21 6; Dt 15 17, aul AV).

AWNING. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

AX, AXE: The rendering in our EV of seven Heb. and one Grk. terms. Of two of these (garzen, Dt 19 5, 20 19; I K 6 7; Is 10 15, and qardōm, Jg 9 48; I S 13 20 f.; Ps 74 6; Jer 46 22) 'ax' is a satisfactory rendering, altho the size and shape and also the material (whether bronze or iron) of the instrument is not certain. It is not likely that by any of the terms a stone implement is meant. Magzērāh (II S, 12 31' but 'saw' in I Ch 20 3) and m'ghērāh (I Ch 20 3, but 'saw' in II S 12 31) both simply indicate a cutting instrument, exactly what is not known. Kashshūl (Ps 74 6) is rendered hatchet in ARV. Herebbh (Ezk 26 9) is usually rendered 'sword.' In Jer 10 3 and Is 44 12 Ma'ātsādh is a cutting instrument, but 'ax' may not be the exact meaning. See also ARTIZAN LIFE, § 6.

AZAL, ē'zal. See AZEL II.

AZALIAH, az'ā-lai'ā (אֲזַלְיָהוּ, 'ātsalyāhū): The father of Shaphan the scribe of Josiah, King of Judah (II K 22 3; II Ch 34 9).

AZANIAH, az'ā-nai'ā (אֲזַנְיָהוּ, 'āzanyāh): The father of Jeshua (Neh 10 9).

AZAREL, az'ā-rel (אֲזָרֵל, 'āzar'el, Azareel, Azrael, AV), 'God helps': 1. One of David's follower (I Ch 12 6). 2. A musician (I Ch 25 18, Uzziel in ver. 4). 3. One of the sons of Jeroham, a prince of the Danites under David (I Ch 27 22). 4. One of the 'sons of Bani' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 41). 5. A priest who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh 11 13, 12 36).

AZARIAH, 'az'ā-rai'ā (אֲזַרְיָהוּ, 'āzaryāhū), 'J' hath helped': 1. King of Judah. See UZZIAH. 2. A son of the Kohathites, an ancestor of the prophet Samuel (I Ch 6 36). 3. A son of Zadok, priest under Solomon (I K 4 2; cf. I Ch 6 9). 4. Son of Nathan, an officer at Solomon's court (I K 4 5). 5. A prophet, son of Oded, who met Asa returning from the defeat of Zerah, the Ethiopian, and exhorted him to persevere in his religious reforms (II Ch 15 1-8). 6. A son of Jehoshaphat, massacred by his brother Jehoram (II Ch 21 2 ff.). 7. The father of Amariah, high priest under Jehoshaphat (I Ch 6 10; Ezr 7 3). 8. A son of Jehoram (II Ch 22 6). But see AHAZIAH. 9. Two captains who assisted Jehoiaada (II Ch 23 1 ff.). 10. A high priest, who withstood Uzziah's attempt to desecrate the altar of incense (II Ch 26 17, 20). 11. An elder of Ephraim, who rebuked Pekah for taking Judean captives in the Syro-Ephraimitish war (II Ch 28 12 ff.). 12. Two Levites, active under Hezekiah (II Ch 29 12). 13. Chief priest under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 10, 13). 14. A son of Hilikiah, and grandfather of Ezra (I Ch 6 13; Ezr 7 1). 15. A Judean leader who opposed Jeremiah's counsels (Jer 43 2). 16. Two persons in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 2 8, 38 f.). 17. A common name among the exiles who returned (Neh 3 23, 7 7, 8 7, 10 2, 12 33). 18. The Hebrew name of Abednego (q.v.) (Dn 1 6). J. A. K.

AZAZ, ē'zaz (אֲזַז, 'āzāz): A Reubenite, the son of Shema (or Shemaiah) I Ch 5 8).

AZAZEL, ā-zē'zel (אֲזַזְעֵל, 'āzāzēl), Scapegoat AV, 'removal' RVmg. (Lv 16 8, 10, 26): A name used in connection with one of the goats selected for the service of the Day of Atonement (Lv 23 26 ff.). It is not, however, the name of the goat, for that was entitled 'unto Azazel' just as the other goat was entitled 'unto Jehovah.' Azazel, must therefore, be the name either of the act of sending the goat away into the wilderness or, preferably, of the person to whom it was sent, possibly a demon in the wilderness.

Apart from this ceremony, however, it is not easy to trace the existence of belief in such a person among the Israelites, altho it was common enough among other peoples (Wellhausen, Reste Arab. Heid., pp. 135-140). In Israel it survived as a shadowy vestige of primitive Semitic demonology and was used to express the thought that sin belongs to a power or principle hostile to J' and its complete purgation must include its being sent back to its source.

A. C. Z.

AZAZIAH, az'ā-zai'ā (אֲזַזְיָהוּ, 'āzazyāhū), 'J' is strong': 1. A musician (I Ch 15 21). 2. The father of Hoshea, prince of Ephraim, in the reign of David (I Ch 27 20). 3. A Levite overseer of the tithes under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13).

AZBUK, az'buk (אֲזַבֻּק, 'azbūq): The father of Nehemiah, ruler of part of Beth-zur, who assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 10).

AZEKAH, ā-zī'ka (אֲזַקָּה, 'āzēqāh): A town in NW. Judah. It is mentioned with Makkedah (Jos 10 10 f.) as a place to which Joshua pursued the Canaanites at the battle of Gibeon. It is also mentioned with Socoh (Jos 15 35; I S 17 1), but these references are not clear enough to identify the site, which remains uncertain. A. was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 9), besieged by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 34 7), and reoccupied by the Jews after the Exile (Neh 11 30). E. E. N.

AZEL, ē'zel (אֲזֵל, 'āzēl): I. A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul (I Ch 8 37 f., 9 43 f.). II. A place near Jerusalem (Zech 14 5; Azal, AV). Perhaps one should read, with Mitchell in ICC 'atslō, 'the side of it'. E. E. N.

AZEM, ē'zem. See EZEM.

AZGAD, az'gad (אֲזַגָּד, 'azgādh), 'Gad is strong' or 'fate is strong': The ancestral head of a large family of postexilic Jews (Ezr 2 12 = Neh 7 17; Ezr 8 12 = Neh 10 15).

AZIEL, ē'zi-el (אֲזִיֵּל, 'āzī'el), 'God is (my) strength': A Levite musician (I Ch 15 20, Jaaziel in ver. 18 and Jeiel in 16 5).

AZIZA, ā-zai'zā (אֲזִיזָא, 'āzīzā), 'strong': One of the 'sons of Zattu' who had taken a strange wife (Ezr 10 27).

AZMAVETH, az-mē'veth (אֲזַמָּוֶת, 'azmāweth), 'death is strong': I. 1. One of David's heroes (II S 23 31; I Ch 11 33). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 38, 9 42). 3. Apparently the father of certain followers of David (I Ch 12 3). It is likely, however, that a place-name is here used genealogically. See II, below. 4. One of David's treasurers (I Ch 27 25). II. The home of a colony of returned exiles (Ezr 2 24; Neh 12 29), called Beth Azmaveth in Neh 7 28. It lay a little N. of Anathoth, Map II, F 1.

E. E. N.

AZMON, az'men (אֶזְמוֹן, 'at-smōn): A town on the S. border of Judah (Nu 34 4 f.; Jos 15 4) called Ezem (Azem AV) in Jos 15 29, 19 3, I Ch 4 29. Site unknown.

AZNOTH-TABOR, az'noth-tē'bōr (אֶזְנוֹת תְּבוֹר, 'aznōth tābhōr), 'ears of Tabor': A place, probably hills, near Mt. Tabor on the border of Naphtali (Jos 19 34).

AZOR, ē'zōr (אֶזֶר, 'Azōr): One of Christ's ancestors; son of Eliakim (Mt 1 13).

AZOTUS, a-zō'tus. See ASHDOD.

AZOTUS, MOUNT (Αἶζωτος): The place where Judas Maccabæus fell (I Macc 9 15). The exact site is unknown.

AZRIEL, az'ri-el (אֶזְרִיאֵל, 'azrī'ēl), 'God is (my) help': 1. A chieftain of the half tribe of Manasseh E.

of Jordan (I Ch 5 24). 2. The official head of the tribe of Naphtali under David (I Ch 27 19). 3. The father of Seraiah (Jer 36 26).

AZRIKAM, az-rai'kam (אֶזְרִיקָם, 'azrīqām): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 23). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). 3. A Levite (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15). 4. An officer of Ahaz (II Ch 28 7).

AZUBAH, a-zū'ba (אֶזְבָּחָה, 'āzūbhāh), 'forsaken': 1. The wife of Caleb (I Ch 2 18 f.). If A. is a place-name, it may indicate that it was once occupied by Calebites and afterward deserted. 2. The mother of King Jehoshaphat (I K 22 42; II Ch 20 31).

E. E. N.

AZUR, e'zur. See AZZUR.

AZZAH, az'za. See GAZA.

AZZAN, az'zan (אֶזְזָן, 'azzān), 'strong': The father of Paltiel, prince of Issachar (Nu 34 26).

AZZUR, az'zūr (אֶזְזִיר, 'azzūr, 'helped': 1. The father of Hananiah, the prophet of Gibeon (Jer 28 1, Azur AV). 2. The father of Jaazaniah, a prince of the people (Ezk 11 1, Azur AV, same as 1[?]). 3. One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 17).

B

BAAL, bē'al or bā'al. I. Significance of the term: The word Ba'al (בַּעַל) occurs many times in the Heb. O T with various meanings. 1. In the primary sense of 'master' or 'owner,' as in Ex 21 28, 34; Jg 19 22; Is 16 8. 2. In the sense of 'husband' as in Ex 21 3; II S 11 26; see esp. Hos. 2 16. 3. To denote the inhabitants or men of a town, as in Jg 9 2 f. 4. To denote one who is skilled in some practise or intimately connected with some particular thing (cf. RVmg. at Gn 37 19). 5. As the name of the Semitic deity Baal (see SEMITIC RELIGION, §10). 6. In compound personal or place-names. In personal names Baal referred to the deity. Such compounds were very common among the Phenicians and Canaanites. In Israelitic personal names compounded with Baal the term was often used as the equivalent of Jehovah—i.e., Jehovah was called Baal. He was the maker, owner, lord. In later times (after the 8th cent.) such compounds were viewed with disfavor. E. g., Ish-baal 'Man of Baal' was the name of one of Saul's sons I (Ch 8 33). In I S 14 49 copyists did not realize that in such a name 'Baal' meant Jehovah but thought it meant the pagan Baal and so substituted the word 'bosheth' ('shame') for it and wrote the name 'Ishbosheth.' Place-names compounded with Baal are ancient and in such 'Baal' stood for the local deity. See Gray, Heb. Proper Names pp. 120-136. II. 1. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 5). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 30 = 9 36). III. A town in the S. of Judah, called Bealoth (Jos 15 24), also Baalath-beer in the list of the cities of Simeon (Jos 19 8), where it seems to be identified with Ramah of the South. Aside from the fact that it was somewhere on the border of Simeon's territory (I Ch 4 33) its site is altogether unknown.

E. E. N.

BAALAH, bē'a-la (בְּעֻלָּה, ba'ālāh): 1. A city on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 9 f.; I Ch 13 6), also called Baale-judah (II S 6 2), Kiriathbaal (Jos 15 60), and Kiriath-jearim (q v). 2. A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 29), also called Balah (Jos 19 3) and Bilhah (I Ch 4 29), and counted as belonging to Simeon. Site unknown. 3. A hill between Ekron and Jabneel (Jos 15 11). For general location see Map III, C 5.

BAALAH, bē'a-la, BAALATH, bē'al-ath: Variant forms of Baal. See BAAL, III.

BAALATH-BEER, bē'al-ath-bī'er. See BAAL, III.

BAAL-BERITH, -bī'rith (בְּרִית בַּעַל, ba'al berith), 'Baal of the covenant': The name of the Canaanite deity of Shechem (Jg 8 33, 9 4), called Eiberith in 9 46. What the 'covenant' referred to in the name was is uncertain. There is no evidence that it was a covenant between the original (Canaanite) inhabitants of Shechem and the Israelites. This Baal had a temple at Shechem, which like most pagan temples, served as the treasury of the community.

E. E. N.

BAALE-JUDAH, bē'al-i-jū'da. See BAALAH, 1.

BAAL-GAD, -gad (בְּעֻל גַּד, ba'al gadh), 'Baal of good fortune': A place in the valley of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7), 'under Mt. Hermon' (13 5). In these passages it marks the N. limit of Israel's conquest of Canaan. Altho often identified with Dan (Banias) its site is uncertain.

BAAL-HAMON, -hē'men (בַּעַל הָמוֹן, ba'al hāmōn): A place mentioned in Song 8 11. The location is unknown.

BAAL-HANAN, -hē'nan (בַּעַל חָנָן, ba'al hānān), 'Baal was gracious': comp the Carthaginian name Hannibal. 1. The seventh king of Edom (Gn 36 38 f. = I Ch 1 40 f.). 2. An official under David (I Ch 27 28).

BAAL-HAZOR, -hē'zōr (בַּעַל חָצוֹר, ba'al hātsōr): A town in Ephraim, where Absalom had a sheep-range (II S 13 23). Probably the hilltop Tell 'Aṣūr. Map III, F 5.

BAAL-HERMON, -hūr'men (בַּעַל הֶרְמוֹן, ba'al hermōn): A town or place near Mt. Hermon (Jg 3 3; I Ch 5 23). Perhaps the same as Baal-Gad (cf. Jos 13 5).

BAALI, bē'al-ai: Used in Hos 2 16 as an appellation of J' in the lower sense of 'owner' or 'master' in contrast to the higher, more personal, sense expressed by 'Tshi' ('my man'). See BAAL, I, 2.

BAALIM, bē'al-im. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 10.

BAALIS, bē'al-is (בַּעַל יִזְרְעֵל, ba'alīs): A king of the Ammonites (Jer 40 14).

BAAL-MEON, -mi-an (בַּעַל מְעֹן, ba'al mē'ōn), 'The Baal of Meon' ('the dwelling?'): A prominent town of Moab (cf. Ezk 25 9), assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 38; I Ch 5 8; Jos 13 17, where it is called Beth-baal-meon). It is called Beth-meon in Jer 48 23 and Beon in Nu 32 3. In the inscription of Mesha (q.v.) it is called Beth-baal-meon and represented as 'built' (cf. Nu 32 38), i.e., 'built up' or 'fortified' by Mesha. Map II, J 1.

E. E. N.

BAAL-PEOR, -pī'er (בַּעַל פְּעוֹר, ba'al pē'ōr), 'The Baal of Peor': The god who was worshiped at the Moabite town, or place, Peor (cf. Nu 23 28). The deity was probably Chemosh, the national deity of the Moabites. During Israel's sojourn in Moabite territory, the Israelites were drawn away by Moabite women to the corrupt worship of the deity (Nu 25 3; Dt 4 3; Ps 106 28; Hos 9 10). See also PEOR.

E. E. N.

BAAL-PERAZIM, -pī-rē'zim (בַּעַל פְּרָצִים, ba'al pērāzīm), 'Baal of (the deeds of) breaking through': The scene of one of David's victories over the Philistines (II S 5 20; I Ch 14 11). The name is significant of the early use by the Israelites of Baal = Jehovah. Is 28 21 refers probably to this event. The site is unknown.

BAAL-SHALISHA, bē'al-shal'i-shē (בַּעַל שָׁלִישָׁה, ba'al shālīshāh): A place in Ephraim (II K 4 42). Map III, E 4. Perhaps identical with Shalisha (q.v.) (I S 9 14).

BAAL-TAMAR, -tē'mār (בַּעַל תְּמָר, ba'al tamar), 'Baal of the palm': A place near Gibeah (Jg 20 33), not yet identified.

BAAL-ZEBUB, -zī'bub. See BEELZEBUB.

BAAL-ZEPHON, -zī'fen (בַּעַל צְפֹן, ba'al tsēphōn): Probably a deity-name giving the name to the town when the deity was worshiped. A place near which the Israelites encamped before crossing the Red Sea (Ex 14 2, 9; Nu 33 7). The site is unknown.

E. E. N.

BAANA, bē'a-nē (בְּנֵינָה, ba'ānā): 1. The name of two of Solomon's officials (I K 4 12, 16). 2. The father of Zadok, one of those who 'built the wall' of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh 3 4).

BAANAH, bē'a-nā (בְּנֵינָה, ba'ānāh): 1. A Netophathite, the father of Heleb (or Heled), one of David's warriors (II S 23 29 = I Ch 11 30). 2. One of the two officers of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who murdered him and were executed by David's order (II S 4 2 ff.). 3. The ancestral head of a family of returned Exiles (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, 10 27).

BAARA, bē'a-rē (בְּעָרָה, ba'ārā): One of the wives of Shaharaim, the Benjaminite (I Ch 8 8).

BAASEIAH, bē'a-sī'ya (בְּעֵשִׂיָּה, ba'āsēyāh): A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 40).

BAASHA, bē'a-shā (בְּעָשָׂה, ba'shā): The third king of Israel, who gained the throne by assassinating Nadab. His reign of 24 years was spent in continual warfare with Asa, who forced him to give up Ramah by forming an alliance with Ben-hadad (I K 15 16 ff., 16 1 ff.; Jer 41 9).

J. A. K.

BABEL, bē'bel (בָּבֶל, bābhel), Bab. bab-il, 'gate of god.' The Hebrew name of Babylon; used in the EVV only in Gn 10 10, 11 9. See BABYLONIA, §§ 2, 25.

L. B. P.

BABYLON, bab'i-lan (בָּבֶל, bābhel): 1. Origin. The city of Babylon, as it preceded the making of the kingdom of Babylonia (see BABYLONIA, § 16), so also long survived its extinction. It undoubtedly owed its rise at some unknown early period to the development of trade with the western oases and along the great western canal (Pallakopas) on which lay the sister city Borsippa, 7 m. to the SW. The native name Babil meant 'gate of God.' The form Babbil (Babel) might also in Babylonian mean 'confusion' (cf. Gn. 11 9); but perhaps both of these words are folk-etymologies. The city lay mainly on the left bank of the Euphrates, as is indicated by the three great mounds along with lesser ruins. It was not until the new empire (see BABYLONIA, § 21) that the opposite settlement on the right bank was built up on a large scale.

2. Influence of Religion. As in all other Babylonian cities it was the religious institutions that chiefly promoted the development of Babylon. In the hands of the priesthood were ample lands held in fee simple or by mortgage, and great properties accruing therefrom as well as from separate loans and investments. The priests also were the teachers of youth and the promoters of learning and research, controlling the schools, workshops, and observatories which were connected with the temples. The temple-buildings themselves were as imposing as the royal palaces and more numerous. Chief among these in Babylon was E-sagila ('the lofty house') sacred to Bel-Merodach (see BABYLONIA, § 16, and SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 15, 24), now lying under the most southerly of the three mounds that occupy the site of the city proper. This, and not the somewhat smaller temple of Nebo in Borsippa, marked by the better-preserved lofty ruin Birs Nimrud, was the original of the 'Tower of Babel' (cf. Gn 11 1-9).

3. The Babylon of Nebuchadrezzar. Babylon owed most of its prosperity and opulence to its two greatest kings. Hammurabi (c. 1955-1913 B. C.; see BABYLONIA, § 16) made it not only the political and business but also the religious center in place of Nippur, and E-sagila became henceforth the pride and inspiration of true Babylonians. As enlarged and beautified by Nebuchadrezzar (605-561) B. C.; (see BABYLONIA, § 21), the city was surrounded by a great wall, which was however much exaggerated in size and length by the Greek writers in circuit, the largest structure of antiquity. This was protected by a broad moat with enclosing walls of its own and pierced by a hundred gates of bronze. A space of 4,000 cubits intervened between it and the ramparts, within which was a moat guarding the inner wall. In the city proper the streets were at right angles to one another, as in our modern towns, and a canal ran through it from N. to S. parallel to the Euphrates. The temple of Merodach, like the other great Babylonian sanctuaries, was of two main parts. There was the temple proper, having a vestibule, a long inner court, and an oracle entered once a year to learn the will of Merodach. Attached to it was a ziggurat or 'high tower,' 600 ft. square at the base, divided into seven stages, for the sun, moon, and five planets. (See TOWER OF BABEL.)

4. Decline of Babylon. Under Cyrus (538-529 B. C.) Babylon was made one of the Persian capitals. It revolted twice against Darius Hystaspis (521 and 514 B. C.) and each time was besieged, taken, and severely punished. Its religion, however, was encouraged by the Persian rulers. Under the Seleucids it was despoiled in favor of Seleucia, which was made their eastern capital. Parthian misgovernment and neglect of agriculture completed its decay, altho its worship and even its written language survived till within a generation of the Christian era. In the N T Babylon is referred to directly only in passages reminiscent of the O T (e.g., Ac 7 43). The other uses of the name are metaphorical, one instance (I P 5 13) referring to the city of Rome, and the others (Rev 14 8, etc.) to the Roman world-power as opposed to Christianity. In N T times and later there was no Christian community in Babylon. After the Parthian régime there was a mere village of Babil; and the town of Hillah, 3 m. to the S., has long been the only center of any permanent settlement. (See R. Koldewey, The Excavations at Babylon [1914.]) J. F. McC.—R. W. R.

BABYLONIA. INTRODUCTORY: 1. Importance of Babylonia. Babylonia is, upon the whole, the most important to the Biblical student of all countries except Palestine. In it is laid the scene of the creation of mankind, of the earliest history of the race, and of the ancestors of Israel. It was also the land where in exile Israel was purified and reformed. It was the source and nursery of ancient wisdom and knowledge, the pioneer of civilization in Western Asia, the proprietor and educator of Syria and Palestine for thousands of years before Israel became a nation. Its literature profoundly influenced the form and even the contents of the early portions of the Bible, and it is one of the main problems of archeology to discover to what extent the religious institutions of Israel were tinctured with Babylonian elements.

I. NAME AND FEATURES: 2. Name. The country known as Babylonia was so called by the Greeks and Romans, who named it from its capital city Babylon (q.v.), the Greek and the Latin form of the native Babil. The Hebrew בָּבֶל, Bābhel, which is an exact equivalent of the latter, is used in the O T for both the city and the country, and therefore the modern versions also use Babylon in both senses. After the city of Babylon had been established and recognized as the capital, the kingship of Babylon implied sovereignty over the whole country as if it were a city-state, so that in an important sense Babylon really stood for Babylonia.

3. Limits of the Country. Babylonia properly embraced all the alluvial land lying between and beside the lower Euphrates and Tigris. This included the territory varying greatly in breadth, stretching from Hit on the Euphrates southeastward to the Persian Gulf. The length of the country thus defined was considerably less in ancient times than it is at present; for the detritus brought down by the great rivers from the Armenian mountains and mingling with the desert sands has long been gaining upon the sea. In the time of the earliest known Babylonian kingdom the seashore was at least 150 m. farther to the NW. than it is at present, and the Euphrates and Tigris flowed into the gulf by separate mouths. (See Map.)

4. Soil and Products. The most striking feature of the soil of Babylonia is the absence of metals and stone of any kind. In ancient times the land, except where the sand predominated close to the seashore, was everywhere very fertile. Its present condition of desolation simply implies a lack of proper care, skill, and industry. The inhabitants in the earliest historic ages drew off the superfluous water into canals and reservoirs, and in the months when the soil was driest it was constantly and systematically irrigated. Its productiveness was enormous, especially in wheat, with other cereals, and dates. A very large variety of herbs also was cultivated in gardens.

5. River and Canal System. The general aspect of the country was determined by this level alluvial soil, intersected by innumerable canals, which in the northern part of the country above Babylon formed a perfect network. South of this system a long waterway, originally a separate branch of the Euphrates, now known as the Shatt-en-Nil, ran a course almost parallel to the main stream. From it were deflected several canals in its downward course. The Tigris from Bagdad southward ran nearly parallel to the Euphrates, till opposite Babylon it began to diverge rapidly and ran an easterly course. At its point of farthest removal, over 100 m. from the Euphrates, it was in its turn relieved of redundant water by a great canal, the Shatt-el-Hai, running nearly due S. across to the lowest stretch of the Euphrates. Lesser watercourses also formed a portion of this third system. (See Map.)

II. DIVISIONS: 6. Divisions Determined by Waterways. These waterways and canals determined the location of the chief settlements which developed into cities or city-states; and the three main systems above indicated gave rise respectively to three well-marked divisions of the whole country into what we may designate North, Central, and South Babylonia.

7. Southern Cities. Nearly all the many important cities of Babylonia were situated between the Euphrates and Tigris. An exception was Ur in South Babylonia, the city of the moon-god, which lay on the right bank of the Euphrates. E. of Ur and close to the old mouth of the Euphrates was Eridu, the most southerly city of all Babylonia. To the NW. of Ur was Erech, the sacred city of Ishtar. E. of Erech was Larsa (the O T Ellasar), and farther to the NE. Lagash, the modern Tello. Still farther N. were Isin, and Adab, the modern Bismaya. There does not seem to have been any general native designation for the territory embraced by these southern cities.

8. Middle Cities. The middle group of ancient cities begins on the S. with Nippur (the modern Nuffar) in the geographical center of old Babylonia. Of the other cities the most important in later times was Babylon. Borsippa, the seat of the prophet-god Nebo, lay 35 m. NW. of Nippur and 7 m. SW. of Babylon, on the right bank of the Euphrates; 15 m. NE. of Babylon, and half-way to the Tigris, was Cutha, the modern Tell-Ibrahim, the seat of Negral, the god of the dead and the underworld. In that same group lay the important cities of Kish and Isin, originally called Nisin. This group of cities from Nippur to Cutha probably represented the very ancient kingdom of Shumer (Shinar).

9. Northern Cities. Proceeding northward we come to the series of numerous canals running across to the Tigris. On the northern border of these was Sippar (the modern ruin Abu-Habba), a very ancient seat of the sun-god, as Larsa was in the south. Near it, and probably to the S., was the still more ancient Agade or Akkad which gave its name to North Babylonia. This designation was preserved to the latest Babylonian times, while the combination 'Shumer and Akkad' seems to have originally designated North and Middle Babylonia, and not the whole of Babylonia as is generally assumed.

III. HISTORY: 10. Region of Earliest Civilization. The development of early Babylonian civilization was necessarily slow, and a great antiquity is to be assigned to its beginnings. But it is probable that in no region of the world can the conditions of the first steps in human culture be so easily inferred. The starting-point must be assumed to have been not the south but the central region of Babylonia. It was riparian and not maritime soil that furnished the occasions of the decisive beginnings of agriculture, and in the most ancient times the rivers could have played no part in the historical lower Babylonia. In those days also the desert had more numerous and larger oases than those which have been known to later times, and the inhabitants of one or more of these, perhaps not far W. of Babylon, became accustomed to observe that vegetables and cereals grew luxuriantly in small areas in the neighborhood of the overflow of the three-branched Euphrates.

11. Progress of Culture. The natural impulse to repeat and multiply the favorable conditions thus noted led by degrees to systematic drainage, irrigation, sowing, and planting. Then fixed settlements were made; private property in land was conceded; fields and gardens were set apart in allotments, making earth-measuring or 'geometry' and mensuration a matter of gradual invention and development. When standards of measurement had been adopted they were transferred to products of the soil and other articles of value, whence arose a system of weights as well as of measures. From the beginning religion played a leading part in tribal and family affairs. In Babylonia it was largely astral and solar, and hence measurement of the sky and its divisions went hand in hand with measurement of the earth, while temple-building employed incessantly all the arts of primitive science. Perhaps most of the first working tools were modified weapons; but vessels of various sorts were readily made from the unsurpassed potter's clay that abounded everywhere; while cement was furnished by the bitumen, still produced in great quantity at Hit. The use of the hand in thus modeling objects of utility led to skilled labor and the making of objects of primitive art. With the growth of agriculture and the increase of town life came exchange and trade, and therewith and thereafter the use of marks or rudimentary writing for record and reference. Such were the essential foundations of Babylonian culture, and, it may be added, the principal elements of the derivative science of Babylonia, which found its way to other peoples and regions in very early days along with many mythological and religious conceptions and traditions.

12. Earliest Type of Culture. To what race the people belonged who chiefly contributed to this momentous development it is very difficult to determine. The written and monumental records for many hundreds of the earliest years point to a mixture of races. The final determining element was Semitic, akin to the Aramean, the Canaanite, and the Arabian. But the cuneiform system of writing, the chief factor in the final stage of cultural evolution, gives much striking evidence in the names and values of its many characters of a non-Semitic origin; and a vast number of inscriptions, especially in the south, which are partly ideographic and partly phonetic, at first sight point the same way. The non-Semitic language, thus indicated, and its speakers and writers, have been designated 'Sumerian.' The term is a misnomer cf. (§§ 8, 9); but the theory as a whole is now universally accepted.

13. Chronology and Early History. The Chronology of the earliest periods has received much new light from lists recently recovered with names of kings from the mythical period to the end of Babylonian rule. These native lists place the earliest legendary dynasties at Kish and Uruk (Erech) and the first historical dynasty at Ur, and give the name of its first ruler as A-an-ni-pad-da who may have lived as early as 4500 B.C., and was certainly not later than 4100 B.C. A small scaraboid bead inscribed with his name has been found at Tell-el-Obeid, four miles from Ur. To his dynasty belonged three other kings, and then followed the dynasty of Awan, and after it the second dynasty of Ur. No less than fifteen Sumerian dynasties in succession, with the names of most of their kings have been made known from these lists, but most of these kings are shadowy personalities awaiting future discovery to make them seem real. Enough is, however, known to make Sumerian civilization even in so early a period no empty boast. This was really a great people coming we know not whence and building in the great valley, cities of no mean size, with many evidences of orderly life. Religion and war were the chief interests of deep concern so far as the meager inscriptions record. Each dynasty had its seat in a city, honored its city god, and fought with other cities for defense or for extension of power. From one of the rulers of Lagash, whose name was Entemena (about 3000 B.C.) there has been preserved a beautiful silver vase, sufficient in itself to prove a high attainment in the arts.

14. Northern and Southern Dynasties. About 2800, however, the Semites of the north attained to power, and for a time eclipsed the splendor of the southern rulers. Inscriptions found in various regions show that Semitic communities to the NE. (cf. § 15) were civilized and in close contact with those in Babylonia. Of the latter Akkad came to the front under Sargon I, who brought under his dominion the whole of Babylonia and the western lands as far as the island of Cyprus. His son, Narām-Sin, inherited his power and ambition. The building up of Sippar (§ 9) was one of his projects, and in view of the extent of his dominions he assumed the title of 'king of the four quarters of the world.' Soon after his death the hegemony returned to Erech, and contemporaneous with this, the fourth dynasty at Erech, great rulers at Lagash, are found not only asserting a wide-spread authority, but promoting architecture, sculpture, and other arts of civilization. Abundant inscriptions attest the energy and resources of this dynasty whose most distinguished member was Gudea about 2600. But the leadership passed at length from these hands to the ancient city of Ur about 2400 B.C. Its rulers, by adding to their own proper title that of 'king of Shumer and Akkad,' showed it to be their purpose to unify the whole of Babylonia. This dynasty was followed (c. 2200) by one whose capital was Isin;

15. Rule of the Elamites. The hegemony of Isin was ere long interrupted by an invasion of the Elamites (c. 2000), which ended in their complete subjugation of Babylonia, Larsa naturally being made their capital. From Gn ch. 14 we learn that these Elamites (under King Chedorlaomer) as rulers of Babylonia continued its rôle of suzerainty over the 'westland.' The expeditions there described had as their object to secure control of the trade route from Damascus to the peninsula of Sinai (cf. vs. 6-7), which in those early days was even more important than it is at present. From the same secondary source we are informed that the sovereignty of Babylon included that of the northeastern country as well ('Goiim, 'nations,' AV, Gn 14 1 = the Bab. Gutē). (For another view, see Tidal).

16. Babylon and Babylonia. The Elamitic yoke was thrown off by Hammurabi, King of Babylon, the 'Amraphael, King of Shinar' (Shumer or Central Babylonia) of Gn 14, (see also AMRAPHEL) who at the same time united all Babylonia under one administration. Babylon, which thenceforth became the undisputed capital of the whole of Babylonia and the leading city of Western Asia, was not by any means a new city at this era, tho its earliest history is as yet obscure. The dynasty to which Hammurabi belonged, altho known as 'the first,' was not native but Amorite, and he was the sixth of the line. He was the real founder of the Babylonian type of nationality, and one of the world's greatest men. His work was epoch-making in religion, civic administration, provincial organization, legislation, irrigation, and national defense. His paternal care extended to hundreds of cities and towns from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean coastland. Among his chief monuments were his temples and palaces, his great canals, his legislative code, and the city of Babylon itself, of which he was the virtual creator, which he made the successor of Nippur as the center of Semitic religion and culture, and whose patron god Merodach was invested with the prerogatives and attributes of Bēl himself and even with his name (cf. Is 46 1). This first dynasty of Babylon lasted till about 1760 B.C. The second dynasty ran till near 1500 B.C. Little is known of it, but it must have been active all over the western country, for the Amarna letters of the next period show that Babylonian influence had permeated the life and thought of Palestine and Syria for hundreds of years before their date (1450-1400 B.C.).

17. The Cossean Dynasty. The rulers of this second dynasty, especially toward the close, had to suffer from incursions of Elamites and Cosseans (or Kassites), the latter of whom succeeded in obtaining control of Babylon about 1700 B.C. Their rule was long and on the whole not very prosperous. Their influence was mainly political. They conformed to the religion of Babylonia, and in their measure they were molded by its civilization. They were not devoid of enterprise and daring, but they lacked culture and resources. Their empire was contracted by other causes also. Assyria was becoming continually stronger, and was barring the way to the west. Mesopotamia became a bone of contention between the two nations, and their rivalry resulted in the loss of the 'westland' altogether. This was also the period of the expansion of Egypt. By 1600, when the Asiatic Hyksos were expelled from that country, no Semitic force was strong enough to keep the Egyptians from successfully invading Palestine and Syria. They were succeeded there by Hittites and Arameans, and finally Assyrians and not Babylonians resumed the empire of the west. Meanwhile the two powers were engaged in frequent warfare with occasional treaties of peace; and both of them cultivated friendship with Egypt in the 16th and 17th centuries while it was a power in Asiatic affairs.

18. Native Rule Resumed. The Cossean intruders were finally expelled by Nebuchadnezzar I, an early member of the 4th dynasty, about 1150 B.C. He made a desperate effort to reclaim Syria, but had to succumb to the superior power of Assyria. Not long after his time Babylon itself was captured by the Assyrians, but not permanently held. Peaceful relations seem to have been maintained for many years thereafter. The next dynasty is called that of the 'Sea-land,' (1038-1017 B.C.) which was probably the result of the first effort of the Chaldeans to assert themselves on a national scale. The 5th, 6th, and 7th dynasties, regarding which little is known, were of short duration. The 7th had at least one Elamitic ruler. After 990 B.C., the native kings were again in power. With the revival of Assyrian aggression on a world-conquering scale Babylonia gradually took an inferior place, but it was not till the era of Tiglath-pileser III that Assyria gained a permanent footing in the mother-country. Early in the reign of Nabonassar (747-735), the first king of the Canon of Ptolemy, the Assyrians occupied Akkad, and in 729 Babylon itself was taken by Tiglath-pileser, who assumed the throne under the name of Pulu (the 'Pul' of II K 15 10).

19. Chaldeans and Assyrians. The chief obstacle to the progress of the Assyrians was presented by the Chaldeans from the shores of the Persian Gulf, who had now begun systematic plans for gaining possession of Babylon (§ 18). Their aims seem not to have been purely ambitious. They wished to maintain a native Babylonian dynasty, while the all-powerful priestly party in Babylon was quite willing to tolerate Assyrian rule for the sake of its protection and better chances of settled government. Merodach-baladan II was the leading spirit of the first great struggle. He was three times in possession of the capital and for two periods actual king. For thirty years he kept intriguing, fighting, or actually reigning in Babylon. It was in 704 that he sent the embassy to Hezekiah of Judah seeking help in organizing a general revolt against Sennacherib (cf. II K 20 12; Is 39 1). He finally disappeared, embarking in his flight for the eastern shore of the Persian Gulf. Native opposition to the Assyrians was still maintained till in 690 Sennacherib captured and destroyed Babylon itself, turning the Euphrates over its site. During these struggles the Elamites rendered faithful and substantial assistance to the Chaldeans.

20. Assyrian Rule and Ruin. Babylon was restored (680 B.C.) by the good Assyrian king, Esarhaddon, who forebore to assume the title of 'King of Babylon' and called himself 'viceregent of Merodach.' Under his régime Babylonia was prosperous and happy. After his early death Asshurbanipal became King of Assyria and his brother viceroy of Babylon. For fifteen years the brothers kept on good terms, and when a combination of Chaldeans, Elamites, and Arameans of the Tigris pasture-lands was made against Assyria, Babylon held aloof. But the viceroy took part in an insurrection which began in 652 and extended through the whole breadth of the empire. The chief cities of North and Central Babylonia were besieged and yielded only to starvation. Babylon was the last to be taken, and the viceroy immolated himself in the flames of his palace (648). During the rest of his life, till 626, Asshurbanipal reigned as 'king' over Babylon. Within the next three years (648-645) Elam also was finally subdued, and Susa captured and destroyed.

21. New Babylonian Empire. Yet, after all, the successor of Asshurbanipal in Babylon was a Chaldean, Nabopolassar (625-605), who threw off the yoke of the hated Assyrian, and founded the new Babylonia. As Assyria declined and shrank in dimensions the Chaldean régime was being constantly strengthened. Nabopolassar allied himself with the rising power of the Medes, and after the fall of Nineveh (612 B.C.) the whole Assyrian Empire W. and S. of the mountains fell to him. His son, Nebuchadnezzar, completed the reduction of Syria and Palestine, which had fallen under the dominion of Egypt, by driving out Pharaoh Necho after the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). He became king upon the death of his father during this campaign. Only the western districts furnished serious trouble to him. Jerusalem rebelled twice and was finally destroyed in 586. Tyre withstood a siege of thirteen years, since the besiegers lacked a competent navy. But Egypt was overrun and for a time, it would seem, occupied by the Babylonians. Throughout the rule of Nebuchadnezzar peace reigned between his empire and Media, which extended itself mainly westward. His career as a ruler was long and successful. While his outlying dominions were generally peaceful and contented, Babylonia itself prospered beyond precedent. Waste lands were reclaimed; irrigation was extended; new settlements were formed; commerce, industry, learning, research, architecture, and above all temple-building were promoted; and the city of Babylon became more than ever the metropolis of Asia.

22. Decline and Fall. The glory of the Chaldean régime was of short duration. Nebuchadnezzar died in 562. His successors were all incompetent. The fourth and last, Nabonidus, a usurper (555) and a religious and antiquarian enthusiast, was distasteful to his own people. Cyrus the Great, in 539 B.C., added the Babylonian to the other empires which he had acquired and consolidated with magical ease and celerity. A midsummer campaign of less than a week ended in the surrender of the capital, after which the whole Semitic world came under Persian control. Babylon henceforth had no higher rank than a province.

23. Continued Importance of Babylonia. But its importance for Biblical history did not thereby cease; rather it set itself in a new relation. It was because Babylonia was a province of Persia that the restoration of Jerusalem and the return of the Babylonian exiles were made possible and the maintenance of the precarious settlements in Palestine secured. Even Persian modes of thought had only a slight influence on the latest canonical writings. Of Judaism Babylonia was the center and focus for over a thousand years. After the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), Babylonia took the place of Palestine as a seat of Jewish schools and the interpretation of the Law. Under the Parthian, the Sassanid, and even the Mohammedan rulers, the Jewish scholars and teachers of Babylon still held a leading place, and it was not till the Mongolians and Turks converted the country into a desert that it ceased to be a nursery of Judaism.

BABYLONISH GARMENT (properly, 'mantle of Shin'ar,' Jos 7 21 mg.): If the text be correct, this is an allusion to the costly embroidered robes of various patterns which are frequently mentioned in the Bab. inscriptions, and to their wide-spread export from the place of manufacture. It is possible however, that instead of 'Shin'ar' we should read se'ar, 'hair.' L. B. P.

BACA, bē'ka, VALLEY OF (בְּקַעַת בָּכָה, 'ēmeq habbākhā', Ps. 84 6, Valley of Weeping RV; 'balsam-trees,' RVmg.): Whether there was a real valley bearing the name Baca is not clear. The context in Ps 84 clearly shows that the phrase is used as emblematic of the hard experiences of life which faithfulness and constancy in devotion to God may transform into sources of joy. For an ingenious explanation of the term as a liturgical note see Peters, The Psalms as Liturgies (1922) p. 341.

BACHRITE, bak'rait. See BECHER.

BACK: Used of God in an anthropomorphic sense (Ex 33 23; Is 38 17). In Ex 3, (ARV) 'back' means 'West,' i.e., the Western part of the desert. See EAST.

BADGER, BADGERS' SKINS. See SEALSKIN.

BAG: The rendering of (1) hārīt (II K 5 23), a bag of skin, here one large enough to hold a talent of silver. A smaller variety is mentioned in Is 3 22 (satchel RV, crisping pin AV); (2) kīs, a bag or purse in which was carried money (Is 46 6; Pr 1 14 [purse] 16 11; Is 46 6), or weights for the balance (Dt 25 13; Mic 6 11); (3) k'li, lit. any sort of receptacle or instrument, used of the shepherd's bag in I S 17 40, 49; (4) ts'ror, from tsārar, 'to bind' (cf. the vb. in II K 12 10), a 'bundle' (Gn 42 35) or bag (Job 14 17; Pr 7 20; Hag 1 6). (5) βαλλάντιον, purse RV (Lk 10 4, 12 33, 22 35), the same as (2), above. The term γλωσσόκομον in Jn 12 6, 13 29 means a small box (RVmg.) rather than a bag. E. E. N.

BAGGAGE: RV for carriages AV (I S 17 22; Is 10 28; Ac 21 15), and for 'stuff' AV and ERV (I S 10 22, 25 13, 30 24). In every case but Ac 21 15 it means the impedimenta of an army.

BAHARUMITE, ba-hē'rum-ait: In I Ch 11 33 we read Azmaveth, the Baharumite, but in the parallel passage (II S 23 31), 'the Barhumite,' the 'h' and 'r' being transposed. The former is probably the correct form. See BAHURIM. G. L. R.

BAHURIM, ba-hū'rim (בְּחֻרִים, baḥūrīm): A place in Benjamin on the way from Jerusalem to the Jordan (II S 3 16, 16 5). B. was the home of Shimei, who cursed David on his flight from Absalom (II S 16 5, 19 18 ff.; I K 2 8). Here also Ahimaaz and Jonathan concealed themselves when acting as David's spies (II S 17 18). Site unknown.

BAJITH. See BAITH.

BAKBAKKAR, bak-bak'ūr (בְּקַבְקָר, baqbaqqar): The head of a Levite family (I Ch 9 15).

BAKBUK, bak'buk (בְּכֻבִּי, baqbūq): The founder of a family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53).

BAKBUKIAH, bak'bū-kai'a (בְּכֻבְיָהוּ, baqbūq-yāh): A name occurring three times in Neh (11 17, 12 9, 25), all the references being perhaps to one individual, a Levite of the 'sons of Asaph.'

BAKE, BAKER, BAKING, BAKEMEATS. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, §§ 2, 11.

BAKING PAN. See PAN.

BALAAM, bē'lām (בְּלֵ'ām, bil'ām): The son of Beor and a magician (enchanter) of Pethor, on the banks of the River Euphrates (Nu 22 5; but according to another reading he was of the b'nē 'ammō [by omission of a final n for b'nē 'ammōn, 'sons of Ammon'], hence an Ammonite). As the narrative stands in Nu 22 3-24 25 [JE] it presents in the character of B. the incongruous, altho not necessarily contradictory qualities of a heathen soothsayer (24 1) and those of a man touched by the spirit of J'. The incongruity is removed when the narrative is analyzed and its separate portions referred to the documents from which they were drawn. But the analysis is not an easy one (cf. Kent, Beginnings of Hebrew History, 233-239; Addis, The Documents of the Hex., I, 175-184); and the story as it stands has a distinct function and spiritual value. It presents the heathen occultist as coming under the power of the spirit of J' and revealing the irresistible nature of this force. Balaam is summoned by Balak, King of Moab, just after the defeat of the Amorites by the hosts of Israel, and bribed to curse the victorious invaders, but is led first by the miracle of the speaking ass, and afterwards directly, to bless them. In four poetically constructed oracles (Nu 23 7-10 [E], 19-24 [E], 24 3-9 [J], 16-24 [J]), he foreshadows the uniqueness of J''s people, their strength, the beauty and fruitfulness of their land, their glorious victories, and finally the great king ('Star') who shall create an empire out of Moab, Edom, Amalek, and Kain. After this B. is for a time lost sight of, and when he reappears, it is as the corrupter of Israel. Through the means of Midianite women he lures many to idolatry and is slain with others for this sin (Nu 31 8, 16 [P]). In the O T, B. stands for the unavailing curse of the heathen enchanter (Dt 23 5; Jos 24 9; Mic 6 5; Neh 13 2); in the N T he is the type of, of the tempter to idolatry, especially that form of it in which lust plays a large part (II P 2 15; Jude ver. 11; Rev 2 14); cf. Gray on Numbers, chs. 22-24, in ICC, (1903). A. C. Z.

BALADIN, bal'a-dan. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

BALAH, bē'la (בְּלָה, bālāh): A town in SW. Palestine (Jos 19 3), Bilhah in I Ch 4 29. Site unknown. Perhaps the same as Baalah (q.v.).

BALAK, bē'lak (בְּלָק, balāq; Balac, Rev. 2 14, AC): King of Moab in Moses' day (Nu 22-23) and famous for his connection with Balaam (q.v.).

BALANCE. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

BALD LOCUST. See PALESTINE, § 26, and LOCUSTS.

BALDNESS: As to location, the O T contrasts baldness of the forehead (gabbathah, only Lv 13 41 ff.) with baldness of the crown (gorhah, or qarahath; cf. the proper names Korah, Kareah). As to origin, baldness was either natural or artificial. The former, which is seldom mentioned, was believed to result from hard labor (Ezk 29 18), as well as disease (Is 3 17, 24), and was perhaps considered a reproach (II K 2 23). Baldness was not itself unclean, but apparently aroused suspicions of some unclean skin-disease (Lv 13 40 ff.).

Artificial baldness, produced by clipping or shaving (cf. Ezk 5 1) is frequently mentioned. The ancient belief that the hair was a seat of the vitality (cf. Jg 16 17) caused the ceremonial shaving of the head to be regarded as a sacrifice to a deity or to the dead; hence this was a sign of mourning forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14 1; Lv 21 5). It seems, however, to have been common in preexilic times (Is 22 12; Am 8 10, etc.; cf. Job 1 20); and baldness is therefore used figuratively for mourning (Jer 48 37; Ezk 7 18, etc.). See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 4. The practise prevalent among neighboring nations of shaving all the head except a circular patch in the middle (Jer 9 26, 25 23) was likewise prohibited (Lv 19 27, 21 5) on account of its connection with heathen worship. At the expiration of the Nazirite's vow, the shaven hair was offered as a sacrifice to J' (Nu 6 18; cf. Ac 18 18, 21 24). See NAZIRITE. Paul says that 'it is a shame to a woman to be shorn or shaven' (I Co 11 6). See HAIR and SHAVING.

BALSAM. See PALESTINE, § 21.

BAMAH, bē'ma (בָּמָה, bāmāh), 'high place': In Ezk 20 29 the word is used with reference to a supposed derivation from bā', 'to come' ('go'), and māh, 'what.' Hence, 'What . . . whereunto go ye?' with evident contempt for it. This allusion to its etymology makes the word a quasi-proper noun as rendered in EVV.

A. C. Z.

BAMOTH, bē'meth (בָּמוֹת, bāmōth), 'high places': A town of Moab, probably the same as Bamoth Baal (Jos 13 17) and the Beth Bamoth of the stone of Mesha (line 27). It was one of the last stations on Israel's march through Moab before the final encampment near Pisgah (Nu 21 19 ff.). The identification, Map II, J 1, is uncertain.

BAND: Often used in O T and N T for divisions of an army (cf. II S 4 2; II K 6 23; Job 1 17; Mt 27 27). See WARFARE, § 4; also BEAUTY AND BANDS.

BANI, bē'nai (בְּנֵי, bānī): 1. One of David's heroes (II S 23 36 = Mibhar, I Ch 11 38). 2. A Merarite (I Ch 6 46). 3. A Judahite, descendant of Pharez (I Ch 9 4). 4. 'Sons of Bani,' a postexilic family (Ezr 2 10, 10 29, 34 ff. = Binnui in Neh 7 15.) 5. Name of one or more Levites (Neh 3 17, 8 7, 9 4, 5, 10 13, 11 22). 6. A term used for one of the divisions of the postexilic community (Neh 10 14); cf. 4.

BAPTISM, BAPTIZE (βάπτισμα, βαπτίζω): The words used to designate the rite characteristic of John the Baptist's ministry (Mk 1 4 and ||s; 11 30 and ||s; Lk 7 29; Ac 1 5, 22, 10 37, 13 24, 18 26, 19 3 ff.), as also the rite imposed from the beginning upon converts to the Early Church's preaching of Jesus Christ).

1. In John's Ministry. The call of the Baptist was not only to moral purification, but to this as leading to an entirely new order of life in the Messianic kingdom which he announced (Mt 3 2 ff.). For Messiah would come only to a righteous Israel, fit and ready for the nearer and more abiding presence of 'the Holy One of Israel' in its midst. As administered by the Baptist, therefore, this rite symbolized repentance in preparation for this coming Divine order (Mt 3 6-12 and ||s; Lk 3 10-17), as forecast by the Prophets (e.g. Zec 12 10-13), and consequently must have been conceived largely on the lines of O T rites of purification (cf. Ez 36 24-28). But it recalls still more the rite of initiating proselytes into Israel (cf. Schürer, HJP, II (2), 319-324; Edersheim, Life of Jesus, I, 272 ff.). In any case it denoted a radical national 'unclean-ness,' such as the religious leaders were loath to admit, at least in their own persons, and so largely held aloof (Lk 7 30, 20 4 ff. and ||s). John's baptism, in fact, was in terms of the prophetic idea of the Salvation of a 'holy remnant' through fiery testing or Judgment (see Is 4 2-4, Mal 3-4, cf. Mt. 3 10-12 ||).

Jesus' acceptance of baptism at John's hands (Mk 1 9-11 ||s) was due to its primarily corporate nature, and to a deep sense of unity with God's people in all its lot. For himself, however, he accepted it simply in its positive aspect, as a symbol of devotion (the primary meaning of 'make holy,' ἁγιάζω, in the Bible, e.g. Jo 17 17, 19) to God's will, as to be fully done in His 'Kingdom.' Thus Jesus 'fulfilled' the rite as an act of 'righteousness' (Mt 3 15, cf. 6 1 f. 21 32), prescribed by God's will (21 25 and ||s) for those who would be ready for His full presence. Only Jesus differed from John as to what this meant chiefly, viz. grace rather than penal judgment (cf. JOHN THE BAPTIST, §§ 3, 6). So too, the anointing 'holy Spirit' which He himself experienced, as the Father's response to his self-devotion in baptism, was of another order and brought another sort of testing, as by fire (Mt 3 11 and ||), in the Temptation.

2. In Jesus' Ministry. The statement in Jo 3 22-26, 4 1 f., that Jesus during his early ministry in Judea administered the rite of baptism, is not contradicted by the Synoptists: but the whole matter turns on the question of a Judean ministry prior to the Synoptic one in Galilee (see JESUS CHRIST, §§ 1, 7, 8).

That it should have been so is probable enough, at least for the early days when his work was being done parallel with John's. The fact, however, that the most receptive of the people of Galilee had already accepted baptism unto the coming Kingdom (Lk 7 29) made almost needless any such rite during Jesus' ministry. Of any baptism of those already baptized by John there is no hint. The call Jesus made was simply for faith in His special Glad Message (Evangel, Mk 1 15).

It is clear, therefore, that any administration of this rite by disciples in the early part of Jesus' ministry would be temporary, and not belong vitally to His own special work. His distinctive Baptism was to be with Messianic 'holy Spirit' (Mk 1 7 f. and ||s)—participation in His experience or 'baptism,' including sacrificial love (Lk 12 49 f., Mk 10 38 f.).

3. In the Ministry of the Early Church. The contrast between the two baptisms, John's 'with water' and Jesus' 'with holy Spirit,' receives final expression in Ac 1 5, and is echoed throughout Ac (11 16, 19 2-4). 'Jesus of Nazareth,' 'the Christ,' whom 'God anointed with holy Spirit and power' (10 38), was the Baptizer with that Spirit—the medium through whom God 'poured forth' (Ac 2 17 f., 33; cf. Jn 7 39) the Spirit-experience which marked or 'sealed' (Eph 1 13 f.) believers as accepted of God for membership of His Spirit-possessed people, the mystic Body of the Christ, or simply 'the Christ' (I Co 12 12 f. cf. 10 2). The Church of Christ, as it appears in the N T, is essentially Spirit-anointed and conscious of a heightened religious experience, a new quality of life, communicated through Jesus; and all this goes back to an initial experience of Spirit-baptism through faith in His Name (II Co 1 21 f.). From the opening of the Apostolic Age, however, the Spirit-baptism of Jesus the Christ (cf. Jn 7 39, 16 7), a sensible experience and one recognizable by outward signs (e.g. rapt utterance, glossolalia, Ac 2 4, 10 46, 19 6), was associated with water-baptism (Ac 2 38) on Jewish lines, those of John the Baptist. How far the Christians had their Master's explicit authority for this is doubtful; many hold the wording of Mt 28 19 f. to be due to Church usage passing into tradition (Mk 16 16 is certainly secondary). In any case Messiah's Spirit-baptism sometimes came before and apart from the outward rite (Ac 10 44 ff., cf. APOLLOS), altho normally the two were conjoined in experience in the definitive act of self-devotion (cf. the mission field to-day, e.g. in India) which constituted the believer 'holy' to God (ἁγίος). Further as Spirit-baptism was the 'seal' of Divine acceptance, it gave also objective assurance of 'the forgiveness of sins' (Ac 2 38, 8 12, 15 f.; Ro 8 15 Gal 4 6; cf. He 10 22). So Ananias bids Paul 'Arise, accept baptism (mid. voice) and wash away thy sins, invoking His Name' (Ac 22 16), i.e. that of 'the Righteous One,' whose Resurrection 'in newness of life,' after death, marked His acceptance as holy 'Son of God' (R 1 4, 6 4, 10). Thus baptism (as burial in the water) became to Paul a visible emblem and actual means of salvation in the Christian's experience.

Having been united by faith with Christ crucified, and so with His death to sin—and to the Law as the 'strength of sin' (I Co 15 56)—the believer was fitly 'buried with Him through baptism into death,' and rose again with Him in conscious 'newness of life' (Ro 6 1-11). This mystic experience of twofold union (by faith, Col 2 12) with Christ in baptism, this 'putting on' of Christ, as 'the new man' or higher humanity (Gal 3 27 f., Eph 4 24), becomes the religious basis and principle of the new moral 'walk' of the Christian 'by (the) Spirit' (Ro 6 2, 4, 11 ff.; Gal 5 18; Eph 4 22-24; Col 2 20-3 11). Thus Paul constantly appeals to the liberating experience of baptism (I Co 6 11), as the great moment when the new 'holy Spirit' energy broke forth as the Christian's true or 'Christ' life (I Co 12 13; Gal 5 25, 2 20; cf. He 6 4 f.). See SANCTIFICATION.

As to the original form of the Baptismal Confession (the NT shows no trace of a baptismal Formula used by the baptizer, whose part is that of a mere minister and witness, cf. 1 Co 1 14-17, 6 11, middle voice), it was at first apparently only 'Jesus is the Messiah' (Ac 2 38, 18 5, 20, 22 16) or 'the Lord' (Ac 8 16, 19 5; Ro 10 9; Eph 5 26; 1 Co 6 11, 12 3; Did. 9 5; cf. even the β gloss in Ac 8 37 'I believe that J. C. is the Son of God'). When exactly the Trinitarian form arose we do not know, the date of Mt 28 19, Did. 7, being uncertain.

The reference to 'baptisms' or 'washings' in He 6 2 (the more general βαπτισμός, cf. 9 10, Mk 7 4, being used, not βάπτισμα) may be to the relative value of Jewish and Christian forms of purification, as regards 'repentance from dead (evil) works and faith towards God,' or cleansing 'from a bad conscience' and 'full assurance of faith' (10 22, cf. 1 P. 3 21). 'Laying on of hands' in He 6 2 probably refers to the baptizer's act, as representing the Church, into which the baptized was seeking incorporation. It can hardly have been a specifically Apostolic act (cf. Ananias' use of it, Ac 9 17), else Paul could not have written as he does in 1 Co 1 14 f.—for such an act (Ac 8 18 f.) was a fortiori open to the misconception he is there excluding. Nor does a high sacramentarian view of the baptismal rite generally, as regards its matter (the water and manual contact) rather than the religious experience normally conditioned by it, seem—in spite of strong assertions from the side of Comparative Religion—to have N T authority.

For the mentality of the original Christian circles (cf. Did. 7 also) was Hebraic, and so was symbolic rather than realistic, in the sense of pagan or 'mystery' religions, in which sacramental elements themselves acquired a fresh Divine potency. The reaction of general 'Hellenistic,' rather than Hebraic, modes of thought upon Christian sacraments was a secondary thing. Some trace of it perhaps appears in 'baptism on behalf of the dead' (1 Co 15 12, i.e. baptism by proxy, for a bodily share in the Parousia), as practised by some in the Corinthian church, on which Paul seizes as simply a telling arg. ad hom. (for other views see Expos. Greek Text., ad loc.).

Infant baptism does not appear in the N T. But the analogy of proselyte baptism, which included all children; the solidarity of children with the parent's religious status in Hebraism; and particularly the parallel between circumcision and baptism as rites of incorporation into the Divine Covenant (Col 2 11)—all make the 'argument from silence' tell for and not against the practise as primitive.

The mode of Christian baptism, like John's, was total or partial immersion when possible, preferably in 'living' (running) water. Yet, as in Jewish lustrations, affusion or sprinkling appears fairly soon as an allowable form, as in Did. vii 3 (a secondary addition) and in early pictorial representations (Studia Bibl. et Eccles., Vol. V, pt. iv).

BAPTIST. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BAR. See HOUSE, § 6 (1).

BAR-: In proper names compounded with Bar-, seven instances of which occur in the N T, this element signifies 'son' (Aramaic ܒܪ, bar = Heb. בן, bēn), e.g., Bar-Jonah, 'son of Jonah' (Mt 16 17).

BARABBAS, bār-ab'ās (Βαραββᾶς): The prisoner released at the instigation of the chief priests by Pilate according to a customary but otherwise unknown act of clemency at Passover (Mk 15 7 f. and || s). He was a notable criminal in Jerusalem imprisoned with accomplices for robbery, sedition, and murder. The name Barabbas ('son of the Father')—probably in the sense of 'Teacher'—is not unknown, there being two rabbis with this surname mentioned in the Talmud. The reading 'Jesus Barabbas' for his full name in Mt 27 16 f., found by Origen in many MSS., and still extant in some cursives and in the Syriac-Syriac and Armenian versions, was rejected by Westcott and Hort, but has been adopted by some recent commentators, and by Moffatt in his New Translation. See Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii, 277 f. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

BARACHEL, bā-rē'kel (בְּרַכֵּל, bārakh'el), 'God blesses': The symbolic name of Elihu's father (Job 32 2, 6).

BARACHIAH, bar''a-kai'-a. See BERECHIAH; and ZACHARIAH, 3.

BARACHIAS, bar''a-kai'ās. See ZACHARIAS.

BARAK, bar'ak (בָּרָק, bārāq), 'lightning': A warrior who shares with Deborah the credit of the victory over Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4 6, 5 12). He was a native of Kedesh-Naphtali, and was later reckoned among the 'judges' of Israel in succession to Othniel and Ehud. In He 11 32 his name occurs among those who achieved great things through faith.

BARBARIAN. See GENTILES.

BARBER: Mentioned in the O T only in Ezk 5 1, showing, however, the existence of professional barbers. 'Temple barbers' are mentioned on Phœnician inscriptions. Compare the frequent references to shaving in the O T (cf. also Is 7 20). See RAZOR.

BAREFOOT: The removal of the sandals was indicative of awe or reverence, of profound emotion, or was a symbolic act. When one was on especially holy ground or felt himself in the immediate presence of Deity, it was incumbent on him to take off his shoes (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 12). The underlying reason for this wide-spread custom is not certainly known (cf. Dillmann on Ex 3 5). The removal of the sandals in experiences of great sorrow and humiliation, or as symbolic of such, is illustrated in the case of David (II S 15 30) and Isaiah (Is 20 2-4). The humiliation of the condition of being unshod is well illustrated in a detail of the peculiar law of levirate marriage (Dt 25 9 f.; cf. Ruth 4 7 f.). See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 7; also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 4.

BARHUMITE, bār-hū'mait. See BAHARUMITE.

BARIAH, bā-rai'a (בָּרְיָה, bārīah): One of the later descendants of David (I Ch 3 22).

BAR-JESUS, bār-jī'zus (Βαρϊησοῦς, 'son of Jesus') A Jewish magician and false prophet in the retinue of Sergius Paulus when the latter was proconsul of Cyprus. For interference with Paul's work B. is represented as stricken with temporary blindness (Ac 13 6-12). In ver. 8 B. is called Elymas, which may be a second, magical name assumed by the same person (but see Dalman, Aram Gr., p. 162), possibly to be connected with the Aram. root מלם, 'strong.' 'Ομάρος (ver. 8) is not necessarily an exact translation of the word, but may be a general description of its meaning. A similar title seems to have been borne by Simon Magus (q.v.) (Ac 8 9 f.). See Ramsay St. P. the Traveller pp. 73-88. For later legends concerning B. see Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apgesch., II, p. 299 f. J. M. T.

BARKOS, bār'kos (בִּרְקָה, barqōs): The ancestor of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 55).

BARLEY. See AGRICULTURE, § § 4 and 5; FOOD § 1; and PALESTINE, § 23.

BARLEY HARVEST. See TIME, § 4.

BARN. See AGRICULTURE, § 7.

BARNABAS, bār'na-bas (Βαρνάβας): The surname given by the Apostles to the Cypriote Levite, Joseph, and taken by the author of Ac (4 46) to mean 'son of exhortation' or 'encouragement' (as παράκλησις clearly means in 13 15, possibly also in 9 31, 15 31, cf. 32, since the verb in Ac regularly = 'exhort,' 'encourage,' e.g. in 11 23 [of Barn], 15 22).

There is some difficulty about the etymology of Βαρνάβας. Deissmann (Bible Studies, pp. 187f., 307-310) considers it the Jewish Grecoized form of Βαρνεβούς, 'son of Nebo' (a God), found in an inscription from N. Syria (in ZNTW, vii, 91f. he cites one from the Euphrates with Βαρναβ(ί)ων). But the Apostles would hardly have chosen such a surname, unless they took it in the sense implied by Ac. In any case, then, -ναβας represents some Aramaic form related to the Semitic word for 'prophet,' which Deissmann admits to be possible. The sense 'son of consolation' seems less likely on every ground, esp. as the surname is referred to before the act which otherwise might seem to explain it is named.

The surname suggests its bearer's character as kindly, sympathetic, optimistic. This is borne out by the story of Ac. Thus he first appears as a notable contributor to the common fund for the needy brethren in the Jerusalem Church (4 36 f.); as sponsor for Saul the ex-persecutor, he shielded him from the natural first suspicions of the Jerusalem Christians (9 26 f.); later on, he took the more hopeful view as to Mark's doing better for the future, altho he had failed his leaders at a crisis (15 37-39: see MARK). But we see both the greatness and the limitations of this 'good-hearted' man (11 24) most clearly in two stages of the rôle he played in Christianity at Antioch. In the one (11 19-26) he was the first sponsor and nursing-father of Gentile Christianity on a large scale, and not as a mere matter of exceptional cases (as in Judea, 11 1-18): in the other, he vacillated in a difficult situation, where only clear, strong grasp of first principles could avail to guide conscience, and where the men he most trusted took different lines (Gal 2 11-13). Here he followed the man of like temperament to himself, Peter, even when his policy, as Paul the man of more reflective insight was able to show, involved inconsistency on religious principles (see GALATIANS, Ep. to).

Barnabas' midway position, between the theory and practise of the primitive Palestinian Church and the distinctive gospel of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, is connected with his personal history and training. Born in the Jewish 'Dispersion,' he was a 'Hellenist' (q.v.), or Jew of largely Greek culture and feeling, more so than the Rabbinically trained Saul the Pharisee, whom yet he may have known, through the Hellenist synagogue (Ac 6 9), in their pre-Christian days in Jerusalem (cf. 9 27). He was rather of the school of the Hellenist Philip, the liberal missionary 'Evangelist'; and so represents with him the great spiritual bridge, the importance of which has only recently been recognized, by which the Gospel passed from Jew to Gentile, altho it required Paul's more radical transcendence (on principle, by antithesis rather than mere sublimation) of Law in religion, permanently to safeguard the Gospel from the recrudescence of Legalism. This we see in the crisis at Antioch of Gal 2 11 ff.

In the light of the above, B.'s career may be briefly traced. His original sphere was Jerusalem, where his relative, Mary the mother of John Mark, his cousin (Col 4 10), had a house that was an important centre of Christian life (Ac 12 12). But we first get an idea of the great place he held in the eyes of the Church there, and its leaders, from the fact that he was sent, as the most authoritative of 'Hellenists,' to deal with the new and startling development at Antioch due to the preaching there of certain Christian Hellenists (see ANTIOCH). Feeling his own inadequacy to deal with the new departure, especially on the intellectual side, he brought Paul from Tarsus, and the two labored in Antioch for a year or more (11 26). Next he and Paul were sent by its church to bear famine relief to 'the brethren in Judea' (27-30).

Ramsay thinks this visit the same as that described, on another side, in Gal 2 1-10; possibly it came shortly after that visit which, as due to a special 'revelation' and private in nature (1 1.), remained unrecorded in Ac (see ACTS, and Expos. Oct. 1899; but also GALATIANS, Ep. to, and PAUL; and cf. Burton, ICC on Galatians ad loc.). On the latter view, Gal. 2 11 ff., may have followed soon after the relief visit—a very natural sequence, also making B.'s vacillation easier to understand than if it followed the missionary journey with Paul next to be named.

Thereafter, as foremost 'prophets and teachers' in Antioch, they were set apart, by Divine monition, to the first deliberate mission of which we have record (13 1-3); and in this connection are referred to by Ac as 'apostles' or divinely called missionaries (see APOSTLE). In the struggle for Gentile liberty from the Mosaic Law, after this mission, B. stood staunchly by Paul both in Antioch and Jerusalem (Ac 15, see PAUL, §§ 10 f.); and altho they differed as to Mark's fitness to share in their further mission work and so went their several ways—B. to Cyprus and Paul to Asia Minor—P.'s later references to B. and Mark suggest that no bad feeling was left on either side. In 1 Co 9 6 he asks 'Have I only, and B., no right to forbear working?' instead of receiving the maintenance due to an 'apostle.' In Col 4 10 he describes Mark as 'cousin of B.' (as if that were a commendation, and perhaps as if B. were still at work), and as one whom he had already bidden his own friends to welcome, if he came their way.

To sum up. B. was above all a man of heart, like Peter, if less impulsive and less dynamic; full of human sympathy and such insight as goes with it; and so capable of inspiring admiring love, such as the author of Ac clearly bears him. But neither in ability of reflective grasp on principle nor in power of uttering himself in speech (Ac 14 12) could he compare with his great colleague Paul. The two illustrate finely the latter's principle, 'now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit.'

The place filled by B. in the Apostolic circle caused him to be credited (by Tertullian and others in the Western Church) with the authorship of the anonymous 'Epistle to Hebrews' (q.v.); with the Alexandrine Epistle of Barnabas (Codex Sinaiticus); and even with a latish Gospel (referred to in the Decretum Gelasii, late 5th cent.), traces of which may survive in the post-Islamic Gospel of Barnabas, now extant in Italian and Spanish versions (ed. L. Ragg, Oxford). To the same cause are due the Acts of Barnabas and fictitious references to him in the Pseudo-Clementine story, both originating about the 3d cent.

BARREL: The AV rendering of badh in I K 17 12-16, 18 33 ('jar' RV). In the latter passage a large earthen water-jar is meant. In the former, the kadh may have been of earthenware, or, as is common among Palestinian peasants to-day, made of a mixture of clay, dung, and straw, perhaps divided into two compartments. See plate of POTTERY, fig. 1.

BARREN. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

E. E. N.

BARSABBAS, bār'sab-bas (Βαρσαββας, Barsabas AV): 1. Joseph. Surnamed Justus, nominated with Matthias as the successor of Judas (Ac 1 23). In the postapostolic literature he is reckoned among the 'Seventy' (Chron. Pasch., ed. Bonn, I, 400), and several apocryphal tales concerning him are extant (cf. Eus. HE, III, 39, 9; Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apostelgesch., I, pp. 108, 116). J. M. T.

2. Judas (Ac 15 22, 27, 32). A leading prophet of the Jerusalem Church, who accompanied Silas with the decree of the Council to Antioch, and afterward returned to Jerusalem. Nothing more is known of him. Barsabbas being a patronymic, he may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas (Ac 1 23).

R. A. F.

BARTHOLOMEW, bār-thel'o-miū (Βαρθολομαίος, 'son of Talmai'): One of the twelve Apostles and mentioned in all four of the lists (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13). Concerning B. there is no trustworthy tradition. For his supposed identification with Nathanael see NATHANAEAL. J. M. T.

BARTIMÆUS, būr'ti-mi'us (Βαρτιμαίος, 'son of Timæus,' perhaps equivalent to Aram, bartimi, 'son of Timi'): A blind man restored to sight by Jesus near Jericho (Mk 10 46-52 and || s). In Mt and Lk no name appears. It is possible that the name was inserted in Mk for the sake of vividness (cf. JAIRUS). J. M. T.

BARUCH, bē'ruk (בְּרֻךְ, bārūkh), 'blessed': 1. Son of Neriah, said by Josephus (Ant. X, 9 1) to have come of a very illustrious family, one of Jeremiah's associates, mentioned as his trusted friend (Jer 32 12), and earlier as his secretary and agent (Jer 36 4, cf. the dates of chs. 32 and 36). Jeremiah dictated his oracles to B., who read them to the people. These prophecies roused the wrath of Jehoiakim, who commanded the arrest of B., and also burned the roll written by him. B., however, rewrote the oracles. After the murder of Gedaliah, he was accused by the leaders of unduly influencing Jeremiah to dissuade the people from leaving Judea (Jer 43 3). Together with Jeremiah he was taken into Egypt. Here all authentic records about him cease. According to one tradition, he died in Egypt at the same time with Jeremiah. According to another, he survived the prophet and went to Babylon, where he died twelve years after the fall of Jerusalem (574 B.C.). 2. The son of Zabbai (Zaccai RVmg.) who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 20). 3. One of those who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh 10 6); possibly the same as 2. 4. The son of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez (Neh 11 5). A. C. Z.

BARUCH, BOOKS OF: I. The Apocryphon:
1. Contents. The Greek Book of Baruch is based upon the tradition which represents Baruch the son of Neriah as spending the last portion of his life in Babylon (see BARUCH 1). The book purports to be a treatise addressed by him to the exiles and consists of an introduction and three sections. In the first section (1 15-3 8) the exiled Israelites are furnished with a form of confession of sin to which is appended a prayer for the return of the divine good pleasure toward them. In the second section (3 9-4 7) the praises of Wisdom are sung in words that recall the panegyrics of Job chs. 28 and 38, and the Book of Proverbs. In the third section (4 8-5 9) words of encouragement and comfort are addressed to the exiles similar to the expressions of the Deutero-Isaiah.

2. Dates of Its Parts. These three sections bear the marks of different ages and environments. (1) The form of confession of sin (1 15-3 8) is of the same class as Ezr 9 8-15 and Dn 9 3-19; but while it is evidently of later origin than the former, it is earlier than the Daniel passage. It was therefore produced probably about 300 B.C. (2) The section which eulogizes Wisdom (3 9-4 7) betrays the effect of a long-standing contact with the Gentile world, and can best be accounted for upon the view that it originated in the first half of the 1st cent. A.D.

(3) The last section (4 8-5 9) must be, from its dependence on the Psalter of Solomon, dated at the earliest after the fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) and may be a product of the last years of the 1st cent. The introduction (cf. 1 1-15) is a redactorial addition embodying the tradition of Baruch's activity in Babylon and therefore the latest of all the parts of the book.

3. Original Languages. These differences of setting correspond with a marked difference in language as between the first and the last two sections. The last two are purer and more choice in particular words and expressions, thus pointing to the conclusion that they were originally composed in Greek. As to the original language of the first section, the evidence is not so clear, but the probability is that it was composed in Hebrew.

4. Ascription to Baruch. As far as the ascription to Baruch is concerned, his known intimacy with Jeremiah and his concern in the events attendant on the deportation to Babylon are sufficient to account for the use of his name. The book has been known continuously from its first appearance and early secured a place among the Apocrypha of the O.T.

II. The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch: 1. Contents. This is an apocryphon discovered and published in a Latin translation in 1866, and later in a more primitive Syriac text in 1871. Its contents consist of a purely apocalyptic section (from which the whole takes its name), and a letter purporting to be written by Baruch to the nine and a half tribes of Israel deported into Assyria at the time of the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.). The first of these parts consists of a series of seven sections of which the first gives a sketch of the circumstances in which Baruch saw his visions. It was at the time of the fall of Jerusalem into the hands of the Chaldeans. Jeremiah, by Divine command, went to Babylon with the captives, while Baruch stayed amid the ruins of Jerusalem. What he saw in the visions there together with the conversations which he held with heavenly personages are narrated in detail in the next six chapters. The sum and substance of these is that while Israel may suffer for a time, the Messiah will soon appear, and bring to naught the counsels of his enemies. The letter to the nine and a half tribes is designed to encourage and strengthen the people in the time of their distress. It represents their condition as fully known to God, and their sufferings intended for their own good.

2. The Author, Date, and Original Language. The author of the book was evidently a Jew, and wrote some time between the middle of the first Christian century and before the opening of the second, or approximately about the year 100. The original language of the document was probably Hebrew. Its relations to 4th Ezra (II Esdras) have roused the keenest interest. Both books seem to issue from the same conditions, are designed to meet the same need, and contain the same type of thought. They have been called the 'twin Apocalypses.' The Syriac text of the book may be found in Ceriani's Monumenta Sacra, V, 2 (1871). An English translation with introduction and notes was published by Charles (The Apocalypse of Baruch, 1896), a German translation by Rothstein in Kautzsch's Pseudepigrapha (1900) and an English translation in Charles' Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O T (1913); here the book is called 2d Baruch.

III. The Greek Apocalypse of Baruch: 1. The Discovery of the Book. A book containing a report of a visit by Baruch to the seven heavens was mentioned by Origen in his treatise De Principiis, but nothing further was known of it until it was discovered in 1896 by Rev. E. Cuthbert Butler in a Greek MS. in the British Museum (subsequently published by Prof. M. R. James in the Cambridge Texts and Studies, Vol. V, 1897, No. 1, pp. 84-94). Almost at the same time a Slavonic translation of the production in an abridged form was made known by Bonwetsch. These two versions are related to each other as the longer and shorter recensions of the same writing. Neither one, however, is probably the full text of the Apocalypse known to and mentioned by Origen. In that work Baruch is reported to have described seven heavens, whereas in the Greek Apocalypse he is represented as visiting five, and in the Slavonic only two.

2. Criticism. The relation of the work to the Syriac Baruch is probably explained by referring to 76 3 f. of that work. Here God promises to give Baruch after the lapse of 40 days a further revelation regarding the world of material elements, including the cycle of the earth, the summits of the mountains, the depths of the valleys and of the seas, and the number of the rivers. The fulfilment of this promise is not recorded in what follows, and the Greek Apocalypse was composed to show that it was fulfilled and how it was fulfilled. A German translation of the work is given in Kautzsch's Pseudepigrapha (1900) and an English translation in Charles' Apoc. and Pseudepigrapha of the O T (1913), where it appears as 3d Baruch. The Greek text is to be found in James's edition above alluded to.

Besides the above Charles (Op. cit.) names 5 other works attributed to Baruch. A. C. Z.

BARZILLAI, bār-zil'-a-i (בָּרְזַיִל, barzillay): 1. An aged and wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim who substantially befriended David when he fled from Absalom (II S 17 27). As he was returning to Jerusalem, David invited B. to spend the rest of his days with him at the capital, but B. refused, asking, however, favors for his servant (or sons? II S 19 31-39; cf. I K 2 7). 2. The father of Adiel (II S 21 8). 3. The ancestor of a family of priests who married a daughter of 1 (supra), but whose descendants could not prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 61; Neh 7 63).

BASE. See TEMPLE, § 15.

BASEMATH, bas'-i-math (בַּסְמַת, bas'math, Bashemath AV): 1. One of the wives of Esau, daughter of Elon the Hittite (Gn 26 34), but in 36 3 the daughter of Ishmael (cf. 28 9, where Mahalath may = Basemath). 2. A daughter of Solomon (I K 4 15, Basmath AV).

BASHAN, bē'-shan, (בָּשָׁן, bāshān), in Heb. usually with the definite article prefixed: The broad, rolling, fertile region E. of the Lake of Gennesaret, extending, roughly, from Gilead on the S. to Hermon on the N. Map I, GH 4, 5. To-day it is one of the granaries of Palestine. In ancient times the region was celebrated for its oaks (Is 2 13; Zec 11 2; Ezk 27 6) and fine cattle (cf. Ps 22 12; Am 4 1). Its general altitude is about 2,000 feet above sea-level. In the NE. portion there is a peculiar, pear-shaped region, known to the Arabs as the Leja, which is literally a 'petrified ocean' of basaltic lava. This district is not improbably identified with 'the region of Argob', which the Israelites wrested from Og, together with its 'threescore cities' all fortified with high walls, gates, and bars (Nu 21 33 ff.; Dt 3 4 f.). This whole region was assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Dt 3 13, 4 43; Jos 13 29 f.). Edrei, Asharoth, Golan, and Salecah were its chief cities (Dt 1 4, 3 1, 10, 4 43). Solomon taxed Bashan (I K 4 13). Hazael put an end to the Heb. supremacy over it (II K 10 33). Tiglath-pileser seems to have carried its inhabitants into captivity (II K 15 29). Under Trajan (106 A.D.) it was incorporated into the province of Arabia. To-day it is inhabited by a fierce, warlike sect, the Druses. G. L. R.

BASHAN-HAVVOTH-JAIR, -hē''veth-jē'ir. See HAVVOTH-JAIR.

BASILISK. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BASIN (or BASON) and BOWL are the English renderings of eight Hebrew words. According to modern usage a bowl is deeper or rounder than a basin and is used chiefly for food or drink; but it is difficult to preserve this distinction in naming ancient vessels whose size and shape are largely a matter of conjecture.

Basins are mentioned in connection with the sacrificial ritual at Sinai (Ex 24 6, E). According to P basins were used in the Passover ritual in Egypt (Ex 12 22) and among the furniture of the Tent were bowls of gold (Ex 37 16) and basins of 'brass' (Ex 38 3). Solomon's Temple contained basins of gold (I K 7 50), 'brass' (I K 7 45), and silver (I Ch 28 17), which were carried away by the Chaldeans (II K 25 14 f.; Jer 52 18 f.), but returned by Cyrus (Ezr 1 7 ff.). For basins as offerings see Nu 7 passim (P); Neh 7 70 (cf. Ezr 8 27).

Bowls for wine (Jer 35 5, 'pots' AV; Am 6 6) or ordinary household use (Jg 5 25, 'dish' EV, 6 33; II S 17 28) were doubtless common. Among bowl-shaped objects were the reservoirs of lamps (Zec 4 2 f.; cf. Ec 12 6), the rounded capitals of pillars (I K 7 41 = II Ch 4 12), and the 'cups' of the golden candlestick (Ex 25 31).

The κράτης used by Jesus (Jn 13 5) was probably a large foot-basin, provided for the purpose. φιάλη (AV 'vial') is correctly rendered 'bowl' by ARV in Rev (5 8, etc.). See also CUP; LAVER; and TEMPLE, § 18, and plate, HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, I. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

BASKET: The uses of the various 'baskets' of the O T are more evident than their form and material. The dūdāh, used for figs (Jer 24 2), as well as clay or bricks (Ps 81 6), was probably a large, shallow basket, such as was used by masons in ancient Egypt. The sal or 'plaited' basket used for carrying bread (Gn 40 16; Ex 29 3) or meat (Jg 6 19) was apparently smaller, and dish-shaped. The same name is used in modern Palestine for a large, soft basket, used for transporting articles of all sorts on the head. The tene was large and deep, shaped like an inverted cone (cf. LXX. κάρταλλος), and is mentioned only in connection with products of the soil (Dt 26 2, 28 5). The k'ūbh (Am 8 1) seems to have been a coarsely woven cage-like receptacle with a lid.

The N T κέρυκος (Mk 6 43, 8 19 and ||s) was a stout wicker hand-basket, often carried by the Jews when traveling, in order to avoid buying food from Gentiles. Apparently each of the Twelve (cf. Mt 14 20) disciples had one. The σπυρίς (Mk 8 8, 20 and ||s) was a larger flexible provision-basket of plaited ropes or reeds. The basket in which Paul was let down was probably a large rope hamper. It is called both a σπυρίς (Ac 9 25) and a σαργάνη (II Co 11 33), the latter word denoting especially the 'plaited' structure. See plate, HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, II. Figs. 2, 3, 4, 6. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

BASTARD. This word occurs three times in EV, once in N T (He 12 8, the perfectly correct rendering of the Greek νόθος), and twice in O T as the translation of mamzer (Dt 23 2; Zech 9 6) a word of uncertain derivation. It denotes (probably) one born of a 'mixed' marriage (within prohibited degrees, or between an Israelite and an alien) rather than one born out of wedlock as (the Eng. 'bastard' signifies).

BAT. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BATH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

BATH-: The element Bath- in compound proper names means daughter. It occurs in only two or three instances in the O T.

BATH, BATHING. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3; and PURIFICATION, § 2.

BATH-RABBIM, bath''-rab'im (בַּת־רַבִּימִים, bath-rabbīm), 'daughter of multitudes': The name of a gate of Heshbon (Song 7 4). Nothing further is known of it. For a bold conjecture, see Cheyne in EB.

BATH-SHEBA, bath''shī'be (בַּת־שֶׁבַע, bath-she-bha'), 'daughter of Sheba': The wife of Uriah the Hittite, who committed adultery with David and after Uriah's death became one of David's wives. She was a woman of beauty and energy. Her first child after her union with D. died, but she later became the mother of other sons including Solomon (cf. I Ch 3 5). She retained her influence over D. until his death, and doubtless it was she who was chiefly instrumental in D.'s choice of Solomon as his successor (II S 11 2 ff., 12 24 f.; I K 1 11-2 19).

In II S 11 3 her father's name is given as Eliam but in I Ch 3 5 she is called Bath-shua, the daughter of Ammiel (only a variant form of Eliam). Ahithophel, D.'s counselor, may have been the grandfather of B. (cf. II S 23 34).

BATH-SHUA, -shū-a. See BATH-SHEBA.

BATTERING-RAM. See BESIEGE.

BATTLE, BATTLE-ARRAY. See WARFARE, § 4.

BATTLE-AX. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 5.

BATTLEMENT: On the use of this term in Jer 5 10 AV compare the RV rendering. See also HOUSE, § 6 (d).

BAVVAI, bav'a-ai (בַּוּוּאִי, bawway, Bavai AV), (Neh 3 18). See BINNUI.

BAY. See COLORS, § 2.

BAYITH, bā'yith, Bajith, bē'yith: This word is treated as a proper name in the EV of Is 15 2. If a proper noun the RV margin is the more correct reading. But bayith (בַּיִת) may be only a textual error for bath (בַּת), 'daughter,' and in that case we should read 'The daughter of Dibon is gone up to the high places.'

E. E. N.

BAY TREE (Ps 37 35 AV): In RV the correct reading is given: 'a green tree in its native soil.' LXX. reads: like the cedars of Lebanon.

BAZLITH, baz'lish (בַּזְלִיִּת, batzlith), and BAZ-LUTH (בַּזְלִיִּת, batzluth): The ancestor of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54).

BDELLIUM. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 3.

BEALIAH, bi'a-lai'a (בְּעִלְיָהּ, b'ealyah), 'Jehovah is Baal (Lord)': One of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 5).

BEALOTH, bi-ē'leth (בְּעִלְיָהּ, b'ealoth): 1. A town in the 'South' (Jos 15 24). Perhaps the same as Baalath-beer. See BAAL, III. 2. A town or district in N. Israel (I K 4 18, Aloth AV). The text here is uncertain.

E. E. N.

BEAM (בֵּמָה): One of the main timbers of a building. The term is used figuratively in Mt 7 3; Lk 6 41 f. in contrast to mote (q.v.) in order vividly to suggest the inconsistency of criticizing the minor faults of others when our own are so much more conspicuous.

J. M. T.

BEANS. See PALESTINE, § 23; and FOOD, § 3.

BEAR. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BEARD: The Israelite was accustomed to wear a full beard which was shaved only in exceptional cases, as that of a leper (Lv 14 9), or of extreme mourning (Jer 41 5), altho later this was forbidden by the law (cf. Lv. 19 27, 21 5), which viewed such defacements as heathenish. To compel one to cut off his beard was thus to inflict upon him an insulting disgrace (II S 10 4 f.). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 4.

E. E. N.

BEAST: In EVV this term designates: 1. A brute animal, as distinguished from man (Ezk 14 13). 2. A quadruped, as distinguished from other living creatures (Gn 6 7). 3. A wild, as distinguished from a domesticated, animal (Job 5 22 f.; Ps 79 2). 4. An apocalyptic symbol of brute force, as set over against the divine power, or distinguished from humanity (Dn 7 3). In Rev 4 6 ff., the AV uses this term, but RV gives the much better rendering 'living creatures.'

BEATEN OIL. See OIL.

BEATING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

BEAUTIFUL GATE. See TEMPLE, § 28.

BEAUTY AND BANDS: Two terms used symbolically in Zec 11 4-14 (better rendered, 'grace and union'), signifying God's gracious purpose toward His people which they stubbornly opposed.

BEBAI, bī'ba-ai (בְּבַי, bēbhay): 1. The ancestral head of a large postexilic family (Ezr 2, 11, 8 11; Neh 7 18, 10 28). 2. One of this family (Neh 10 15).

BECHER, bī'kar (בְּכֶרֶךְ, bekher): 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21; I Ch 7 6-8). 2. The ancestral head of the Becherites, a clan or family of Ephraim (Nu 26 35 Bachrites AV. But in I Ch 7 20 we read Bered, which may be the correct form, or there may have been some genealogical confusion, owing to the contiguity of the territory of the two tribes Benjamin and Ephraim.

E. E. N.

BECORATH, bī-kō'raṭh (בְּכוֹרָת, bēkhōrath, Bechorath AV): An ancestor of Saul (I S 9 1).

BED, BEDSTEAD (Couch in RV of I Ch 5 1; Est 1 6, 7 8; Job 17 13; Ps 41 3; Pr 7 16, 17): In the simpler conditions of life reflected in the Bible it was customary to sleep in one's ordinary clothing, using the outer garment or cloak for a covering (Ex 22 27). In more advanced conditions, an ordinary rug or mat was used as a bed. Later, a mattress either took the place of the mat or was used with it, and together with a pillow and a simple coverlet or quilt for cold nights made up the bed furniture of a 'common' individual. The mattress was rolled up and put away for the day within a closet. But bedsteads must have been used occasionally, as may be inferred from the fact that the sarcophagus of Og, King of Bashan, is called his 'bedstead' (Dt 3 11). But more usually such bedsteads were made of lighter material and more easily movable. The place of a bedstead was sometimes taken by the raised platform or immovable divan along the walls of a room (mīṭṭāh, Gn 47 31; 11 K 4 10; mishkābh, Song 3 1). This was covered with cushions and used as a sofa during the day.

More elaborate and ornamented bedsteads are mentioned in Am 6 4, 3 15 ('beds of ivory') and Est 1 6 ('couches . . . of gold and silver'). These were used by the wealthy, and offered an opportunity for indulging the love of display and luxury. Such bedsteads were further furnished with pillars and a canopy like those of palanquins (Song 3 10; Est 1 6).

A. C. Z.

BEDAD, bī'dad (בְּדָד, bēdhadh): The father of Hadad, King of Edom (Gn 36 35; I Ch 1 46).

BEDAN, bī'dan (בְּדָן, bēdhān): 1. Referred to in I S 12 11 as one of the early deliverers of Israel. The text is probably wrong. LXX. and Syriac read Barak, but perhaps the original reading was Abdon; cf. Jg. 12 13 ff. 2. The head of a Manassite family (I Ch 7 17).

E. E. N.

BEDCHAMBER. See HOUSE, § 6 (h).

BEDEIAH, be-dī'ya (בְּדֵיָא, bēdhyāh): One of the 'sons of Bani' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 35).

BEE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BEELIADA, bī'ī-lai'a-da (בְּעִלְיָדָא, bēlyādhā), 'Baal [in sense of Jehovah] knows': A son of David (I Ch 14 7), called Eliada in I S 5 16 and I Ch 3 8.

BEELZEBUB, be-el'zī-bub: 1. The Heb. בְּעִזְבּוּב, ba'al zēbhūbh, Baalzebub, 'the god of flies,' worshiped by the Philistines of Ekron (II K 1 2 f., 6, 16). It is not clear whether this Baalzebub was regarded as a special divinity, sender of flies, or the sun as the healer of disease through his piercing rays. 2. The Greek form of the same is Βεελζεβοὺλ (Beelzeboul, so also AVmg. and RVmg., Mt 10 25, 12 24, 27; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 15 f.). Jerome calls him the 'Chief of the devils'; Cheyne renders 'Lord of the Mansion,' i.e., of the nether world; Lightfoot, 'Lord of Dung.'

A. C. Z.

BEER, bī'er (בְּעַר, bē'er): 1. A place where the Israelites made a station during the wilderness journey (Nu 21 16), possibly the same as Beer-elim, 'well of terebinths' (Is 15 8). 2. The place where Jotham took refuge from his brother Abimelech (Jg 9 21). Both sites unknown.

BEER- bī'er- (בְּעַר, bē'er), 'a well': On account of the necessity of a constant water-supply, sites of towns were often chosen because of nearness to a well or wells, and named accordingly, as Beer-elim, Beer-lahai-roi, Beer-sheba, Beeroth (plural of beer.)

A. C. Z.

BEERA, bī'er-a (בְּעֶרָא, bē'erā), 'well': A son of Zophar of the tribe of Asher (I Ch 7 37).

BEERAH, b' 'er-a (בְּעֶרָה, bē'erāh), 'well': A Reubenite 'prince,' carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser III (I Ch 5 6).

BEER-ELIM, bī'er-ē'lim (בְּעֵר עֵלִים, bē'er 'ēlīm), 'well of [sacred] trees': According to the common Heb. text, 'well of mighty ones,' Is 15 8. Site unknown. See also BEER.

BEERI, bī-'rēi (בְּעִירִי, bē'erī): 1. A Hittite, father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gn 26 34). 2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1 1).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI, bī'er-la-hai-'rēi (בְּעַר לַחַי רֹאִי, bē'er laḥay rō'ī): The well (probably not far from Kadesh) near which Hagar had her theophany (Gn 16 7-14) and where Isaac lived for some time (Gn 24 62, 25 11). The interpretation of the name given in RVmg., 'the well of the living one who seeth me,' is not entirely satisfactory. The Heb. expression offers difficulties of interpretation which have not yet been solved. In the context (Gn 16 12 f.) the emphasis is on God's 'seeing,' but nothing is said that explains laḥay, taken to mean 'living one.' The same Heb. letters would ordinarily be taken to mean 'jaw bone' (cf. Jg 15 17 ff.), but this does not explain rō'ī, 'who seeth me.' Many scholars think that rō'ī stood originally for the name of some animal. In that case the whole name must be considered a place-name much older (and no longer understood) than the origin of the story in Gn 16, which simply gives it an interpretation. See Comm. on Gen., esp. Driver, Gunkel or Skinner ad loc.

E. E. N.

BEEROTH, bī-'rēth (בְּעֶרֶת, bē'erōth), 'wells': A Canaanite city once leagued with Gibeon and included with it in the treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites (Jos 9 17). It was in the territory assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18 25; II S 4 2). After the Exile it was again occupied by the Jews (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). Its inhabitants were called Beerothites (II S 4 2, 23 27; I Ch 11 30). For Dt 10 6, see JAAKAN. Map III, F 5. E. E. N.

BEEROTH BENE JAAKAN, bi'nū jē'a-kan. See JAAKAN.

BEER-SHEBA, bi-ūr'shū-bə or bi'ūr-shī'bə (בְּרֶשֶׁב, b'er shebba'): The residence of the patriarchs (Gn 21 31, 26 23, 28 10); the name signifying 'well of seven' (Gn 21 30 f.), or 'well of oath' (26 31-33), or, as Strabo states it (xvi, 4, 24), 'seven wells' (cf. Kiriath-arba, 'fourfold city'). It is pretty safely identified with the modern Bir-es-saba', 28 m SW. from Hebron. Map II, C 4. The neighboring district was called the Wilderness of Beer-sheba (Gn 21 14). Being situated on the S. border of the country, the expression naturally arose 'from Dan to Beer-sheba' (Jg 20 1; I S 3 20), which is used conversely by the chronicler 'from Beer-sheba to Dan' (I Ch 21 2; II Ch 30 5). It was a city of Simeon (Jos 19 2). Samuel's sons became judges at Beer-sheba (I S 8 2); Elijah fled to Horeb via Beer-sheba (I K 19 3). The mother of King Joash was born there (II K 12 1). In the days of Amos there was at Beer-sheba an important sanctuary (Am 5 5, 8 14). Since 1900 a modern town has sprung up about the seven wells which are now known to exist there. See also SHIBAH. G. L. R.

BEESTERAH, bi-esh'ti-ra (בֵּית אֶשְׁתָּרוֹת, b'esht-rāh) (called Ashtaroth in I Ch 6 71; possibly an abbreviation for Beth-Ashtaroth, 'house of A.'): A city of Bashan (Jos 21 27). See ASHTAROTH.

BEEBLE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

BEGGAR: The Mosaic legislation was designed to prevent the formation of a beggar class among the Hebrews (cf. Dt 15 4, 7, 9, 11; Ex 23 11). Accordingly, altho such a class is common enough in the Orient, there is no mention of beggars in the O T (except in I S 2 8, AV for the Heb. 'ebhyōn, 'poor'). The term 'poor,' however, may often mean such destitute persons as were dependent upon the bounty of their more prosperous brethren for their means of daily subsistence (Ps 41 1, 82 4). Likewise in the N T the term 'beggar' (Lk 16 20, 22) represents the Greek πτωχός, 'poor.' See ALMS; and ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, § 34. A. C. Z.

BEGOTTEN. See ONLY-BEGOTTEN.

BEHEAD. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a).

BEHEMOTH, bi'he-mōth (בְּהֵמוֹת, b'hēmōth), apparently an intensive plural, from b'hēmāh, 'beast' (so Cheyne, EB), hence 'colossal beast': A monstrous beast, used as an illustration of the Divine creative power in Job 40 15 ff. The details of the description fit the hippopotamus more nearly than they do any other animal. By some the description (like that of 'Leviathan,' ch. 41) is viewed as passing into the mythological realm, borrowing details from Egyptian or Babylonian mythology, simply to make the impression more forcible and show how God is absolutely supreme over all beings, natural or supernatural. Possibly there is a similar instance in Is 30 6 ('beasts' = Behemoth?). (See Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, p. 64 f., and Cheyne in EB.) See PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

BEKA, BEKAH, bi'ka. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

BEL. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 15.

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, ADDITIONS TO, § 3.

BELA, bi'lə (בְּלָא, bela'): I. 1. A king of Edom the first in the list in Gn 36 32 ff. He is called the 'son of Beor,' which has led many scholars to identify him with Balaam, son of Beor (Nu 22 5 ff.), but this is uncertain. 2. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin, the Belaites (Gn 46 21; Nu 26 38 ff.; I Ch 7 6 f., 8 1 ff.). 3. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Reuben (I Ch 5 8-10).

II. A city near the Dead Sea, one of the five attacked by Chedorlaomer (Gn 14 2, 8), identical with Zoar. E. E. N.

BELIAL, bi'lī-al or bil'yāl (בְּלִיָּא, b'liyya'al), b'li, 'not,' and ya'al [in Hiphil], 'profit': Primarily 'unprofitable.' From this neutral sense, however, the term soon passed into the more positive one of 'wickedness.' It is used in the O T almost invariably in connection with some prefixed word, such as 'son,' 'daughter,' 'children,' 'man,' and designates a very wicked character (Dt 13 13; Jg 19 22; I S 1 16, 10 27, 25 25, etc. AV). In the apocalyptic literature Belial (under the form of Beliar) is personified and identified with the genius of all evil, Satan. (Cf. also II Co 6 15). See ANTICHRIST. A. C. Z.

BELLOWS. See ARTIZAN LIFE, §§ 10; and METALS, § 1.

BELLS: Mentioned in Scripture only in the following instances: 1. The golden bells (pa'āmōnīm, fr. pā'am, 'to strike') which alternated with the pomegranates upon the skirts of the high priest's robe (Ex 28 33 f., 39 25 f.). 2. The bells used on horses were called mitsillōth, fr. tsālal, 'to clang' (Zec 14 20). L. G. L.

BELSHAZZAR, bel-shaz'ar (בֶּלְשַׁצְצָר, bēlsha'ts-tsar), Bel-shar-utsur, 'Bel, protect the king.' The last Chaldean king of Babylon, according to Dn 5; but really prince-regent and son of Nabonidus; important in the affairs of Erech; associated with his father the king, and equal with him in oaths. He had jurisdiction in temple matters, and paid a tithe to Eanna. His relation to Nebuchadnezzar was simply that of successor and not 'son,' as Dn 5 18 implies. Whatever view we may take of the Book of Daniel at least ten recently published tablets establish the fact that B. is a historical character, was the oldest son of Nabonidus, and occupied a prominent place in the government of Babylonia in the last years of its independence. I. M. P.

BELT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2.

BELTESHAZZAR, bel'ti-shaz'ar (בֶּלְתְּשַׁצְצָר, bēl'tsha'ttsar, Babyl. balātshu'utsur, 'protect his life'): The Babylonian name given to Daniel (Dn 1 7, 2 26, 48 g. etc.).

BEMOAN. See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

BEN (בֶּן, bēn) 'son': A Levite (I Ch 15 18). The reading is probably corrupt; comp. ver 20.

BEN- (בֶּן-) ben: In compound proper names means 'son' (i.e., 'son of'). The plural is benē ('sons of').

BEN-ABINADAB, ben-'a-bin-'a-dab (בֶּן-אַבְיָנָדָב, ben-'ābhīnādābh), 'son of Abinadab': An official under Solomon (I K 4 11).

BENAIHAH, bi-nē'yū (בְּנֵי-יָהוּ, benāyāh), 'J' has built': 1. A son of Jehoiada, of priestly family (I Ch 27 5), commander of David's body-guard, reckoned among the heroes (II S 23 22) with a name 'like the three' (cf. Smith in ICC), a man of prowess and the victor over both Moabite and Egyptian champions. In David's later years his star was in the ascendant, while between the lines appears the story of a bitter rivalry with Joab. When the latter's shrewdness forsook him, and Adonijah's coup failed, Benaiah's loyalty was rewarded by the chief command, and he became his rival's executioner (I K 2 28-35). 2. A Pirathonite, another of the thirty heroes (II S 23 30). 3. A Simeonite prince (I Ch 4 36). 4. A Levite of the second degree who played 'with psalteries set to Alamoth' in the time of David (I Ch 15 18-20). 5. One of the priests who 'did blow the trumpets before the ark of God' (I Ch 15 24). 6. A forefather of Jahaziel (II Ch 20 14). 7. A Levite overseer of the Temple in Hezekiah's time (II Ch 31 13). 8. The father of Pelatiah, a 'prince of the people' (Ezk 11 1-13). 9-12. Names of four Israelites who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 25 ff.). A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

BEN AMMI, ben am-'ai. See AMMON, AMMONITE.

BENCH. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

BEN-DEKER, ben-di'kar (בֶּן-דֵּקָר, ben deqer), 'son of Deker' (Dekar AV): An official under Solomon (I K 4 9).

BENE-BERAK, ben-'i-bi'rak (בְּנֵי-בִרָק, benē bh'raq), 'sons of lightning' (i.e., of a storm-god?): A city of Dan (Jos 19 45), Map III, C 4.

BENEFACITOR: The translation of εὐεργέτης (ai) (Lk 22 25), a title frequently assumed by rulers in antiquity; e.g., Ptolemy Euergetes, i.e., Ptolemy the Benefactor.

BENE-JAAKAN, bi-'ni-jē'a-kən. See JAAKAN.

BEN-GEHER, -gē'ber (בֶּן-גֵּבֶר, ben gebher), 'son of Geber': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 13).

BEN-HADAD, ben-'hē'dad (בֶּן-חֲדָד, ben hādhadh), 'son of Hadad': The name Ben-hadad is the Heb. form (perhaps reproduced incorrectly) of the name Dad'idri, or, as seems more likely, Bir'idri, found in the Assyr. inscriptions as the name of the king of Damascus contemporary with Ahab. The god Hadad (or Adad, the same as Ramman or Rimmon) was a weather- or storm-god, widely worshiped in SW. Asia and, apparently, the national god of Damascus.

The O T speaks of three kings of Damascus of this name: 1. The son of Tabrimmon, who was hired by Asa of Judah to attack the NE. frontiers of Israel (I K 15 18 ff.; II Ch 10 2 ff.) 2. The son of the preceding and the contemporary of Ahab of Israel, with whom he was frequently at war. He was an able, energetic king, who waged a long and fairly successful struggle against Shalmaneser III of Assyria (860-824), who has left a record of a great defeat inflicted on B. and a number of confederates (including Ahab) at Karkar in 854. This victory was really indecisive, for Shalmaneser did not take Damascus and undertook several other campaigns against B. without attaining any permanent advantage. This B. was succeeded by Hazael (who perhaps murdered him; cf. II K 8 15), about 844 (I K 20, 22; II K 5, 6 24-7 20, 8 7-15). Many scholars consider 1 and 2 to be identical. 3. The son and successor of Hazael. He is called Mari in the Assyr. inscriptions. He was conquered by Ramman Nirari III of Assyria, c. 803. This event broke the power of Damascus and gave Israel a chance to recover from the crushing defeats inflicted by Hazael (II K 13 3-5, 24). E. E. N.

BENHAIL, -hē'il (בֶּן-חַיִל, ben hayil), 'son of strength': A prince of Judah, one of the company of 'teachers' appointed by Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7).

BEN-HANAN, -hē'nan (בֶּן-חֲנָן, ben hānān), 'son of the gracious one': A Judahite, the son of Shimon (I Ch 4 20).

BEN-HESED, -hī'sed (בֶּן-חֶסֶד, ben hesedh), 'son of Hese'd': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 10).

BEN-HUR, -hūr' (בֶּן-חֹר, ben hūr), 'son of Hur': One of Solomon's officials (I K 4 8).

BENINU, bi-nai'nū (בְּנֵי-נֹחַ, beninū): A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 13).

BENJAMIN, ben'jā-min (בִּנְיָמִן, binyāmīn), 'son of the right hand': I. 1. A son of Jacob (see TRIBES, § 4). 2. A Benjamite, the son of Bilhan (I Ch 7 10). 3. One of the 'sons of Harim' (Ezr 10 32; Neh 3 23, 12 34).

II. The tribal name Benjamin was naturally applied to the territory occupied by the tribe. This territory is defined in Jos 18 11-20, and included the towns enumerated in the immediately following paragraph (vs. 21-28). It is not clear whether Bethel and Jerusalem were within it. The site of Jerusalem was just on the border between Benjamin and Judah, and, ideally considered, might have belonged to the former during the earlier days when it was still a Jebusite city. There are evidences, however, that at the time of the Exile it was quite firmly fixed in possession of the larger tribe (Jer 37 12).

As to Bethel, after the disruption following the accession of Rehoboam, it is viewed as in Ephraim and was one of the two shrines of the northern kingdom favored by Jeroboam I, (I K 12 32). In Jos 18 22, however, it is said to belong to Benjamin. It is possible that part of Benjamin joined in the revolt against Rehoboam. It has been held that such was the case upon the basis of I K 12 20 ('There was none that followed the house of David but the tribe of Judah only'). But against this stand a series of explicit statements (I K 12 21, 23; II Ch 11 10, 12, 23, 14 8, 15 2, 9, etc.), and the fact that even in NT times Benjamin was regarded as a portion of the Jewish commonwealth. Paul belonged to this tribe.

III. One of the gates of Jerusalem, (Jer 20, 2, 37 13, 38 7; Zec 14 10); see JERUSALEM, § 32. A. C. Z.

BENO, bi'no (בִּנּוֹ, b'nō): A son of Merari (I Ch 24 26 f.).

BENONI, ben-ō'ni: Another name for Benjamin. See TRIBES, § 3.

BEN-ZOHEHETH, ben-zō'heheth (בֶּן־זֹהֶתְהַ, ben zōhēth), 'son of Zoheth': A son of Ishi, a man of Judah (I Ch 4 20).

BEON, bi'on. See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR, bi'er (בְּעוֹר, b'e'ōr): 1. The father of Bela, the first king of Edom (Gn 36 32). 2. The father of the seer Balaam (Nu 22 5, etc.). Some would identify him with 1.

BERA, bi'rā (בֶּרֶא, berā'): King of Sodom (Gn 14 2).

BERACAH, ber'a-ka (בֶּרַחָה, b'rākhāh, Berachah, AV 'blessing'): I. A Benjamite who came to David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 3). II. A valley where an army invading Judah in the days of Jehoshaphat was destroyed (II Ch 20 26). Perhaps the modern ruins Berekūt indicate the locality. Map II, E 2.

BERACHIAH, ber'a-kai'a. See BERECHIAH.

BERAIAH, ber'a-ai'a (בֶּרֶאִיָּה, b'rā'yāh), J' creates: A Benjamite, one of the sons of Shimei (I Ch 8 21).

BEREA, bi-rī'a. See BERCEA.

BERECHIAH, ber'ī-kai'a (בֶּרֶכְיָה, berekhyāh), 'J' blesses': 1. The father of Zechariah the prophet (Zec 1 1, 7). (In some editions of AV called Barachiah.) 2. The father of Asaph the singer (I Ch 6 39, 15 17). 3. A Levite doorkeeper for the ark (I Ch 15 23). 4. A chief of the Ephraimites (II Ch 28 12). 5. A postexilic Levite (I Ch 9 16). 6. The father of Meshullam (Neh 3 4, 30, 6 18). 7. One of the sons of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20).

BERED, bi'red (בֶּרֶד, beredh): 1. A place in the wilderness S. of Beersheba (Gn 16 7, 14). Site unknown. 2. See BECHER, 2.

BERI, bi'roi (בֶּרִי, bērī): The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 36). With this family the Berites (II S 20 14) had nothing to do. Perhaps the original reading was Bichrites (see BECHER, 2.)

BERIAH, bi-rai'a (בֶּרִיָּה, b'rī'āh): 1. One of the sons of Asher who migrated to Egypt with Jacob (Gn 46 17) and therefore the designation of one of the clans of the tribe of Asher, the Beriites (Nu 26 44 f.). 2. The designation of an Ephraimitic clan with a Benjamite intermixture. According to 1 Ch 7 21 ff. Ezer and Elead, sons of Ephraim, lost their lives in a cattle-raid against Gath. After a period of mourning, their father, Ephraim, beget another son, Beriah. In I Ch 8 13 Beriah and Shema are two Benjamites who put the men of Gath to flight. Scholars interpret these names in the tribal sense, Beriah being a clan composed of individuals from the two tribes Benjamin and Ephraim. 3. A son of Shimei, the Gershonite (I Ch 23 10). J. A. K.

BERNICE, bār-nai'sē (Βερνίκη Maced. form of Φερωνίκη, 'bearer of victory': Daughter of Herod Agrippa I and sister of Herod Agrippa II. She was thrice married. At the time of Paul's trial before Festus (Ac 25 13 ff.), she had recently left her third husband, Polemon, King of Pontus. She was suspected of criminal intimacy with her brother. During the war with Rome (66-70) she became the mistress of Titus and afterward lived with him at Rome. Public policy alone prevented him from acknowledging her to be his wife. See Jos. Antiq. (passim) and Schürer HJP I. § 19 (supplement). See also HEROD, § 9. E. E. N.

BERODACH-BALADAN, be-rō'dak-bal'a-dan: A king of Babylon (II K 20 12; Is 39 1). See MERO-DACH-BALADAN.

BERCEA, be-rī'a (Βέρεια) BEREA, AV: A city of Macedonia in the province of Emathia, at the foot of Mt. Bermius. B. was the most populous city in Macedonia in the 1st cent. A.D. Paul preached here with some success to the Jewish colony on his second missionary journey (Ac 17 10, 13). It was destroyed by an earthquake in 900 A.D. The modern name is Verria.

BEROTHAI, be-rō'hai (בֶּרוֹתַי, bērōthāh): A place on the (ideal) N. border of the Holy Land (Ezk 47 16). Site unknown. Possibly the same as the following.

BEROTHAI, be-rō'hai (בֶּרוֹתַי, bērōthay): A city belonging to Hadadezer, King of Zobah, conquered by David (II S 8 8). It is identified by some with Bereitān, a little S. of Baalbek.

BEROTHITE, be-rō'hoit (בֶּרוֹתִי, bērōthī): Naharai the Berothite (I Ch 11 39) was probably a man of Beeroth (q.v.).

BERYL. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

BESAI, bi'sai (בִּסַּי, bēsāy): The ancestral head of a Nethinim family (Ezr 2 49, Neh 7 52).

BESIEGE: The offensive wars in which the Israelites were engaged were usually of short duration and probably did not involve any long or elaborate siege-operations. Altho we read of sieges (e.g., in Jg 9 46-52; II S 20 15; I K 15 27) these were little more than the brief investment of a town by the attacking army. The methods for destroying the wall, etc., were of the simplest kind. It was otherwise with the operations of the Egyptian and Assyrian armies. These were provided with scaling-ladders, with protected cars which could be pushed close to the walls (as depicted on their wall inscriptions), with battering-rams (Ezk 21 22, the covering of which is perhaps meant by mantelet, Nah 2 5), etc. Later kings of Judah sought to provide themselves with like engines of warfare (II Ch 26 15). Naturally, with this development of offensive methods there went a corresponding development of defensive works. Walls were made stronger, furnished with bulwarks or outer walls, etc. By the Romans the science of siege-operations was carried to a high state of perfection (cf. Josephus' description of the siege of Jerusalem in BJ, V, 6-VI, 4). E. E. N.

BESODEIAH, bes'o-di'ya (בִּסְדֵּיָה, bēṣōdhyāh), 'in the secret of J'' (?): The father of Meshullam (Neh 3 6).

BESOM, bī'zam: An old English word meaning a broom. The Heb. term maḥāṣē in Is 14 23 is rare, but means probably some kind of sweeping instrument. E. E. N.

BESOR, bī'ser (בִּסְרִי, bēṣōr): A wady or brook mentioned in I S 30 9, 10, 21. Probably the Wādy esh Sheriah, a tributary of Wādy Ghuzzeh, Map II, B 3.

BESTEAD, bī-sted', for early Eng. bested, i.e., 'placed' (Is 8 21 AV). The RV reads 'sore distressed.' The Heb. (בִּשְׁתָּה) has reference to being in great difficulty or hardship.

BETAH, bī'ta. See TEBAH.

BETEN, bī'ten (בֵּתֵן, bēten), 'a hollow': A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25), site unknown (perhaps el Baneh, Map, I E 4).

BETH- (בֵּית, bēth-), 'house of': In compound place-names Beth- means 'place of,' 'abode of,' 'temple of,' 'house of,' etc.

BETH-ABARA, beth'-ab'a-rā. See BETHANY, 2.

BETH-ANATH, beth'-ē'nāth (בֵּית אֲנָת, bēth-ānāth), 'temple of Anath': An old Canaanitish fortress later occupied by Naphtali (Jos 19 38; Jg 1 33). Altho mentioned in Egyptian lists, its exact site is uncertain.

BETH-ANOTH, beth'-ē'neṯh (בֵּית אֲנוֹת, bēth-ānōth): A town of Judah (Jos 15 59). Probably the modern Beit 'Ainūm, Map II, E 2.

BETHANY, beth'a-nī (Βηθανία): 1. Bethany near Jerusalem, now called el 'Azariyeh from Lazarus, the place of Jesus' arrival on His last journey to Jerusalem (Mk 11 1; Mt 21 1; Lk 19 29; Jn 12 1); also the place of His ascension (Lk 24 50). Map II, F 1. 2. Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1 28, early changed in some MSS. to Bethabara, so AV). One of the places where John baptized (cf. also Jn 3 23). The site is uncertain. J. M. T.

BETH-ARABAH, beth'-ar'a-ba (בֵּית אֲרָבָה, bēth-hā'ārābhāh), 'the house of (or in) the Arabah': A town on the NE. border of Judah. Site unknown (Jos 15 8, 9); Jos 18 22 may refer to a different place. E. E. N.

BETH-ARAM, -ē'rām. See BETH-HARAN.

BETH-ARBEL, beth'-ār'bel (בֵּית אֲרֵבֶל, bēth-'arbēl), 'house of Arbel': In Hos 10 14 we read 'as Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel in the day of battle.' Many conjectures have been advanced to explain this statement, as e.g., that Shalman = Shalmaneser III, King of Assyria, and Beth-arbel = Arbela (Irbid in Gilead, Map I, G 5), but none of them rests on certain grounds. E. E. N.

BETH-AVEN, -ē'ven (בֵּית אֲוֵן, bēth-'āwen): A place E. of Bethel near Ai (Jos 7 2; I S 13 5, 14 23). Near it was a 'wilderness' (Jos 18 12). The exact site is unknown. According to the pointing of the present Heb. text bēth 'āwen means 'house of wickedness.' It was easy to use this as a contemptuous designation for Bethel ('house of God'), the seat of corrupt worship, as seems to have been done by Hosea (4 15, 5 8, 10 5). E. E. N.

BETH-AZMAVETH, -az-mē'veth. See AZMAVETH.

BETH-BAAL-MEON, -bē'al-mī'on. See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-BARAH, bē'ra (בֵּית בָּרָה, bēth-bārāh): A locality which, owing to its waters, was difficult to traverse by the fleeing Midianites (Jg 7 24). Moore's conjecture that it was the region near the mouth of the Wādy Fārāh (Map III, H 4) is preferable to the site given on Map II, E 8. The exact situation is unknown. E. E. N.

BETH-BIRI, -bī'rai (בֵּית בִּרְיָה, bēth bir'ī), B.-birei AV: A place in Simeon (I Ch 4 31), called Beth-lebaoth in Jos 19 6 and Leboath in Jos 15 32. Site unknown.

BETH-CAR, -kār' (בֵּית קָר, bēth kār): A place, possibly a height, marking the limit of a pursuit of the Philistines by Israel (I S 7 11). Perhaps the modern 'Ain Kārim Map II, E 1. E. E. N.

BETH-DAGON, -dē'gen (בֵּית דָּגוֹן, bēth dāghōn) 'house of Dagon': 1. A town of Judah (Jos 15 41). Map III, C 5. 2. A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). The identification, Map IV, B 6, is somewhat uncertain. Both places were doubtless once seats of Dagon-worship. E. E. N.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, -dib'la-fhē'im. See ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.

BETH-EL (בֵּית אֵל, bēth-'ēl), 'house of God': A locality 12 m. N. of Jerusalem on the way to Shechem. Three accounts are given of the origin of the name. According to one, Jacob fleeing from Esau to Haran became aware through a dream of God's special presence at the place, and called it 'the house of God' (Gn 28 13 [B]); according to the second, after leaving Shechem he came to B. when he built an altar, calling it El-beth-el, and set up a pillar, in fulfilment of his vow when fleeing from his brother (Gn 35 1-7, 14 and cf. 28 18-22 [E]). According to the third, on his return from Padan-aram he received the assurance of a blessing from God at that spot, 'and Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him Beth-el' (Gn 35 9-13, 15 [P]). Originally, the name probably belonged more narrowly to a high place or shrine in the vicinity of Luz. Later, it passed on to the neighboring city with its adjacent country (Jg 1 23). In Jos 18 22 it is reckoned among the cities of Benjamin; but from Jg 1 22-23 it appears that 'the house of Joseph' secured possession of it by treachery, and in Jos 8 17 its capture is associated with that of Ai. In I Ch 7 28 it is mentioned among the possessions of Ephraim. When Jeroboam led the ten tribes to break away from Rehoboam, Bethel became the most prominent shrine in the new kingdom (cf. Am 7 10-13.) To this end its history contributed materially, for even before the days of Jacob, Abraham had built an altar at the place (Gn 12 8, 13 8-9), and Jacob's experience gave it a permanent name for sacredness (Gn 28 18-22, 31 13, 35 16). To the prophets Bethel became a symbol of the idolatrous worship of the northern tribes which was evidently thoroughly organized with its own priesthood and ritual. In modern geography, Bethel is to be identified with Beitin. Map III, F 5. (Cf. for fuller history G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 250 ff.) A. C. Z.

BETH-EMEK, -i'mek (בֵּית עֵמֶק 'ב, bēth hā-'ēmeq), 'house (place) of the valley': A place on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). Possibly the modern 'Amkā, Map IV, B 6.

BETHER, bi'fhar (בֵּיתר, bether): In Song 2 17 we read 'the mountains of Bether.' The name may be only figurative, 'mountains of divisions or separations.' A slight emendation of the Heb. would give 'Cypresses,' the reference being to Lebanon (so Cheyne). A place Bether is mentioned in LXX. of Jos 15 19—probably the modern Bittir on a hill about 6 m. SW. of Jerusalem. Map II, E 1.

E. E. N.

BETHESDA, bi-fhez'da. See JERUSALEM, § 12.

BETH-EZEL, -i'zel (בֵּית עֶזֶל 'ב, bēth hā-'ētsel), 'place near by': A place in the Shephelah (Mic 1 11). Site unknown.

BETH-GADER, -gē'dar (בֵּית גָּדֶר 'ב, bēth gādher): A place inhabited by a Calebite clan (I Ch 2 51), otherwise unknown.

BETH-GAMUL, -gē'mul (בֵּית גָּמֹול 'ב, bēth-gāmūl): A town of Moab (Jer 48 23). Its site is unknown.

BETH-GILGAL, -gil'gal (בֵּית הַגִּלְגָּל 'ב, bēth haggilgāl), 'house of Gilgal,' so AV (Neh 12 29). Same as GILGAL (q.v.).

BETH-HACCHEREM, -hak'ki-rem (בֵּית חֲכֶרֶם 'ב, bēth hakkherem, Beth-Haccherem AV), 'place of the vineyard': A place in Judah (Jer 6 1; Neh 3 14). The site is uncertain. Cheyne's identification with Beth-car (q.v.) is plausible.

BETH-HARAN, -hē'ran (בֵּית חֶרָן 'ב, bēth-hārān): A city E. of Jordan in the territory of Gad (Nu 32 36, called B.-Haran in Jos 13 27 [B.-Aram AV]), identified usually with Tel Ramah, Map II, H 1. This was rebuilt by Herod the Great and named Livias, and later after being destroyed was again rebuilt by Herod Antipas and named Julias. Here possibly he celebrated his birthday (Mt 14 6-12).

BETH-HOGLAH, -həg'la (בֵּית חֹגְלָה 'ב, bēth-hoghlāh) 'place of a partridge': A town of Benjamin near the NE. border of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea (Jos 15 6; 18 19, 21). Map II, H 1.

BETH-HORON, -hō'rən (בֵּית חֶרֶן 'ב, bēth hōrōn), 'house of a hollow,' perhaps from a bowl-shaped valley in the vicinity: Two neighboring places (II Ch 8 5) about 3 m. apart, distinguished from each other as the 'upper' (Jos 16 5) and 'nether' (Jos 16 3) Beth-horon. They were both on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin to the W. of the watershed of the hill-country (Jos 10 10 f.). Map III, E 5. Josephus (BJ, II, 19 8). places the region on the way from Jerusalem to Antipatris and Caesarea. The importance of B. in history lies chiefly in the availability of the spot as a fortified strategic point (Jth 4 4). Solomon evidently appreciated this fact when he 'built' it (I K 9 17; II Ch 8 5); so did the Ephraimitess Sheerah, whose interest and authority, however, are very obscure (I Ch 7 24). In the Maccabean period, Jonathan used the spot in a similar way (I Mac 3 13 ff., 7 39). Beth-Horon was also invested with a sacred character as a Levite city (Jos 21 22; I Ch 6 68). In modern times the two Beth-Horons are known as Beit-Ur el Fōga and Beit-Ur et-Tahta respectively, two villages with some old ruins (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 254, 290). A. C. Z.

BETH-JESHIMOTH, -jesh'i-meth (בֵּית יֵשִׁימוֹת 'ב, bēth hay'shīmōth): A town in the territory of Moab, in the region where Israel encamped (Nu 33 49). It was assigned to Reuben (Jos 12 3, 13 20). Later reoccupied by the Moabites, it was still in their hands at the time of the exile (Ezk 25 9). Map II, H 1.

BETH-LE-APHRAH, -li-af'ra (בֵּית לֵאֶפְרָח 'ב, bēth lē'aphrah), 'house of Aphrah' (so AV): A town near the western border of Judah (Mic 1 10). Site unknown.

BETH-LEBAOTH, -li-bē'oth (בֵּית לֵבְאוֹת 'ב, bēth lēbhā'ōth), 'place of lions': A town of Simeon (Jos 19 6), also called Lebaath (Jos 15 32) and Beth-biri (I Ch 4 31). Site unknown.

BETHLEHEM, beth'li-hem (בֵּית לֵחֶם, bēth lehem), 'house of bread': 1. A city of Judah, called at times Beth-lehem-judah (Jg 17 7 ff., 19 1 ff.; Ru 1 1 f.; I S 17 12; cf. Mt 2 1, 5 f.), to distinguish it from the city of similar name in Zebulun (see 2), the modern village of Beit Lahm ('house of flesh'), 5 m. SSW. of Jerusalem (Map II, F 1), situated in a region which was, and still is, one of the most fertile in Judea, altho, singularly enough, unsupplied with springs of water.

If the LXX. text of Jos 15 59 is genuine, the name occurs in the list of the cities of Judah. The first reasonably assured mention of the place, however, is in the David narrative, where it is spoken of as the home of his father, Jesse, the Bethlehemite (I S 16 1, 17 58; cf. vs. 12 and 15, where it is definitely named) and his own city (I S 20 6, 28 f.), the scene of his anointing (I S 16 4 ff.) and from the well at whose gate he longed for a draft of water (II S 23 14 ff.). The district in which B. lay was called Ephrath perhaps a clan-name, cf. I Ch 2 19, 50, (cf. I S 17 12; Ru 1 2, where inhabitants of B. are called Ephrathites), which is given in its longer form Ephrathah (Ephratah AV), as part of the accepted name of the place by Micah (5 2; cf. the later documents Ru 4 11; I Ch 2 50, 44; Ps 132 6). Confusion with another Ephrath, some miles S. of Bethel led to the gloss in Gn 35 19 and 48 7. It is the scene of the story of Ruth (1 19, etc.); the place of the family sepulcher of Asahel, brother of Joab and Abishai (II S 2 32); the home of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (II S 23 34). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 6). It was near B. that the Jews, who in 586 B.C. fled to Egypt, found a wayside refuge (Jer 41 17), and the site itself was repopled by the 'Children of Bethlehem' after the return from Babylon (Ezr 2 21 || Neh 7 26).

Its special distinction came from its prophetic assignment as the home of the coming Messianic King (Mic 5 2). In fulfilment of this prophecy it appears in the Mt narrative as the birthplace of Jesus (2:1-18). In the N T it is still distinguished as the Judean B. (Mt 2:1, 5 f.), and as the 'City of David' (Lk 2:4; cf. Jn 7:42). As such it was recognized in the Roman administration of the land; since the fact that Jesus was born in the place was due solely to the coming there at that time of Joseph and Mary to be registered as 'of the house and family of David' under the Syrian census of Quirinius, c. 6 B.C. (Lk 2:1-7). The statement of Luke (2:7), that because of the lack of room in the inn, or khan, Mary laid the infant in a manger is confirmed by the early tradition that makes Him to have been born in a cave (Justin Martyr, 140-150 A.D., Dial. c. Tryph. § 78) and by the ancient practise of using the limestone caves of the hill-country of Judea as shelters for cattle. The modern Church of the Nativity is built over a group of caves, some one of which may have been the historic cave of the nativity.

2. A city of Zebulun (Jos 19:15), the modern insignificant village of Beit Lahm, 7 m. NW. of Nazareth (Map IV, C 7), generally held to have been the home and burial-place of Ibzan, who judged Israel seven years (Jg 12:8, 10).

BETH-MAACAH, -mā'ə-ka (בֵּית מַעַכָּה, bēth ma'ākhāh, Beth-Maachah AV): The (originally Aramean, see MAACAH) district where the town Abel was situated. 'Abel of Beth-maachah' should be read in II S 20:14. This Abel was attacked by Ben-hadad I (I K 15:20) c. 900 B.C. Its people were carried away by Tiglath-pileser III (II K 15:20) c. 734 B.C. It was an old city mentioned in the list of cities taken by Thormes III of Egypt c. 1475 B.C. and later famous for its circle of 'wise' men and women (II S 20:18). The fertility of the site is indicated in its alternate name Abel-maim, 'meadow of waters' (II Ch 16:4). Its situation was strong and advantageous. Map IV, E 4. E. E. N.

BETH-MARCABOTH, -mār'ka-beth (בֵּית מַרְכָּבוֹת, bēth markābhōth), 'place of chariots': A town of Simeon not far from Ziklag mentioned along with Hazarsusah in Jos 19:5 I Ch 4:31. The parallel passage (Jos 15:31) has Madmannah (q.v.) and Sansannah (q.v.) as the names of the places. Since B.-Marcaboth = 'place of chariots,' and Hazarsusah = 'place of horses,' it is not impossible that the places had some connection with the trade in horses mentioned in I K 10:28 f.; cf. 9:19. E. E. N.

BETH-MEON, -mī'ən. See BETH-BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK, -mer'hak (בֵּית מֶרְחָק, bēth merhāq), 'the house afar off,' 'the far house' (II S 15:7; cf. AV): Apparently the name of a house or station near Jerusalem, between the city and the Kedron. E. E. N.

BETH-NIMRAH, -nim'ra (בֵּית נִמְרָה, bēth nimrah): A town of Moab, in the region assigned to Gad. It was further built up and fortified by the Gadites (Nu 32:36; Jos 13:27). It is called Nimrah in Nu 32:3. Map III, H 5.

BETH-PALET. See BETH-PELET.

BETH-PAZZEZ, -paz'ez (בֵּית פַּזֶּז, bēth patstsēts): A town on the border of Issachar (Jos 19:21). Site unknown.

BETH-PELET, -pī'let (בֵּית פֶּלֶט, bēth pelet), 'house of escape': A town in southern Judah (Jos 15:27, Beth-palet AV) reoccupied in postexilic times (Neh 11:26, Beth-phelet AV). Site unknown.

BETH-PEOR, -pī'ōr (בֵּית פְּעוֹר, bēth pē'ōr), 'house of Peor,' possibly 'house of Baal-Peor,' i.e., a shrine where Baal-Peor was worshiped: A city of Moab, not far from Mount Pisgah, the place where Israel listened to the farewell discourses of Moses (Dt 3:29, 4:46) and the neighborhood in which Moses was buried (Dt 34:6). In the assignment of territory E. of the Jordan it fell to the lot of Reuben. Regarding its more definite identification in modern geography, there is great uncertainty (cf. Conder, PEFQ, 1882, p. 85 f.). Map II, H 1. A. C. Z.

BETHPHAGE, beth'fa-jī (Βηθαφαγή), 'house of figs' (Mt 21:1 and ||s): A place on the Mt. of Olives, near Bethany. The exact site is unknown.

BETH-RAPHA, -rē'fa (בֵּית רַפְּאֵל, bēth-rāphā): Probably a place-name in the genealogy of Chelub (Caleb) (I Ch 4:12).

BETH-REHOB, -rī'heb (בֵּית רְהוֹב, bēth rē'hōbh): The name of a town and its district situated not far from Dan (Jg 18:28; II S 10:6). The location assigned on Map IV, E 4 is almost certainly wrong as the city of Dan was situated in the 'valley of Beth-rehob' (Jg 18:28). Syrians of B. were involved in war with David (II S 10:6 ff.). See also REHOB. E. E. N.

BETHSAIDA, beth-sē'i-da (Βηθσαιδά), 'house of the fishers': According to Josephus (BJ, III, 107; cf. Vit. 72; Ant. XVIII, 2:1), a town situated 120 furlongs S. of Lake Semechonitis (Mērōm, Jos 11:5), the site of the modern et-Tell. Map IV, E 6. Early in the reign of Philip the Tetrarch B. was advanced to the rank of a city and named Julias in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Ant. XVIII, 2:1). B. was the home of one of Jesus' disciples, Philip, (Jn 1:44, 12:21), and along with other towns in the region was denounced by Jesus for its unbelief (Mt 11:21 and ||). Jesus and His disciples withdrew to B. in order to escape Herod (Lk 9:10) and to avoid the multitudes (Mk 6:45, 8:22). The N T passages do not require the assumption of a second B. on the W. side of the lake (see Smith, HGHL, p. 457 f., and compare the inconclusive reasoning of R. L. Stewart in DCG; that the ref. in Jn do not indicate that Andrew and Peter were from B. cf. Exp. Times, July 1924, pp. 475 f. For the later history of B. cf. Schürer GJ V, (3d-4th Ed 1907 Vol. II p. 208.

BETHSHAN, -shan (בֵּית שָׁן, bēth shān), so in I S 31:10, 12; II S 21:12; elsewhere Beth-shean, בֵּית שֶׁעָן, bēth shē'an), 'house of safety': An important ancient Canaanite city. Excavations show that it was in existence earlier than 2000 B. C. It lay about 4 m. W. of the Jordan, and 12 m. S. of the Sea of Galilee, Map III, G 2. Its strength enabled it to successfully resist the first attacks of the invading Israelites (Jg 1:27 f. = Jos 17:12 f.). Later it seems to have been the first and easiest accessible place for the Philistines to celebrate their victory (I S 31 10). Its modern name is Beisan. It had an important history in postbiblical times. Cf. I Mac 12 40; G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 357 ff. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

BETH-SHEMESH, -shī'mesh (שֶׁמֶשׁ 'ב, bēth shemesh), 'house of the sun': 1. The modern Ain Shems. Map II, D 1. Excavations show that the site was that of an important city from very early times (c. 2000 B.C.). It was strongly fortified, much of the ancient wall can still be traced. It was taken from the Canaanites by the Philistines and then passed to Israel. Its sanctuary was without doubt a seat of sun-worship (See PEFQ 1911 and 1912). It was on the border of Judah (Jos 15 10) and counted as a priestly city (Jos 21 16). Under the name Ir-Shemesh it is assigned to Dan in Jos 19 41. Here, in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite, the Ark rested on its return from the Philistines, but was not allowed to remain (I S 6 9 ff.). Here Amaziah of Judah was defeated by Jehoash of Israel (II K 14 11 ff.). Later, in the days of Ahaz, it was taken by the Philistines (II Ch 28 18). 2 and 3. Two still unidentified towns, one in Naphtali (Jos 19 38; Jg 1 33) the other on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 22). These three places (probably there were others) with this same name show the prevalence of sun-worship in ancient Canaan. 4. A city of Egypt, probably On i.e., Heliopolis (Jer 43 13). E. E. N.

BETH-SHITTAH, -shit'a (שִׁטָּה 'ב, bēth-shittāh), 'place of the acacia': A place to which the Midianites were pursued (Jg 7 22). The ordinary identification with Shutta (Map IV, 8) is not entirely satisfactory. E. E. N.

BETH-TAPPUAH, -tap'pū-ā (תַּפּוּחַ 'ב, bēth-tappūah), 'place of apples' (?): A town of Judah (Jos 15 53), connected possibly with the family named Tappuah (I Ch 2 43), Map II, E 2. E. E. N.

BETHUEL, bi-ṭhū'el (בְּתוּעַל, bēthū'el). I. A son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, and the father of Rebekah, Isaac's wife, and of Laban (Gn 22 22 f., 24 15, etc. 25 20, 28 2, 5). II. See BETHUL.

BETHUL, bēth'ul (בְּתוּל, bēthūl): A town in the S. of Judah (Jos 19 4) called Bethuel (I Ch 4 30) and Chesil (Jos 15 30). Site unknown.

BETHULIA. See JUDITH, BOOK OF.

BETH-ZUR, -zūr' (צֹר 'ב, bēth tsūr), 'house of rock,' or Zur may be the name of a deity: A town of Judah (Jos 15 58; I Ch 2 45), strongly situated, commanding the road between Hebron and Jerusalem (Map II, E 2) and fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 7). It was occupied by a postexile colony (Neh 3 16) and was the scene of several conflicts in the Maccabean war (I Mac 4 19, etc.). E. E. N.

BETONIM, bet'o-nim (בֵּיתֹנִים, bēṭōnīm), 'pistachio nuts': A place on the border of Gad (Jos 13 26). Site unknown.

BETROTH. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

BEULAH, biū'la, 'married': The reference in Is 62 4 is to the old Semitic idea that a deity stood in closest relation to the land in which he was worshipped, i.e., he owned it, controlled it, gave fertility to it, etc. The prophet here uses the term, altho his idea of J' is far more spiritual than was that of the earlier age. E. E. N.

BEWAIL. See MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

BEWITCH. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION.

BEWRAY: An old English word meaning 'to disclose,' found in the AV of Is 16 3; Pr 29 24, 27 16; Mt 26 73. The Heb. of Pr 27 is altogether obscure.

BEYOND THE JORDAN: When this phrase occurs in the reported speeches of Moses it denotes the region W. of the river (Dt 3 20, etc.), but when used by the author who reports them, the region E. of the river (Dt 1 1, 5, etc.; cf. also Gn 50 10). The latter is also the N T meaning (Mt 4 15, 25; Mk 3 8; etc.).

BEZAI, bī'zā-ai (בְּצַי, bētsay): The ancestral head of a large postexilic family (Ezr 2 17; Neh 7 23, 10 18).

BEZALEL, bez'a-lel (בְּצַלְאֵל, bētsal'el, Bezaleel AV), 'in the shadow of God': 1. The son of Uri, the son of Hur, who was divinely called to be the chief artificer of the Tent and its furnishings (Ex 31-39; I Ch 2 20; II Ch 1 5). 2. One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab' who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10 30).

BEZEK, bī'zek (בִּזְעַק, bezeq): 1. A town ruled over by Adonibezek, captured by Judah and Simeon in their invasion of Canaan (Jg 1 4 f.). It could not have been far from Jerusalem (cf. ver. 7), but its site is unknown. To identify it with the following without distorting the whole narrative is impossible. 2. The place where Saul rallied the Israelites before marching to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (I S 11 8). Map III, G 2. E. E. N.

BEZER, bī'zar (בְּצֵר, betser), 'fortress': I. The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 37). II. A city of refuge, also one of the Levitical cities in the tribe of Reuben, Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8, 21 36; I Ch 6 78). It was 'in the wilderness in the plain (mīshōr, here 'upland plain'). Of the same place Mesha says (Mesha stone, line 27): 'I built B., for ruins had it become.' Site unknown. E. E. N.

BIBLE. 1. Name and Names. The word Bible is from the Gr. βιβλος, the inner layers of the papyrus-plant used in making the paper of which books, βιβλοι, were manufactured. The dim. βιβλιον was especially used of a 'book' as a part or division of a larger work. The pl. τὰ βιβλία, 'the books,' was applied to the Scriptures in consequence of their supreme importance. This Greek plural passed over into the Latin as a singular biblia, whence the English word 'Bible.' The oldest name among the Jews for their Scriptures was 'the books' (Dn 9 2) or, for the legal part, the 'book of the law' or 'book of Moses' (Neh 9 3, 13 1). In N T times the Jews were accustomed to say 'the writings' (Heb. kēthābhīm; Gr. γράφαί, Lat. Scripturae), or, in case of quotation, etc., 'Scripture' (ἡ γράφή; Lat. Scriptura, which term passed over into Christian usage and has maintained itself until the present day.

The term Testament is from the Lat. testamentum, 'will,' the rendering of the Gr. διαθήκη (cf. also Mt 26 28, etc.), which, however, neither in the LXX. nor in the N T, means 'will' but (as e.g., in II Co 3 4) 'covenant.' It was easy, however, to take διαθήκη in the sense of a testamentary document and use it of the Scriptures of the old and new covenants, and in ecclesiastical literature from the 2d cent. this is a common designation of the Scriptures. For the names applied by the Jews to the various parts of the O T see OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

2. The Bible a Collection of Books of Various Dates and by Many Writers. The Protestant Bible in common use is a collection of sixty-six books, subdivided into the O T (thirty-nine books) and the N T (twenty-seven books). The thirty-nine O T books originally constituted the Hebrew Scriptures recognized and used by Palestinian Judaism in New Testament times. The remaining twenty-seven originated in Christian circles in the Apostolic Age. The Greek-speaking Jews of the New Testament period recognized as Scripture a larger number of books than was the case with their more conservative brethren in Palestine, and the Greek O T which passed from Hellenistic Judaism to the early Christian church contained, in addition to the thirty-nine books of the Hebrew canon, a number of others of which seven, Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I and II Maccabees plus the so called Additions to Esther and Daniel, are considered canonical by the Roman church and are quite familiarly used in the Greek Catholic and also in the Lutheran churches on the continent. The Roman Catholic O T contains therefore forty-six instead of thirty-nine books (See APOCRYPHA and VERSIONS.)

The material in the Bible was composed at different times during a period of more than a thousand years—from the foundation of the Hebrew nation by Moses (c. 1200 B.C.) to about the end of the 1st cent. A.D. The number of writers whose work is preserved in the Bible is unknown. A large number of the O T books and some of the N T are anonymous. The range and variety of subjects are indicative of a corresponding variety and number of authors. The poet, the historian, and the philosopher ('wise man'), the priest, the prophet, and the apostle, the king and the statesman, the popular story-teller, the serious legislator, the antiquarian delighting in genealogy and statistics, the zealous reformer, the faithful teacher, the seer, all these and others, even the Divine Son of Man Himself, find their words or work represented in the Bible.

It is also a world of varied thought and culture that is reflected in the Biblical material. In one part we are face to face with the primitive simplicity of the Semitic nomad; in another we are in touch with the rich culture of the ancient Babylonian civilization; again we share the experiences incident to the predominantly agricultural type of life of the ancient Hebrew commonwealth; at first we witness the crude and petty warfare between clans or tribes, then the larger struggles of Israel with her near neighbors; next we hear the measured tread of Assyria's victorious armies, creators of the first world monarchy; then, in succession, it is the Babylonian, the Persian, the Greek, and finally the Roman empires that form the background of the Biblical history.

3. The Original Language and Text of the Bible.

The original languages of the Biblical books were Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek. Nearly all the O T was composed in Hebrew, the language spoken by Israel in Canaan before the Exile, but after the Return gradually giving way—as the speech of common intercourse—to the Aramaic, then the lingua franca of all SW. Asia. Parts of Daniel and Ezra and one verse in Jer (10 11) are in Aramaic. There is also an Aramaic coloring to many expressions scattered through the O T. A dialect of Aramaic was the vernacular of Palestine in N T times, and it is probable that Jesus' teachings were spoken by Him in Aramaic and later rendered into Greek by the teachers of the early Apostolic Church (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE). Apart from this Aramaic basis of the Gospels, especially the first three and of some material in Ac, the N T was composed entirely in Greek, the Greek of ordinary intercourse in the Hellenistic world (see GREEK LANGUAGE).<sup>1</sup>

The text of the Bible has doubtless had a very checkered history. Nothing is known of the means taken to preserve the text of the O T autographs. It is probable that much editorial work was done by exilic and postexilic scholars on the material in their hands, and we do not know when the text came to be so carefully guarded that no more changes were possible. The Greek translation of the O T, the Septuagint (LXX., begun c. 250 B.C., and perhaps completed by 150 B.C.), shows that in many places the text before the translators differed from the Hebrew text current to-day (see VERSIONS OF THE O T). The great Hexapla of Origen, c. 225 A.D. (a six-column edition of the O T, one column giving the Hebrew text), and the Latin Vulgate of Jerome (390-405 A.D.), who made use of the Hebrew, also furnish valuable testimony to the ancient Hebrew text. Finally, the Massoretes (Jewish scholars who were careful students of the text, 3d to 10th cent. A.D.) settled upon a uniform text which is that represented in practically all Hebrew MSS. extant. (See OLD TESTAMENT TEXT 5.)

The text of the N T has had a corresponding history. The autographs, written on papyrus, were perishable and soon disappeared. The first copying was of an unregulated and perhaps at times careless character. With the growth of the Church in numbers and culture more attention came to be paid to the copying of the text. At last, mainly through the influence of the first printed editions, one type of text, unfortunately very corrupt, the so called Textus Receptus, became dominant. Only within the last seventy years have more critical and therefore correct texts become available. (For a full discussion see NEW TESTAMENT TEXT.)

Since the Biblical material was produced under such a variety of circumstances, by so many different authors, and its composition covered such a long period of time, it is evident that the collection in its present form has a complicated history behind it. The O T was already complete before a word of the N T was written. But neither collection was the work of a single age or made at the dictation of any external authority. For full discussion of the formal steps that led to the final results in both cases see O T CANON and N T CANON. For the principles involved in a proper appreciation and study of the Bible see the articles on THE APPROACH TO THE BIBLE, at the beginning of this work.

BIGTHA, big'tha (בִּגְתָּה, bighthā). See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

BIGTHAN, big'than; BIGTHANA, big-fhē'na (בִּגְתָּן, בִּגְתָּנָה, bighthān, bighthānā): One of the chamberlains (lit. 'eunuchs') of Ahasuerus who kept the door of the palace (Est 2 21, 6 2).

BIGVAI, big'va-ai (בִּגְוַי, bighway): 1. One of the leaders of the Return (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7). 2. The ancestor of a large postexilic family (Ezr 2 14, 8 14; Neh 7 10), possibly the same as 1. 3. A representative of this family (Neh 10 61).

BILDAD, bil'dad (בִּלְדָּד, bildadh), 'Bel loves' (?): One of Job's friends (Job 2 11, etc.), called 'the Shuhite', i.e., of the line of Shuah, son of Abraham (Gn 25 2, 6).

BILEAM, bil'1-am. See IBLEAM.

BILGAH, bil'gu (בִּלְגָּה, bilgāh): The ancestral head of the fifteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 14; Neh 10 8 [Bilgai], 12 5, 18).

BILHAH, bil'ha (בִּלְהָה, bilhāh): I. The handmaid of Rachel and mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gn 29 29, 30 3-7, 35 22, etc.). See TRIBES, §§ 2, 3. II. A town in Simeon. See BAALAH, 2.

BILHAN, bil'han (בִּלְחָן, bilhān): 1. A Horite clan (Gn 36 27; I Ch 1 42). See HORITES. 2. A Benjamite clan (I Ch 7 10).

BILL. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 5; and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

BILSHAN, bil'shan (בִּלְשָׁן, bilshān): One of the leaders of the Return (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7).

BIMHAL, bim'hal (בִּמְחָל, bimhāl): One of the descendants of Asher and a son of Japhlet (I Ch 7 33).

BINEA, bin'1-a (בִּנְיָא, bin'ā): Son of Moza and a descendant of Jonathan (I Ch 8 37, 9 43).

BINNUI, bin'nū-ai (בִּנְנִי, binnūy), 'building': The ancestral head of the 'sons of Binnui,' one of the great postexilic families (Neh 7 15; Bani in Ezr 2 10). To this family most of the following individuals probably belonged: (a) The Levite (Ezr 8 33; Neh 12 8); perhaps the same person is called Bunni (Neh 9 4) and Bani (Neh 8 7). (b) One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab' and (c) 'one of the sons of Bani,' both of whom had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10 30, 38). (d) A Levite, the son of Henadad, who helped in repairing the wall (Neh 3 24, 10 9; the same as Bavai of 3 18?).

BIRDS. See PALESTINE, § 25.

BIRSHA, bir'sha (בִּרְשָׁה, birsha): King of Gomorrah (Gn 14 2). See CHEDORLAOMER.

BIRTH, BIRTHDAY, BIRTHRIGHT. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 6, 8.

BIRZAITH, bir-zē'ith; BIRZAVITH, -vith (בִּרְצָיִת or בִּרְצָיִת, birzāwīth or birzayīth): A place (?) in Asher (I Ch 7 31). Site unknown.

BISHLAM, bish'lām (בִּשְׁלָם, bishlām): A Persian official (Ezr 4 7).

BISHOP, BISHOPRIC. See CHURCH, § 8.

BIT, BRIDLE: These words, as used in EV, indicate three different objects: (1) The bridle (methegh, χαλινός), which includes the curb or bit, is mentioned as part of the harness of the horse (Ps 32 9, 'bit'; Rev 14 20) and ass (Pr 26 3). It is used figuratively for restraint (II K 19 28 = Is 37 29; Jas 1 26, 3 2 f., of the tongue) and for the authority of the mother-city (II S 11). (2) The rešen is a halter (EV 'bridle') and is used metaphorically for restraint of the actions (Job 30 11; Is 30 28). The 'double bridle' (Job 41 13, AV) of Leviathan seems to refer to his upper and lower jaws (so ARV). (3) The mahšōm was a muzzle, intended to prevent the animal from biting (Ps 39 1; cf. ARVmg.). See plate of ARTICLES USED IN TRAVEL, Fig. 5.

L. G. L.—L. B. P.

BITHIAH, bith'i-a (בִּיתְיָה, bithyāh): A daughter of Pharaoh whom Mered, a descendant of Judah, married (I Ch 4 18). The statement is a peculiar one and difficult of explanation.

BITHRON, bith'ren (בִּיתְרוֹן, bithrōn), 'the gorge': A wady through which Abner fled from the Jordan to Mahanaim (II S 2 29). Perhaps the Wādy 'Ajlūn, Map III, H 3.

BITHYNIA, bi-thin'i-a. See ASIA MINOR, III 2.

BITTER HERBS: One of the elements of the Passover meal (Ex 12 8; Nu 9 11). The herbs used were watercress, lettuce, endive, and chicory. They were either mixed or used separately. Regarding their significance different views are held, some alleging that they symbolized the sufferings of the people in Egypt, while others hold that like the prohibition of leaven they were the sign of the haste in which the Exodus took place.

A. C. Z.

BITTERN: The AV rendering of בִּטְרָן, qippōdh (Is 14 23, 34 11; Zeph 2 14). The meaning of the Heb. is not known. RV renders 'porcupine.' Cheyne (EB, s.v.) favors bittern. Socin, in Guthe's Bibelwörterbuch, thinks some kind of lizard is meant. See PALESTINE, §§ 24, 25.

E. E. N.

BITTER WATER. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

BIZIOTHIAH, biz'io-thai'a (בִּזְיוֹתְיָה, bizyōth-yāh; Bizjothjah, biz-joth'jā, AV: The reading found in the Heb. of Jos 15 28, but in LXX. and at Neh 11 27 we read 'and the towns thereof' (=Heb. בִּזְיוֹתַי), which is probably the true text. E. E. N.

BIZTHA, biz'thā. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

BLACK. See COLORS, § 1.

BLAIN. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (2).

BLASPHEME, BLASPHEMER, BLASPHEMY.

In the N T the words so reviewed exactly represent the Grk. βλασφημεῖν, βλάσφημος, βλασφημία, which mean 'speaking lightly, contemptuously or injuriously' of another. In the OT the root-idea of the Heb. originals (with one exception) is that of 'cutting into,' 'piercing' (thus injuring the honor or good name of another) or of 'spurning.' In I K 21 10, 13 the literal meaning of the Heb. bārakh is 'to bless' and the word is here used antithetically to express the exact opposite. See also CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c). E. E. N.

BLAST: The rendering of n'shāmāh, 'breath,' as in II S 22 16; Ps 18 15, where it is followed immediately by rūah, 'wind,' and of rūah in Ex 15 8; II K 19 7, etc. In all cases it refers to a manifestation of God's power, either in the physical world by wind or storm, or by a plague (Is 37 7), except in Is 25 4, where it refers to human violence. E. E. N.

BLASTUS, blas'tus (Βλάστος): The chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I (Ac 12 20), through whose intervention certain men from Tyre and Sidon secured an audience with the king. No mention is made of Blastus in Josephus' account of the death of Herod (Ant. XIX, 8 2). See HEROD AGRIPPA I. J. M. T.

BLEMISH. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5.

BLESS, BLESSING. See TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH.

BLINDNESS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, §§ 6 and 7.

BLOOD: 1. Significance. The important meaning attached to blood in the Oriental world was determined by the notion that the life principle either is the blood itself or has its residence in the blood (Lv 17 11). Just how such a notion might originate it is not difficult to understand when one considers that after the blood is allowed to run out of the body the life of the body is extinguished. This is true of both man and the lower animals (Gn 9 4).

2. Legislation About Blood. From this notion are deducible the prescriptions as to the treatment of the blood: (1) Blood was not to be made an article of food (Lv 7 26 f.; Dt 12 16). This law is applied to all blood, not simply to that of animals slain for sacrificial purposes. (2) The tabooing of the blood of sacrificial victims (I S 14 32). (3) The presentation of the blood of an innocent victim at the altar of Jehovah as pure life to cover the offending life of the offerer (Lv 1 5, etc. See also SACRIFICE). (4) The value of blood as means of ceremonial cleansing, as in the case of purification from leprosy (Lv 14 5-7). (5) The law of blood revenge, i.e., a life for a life.

(Gn 9 6; Dt 19 6), and (6) the use of blood as a means of establishing a covenant (Ex 24 6). Cf. Trumbull, Threshold Covenant. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16. A. C. Z.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF (gō'el haddām, Nu 35 19): The next of kin whose duty it became to visit vengeance for the violent death of those related to him. The duty was based on the theory that the family, tribe, and clan constituted sacred units. When the blood of a member of one of these units was shed, atonement was required either through the death of the shedder of the blood or through that of some member of the unit to which the offender belonged (II S 21 1-14; Jg 8 18-21). The earlier law made no distinction between intentional murder and undesigned homicide (Gn 9 6); the later (Nu 35 9 ff.) was a great improvement over the earlier in that it did and thereby softened the asperities of natural feeling, placing safeguards about the whole practise and thus preventing injustice and cruelty.

BLOODGUILTINESS. See BLOOD, 2 (5); and BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

BLOOD, ISSUE OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 8.

BLOODY FLUX. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (5).

BLOODY SWEAT: Taken literally this would mean the oozing of the blood through the pores of the skin, together with the perspiration. That under intense excitement such as was experienced by Jesus (Lk 22 44) perspiration sometimes breaks into bloody sweat is a well-known fact in medical science. But it is by no means certain that the text of Lk is pure (cf. Westcott and Hort, The N T in Greek, Vol. II, App. p. 64 ff.) or that the statement was intended as a literal one (cf. Plummer on Lk in ICC, 1896). A. C. Z.

BOANERGES, bō''a-nōr'jiz (Βοανηργές): A surname given by Jesus to James and John (Mk 3 17), interpreted by Mark to mean 'Sons of thunder' (Υἱοὶ Βροντῆς). The nearest known Aram. equivalent is b'nē r'ghaz or b'nē r'ghesh (see Dalman, Aram. Gr. 2, p. 144), which, however, means 'sons of wrath,' or 'sons of tumult,' not 'sons of thunder.' Mark's interpretation is perhaps a reminiscence of the tradition in Lk 9 54. For an explanation of B. as equivalent to the Dioscuri, or Heavenly Twins, see J. Rendel Harris, Expos. Feb., 1907. J. M. T.

BOAR. See PALESTINE, § 24.

BOAT. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 1.

BOAZ, bō'az (בּוֹאֵז, bō'az), 'swiftness' (so Oxf. Heb. Lex.): 1. A prominent citizen of Bethlehem, kinsman of Elimelech, husband of Naomi (Ru 2 1 ff.). Upon the return of Naomi from Moab with Ruth, her daughter-in-law, Boaz was led to take the later under his protection by purchasing the right of redemption from the next of kin. And as this right included according to the Law that of levirate marriage (Dt 25 5 ff.), Boaz took Ruth as his wife, and from this marriage sprang Obed, the grandfather of David (Ru 4 21 f.). The importance of Boaz in history is accordingly in the main genealogical (cf. Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32, Booz AV). 2. For the pillar called Boaz at the vestibule of Solomon's Temple, see TEMPLE, § 14. A. C. Z.

BOCHERU, bō'ke-rū or bek'1-rū (בְּכֶרֶךְ, bōkherū): A Benjamite of the stock of Saul through Jonathan (I Ch 8 38, 9 44).

BOCHIM, bō'kim (בְּכִים, bōkchim), 'weepers': A place where the Israelites were reproved by an angel (Jg 2 1, 5). In 2 1 LXX. reads 'Bethel,' which is probably the true reading. In that case 'Bochim' would be a place in or very near Bethel. See ALLON-BACUTH (cf. Moore on Judges, in Int. Crit. Com.). E. E. N.

BODY: The earliest Biblical usage has no fixed name for the human body as a living organism. Several terms are used which designate it from some portion or peculiarity, such as 'belly,' bēten (Mic 6 7; Job 19 17), which is quite uniformly, however, a synonym of 'womb'; also 'bowels,' mē'im (Song 5 14; 'back,' gēu, gēwāh, gēwiyāh (Is 51 23; Job 20 25; I S 31 10; also gabh, Job 13 12, AV); 'bone,' etsem (Ex 24 10, AV); 'thigh,' yārēkh (Jg 8 30); 'flesh,' bāsār (Is 10 18), also sh'er (Pr 5 11); 'breath,' nephesh (Lv 21 11); 'carcass,' nēbhēlāh (Dt 21 23), together with an occasional metaphorical expression such as 'house of clay' (Job 4 19). The later usage added to these gūphāh, 'back' (I Ch 10 12), g'shēm, 'material' (Dn 3 27), and nidneh, 'sheath' (Dn 7 16). In the NT the single term σῶμα is comprehensively used (except in Ac 19 12, where χρῶς, lit. 'skin,' is found). In Paul's conception of the spiritual body, there is a hypothetical counterpart of the animal organism with which the spirit of man is always found associated on earth. Such a hypothetical being, whatever its true nature, removes a difficulty in the way of belief in the resurrection (I Co 15 44). See also MAN, DOCTRINE OF, §§ 6, 7. A. C. Z.

BODY OF CHRIST. See KINGDOM OF GOD, § 8; and CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 4.

BOHAN, bō'han (בֹּחַן, bōhan), 'thumb': The stone of Bohan, son of Reuben, was a landmark on the NE. boundary of Judah (Jos 15 6, 18 17). No mention is made of B. in the genealogies of Reuben. The stone may have had the appearance of a great thumb. E. E. N.

BOIL. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (2), (3) and 5; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

BOLLED: The English word 'boiled' (Ex 9 31) means 'swollen,' as pods are by seed. But the Heb. term, gibh'āl, is more correctly rendered by the ARV 'in bloom.'

BOLSTER: The translation in AV of a Heb. term (m'ra'āshōth) meaning 'at the head of' or 'near the head' (IS 19 13 ff., 26 7 ff. cf. RV.).

BOLT. See HOUSE, § 6 (1).

BOND: Besides having its more common meaning of a fetter or chain (Jer 27 2; Ac 26 29; Eph 6 20) or of a pledge in connection with an oath or vow (Nu 30 2), the word stands in EV for (1) mōšar, the bond of a king (Job 12 18), i.e., the obligation imposed by the authority of a king; (2) māšōreth, the bond of the covenant (Ezk 20 37), i.e., the relation of the theocratic community; (3) σύνδεσμος, 'the bond of iniquity,' 'the bond of peace,' 'the bond of perfectness' (Ac 8 23; Eph 4 3; Col 3 14), i.e., the fellowship created by the acceptance of these as ideals of conduct. In I Co 12 13, etc., it is used to render δοῦλος, 'slave,' or 'bond servant.' See also SLAVERY, § 2; and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3. A. C. Z.

BOOKS AND WRITING. 1. Materials. In Biblical times, men wrote upon diverse materials, such as clay tablets, stone stelai, skins, painted wooden boards, waxed wooden tablets, potsherds, papyrus, and parchment. The Hebrews, following the practise of the Babylonians and Assyrians, used clay tablets for letters and records until the 8th century B.C., and for contracts until an even later date. Among the tablets found at Tel el-Amarna in Middle Egypt, dated c. 1380 B.C., are letters written by the Syrian governors in cuneiform characters, which contain Hebrew words, and the reference in Jer 32 10-12 is evidently to such a clay tablet, sealed in its clay envelope. These cuneiform characters were made with a wedge-shaped wooden stylus.

Inscribed tables of stone are mentioned in Ex 24, 12 and elsewhere in the Old Testament, and there exist to-day Hebrew inscriptions on stone, dating back to the 9th and 8th centuries B.C. The iron pen of Job 19 24 seems to imply a cold chisel for engraving on stone. But a more portable form of document was needed and we have every reason to believe that from the earliest times, the Hebrews committed their sacred writings to skins (διφθέραι). These are not specifically mentioned in the Old Testament but their manufacture is known to have been very ancient, and the copy of the law which is said to have been sent from Jerusalem to Alexandria in the 3d century B.C. for translation from Hebrew into the Greek version known as the Septuagint, was written on skins.

In Egypt, papyrus paper had been used from early Dynastic times and it was adopted in Palestine before the end of the 7th century B.C., in the lifetime of Jeremiah. In ch. 36 (LXX version) the prophet has two words to denote book, χάρτης for the roll of papyrus unincised and βιβλίον for the written roll of the book. By permitting greater facility in writing, papyrus encouraged the development and increase of Hebrew literature at this period. Apparently Jeremiah and his scribe Baruch wrote a cursive hand in place of the formal characters known to us on stone. Some centuries later, the modern square characters were adopted for sacred writings and it is this form which was familiar to Our Lord (cf. Lk 4 17). See ALPHABET.

For memoranda, brief letters, bills, contracts and schoolwork, wax tablets were regularly used from c.

300 B.C. to c. 300 A.D. and it was probably a wax tablet on which Zacharias wrote 'His name is John' (Lk 1 63). They were made of wood and resembled our school slates, having the waxed surface protected from injury by a raised rim. Single tablets do not appear; instead, two, three or more tablets were hinged together by thongs or strings and were known as diptychs, triptychs, etc. As the waxed surfaces were on the inside only, there was no danger of accidental erasure or injury. Letters and even legal documents have been found in this form, tied with string, the ends of which were sealed with wax or clay. The tablets were often supplied with handles by which to carry them or to hang them up. It is natural to see in the multiple tablets a suggestion of the later codex or book form.

2. Instruments. For incising waxed tablets a stylus (στῦλος) of bone, ivory, or metal was used, and the blunt or flattened end did duty for smoothing the wax surface for use again. Ink and a reed pen were employed by the scribe to write upon papyrus, parchment and vellum, and by the school boy to copy his exercises on painted board or potsherd. The end of the pen (κάλαμος III Jo 13) was softened in the mouth or later split like a quill. Ink (μέλαν), mentioned in II Co 3 3, II Jo 12 etc., was made from soot or charcoal with gum or glue, the mixture then being diluted with water. Ink made from sepia, like the India and Chinese inks to-day, may have been in use; it is doubtful if that made from galls was known. Ezekiel (9 2, 3, 11) mentions the writer's inkhorn at his girdle. A sponge (σηγγύς) served to clean the pen and to obliterate writing; the penknife (ξυρόν) for erasure and to sharpen the pen. With such a knife Jehudi (or the King?) cut the roll which Baruch had written at Jeremiah's dictation (Jer 36 23). With a disk of lead (μόλυβδος) and a ruler (κανών) the writer could score lines on papyrus or parchment for his guidance. With compasses or a pricker he could prick out the line and column spaces, and holes made in this way are seen in many a manuscript preserved to us. A piece of pumice-stone was needed for finishing the pen-point, and for smoothing the edges of the roll and the roughnesses of the surface of the papyrus and parchment.

3. Papyrus and rolls. For literary matter and fuller documents the roll form (Jer 36 2, Scroll, Is 34 4; Rev 6 14) was in use, whether of skin or of papyrus, or later of parchment. For such purposes, wax tablets were both cumbersome and perishable. Papyrus or πάπυρος sheets were prepared in Egypt from the stem of the papyrus reed (Cyperus papyrus), long and narrow strips being placed on a board side by side to the required width, forming a layer across which, at right angles, another layer of shorter strips was laid. Soaked, beaten and pressed together, the sheets assumed a paper-like consistency. A common size for these sheets was 9 to 11 inches high and 5 to 6 broad. A number of these were then joined together side by side, with paste, to form a roll of the required length. A common length in the time of Pliny was 20 sheets, but one existing Egyptian roll of prayers for the dead is 144 feet long. Excessive length led to complaints, such as that of Callimachus, who wrote in the 3d cent. B.C. that 'a great book is a great evil.' The difficulty of referring to any desired passage or incident was very great, especially as there was no division into chapter and verse or paragraphs; and in an age when strict quotation was actually alien in thought, the tendency to quote the general sense, or from memory, must have been irresistible. The cumbersomeness of the great rolls led to the division of the classics, such as the Iliad and the Odyssey, into books, which were merely rolls of modest size. Originally the word βιβλος, a book, did not mean a volume or a section of a work, but the material on which it was written, βύβλος being the name of the papyrus reed. By transference, the word came to be used for the matter written on the material. By the beginning of our era it had become customary to make rolls and sheets of certain sizes. St. Mark would have employed an average-sized roll of 19 feet for his gospel, whereas St. Luke, both for his Gospel and for Ac, needed the extreme size; and it may even be that he compressed his matter somewhat or modified his writing to accommodate it.

The scribe wrote normally on the inside of the papyrus, thus having the advantage of the horizontally stretched material. This provided not only an easy surface but a guide to level writing without the necessity of ruling, and was better adapted for rolling inwards. The roll had a cylinder (δυναλός) either attached to the end of the papyrus or loose, with its ends, called horns (κέρατα), projecting. The edges of the roll were trimmed, smoothed with pumice-stone and colored, generally black. The text was usually in narrow columns of from 2 to 3 inches, but wider in nonliterary MSS. In literary MSS, each column contained the same number of lines. This made for ease in calculating the number of lines in a roll, and in appraising the cost of copying. Opening the roll, the reader found it convenient to have as many as four columns before his eyes, and this habit was carried over at first to the parchment codices. An example of this is seen in the 4th century Codex Sinaiticus of the Bible, which has four columns on the page. Later codices illustrate the gradual dwindling from the four- to the familiar one-column. The text was without punctuation, very rarely a dot separated words, the line being a series of evenly written continuous letters. In copying there was a tendency to abbreviate words and to omit syllables. Naturally this led to ambiguity and errors. The reader held the roll in his right-hand, unwinding it with his left and then rolling up with that hand the part read. This image of the book unrolled is used of the heavens in Is 34 4 and Rev 6 14. At the end of the reading it was necessary to reverse the process, and to unroll the book and reroll it from the right-hand end. A number of rolls, such for instance as the books of the Iliad, would be kept together in a case or chest (κίστη or κιβωτός). A title στίλλυβος or στίτυβος on a small strip of papyrus was attached to the top edge, which could thus be easily read, whether the roll stood up on end with others in a chest, or lay on a shelf. Rolls on cognate subjects were kept together, and, if without titles, might after a lapse of time become confused, thus furnishing another cause of error. A possible example of this is the passage in Rom 16 1-23 which does not belong in its present position, but probably formed a separate epistle, perhaps addressed to the Ephesians (cf. EPHESIANS. EPISTLE TO, and also CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO, where this probability is used as solving the problem of the integrity of II Cor.)

Books, or rather rolls, were commonly copied for sale; and as publishers employed slaves for this work, and were only at the cost of their food and clothing, they were able to produce copies at reasonable prices. It is pointed out, however, that in the first centuries A.D., publishers would not have dared to issue the books of a persecuted sect, and yet before the 2d century the four Gospels appear to have been known in a very large number of the churches throughout the Empire. The explanation is that as the early Christian MSS. had been written in the main for private use, so also the early copies were made and circulated privately. The work of slaves as copyists was both mechanical and skilled, and resulted in fairly faithful texts. On the other hand, the work of amateurs, friends and converts, would not be mechanically correct, and variants naturally crept into the successive copies. Also since the writers were deeply interested in the subject matter, they no doubt sought to improve it by emending or by inserting new material from other sources, written or oral. An important example of this latter is the story of the woman taken in adultery (Jo 7 53-8 11), which is absent from the better MSS. It is estimated that there exist to-day more than 4000 Gr. MSS. of the books of the N T and probably 1000 early MSS. of translations, no two of which are exactly alike, tho helping very greatly in checking each other. Some of these variants are due to the fact that comments or emendations in the margin afterwards became embodied in the text.

Rolls could be protected from moths by being soaked in cedar-oil but not from wear and the effects of climate. Papyrus grows brittle in time and cracks. Thus gaps arose in the rolls or, if they were patched, a problematical restoration of the text took place. The same causes led to another serious result. The beginning and end of the roll naturally received the most wear and tear, and unless promptly patched or strengthened, these parts or either of them might be lost. This, it is conjectured, is the reason for the abrupt ending of St. Mark's Gospel at ch. 16 9 in two of the most important MSS. and at v. 8 in a third. The addition of vv. 10-20, which do not fit, is believed to have been made by a later hand (cf. also the case of II Cor.; see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO).

It seems probable, notwithstanding the remarkable discoveries of papyri in Egypt, that the original sources of the N T written on this material must have perished either through wear, climatic changes or as a result of persecutions. It is not impossible that there should yet be found in Egypt a 2d century copy of a Gospel or Epistle. If such a find were made we should expect it to prove to be a private copy, for the more accurate semi-official copies belonging to the churches, corresponding to library copies of the classics, would most probably have perished in the persecutions.

The text of the O T books must have suffered many of the misfortunes which befel that of the N T. In addition, there was a great lapse of time between the dates of the earlier books, such as Samuel and even Isaiah, and the fixing of the text in the Greek Septuagint version. It would indeed be a miracle if the original text of the O T had been preserved from error.

Knowledge of reading and writing was widespread in the 1st cent. A.D., and it is said that more than 200 years earlier a law had been passed at Jerusalem providing for the compulsory attendance of boys at elementary schools. From the practice of the times one may suppose that many persons jotted down, shortly after the Resurrection, notes of the incidents in the life of our Lord, and St. Luke may have referred to such in ch. 1 1-3. For literary purposes, however, an amanuensis would be required, as professional letter-writers are commonly employed in the East to-day. If even an educated man like Paul found it convenient to dictate his letters, much more would the fishermen Peter and John need such help. The effects of dictation are seen in the vividness of the narrative of an eye-witness, in occasional broken construction, and in sudden changes. It is also probable that St. Paul used different methods at different times, dictating word for word at one time and at another outlining the sense, to be embodied in the scribe's own words. In the case of St. Mark's Gospel it is the common accepted belief of scholars that the writer recorded in Greek reminiscences of many a narrative which he had heard in Aramaic from the lips of St. Peter as he preached.

A postal service existed in the Roman Empire for official purposes only, letters of private persons being forwarded through traveling friends (1 Pet 5 12, Eph 6 21, 22), merchants or captains of ships. This fact, together with the high cost of papyrus, led a number of friends to add their greetings at the end of letters, as in Rom 16 21-23, and Col 4 10-14.

4. Parchment and codices. Among the great city libraries of antiquity two stand out, those of Alexandria in Egypt and Pergamum in Asia Minor. A story, disputed but not disproved, tells us that in the 2d century B.C., one of the Ptolemies, jealous for the library at Alexandria, forbade the export of papyrus, hoping thereby to deal a blow to the Pergamum library. Pergamum was the center of the skin and leather trade, and probably the story witnesses to a new development due to a shortage of papyrus supplies. In the new preparation, instead of tanning the skins, both sides were prepared in such a manner as to give two writing surfaces, which in the early stages were probably rather rough. The material used was the skin of the sheep or goat, and possessed this advantage that in time it could be manufactured anywhere, altho it always kept the name of περγαμηνή, (adj. = 'Pergamene' s. c. skin), parchment, from the city of its invention. The earliest biblical manuscripts which are approximately complete were written on parchment or vellum. The latter was made, strictly speaking, from the skins of young calves and lambs, and provided a surface superior to parchment. The new material was neither fragile nor perishable, and with a writing surface on both sides, it encouraged the use of book or codex form for which it was so well-suited. The leaves of parchment or vellum were folded once, arranged in quires, and sewn as modern books. While it is true that papyrus was used mainly in the roll, codices are known, and indeed the earliest fragments of the N T writings dating from the 3d and 4th centuries are pages from papyrus codices. Parchment did not become common until the 3d century A.D. and did not supplant papyrus until the 5th century. The codex form received an impetus, not only from the convenience of parchment but also from the Christian demand for the Scriptures; for a single codex could hold the O T and N T, whereas in the old material 30 rolls would have been required. The conversion of the emperor Constantine and the establishment of the Christian religion in the 4th century led to the multiplication of the Scriptures. No longer was it necessary to have them copied furtively. Professional scribes wrote them more accurately and in the literary hand. From this time there is a decided improvement in the penmanship, which, freed from the limitations of space, grew larger and better.

5. Palimpsests. Reasons of economy led sometimes in later days to the practise of sponging off as much as possible of the old writing, and using the material again for another document. Thus unintentionally have been preserved to us, tho faint and read with difficulty, some valuable and ancient MSS. It is this practise of blotting out which is referred to in Col. 2 14. It was possible to do this with a papyrus MSS. only when the ink was fresh. If old rolls of papyrus were used again, it was by crossing out the original text or by writing on the back. In Ezk 2 10 reference is made to writing on both sides of the roll in order to emphasize the limitless nature of the message of lamentation and wo.

BOOTH: In the climate of Biblical lands, the booth or bower (sukkāh), constructed in the form of a tent from branches of trees, is a very convenient refuge from the heat of the sun by day and a comfortable place for sleep at night. It was used for the accommodation of both men and beasts (Gn 33 17; Job 27 18; Jon 4 5). Essentially the same thing is meant by the term 'lodge' in Is 1 8. Cf. also VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

BORDER: (1) The word g'bhāl, used in most of the geographical notices of the O T, means 'boundary' or 'limit.' Sometimes other terms as g'ilālāh, 'circuit,' 'region,' RV (Jos 13 2, etc.), yarkhāh, 'side' (Gn 49 13), qēts or qātsēh, 'end' or 'extremity' (II K 19 23; Ex 16 35, etc.), sāphāh, 'lip' (Jg 7 22), tōtsā'ōth, 'outgoings' (I Ch 5 16) are used. Yādāh, 'hand' (II S 8 3; I Ch 7 29) means dominion or power. In Jos 11 2 'borders of Dor' means the high land, near Carmel, belonging to Dor. In the N T τὰ ὅρια (Mk 7 24; cf. Mt 4 13) means 'boundary' or 'frontier.' (2) The word is used also of the hem or edge (Heb. kānāph, 'wing') of a garment (Nu 15 38; cf. κράσπεδον, Mt 23 5, etc.), of the enclosing edge; misgereth, of a table or other structure (Ex 25 25; I K 7 28, etc.). In Ex 13 7, 28 26, 39 19; Dt 19 8, II S 8 3; II K 19 23; Song 1 11; Is 26 15, 37 24 the RV corrects the AV.

BOTTLE: (1) The baqbūq or 'gurgler' (I K 14 3; Jer 19 1, 10) was an earthenware bottle or cruse. (2) The nēbbel sometimes denoted a breakable jar (Is 22 24, 30 14; Jer 13 12, 48 12; La 4 2). (3) In all other instances (except Hos 7 5; Hab 2 15, where the meaning of the Heb. is 'heat' or 'rage'; cf. RV) the 'bottle' of AV ('ōbh, hēmeth, nō'dh = ἀσκάς) is a vessel made of goatskin, and is usually translated 'skin' or 'wine-skin' by ARV or ARVmg. (e.g., Job 32 19; Gn 21 14; Mt 9 17). BOW: Metaphorically, the word is used to signify the military power or prestige of a nation or people; cf. Gn 49 24; Jer 49 35; Hos 1 5. In the same way it is symbolical of God's power and wrath in action against His enemies; cf. Ps 7 12; La 2 4. See also ARMS AND ARMOR, § 3. As used in Gn 9 13 ff., see RAINBOW. II S 1 18a is of quite uncertain meaning. EV supplies 'the song of' before 'bow' to make sense. But this is mere conjecture. See ICC ad loc. E. E. N.

BOZRAH, bez'ra (בֹּזְרָא, bōtsrāh), 'fortress': 1. The capital of Edom (Gn 36 33; Is 34 5; 63 1; Jer 49 13; Am 1 12), located by modern explorers at el Buseira, about 50 m. SE. of the Dead Sea (Robinson, Expl. III, p. 125; Buhl, Edomiter, p. 37). 2. A city in Moab (Jer 48 24), probably the same as Bezer (Dt 4 43). BRANCH (פָּרָךְ, tsemah): A designation of the Messiah first used as such by Jeremiah (23 5, 33 15), altho it had been employed in an impersonal sense as early as by Isaiah (4 2). Later it was taken up by Zechariah (3 8, 6 12) and more definitely identified with the ideal king of Israel. Its selection was made at a time when the house of David viewed as a tree was in a decaying condition, showing signs of a speedy and complete collapse. In the prophetic vision the dying away of the tree was not to be its final disappearance. A new branch, shoot, or sprout (nētsar) would issue from its trunk in the person of the Messiah (Is 11 1). (3) Of pārats (vb.) and perets (n.), 'to break,' 'a breaking,' especially associated with the idea of violence (II S 5 20, 6 8, etc., very frequent). (4) Of shebher, a breaking or crushing that has serious results (Lev 24 20, etc.). In Jg 5 17 both 'breaches' AV and 'creeks' RV are open to objection. Moore (ICC) renders 'landing-places.' On Nu 14 34 AV cf. RVmg. for the true sense. In Am 6 11 the Heb. r'shshim means 'ruins,' rather than 'breaches.' E. E. N.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD, THE (οἱ ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ κυρίου): A term used by Paul in I Co 9 5 (cf. also Gal 1 10) to designate the brethren of Jesus who are referred to in the Gospels (Mk 3 31 ff. and ||s, 6 3 and ||; Mt 28 10 [?]; Jn 2 12, 7 3, 5, 10, 20 17 [?]), and in Ac 1 14, and whose names are given as James, Joseph (Joseph, v.l. John; Mt 13 55), Judas, and Simon.

As to the specific relationship which they sustained to Jesus, there has been question since the early ages of the Church, the discussion formulating itself finally in three views, termed by Lightfoot (Com. on Galatians, p. 242), after the names of their foremost supporters, (1) the Epiphanian, that the brethren of Jesus were the children of Joseph by a former wife; (2) the Helvidian, that they were children of Joseph and Mary, younger than Jesus; (3) the theory of Jerome, that they were not brothers but cousins of Jesus.

In the earliest period of which we have knowledge after the Apostolic Age, Christian opinion was divided between the first and second of these views. The language of Lk 2 7, Mt 1 25 (see below), naturally suggested that Joseph and Mary had children younger than Jesus, whom the evangelists, not inappropriately, termed his brothers and sisters. This opinion, (the 'Helvidian') is mentioned by Origen (Tom. x. 17, on Mt 13 55) as if current in his time but not universally held; a half-century earlier it seems to have been the view of Tertullian (Contra Marcionem iv. 19; De carne Christi 7), to whom it was acceptable because he valued marriage but condemned second marriage ('unum matrimonium novimus sicut unum deum,' De monogamia 1).

The other early view mentioned (the 'Epiphanian') is the basis of the interesting and influential 'Protevangelium Jacobi,' a fictitious narrative of the birth and early history of the Virgin Mary, of which the greater portion seems to have been written in the late 2d or early 3d century. Here Joseph is expressly stated to have been a widower eighty years old at the time of his betrothal to Mary, and to have had already a number of children by his first wife. Mary, who, according to this book, had been born miraculously, and brought up in the Temple, was entrusted to Joseph as his wife with express understanding that her virginity should be perpetual. The idea that the brethren were Joseph's older children by an earlier marriage may very likely have been adopted by the Protevangelium from earlier popular thought; it was perhaps the view of Clement of Alexandria († ca. 215), and was definitely affirmed by Origen († 254), altho he seems aware that it was only a theory, resting on dogmatic and sentimental grounds, and possessing no claim to have been transmitted by actual tradition. Origen states that it was found in the apocryphal 'Gospel according to Peter' (2d cent.), of which only a fragment from the later sections has been preserved to us.

The view of Origen evidently gained ground rapidly, and in the 4th cent. had come to prevail nearly everywhere. Epiphanius (376-377) wrote a powerful attack (Adv. haereses iii. 2) on those unimportant, or even heretical, groups of Christians who did not hold it; hence the name 'Epiphaniian' applied to it. It accorded not only with popular Christian sentiment, but also with the dominant monastic asceticism of the time. It was held by many Latin fathers, and by nearly all the Greek fathers from the 4th cent. on, and has been the view of the Greek Orthodox Church and the Oriental Churches down to the present day.

In the 4th cent., however, an otherwise unknown Roman lay Christian, Helvidius, disaffected in general toward the current monkish asceticism, wrote a treatise maintaining the natural view that the 'brethren' were the children of Joseph and Mary (hence the name 'Helvidian'). To this Jerome wrote a reply (ca. 380), entitled Adversus Helvidium de perpetua virginitate B. Mariae, and in the course of it developed what appears to have been a wholly original theory (hence called 'Hieronymian', from Hieronymus = Jerome), which can best be exhibited in the following table of supposed relationships.

The assumption necessary for this theory was that 'brethren' meant cousins. Altho this assumption is unlikely, and to most Protestant scholars seems impossible (I Ch 23 21 f., Lv 10 4, Gn 14 14 f., 29 15 appear to have no more bearing on the question than would Ro 7 4 or I Co 1 1), Jerome's theory was attractive to his contemporaries, and for them was superior to the Epiphaniian view in that it permitted belief in the perpetual virginity of Joseph as well as of Mary. It rapidly conquered the Latin-speaking church, so that in less than a century it was the common view of Western Christendom; and it is still the established tradition of Roman Catholics.

The men of the Reformation did not reject this current view, and, with a few notable exceptions, such as Hugo Grotius (1645, Epiphaniian), it was generally held by Protestant theologians and scholars until the end of the 18th century. Since that date Protestant thought has gradually turned against it, and at present it is probable that but few Protestant scholars accept it.

The main Biblical argument for Jerome's view is derived from the supposed implication in Gal 1 19 that 'James the Lord's brother' was one of the twelve apostles. Since James the son of Zebedee had been executed about 44 A.D. (Ac 12 2), that implication, if accepted, would require the identification of 'James the Lord's brother' with the apostle 'James the son of Alphæus' (Mk 3 18 and ||s). The other chief data for the table of relationships are found in Jn 19 25, Mk 15 40. But the historical constructions based on these passages crumble under analysis; while many improbabilities in detail combine with the indication (Jn 7 5; Mk 3 21, 31,) that Jesus' brethren did not believe on him in the period when the apostles were chosen, to make Jerome's theory unacceptable.

Since both the Epiphaniian and (with increasing dominance) the Helvidian view have been held by modern Protestant scholars, and since the two views are alike attested for the second century, it is evident that the positive evidence in either direction is not very convincing. Some of the arguments brought forward are as follows:

I. Arguments for the Epiphaniian View: (1) Mary's reply to the angel's announcement that she should conceive and bring forth a son ('How shall this be, seeing that I know not a man,' Lk 1 34) is said to imply that with Joseph's consent she had devoted herself to a life of virginity even in marriage. (2) The brethren of Jesus conduct themselves toward Him with a spirit of superiority natural to older brothers, presuming to control His conduct (Mk 3 21 with 31 and ||s) and advise Him in a faultfinding way (Jn 7 2 f.). (3) At the Cross Jesus commits His mother to the care of (His cousin?) John (Jn 19 26 f.), which would be more natural on His part if His 'brethren' were not Mary's own children. (4) In addition to these arguments from the Gospel narratives, some feel it inherently unlikely that after the miraculous event of the birth of Jesus, and in view of ancient (but not Jewish) ideals of the superiority of virginity, Joseph and Mary should have united to raise up seed.

II. Arguments for the Helvidian View: (1) Lk 2 7 ('And she brought forth her firstborn son' καὶ ἔτεκεν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτῆς τὸν ἀπαρχόγονον), and Mt 1 25 ('and knew her not till she had brought forth a son' καὶ οὐκ ἐγίνωκεν [v. l. ἔγνω] αὐτὴν ἕως οὗ ἔτεκεν αὐτόν) do not seem to imply the perpetual virginity of Mary, but rather (altho not certainly) the opposite. (2) These brethren not only lived under the same roof with Mary, but are found in her company on more than one occasion (Mk 3 31 f. and ||s; Jn 2 12; Ac 1 14), which would be natural if they were her children as well as Joseph's.

The positive arguments for the Epiphaniian view do not indicate with any clearness that the evangelists held the 'brethren of the Lord' to have been children of Joseph but not of Mary; on the other hand the passages adduced for the Helvidian view are inconclusive, altho the natural impression conveyed by them (esp. by Mt 1 26) is that Jesus, supernaturally conceived tho he was, was deemed by the evangelists to have been but the first of Mary's children. In these circumstances the student's conclusion as to the actual fact will depend on his theological and historical presuppositions; nothing in the Gospels forbids either view.

BRIBERY. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, 2 (b).

BRICK, BRICK-KILN: Brickmaking was well understood among the Israelites, since their houses of the more common sort were often constructed of bricks (see HOUSE, § 4), tho the references to such are very few in the O T (II S 12 31; Is 9 10). The art of brickmaking was highly developed in Babylonia (cf. Gn 11 3) and in Egypt (cf. Ex 1 14, 5 7-10). From the Egyptian inscriptions and illustrations on the walls of temples, tombs, etc., a very complete knowledge of the ancient process of brick-making can be gained. The details agree quite closely with those in Ex 5 7 ff. The Heb. malbēn, rendered 'brick-kiln' in EV (II S 12 31; Nah 3 14) should be rendered 'brick-mold' as in ARVmg. On Jer 43 9 cf. RVmg. (The Heb. malbēn, 'brick-mold' suggested the derived meaning 'square' from its rectangular shape.) E. E. N.

BRIMSTONE: The Heb. term gophrith, (LXX. θείον) 'sulfur,' is of uncertain derivation. Many connect it with kōpher, 'bitumen,' of which there is an abundance in the Jordan Valley and near the Dead Sea. The 'raining' of brimstone (Gn 19 24, etc.) refers perhaps to combustion of sulfur or petroleum from sulfur or petroleum springs which thus could be used as illustrations of the Divine judgment, especially under the influence of the story in Gn 19. BROID, broid, BROIDER, brei'der: The word riqmāh, so rendered in Ezk chs. 16, 26, and 27, means 'variegated' and indicates that the garments were of variegated colors, not that they were embroidered. In Ex 28 4 tashbēts and in I Ti 2 9 πλέγμα are rendered in AV 'broidered,' but cf. RV for a more correct translation. E. E. N.

BROOCH. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II. 2.

BROOK: With only a few exceptions the Heb. word rendered 'brook' is nahal, which means either the valley or ravine in which water is found (cf. Gn 26 19; Nu 21 15; Job 30 6) or the brook itself. Palestine abounds in such valleys with thin brooks. Nahal is the word used for the streams that run only a part of the year, drying up in the summer-time, while nāhār is the proper word for the larger permanent river. But this distinction is not always observed. E. E. N.

(2) מִצְוֵר, mātsōdh, 'fortification' (Ec. 9 14). (3) מִצְוֵר, mātsōr, a besieger's wall (Dt 20 20). (4) Of פִּנָּה, pinnāh, 'corner' (II Ch 26 15 AV, 'battlements' RV). BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS. I. PREPARATORY TO BURIAL: 1. Preparation of the Body. Customs and usages connected with death reach back into remote antiquity, and show the family to have been even then a social-religious unit. When death occurred, it was a duty to close the eyes (Gn 46 4), probably also the mouth of the person. It is true this is distinctly mentioned only in the Mishna (cf. Tract. Shabbath 23 5—codified about 200 A.D.), but the custom certainly antedates this tractate. Kissing the dead (Gn 50 1) was probably exceptional. The body was washed (Ac 9 37) and anointed (Mk 16 1; Lk 24 1; Jn 12 7, 19 40). It was wrapped in a white linen sheet (Mk 15 46 and ||s), the hands and feet being bound (Jn 19 40) with grave-bands (RV mg.; Gr. καίρα) and the face with a napkin (σουδάριον, 'kerchief'), Jn 11 44. How ancient these customs were it is not possible to determine.

II BURIAL. 2. Interment Ceremonies. The Israelites did not embalm their dead (cf. Gn 50 2 f., 26). From I S 28 14; Is 14 9 ff.; Ezk 32 27, we must conclude that in the ancient period the dead were buried with the garments they had worn while living. According to Jer 34 5; II Ch 16 14, 21 19 (cf. Jos. BJ. I, 33 9), spices were burned beside the bodies of prominent men. Later it was the custom to bury together with the dead objects which had been used by them during life, e.g., inkhorns, pens, writing-tablets, keys, etc. Herod furnished Aristobulus his funeral spices and other articles (Jos. Ant. XV, 3 4). Probably this custom goes back to older times (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII, 8 4; XVI, 7 1). Cremation was not practised in Israel (cf. Comm. on I S 31 12; Am 6 10); the usage was rather to bury the dead, while cremation, e.g., of criminals (Lv 20 14, 21 9; Jos 7 25; cf. Dt 21 23), appears as a disgrace added to the penalty of death (Mishna, Tract. Aboda Zara I, 3 rejects cremation as heathen practise. Cf. Tac. Hist. V, 5 4).

3. Importance of Burial. Not to be buried was considered by the Israelites, as by other peoples of antiquity, a frightful fate which one wished visited only on his worst enemies (Am 2 1; cf. Is 33 12; Jer 16 4; Ezk 29 5; II K 9 10). This is to be explained from the belief that the spirits of the unburied dead were obliged to drift about restlessly. Even in Sheol the lot of the unburied is lamentable. They must shift about uneasily in nooks and corners (Ezk 32 23; Is 14 15, etc.).

4. Mode of Burial. In all probability burying came usually on the very day of death, as at present in the Orient. Of coffins the Israelites knew as little as the ancient Arabs (II K 13 21). The body was carried on a litter or bier (miṭṭāh II S 3 31; cf. Lk 7 14), and was followed by mourners who chanted lamentations.

III. PLACE OF BURIAL: 5. The Grave. In view of the belief that family unity survived death we can understand the importance attached to the custom of placing bodies in a household grave; it was thus that connection with the family was preserved after death (cf. Gn 15 15, 25 8, 17, 35 28, etc.). It is obvious that in ancient times these household graves were located upon land belonging to the family and in proximity to the house (cf. Gn ch. 23; I S 25 1; accordingly the tombs of the kings down to Ahaz are found in the citadel, later in the 'garden of Uzza,' which in any case is to be sought for in the vicinity (cf. Ezk 43 7). Preferably such graves were located under shade-trees (sacred trees, Gn 35 8; I S 31 13), or in gardens (II K 21 18, 20). Gradually the habit prevailed of placing them outside of inhabited districts and of making use of clefts and of caves, in which the country abounded. For the most part, however, the graves were excavated and the effort was made to place them on the rocky hillsides and often on heights difficult of access (Is 22 16; II K 23 16); but in view of the dangers from beasts of prey, their openings were closed with heavy stones. The sepulcher was always strictly regarded as family property, in which no stranger should be laid. Only in later times, as older views were relaxed, did strangers, in exceptional circumstances, find burial in them (II Ch 24 16; Mt 27 60). For the destitute (II K 23 6; Jer 26 23) and for pilgrims (Mt 27 7) there were common, i. e., public cemeteries, where criminals also were interred (Jer 26 23; Is 53 9; I K 13 22).

6. Sanctity of the Grave. Inasmuch as the graves of ancestors were in earlier times places of worship (shrines), and as such, holy ground, it is easy to understand that over the tomb of Rachel a matstsēbhāh ('pillar') was raised (Gn 35 20). It appears probable that the sacredness of some shrines rests upon the fact that they were burial-places of heroes (cf. Hebron, Gn 23, 25 9, 49 31; Shechem, Jos 24 32; Kadesh-barnea, Nu 20 1). The tomb of Deborah was under a sacred tree near Bethel (Gn 35 8). In later times sepulchers as a whole were regarded as unclean, because associated with another worship—i. e., the worship of the spirits of the departed as contrary to the worship of Jehovah, and the custom arose of whitewashing the stones which covered them in order to render them distinguishable from afar and keep passers-by from ceremonial pollution (Mt 23 27).

IV. MOURNING. 7. Customs of Mourning. Upon the news of the death of a relative it was customary to rend the clothes (II S 1 11) and gird oneself with the mourning garment (cf. II S 3 31 ff., which originally was probably nothing but a loin-cloth. Among the Arabians the custom prevailed of going about naked as a sign of mourning. Whether this was practised in Israel is doubtful (Mic 18; Is 20 2 f. are not clear evidences of such a usage). But it was customary to go bareheaded and barefoot (Ezk 24 17; II S 15 30), to sprinkle dust and ashes on the head (Jos 7 6; II S 1 2), to cover the head, or at least the beard (Ezk 24 17; Jer 14 3; II S 15 30), or to place the hand on the head (II S 13 18 f.), and to sit in dust and ashes (Jer 6 26; Job 2 8). In addition, various disfigurements and mutilations were self-inflicted. The head was shaved (Jer 16 6, 47 5); the beard was cut off, or at least clipped (Jer 41 5, 48 37; Is 15 2; Lv 19 27); gashes were made on the whole body, or at least on the hand (Jer 16 6, 41 5, etc.). It was quite usual upon the occurrence of a death to follow the wide-spread custom of holding a funeral repast (Hos 9 4; II S 3 35; Jer 16 7 f.; Ezk 24 17, 22). In addition there were separate offerings of food and drink which were placed upon the grave (Dt 26 14). From To 4 18 and Sir 30 18 f., we learn that this custom continued until quite late. Widespread was also the custom, while the women of the house were sitting upon the earth weeping, for professional female mourners to come and chant peculiar rhythmic lamentations beginning with 'ēkh or 'ēkhāh. Evidently this custom of funereal lamentation was a religious usage regulated by nearness of relationship (cf. Zec 12 10 ff.). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

8. Significance of These Customs. How these different customs are to be accounted for is a much-debated problem, which has not yet been brought to a definite solution. Particularly, it is in no way certain that all these customs can be traced back to one original idea and practise. Some may possibly be conceived as expressions of the vivid sense of grief peculiar to the Oriental; but the attempt to say this of all, as Kamphausen and others have done, has failed. As far as one class of these customs is concerned, it is not to be disputed that they probably were connected with the worship of the deceased, once prevalent also in Israel. This in no way means that the Israelites in all ages were conscious of such connection. It is much more likely that in this case, as in many others, such customs continued even when the original idea from which they sprang had long since disappeared.

BURNING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a); BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 2; MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 6; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 6 ff., 16.

BURNT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 6.

BURY, BURYING-PLACE. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, §§ 2-6.

BUSH, THE BURNING: The instrument of a theophany in the experience of Moses (Ex 3 2 f.; Dt 33 16; Lk 20 37; Ac 7 30, 35). The natural mechanism of the phenomenon may have been electrical

(W. Robertson Smith, Rel. Sem. II, p. 193 f.). The important feature of it is the revelation of God through it to Moses. The effort to identify the species of the bush (Heb. šeneh) with the senek, a thorny shrub, is not altogether successful. A. C. Z.

BUSHEL. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

BUSINESS: This term is used in EV in a variety of senses, corresponding to the different original Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) As the rendering of dābhār, 'word,' often used in the more general sense of 'matter,' 'affair,' like the Gr. λόγος (Dt 24 5; Jos 2 14, etc.). (2) Of m'lā'khāh 'work,' i.e., 'occupation,' (Gn 39 11; cf. RV; I Ch 26 30, etc.). (3) Of 'inyān, 'occupation,' 'task,' (Ec 5 3, 8 16). Most of the other cases need no comment. On Lk 2 49; Ro 12 11 (both AV) cf. RV for the correct rendering. E. E. N.

BUTLER. See CUPBEARER.

BUTTER. See FOOD, § 6.

BUY. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

BUZ, buz (בז, būz): 1. The name of a region (Jer 25 23) probably somewhere in N. Arabia, possibly the Bāzū of the Assyrian inscriptions. The inhabitants were called Buzites (Job 32 2, 6). 2. 'Son' of Nahor, and therefore apparently an Aramean tribe which may have lived in Buz (Gn 22 21). 3. A descendant of the tribe of Gad (I Ch 5 14). E. E. N.

BUZI, biū'zai (בזי, būzī): The father of the prophet Ezekiel (Ezk 1 3).

BYPATH, BYWAY. See WAY.

BYWORD: (1) In Job 30 9 the Heb. millāh means 'word.' (2) In Job 17 6; Ps 44 14 māshāl, the ordinary word for 'proverb,' means a saying of more than ordinary significance (in a good or evil sense). (3) In Dt 28 37; I K 9 7; II Ch 7 20 sh'mināh from shānan, 'to sharpen,' means a 'sharp' saying, i.e., one with a 'sting' to it. See TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH. E. E. N.

C

CAB. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

CABBON, cab'ben (קבון, kabbōn): A town of Judah near Eglon (Jos 15 40), site unknown.

CABINS: This term occurs only in Jer 37 16 (AV), for which RV has, more correctly, 'cells.'

CABUL, kē'būl (קבול, kābhūl): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27), Map IV, C 6. In I K 9 13 it is said that Hiram called the 20 cities in Galilee given him by Solomon 'the land of Cabul,' apparently indicative of his dissatisfaction. Popular etymology may have interpreted 'Cabul' as 'good for nothing.' E. E. N.

CÆSAR (Καῖσαρ): The surname of Julius Cæsar and then, after the organization of the empire by his heir Augustus, the general title of the Emperors; hence, practically equivalent to 'the emperor.' (cf. e.g., Ac 25 8, 11 f., etc.)

CÆSAR AUGUSTUS. See AUGUSTUS.

CÆSAREA, ses'ā-rī'ā: A city on the coast of Palestine (Map I, C 5). The ancient name of the site, 'Straton's Tower' (Jos Ant. XIII, 12 2), may have been derived from the name of one of the Sidonian kings (cf. CIGr. 87). The city became a part of the domain of Herod the Great, who rebuilt both city and harbor on a magnificent scale (Jos. BJ. I, 21 5 8), naming the city Καισάρεια and the harbor Λιμὴν Σεβαστῆς in honor of Augustus. After the deposition of Archelaus in 6 A.D., C. became the residence of the Roman procurators. C. plays an important part in Apostolic and post-Apostolic history (cf. Ac 10 1 ff. etc. and Eusebius, HE II 3 and passim.) See Plan on page 120. J. M. T.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, fī-lip'oi (Map IV, F 4): The site, near one of the sources of the Jordan, is probably the same as that of Baal Gad (Jos 11

17) and Baal-hermon (Jg 3 3), so called because it was an early seat of Canaanitic worship. Under Greek domination site and district were called Paneion, Panias or Paneas (Jos. Ant. XV 10 3, XVIII, 2 1, Pliny Hist. Nat. V, 18), from a grotto dedicated to the god Pan (cf. the inscription, Πανί τε καὶ Νύμφαις). The tetrarch Philip renamed the place Cæsarea in honor of Augustus (Jos. BJ. II, 9 1). In the N T (Mt 16 13; Mk 8 27) and Josephus (BJ. III, 9 7; Vita. 13) it is known as Cæsarea Philippi, to distinguish it from Cæsarea on the coast. Under Agrippa II the city was called Neronias, but after the 4th cent. only the old name Paneas occurs, still preserved in the modern Arabic name of the place, Bāniās. J. M. T.

CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD (οἱ ἐκ τῆς καίσαρος οἰκίας): A group of Christians mentioned in Ph 4 22, whose greetings are sent to the Church in Philippi. Since familia (οἰκία) is used to include the dependents as well as the immediate members of the household it is not necessary to assume that the converts to whom Paul here refers were of distinguished rank (cf. Dissertation by Lightfoot in Ep. to the Phil., p. 169 f.). See also PRETORIUM. J. M. T.

CAGE. In Jer 5 27 the Heb. k'labh means the wicker-basket in which the fowler placed the captured birds. Such baskets, filled to capacity with living birds, were probably a familiar scene in the markets of ancient cities. In Rev 18 2 the exact meaning to be assigned to the Grk. φυλακή, 'cage' AV, 'hold', RV, 'prison' RVmg. is somewhat uncertain, see Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John, ad loc. E. E. N.

CAIAPHAS, kē'a-fas or kai'a-fas (Καϊάφας): The high priest before whom Jesus was tried (Jn 18 14 f.). His original name was Joseph (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 2), and he was the son-in-law of Annas (Jn 18 13). He became high priest not later than 18 A.D. (Ant. XVIII, 2 2), and retained his office until about 36 A.D. (Ant. XVIII, 2 2, 4 3). His adroitness and capacity for intrigue are well illustrated in Jn 11 49 f. He naturally presided at the session of the Sanhedrin at which Jesus' arrest was planned (Mt 26 3), and after His condemnation it was his official duty as head of the nation to deliver Him to Pilate with the request for His execution, (Mt 26 57 f.; Jn 18 24, 28; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII 2 2, 4 3, XX, 10, end; Contra Apionem, II, 23; J. M. T.

CAIN, kēn (כַּיִן, qayin), 'smith,' 'artificer': I. The eldest son of Adam and Eve (Gn 4 1 f.). In the ancient story of Gn ch. 4 by a popular etymological word-play the name is made to mean 'acquired' or 'possession.' The material in Gn 4 1-24 is not all of the same character. The Cain of vs. 12 f. (a 'fugitive' and a 'wanderer') is not the Cain of vs. 16 f. (a city builder and head, after Adam, of one of the great genealogical lines of descent). The story in vs. 2-15 probably reflects some ancient struggle or antipathy between two different types (or tribes) of men. That in vs. 16 f. is an ancient attempt at tracing the development of civilization by connecting the discovery of the different arts with certain legendary heroes. In the names Jabal (v. 20) the 'father' of shepherds, and Tubal-Cain (v. 22) the 'smith,' it is not difficult to see another form of the legend of v. 2. The two stories later became connected, perhaps through the ancient song of Lamech (q.v.) which may have been originally entirely independent of both (cf. ver 15 with ver 24). The 'sign' put upon Cain is thought by some to have been the totem sign of the clan or tribe of Cain. The Cain-genealogy in Gn 4 16 f. (J) is but another form, presumably a simpler and earlier one, which took no account of the flood, of the Seth-genealogy of P in 5 1-31 which conforms more closely in outline to the Babylonian form found in Berossus. Fragments of another Seth-genealogy survive in 4 25 and 5 29 (J also, but from another source). See A. R. Gordon, Early Traditions of Genesis (1907) pp. 188-192; J. Skinner in ICC Genesis, ad loc. II. A town in Judah (Jos 15 57). See KAIN. E. E. N.

CAINAN, kē'nān (כַּיִן, qēnān): 1. Son of Enosh. See KENAN. 2. Son of Arphaxad (Lk 3 36). In the Heb. text of Gn 10 24, 11, 12, there is no mention of Cainan. Luke has followed the LXX., where the name was probably interpolated to make 10 terms in the genealogy. E. E. N.

CAKE. See FOOD, § 2; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

CALAH, kē'la (כַּלַּח, kelah, Assyrian kalhu, kalah): One of the chief cities (next to Asshur and Nineveh) in Assyria, said in Gn 10 11 to have been built by Nimrod. It acquired importance under Shalmaneser I in the 14th cent. B.C. The period of its greatest glory was during the reigns of Assurnasirpal and Shalmaneser III (885-824 B.C.). Many of the inscriptions of these kings have been discovered on its site, which is identified by Layard and G. Smith with the mound Nimrud, about 20 m. SE. of Nineveh (Kuyunjik). It was the first of these kings (Assurnasirpal) who built and fortified the town, adorned it with a palace, constructed a canal, and induced many to take up their residence in the city. A. C. Z.

CALAMUS. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1 (3); and PALESTINE, § 23.

CALCOL, kal'kol (כַּלְכֹּל, kalkōl, Chalcol AV): Son of Zerah, son of Judah, according to I Ch 2 6, but in I K 4 31, a famous wise man, son of Mahol.

CALDRON, kel'dron: In Job 41 20 the RV rendering 'rushes' is correct. The other words rendered 'caldrone' ('pots' in RV in Jer 52 18 f.), all refer to earthenware vessels, but it is now impossible to ascertain how they differed from one another. E. E. N.

CALEB, kē'leb (כָּלֵב, kālēbh), 'dog': 1. One of the twelve spies; son of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah (Nu 13 6, 34 19). With Joshua he advised an immediate advance into Canaan. For his faith shown in this attitude, he was rewarded with long life, and entered into the possession of his share of the land allotted to Judah. In Jg 1 10 ff. he appears, independent of all connection with Joshua, as a leader in Judah's conquest of the region about Hebron and Debir. From Jos 14 6, 14, it appears that Caleb was not a natural descendant of Judah but a Kenizzite adopted into the tribe, within which his name became the eponym of a subdivision or clan (cf. I S 25 3, the kālībī [Calebite], 'of the house of Caleb' EV). The name of Caleb is also given in the variant form of Chelubai (I Ch 2 9, 18), brother of Jerahmeel. In Chronicles he is designated not as the son of Jephunneh but of Hezron, a remoter ancestor, i.e., a Hezronite. 2. Son of Hur and grandson of the preceding (I Ch 2 50). A. C. Z.

CALEB-EPHRATHAH, kē'leb-ef'ra-fha (כָּלֵב עֵפְרַתָּה, kālēbh 'ephrāthāh): According to the common text (I Ch 2 24) this term is a place-name. But the Heb. is confused and the true reading probably was 'and after Hezron was dead Caleb went in unto Ephrath (ah), the wife of his father Hezron, and she bare,' etc. see also EPHRATH and cf. Curtis in ICC, Chronicles, ad loc. E. E. N.

CALF. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING; § 5; and FOOD, § 10.

CALF, GOLDEN, and CALF IMAGES: 1. The account in Ex. 32: This narrative is the result of combining two distinct accounts (J and E), neither of which is now preserved intact (see HEXATEUCH, § 12-18).

In J's account (vs. 7 and [8] 9-14, 25-29) emphasis is laid on the mutinous disorder in the camp and on the loyalty of the Levites. E gives a detailed account of the making of the calf (vs. 1-6), of Moses' surprise as he enters the camp (15-18), and of his wrath and rebuke of Aaron (19-24). Ver. 8 may be editorial; consequently it is uncertain whether J's original narrative said anything about a calf. It is in E that we get the fullest description of the apostasy as consisting in making a calf to symbolize J' and in worshiping Him by this means. Since E was probably written in northern Israel, this is what might be expected, as calf-worship was practised in the northern kingdom.

There is nothing improbable in the story that the Israelites in the desert fell into this sin. The prohibition of metal images as symbols of deity was one of the fundamental principles of Moses' teaching (according to both J and E, even independently of the Second Commandment, cf. Ex 20 23, 34 17), while the temptation to symbolize their deity under the form of a young bull, for such is the meaning of 'calf' here, was one that might have presented itself very easily to the Israelites even in the desert, not because of their knowledge of the Egyptian animal-worship (which was of a very different type), but simply because of the wide-spread use of the bull as a symbol of deity throughout the Semitic world. The kernel of E's account may then be historical, altho the narrative itself may be colored by details drawn from the writer's personal knowledge of calf-worship in N. Israel. It is probable that the bull was a symbol of strength, possibly also of generative power.

2. The bull-worship introduced by Jeroboam I (I K 12 28-30): Jeroboam's motive in this was political rather than religious. He was not introducing a new deity, since his proclamation in ver. 28 evidently refers to J'. The plural ('these be thy gods') is remarkable, but is more natural here than at Ex 32 4, 8, which therefore is suspected of having been edited under the influence of I K 12 28. On the other hand, in the || in Neh 9 18 the singular is found, which after all may be the original reading.

Furthermore, Jeroboam was not guilty of making a complete innovation; for the worship of J' by means of images was practised before his time (cf. e.g., Jg 17 4, 18 17, 30-31). Nevertheless, it was a step downward, tending to obliterate the essential distinction between the religion of J' and common Semitic religion. The severe judgment pronounced upon Jeroboam expresses the view of the Deuteronomist author of Kings (see HEXATEUCH, § 19, and KINGS, BOOKS OF). It is the view of a later time, after the prophetic polemic (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah) had aroused and enlightened the conscience as to the true character of such worship.

3. Subsequent history of calf-worship in Israel: Jeroboam I set up this worship at two old and important sanctuaries, Bethel in the S. and Dan in the N. There is no evidence that calf images existed at any other N. Israelite sanctuary, while Judah seems to have been free from the practise—at least in any officially recognized form. The early opposition to it in Israel seems to have quieted down. Elijah and Elisha made no protest against it, altho they can not have approved it. It survived the destruction of the Baal-worship by Jehu and possibly then took on new strength. Amos' attitude toward it is not explicitly noted, but Hosea vehemently opposed it (cf. 8 5-6—where 'Samaria' means not the city, but the realm—and 13 2). It maintained its hold until the fall of N. Israel in 721. (See also SEMITIC RELIGION, § 16.)

CALKER: See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

CALLING (καλῆσις): The primary significance of the Greek word is 'invitation.' Sometimes the object or design of the invitation is explicitly stated (I Th 2 12, unto his own kingdom and glory; Col 3 15, 'to peace'; I P 2 9, 'his marvelous light'). The word is also used without such definition of the object. In that case it signifies God's invitation of men to accept the redemption He offers through Christ (Ro 8 28, 11 29; Ph 3 14). This calling is associated with God's eternal purpose, but is also represented as involving the response of acceptance by man as a necessary condition of its completeness. A difference may be noted between the Pauline and the Synoptic usage. According to the latter it is complete, irrespective of the response of man (Mt 20 16, but text doubtful). A. C. Z.

CALNEH, kal'ne (Cal'ne, כַּלְנֶה). 1. One of the four cities of Nimrod's kingdom (Gn 10 10). Its site has been the subject of much dispute. The Talmud's 'Calneh means Nippur' is generally regarded as untrustworthy. Delitzsch's effort to identify it with Kul-min (Wo Lag das Parad., p. 226) has not succeeded. 2. A city in Syria (Am. 6 2, also called Calno, כַּלְנוֹ, Is 10 9) is probably the Kulnia (Kullani) associated with Arpad and Hadadezer in an Assyrian 'tribute list' (Western Asiatic Inscriptions, II, 53, no. 3.) A. C. Z.

CALVARY. See JERUSALEM, § 45.

CALVES OF LIPS: In Hos 14 2 we read: 'We render as bullocks (the offering of) our lips'; but the LXX. evidently read a text equivalent to 'fruits of our lips.' If EV be correct, the phrase means: 'that which proceeds from the lips' as an expression of heart devotion in lieu of animal sacrifice.

A. C. Z.

CAMEL (גַּמָּל, gāmāl): The camel is referred to in the O T most frequently as in use in the nomadic stage of civilization, as by the patriarchs (Gn 12 16, etc.), the Midianites (Jg 6 5-8 21), Job (Job 1 3, 42 12), the people of Kedar (Jer 49 39), etc. Its use in caravans is referred to in I K 10 2; Ezr 2 67. David is said to have had a herd of camels (I Ch 27 30). Possibly the same thing is to be inferred as to the Pharaoh from Ex 9 3. At the same time it must have been a more or less common possession of many in Palestine (cf. I S 15 3; I Ch 12 40; and the prohibition of the camel as food in Lv 11 4; Dt 14 7). The one-humped or Arabian variety was the one common in Palestine, the two-humped or Bactrian camel being used farther east. The camel was used mainly as a beast of burden (cf. II K 8 9), or for riding, especially on long journeys and over desert country (cf. Gn 24 9; I S 30 17, etc.) Its milk was also used (Gn 32 15). The structure of its feet, its capacity for going without water for a long period—as much as a week—and its ability to subsist on almost any sort of pasturage, even thistles, fit it preeminently for hard service on the hot, dry, and barren desert. Its wool is woven into coarse cloth much used by the Bedawin (cf. II K 1 8, RVmg. and Mt. 3 4). The camel, while generally patient and serviceable, is often vindictive and savage. The word translated 'dromedary' (Is 60 6; Jer 2 23) may also be rendered 'young camel.' On Est 8 10, 14 cf. the RV. E. E. N.

CAMEL'S HAIR. See CAMEL; and DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 9.

CAMON, kē'mun. See KAMON.

CAMP: The word maḥāneh, rendered 'camp,' means the place where the tent is pitched and thus indicates the encampment, or resting-place, of the tribe or clan, and has no necessary connection with warfare. Throughout the Hexateuch it is generally used of Israel, whether stationary or on the march, as dwelling together in tents. In the subsequent O T books it generally refers to a military camp. See also WARFARE, § 3. E. E. N.

CAMPFIRE, cam'fair: Only in Song 1 14, 4 13 AV. See PALESTINE, § 21.

CANA, kē'nā (Κανά): A village of Galilee referred to several times in the Gospel of John (2 1, 11, 4 46, 21 2). Since Jesus' mother and apparently His entire family were at the wedding-feast (Jn 2 2, 12), Cana was probably not far from Nazareth, while the fact that Jesus 'went down' (2 12) from Cana to Capernaum would imply that it was among the hills. This agrees somewhat better with the modern Khurbet Kānāh (Map IV, C 7), on a ridge above the plain of el Buṭṭāuf, than with Kefr Kenna (Map IV, D 7), altho the latter is much nearer Nazareth. Khurbet Kānāh is also to be preferred on philological grounds (cf. Jos 16 8, LXX., where Kavá is apparently the equivalent of Qanah). The hints in Josephus (cf. Vita, 16 with 40), and the traditions of the crusaders favor the same identification (see Conder, Tent Work in Pal., p. 79 f.)

CANAAN, kē'nān (כְּנָעַן, k'na'an). I. The son of Ham in the ethnological (really geographical) lists in Gn chs. 9 and 10. It is possible that Caanan and Cain may be but two varieties of the same ethnological-geographical tradition (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 9 and 12). II. One of the old designations for Palestine, the land of the Canaanites whom the Israelites dispossessed. This term can be traced as far back as the Egyptian inscriptions of c. 1800 B.C. in which it is used for the coastland between Egypt and Asia Minor. It appears also in the Amarna letters of c. 1400 B.C. as a designation of Palestine. The etymology and earliest history of the name are unknown. Phœnician traditions show that the Phœnicians themselves were known as Canaanites. Some hold that the name originally belonged to a region of Babylonia and was carried west by the Semitic emigrants who settled on the Mediterranean coast 3000-2000 B.C. The O T uses the word Canaanite sometimes in a wider, sometimes in a narrower sense. In Gn 12 6, 24 3, 37; Jos 3 10, it includes the whole pre-Israelite population, even those E. of the Joran. In other passages the Canaanites are spoken of as but one of six or seven different peoples dispossessed by Israel (Ex 3 8, etc.). The 'land of C.' generally refers to the whole W. Jordan land. Canaanite and Amorite are often used synonymously. In Is 23 8 and Hos 12 7 the Heb. word rendered 'trafficker' is Canaan, the word having become the equivalent of 'merchant,' because of the mercantile activity of the Canaanites, especially the Phenicians. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 9.

The Canaanites were of Semitic stock, like the Phenicians to the N., and were but a part of the large Semitic group (Phenicians, Amorites, Canaanites) whose ancestors migrated west from NE. Arabia 3000-2000 B.C. Their language (the 'lip' of Canaan, Is 19 18), the same as that spoken in Phenicia, Moab, etc., was adopted by the Israelite invaders and is the Hebrew of the O T. They were well acquainted with Babylonian culture long before they were conquered by Israel. They became subject to Egypt c. 1500 B.C. and continued under Egyptian suzerainty until c. 1200 B.C., when Egypt's hold gradually relaxed. The Canaanites lacked organization. Each city held itself aloof from the rest, jealous of its own independence, and thus fell more easily into the hands of the invading Israelites. The majority of the Canaanites were probably not exterminated, but gradually absorbed into Israel, which eventually contained a large Canaanite admixture. The Canaanites possessed a (material) culture higher than that of their conquerors, and it was the presence of the Canaanites among the Israelites and their close intimacy with them that rendered the religious problem in Israel so serious and difficult. They taught their conquerors agriculture and many other useful arts and also led them to adopt many of their religious practises. The ultimate triumph of Israel speaks well for the strength and vitality of Israel's own religion. (See Paton, Early History of Syria and Palestine. Cambridge Anc. History, Vol. I pp. 225-237 [1923]. See also EXPLORATION AND EXCAVATION, § 15; ISRAEL, HISTORY OF § 3; PALESTINE, §§ 28-30; and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

CANANÆAN, kē'nā-nī'ān (Καναναῖος, perhaps more correctly Κανναῖος = Aram. qannai, 'a zealous one,' of which the Gr. equivalent is ζηλωτής, 'zealot.' Some MSS. have Κανανίτης = Canaanite, so AV): A title borne by the Simon mentioned toward the end of the lists of the Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 4). In Lk 6 15, Ac 1 13 the Greek form 'zealot' is used. The Zealots were the party organized by Judas of Gamala in opposition to the census under Quirinius (q.v.), in 6 A.D. (cf. Jos. Ant XVIII, 1 1, 6). They were intensely nationalistic in their aims and during the civil war committed many excesses (Jos BJ. IV, 5 1-3). See also Schürer, GVV. (3d ed.) I. p. 486, note; and Mathews, The Messianic Hope in the N T, p. 15 f.

J. M. T.

CANDACE, can'dā-se (Κανδάκη): According to Ac 8 26 f. the queen of the Ethiopians, whose treasurer was baptized by Philip. The word is probably a dynastic title rather than a personal name (cf. Pliny, HN. VI, p. 35).

J. M. T.

CANDLE. See LAMP.

CANDLESTICK: From II K 4 2 it seems evident that some sort of stand on which the clay lamps were placed was in common use, but little is known as to this in detail. In Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21, Lk 8 16, 11 33, 'candlestick' (AV), RV reads 'stand' retaining, somewhat inconsistently, the AV in other places (Heb. 9 2; Rev 1 12 etc.) See LAMP; TEMPLE, §§ 15, 23; and TABERNACLE, § 3.

CANE. See PALESTINE, § 22.

CANKER. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

CANKER-WORM. See LOCUST.

CANNEH, kan'e (קנח, kannēh): A place in Syria, mentioned with Haran and Eden (Ezk 27 23), otherwise unknown; perhaps an error for Calneh.

CANON. See OLD TESTAMENT AND NEW TESTAMENT CANON.

CANOPY: In the ERV of Is 4 5 for AV 'defense.' The ARV reads 'covering' the primary meaning of the Heb. term (חֹפֶה, huppāh).

CANTICLES. See SONG OF SONGS.

CAPERBERRY. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

CAPERNAUM, kə-pur'nā-um (Καφαρναούμ, i.e., Kaphar-Nahum 'village of Nahum'): A city of Galilee where Peter and Andrew had taken up their residence before Jesus called them to be His disciples (Mk 1 16-21; Jn 1 44). Jesus Himself made it the headquarters of His ministry in Galilee after His rejection at Nazareth (Mt 4 13; Mk 2 1). That it was a town of considerable size in the days of Jesus there can be no doubt whatever. It contained the office of a tax-collector (Mk 2 14), a representative of the king, Herod Antipas (Jn 4 46 mg.), and a military station whose commander had built a synagog for the people (Mt 8 5-13; Lk 7 1-10). Its present site is a matter of dispute. The view that Tell-Hum is the ancient Capernaum is supported by a tradition going back to the 4th cent., as well as by the excavation of the ruins of a synagog there. Further, the last syllable of the name (Hum) seems to be a remnant of Kaphar-Nahum. This view has steadily gained ground in recent years. In favor of Khan-Minyeh the facts are cited that Capernaum must have belonged to the Plain of Gennesaret (Jn 6 1-21), that a place of such size and importance must have been on a highroad, and that the name Minyeh is a remnant of the ancient designation of Christians as Minim, 'heretics.' See Map IV, E 6. (Cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 456; E. A. Wicher, in Am. Jour. Archaeology, XX, i. 90.)

CAPHTOR, kaf'ter; CAPHTORIM. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

CAPITAL, CAPITOL. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CAPPADOCIA, kap'dō'shi-a. See ASIA MINOR, III, 3.

CAPTAIN: This term is used somewhat loosely in the Eng. Bible (especially the AV) as the rendering of nineteen different Heb. and Gr. words, only one of which, χιλιάρχος, 'chiliarch,' was specifically a designation of a particular military rank. Most of the others are terms expressive of leadership, but not technical terms for specific grades or ranks in a military organization. In some instances the more correct RV rendering is altogether different from the AV, e.g., 'friends,' Jer 13 21 'marshal,' Jer 51 27, Nah 3 17, 'battering-ram,' Ezk 21 22. In other cases, the substitutions of 'prince' (I S 9 16, etc.), 'governor' (Jer 51 23; etc.), 'chief,' or 'chief men' (Jos 10 24; I Ch 11 15, etc.) are not significant. Cf. also the RV in Dt 29 10; I Ch 11 11, 12 18; He 2 10 for improvements in translation. In the O T the most frequently used term is סר, sar, a term that could be used for almost any kind of military leadership. Chief captain is used in the NT to render χιλιάρχος, the technical Gr. term for the commander of a cohort, i.e., one-tenth of a legion, for which the Latin term was 'tribune.' In Ac the usage of this term is perfectly regular, but in the Gospels (Mk 6 21; Jn 18 12) and in Rev 6 15, 19 18, it is used to designate any high military rank. The 'captain of the temple,' Ac 4 1, 5 24 ff. was a priest of high rank. See also WARFARE. E. E. N.

CAPTIVITY. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 7; and ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §.

CARAVAN. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, §§ 2, 3.

CARBUNCLE. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

CARCAS. kār'kas. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

CARCASS. See PURIFICATION, § 6.

CARCHEMISH, kār'ki-mish (כַּרְכַּמִּישׁ, kark'māsh; Assy. karyamish and gurgumish). A city of ancient times lying 63 m. N.E. of Aleppo on the W. bank of the Euphrates identified with the modern Kala'at near the modern Djerablus (Turkish). The oldest extra-biblical reference to C. is found in the time of Thutmose III ca. 1500 B.C. when its plundering is recorded. Ramses II of Egypt, also reports its sacking. It was for long centuries a Hittite capital and headquarters of commercial and military activity. Tho it paid tribute to several Assyrian kings, beginning with Shalmaneser III about 858 B.C., it was not completely overcome and defeated until the disastrous assault of Sargon II in 717 B.C. (cf. Is 10 9). Henceforth it declined, and became merely an Assyrian dependency. It was the scene of Nebuchadrezzar's great victory over Pharaoh Necho (Jer 46 2; II Ch 35 20), 605 B.C. Extensive excavations by the British Museum 1911-1914 give it new significance in the history of W. Asia. See Woolley and Lawrence, Carchemish (Parts I, 1914; and II, 1921). I. M. P.

CAREAH, kā-rī'a. See KAREAH.

CARITES, kar'ī-tiz. The RV rendering of a Heb. word (kārī) of uncertain meaning (II K 11 4, 19). The AV has 'captains.' It was evidently the designation of a body of troops, but whether a proper name or a mere appellation is uncertain. E. E. N.

CARMEL, kar'mel (כַּרְמֶל, karmel), 'garden,' 'vineyard': 1. The name of a mountain situated between the plain of Esdraelon and the Mediterranean Sea, so called because of its thickly wooded aspect, which was even more striking in ancient times than it is at the present day (Map IV, A 7). From the single peak, however, the name passed to the range of hills associated with it, thus designating the mountainous territory more than 20 m. in length, and from 3 to 8 m. in breadth to the W. and NW. of Esdraelon. In history Carmel became noted for the contest between Elijah and the Baal prophets (I K 18). It was also famed in literary composition for natural beauty (Song 7 5; Is 35 2). Together with Sharon, Lebanon, and Bashan it is one of the points of Palestine which especially show God's favor to Israel in bestowing such a country upon it (Jer 50 19; Mic 7 14). Its devastation is, therefore, a sign of the decided displeasure of J<sup>h</sup> (Is 33 9; Jer 4 26; Am 1 2; Nah 1 4).

2. A town in the hill-country of Judea (Jos 15 55). The residence of Abigail, wife of Nabal, who after her husband's death was taken by David as one of his wives (I S 30 5). Abigail is accordingly called 'the Carmelite.' This Carmel was also the scene of other incidents in the lives of Saul and David (I S 15 12, 25 2). Its modern name is Karmal, and its exact location 8 m. SE. of Hebron. Map II, E 3. A. C. Z.

CARMI, kār'mi (כַּרְמִי, karmī): 1. Father of Achan and head of the Carmites a family of Judah (Jos 7 1, 18; I Ch 2 7). 2. Head of one of the clans of Reuben (Gn 46 9; Nu 26 6, etc.). It is probable that in I Ch 4 1 Carmi is a textual error for Caleb. E. E. N.

CARNALLY. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

CARPENTER. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 5.

CARPET: The term occurs in the RV of Jg 5 10 for AV 'in judgment,' and of Pr 31 22 for the AV 'coverings.' The two different Hebrew words (middin and marbhaddim) are of uncertain meaning, but each indicates a covering of some sort. E. E. N.

CARPUS, kār'pus (Κάρπος): A friend of Paul's probably a resident of Troas (II Ti 4 13). Later legend made him one of the seventy disciples of Jesus. E. E. N.

CARRIAGE: This term occurs five times in the AV, and in each case the RV substitutes a more correct rendering; in Jg 18 21 'goods'; in I S 17 22; Is 10 28; Ac 21 15 'baggage'; in Is 46 1, 'the things that ye carried about.' See BAGGAGE.

CARSHENA, kār'shī-nə (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

CART (כֶּלֶבֶת, āghālāh, from āghal, 'to be round,' 'to roll'): The cart or wagon of the Hebrews was probably a somewhat rude and clumsy affair, with two wooden wheels, and furnished with a tongue or pole, as it was drawn by two oxen yoked side by side. The accompanying cut of a modern Syrian cart

ONE OF THE FEW REMAINING GROVES OF THE CEDARS OF LEBANON

probably well represents those used in ancient times. In Is 28 27 f. the reference is to the 'rollers' of the threshing-sledge (see AGRICULTURE, § 7). For 'wagons' in Ezk 23 24 AV, the RV renders correctly 'chariots.' E. E. N

CARVING. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 5.

CASEMENT. See HOUSE, § 6 (j).

CASIPHIA, ka-sif'i-a (כַּסְפִּיָּה, kāṣiphā): A 'place' (in Babylonia) which was the home of a colony of Levites and Nethinim (Ezr 8 15-20). Its site is unknown.

CASLUHIM, kas'lu-him. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

CASSIA, kash'i-a. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, §; 1 and PALESTINE, § 21.

CAST. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10; and METALS.

CASTANET. See MUSIC, § 3 (1), (c).

CASTAWAY: In Co 9 27 ἀδόκιμος, 'a castaway' AV, is rightly changed in RV to 'rejected.' The Gr. word means 'not approved,' 'unable to stand the test.'

CASTLE. See CITY, § 2; FORT; JERUSALEM, § 38; and TEMPLE, § 36.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, kas'ter, pol'uks. See TWIN BROTHERS; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

CATERPILLAR. See PALESTINE, § 26.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES: A term applied to the Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude. Since no one of these seven epistles is addressed to a specifically named church or individual, and all (except II and III Jn) deal with general rather than merely local or individual questions, they easily came to be considered by the early Fathers as addressed to the Church at large, i.e., the catholic (or universal) Church. The AV expresses this idea by the word 'general' in the titles of Ja, I P, II P, I Jn, and Jude, which is the translation of καθολική, found in many late MSS. With the early MSS. the RV omits it. E. E. N.

CATTLE. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS; and PALESTINE, § 24.

CAUDA (Καῦδα) Cauda AV, now Gavdho: A small treeless island S. of Crete, with no safe anchorage on its E. side (Ac 27 16). Its present population numbers but 70 families. J. R. S. S.—E. E. N.

CAUL: The sacrificial term (Ex 29 13, etc.). (1) The Heb. (חֲזֵץ), 'the excess' or 'that which is left over' seems to mean the fatty mass near the opening of the liver (cf. Dill. on Lv 3 4). (2) In Hos 13 8 (Heb. חֲזֵץ, 'enclosure') it means either the pericardium or the breast as a whole. (3) For Is 3 18 see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10. E. E. N.

CAUSE. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

CAUSEWAY. See WAY.

CAVE: In the hilly regions of Palestine caves are very numerous. The O T contains many references to them as places of temporary abode (Gn 19 30), of refuge from invaders (Jg 6 2; I S 13 6, etc.), or from pursuers (Jos 10 16; I S 22 1, etc.) and as burial-places (Gn 23 9 ff.; cf. Jn 11 38). Excavations, such as those of Gezer (q.v.) and Ascalon, show that later city-sites were first occupied by a cave-dwelling race. This is probably true even of Jerusalem (see G. A. Smith, JERUSALEM, Vol. I, p. 283 ff.). The Horites (Gn 14 6, 36 20 ff.) were probably cave-dwellers, as the word Horite is from hār (one of the O T words for cave.) See HORITE. E. E. N.

CEDAR (צֶדֶר, 'erez): The cedar so often referred to in the O T is always the cedar of Lebanon with the possible exception of Nu 24 6 (where the text may be corrupt). These cedars were famed throughout all SW. Asia. The lumber made from them, because of its size, durability, and fragrance, was used from early times by the kings of ancient Babylonian cities and later of Assyria and other countries for the decoration of their palaces, etc. The various notices of the use of cedar in Israel (Lv 4 14; II S 5 11; I K 5 8, 6 9, 7 2; Song 1 17; Jer 22 14, etc.) illustrate its use in other countries. The tree itself was considered the most beautiful and majestic of trees and was easily made the symbol of strength, glory, and regal power (Ps 92 12; Ezk 31 3, etc.). The cedars now extant on Lebanon are probably only stunted and scattered remains of once large and magnificent forests. See also PALESTINE, § 21. E. E. N.

CEDRON, si'dron. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

CEILING, CIELING AV: See HOUSE, §§ 5 and 6 (a).

CELLAR: In I Ch 27 27 f., the word צִמְרֵן ('ōts-rōth, plur. of 'ōtsār, rendered 'cellars') means merely storehouses or rooms where wine and oil were stored. In Lk 11 33 (RV) the Gr. κρύπτειν means literally 'a hidden place,' i.e., anything similar to a vault, crypt, or cellar.

CENCHREA, sen-kri'a (Κενχρεά): A harbor of Corinth on the Saronic gulf and a town of some size (Ac 18 18; Ro 16 1). It contained temples of Aphrodite and Artemis, a bronze statue of Poseidon, sanctuaries of Asclepius and Isis, also the Baths of Helen. The mole is still visible. J. R. S. S.—E. E. N.

CENSER. See TEMPLE, § 16.

CENTURION (ἐκατοντάρχης [and -ος], 'ruler of a hundred,' and κεντυρίων [=Lat. centurio): The commander of a 'century,' i.e., a hundred men, the sixtieth part of a legion, in the Roman army. The centurion mentioned in Mt 8 5-13; Lk 7 2-6 (=Jn 4 46 ft. ?) belonged probably to the small military force of Herod Antipas, organized on the Roman model. In all other cases a Roman officer is meant. E. E. N.

CEPHAS, sī'fās. See PETER.

CERTIFY: The words rendered 'certify' mean: in II S 15 28 'to announce or tell'; in Ezr 4 14, 16, 5 10, 7 24 'to cause one to know.' In Est 2 22 the RV renders, much more correctly, 'told,' and in Gal 1 11 'make known.'

CHAFF: The translation of: (1) mōts, always correctly rendered 'chaff' in both RV and AV. (2) hāshash, 'dry grass' (Is 5 24 AV, 33 11). (3) ār, Dn 2 35. (4) ξύρον (Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17). In Jer 23 28 the RV 'straw' is more correct.

CHAINS: These were either voluntarily worn for purposes of personal embellishment or imposed from without as means of preventing movement. (1) Of ornamental chains the most typical are those referred to in the stories of Joseph and Daniel (Gn 41 42; Dn 5 7, etc.). See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II. 2. (2) Of restraining chains those worn by Paul may be cited (Ac 28 20; II Ti 1 16; but cf. also Ac 12 7). In this case for a clearer understanding it must be borne in mind that the prisoner was fastened by the wrist through a chain to a guarding soldier, whose wrist was also attached to the other end of the chain. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, 3 (b). A. C. Z.

CHALCOL, kal'kol. See CALCOL.

CHALDEA, kal-dī'a, CHALDEANS: The Heb. term kasdīm (Gn 11 31, etc.) corresponds phonetically to the form kaldū found on the Assyrian inscriptions. The Chaldeans were a Semitic people who pressed into Babylonia from the S. (c. 12th cent. B.C.), and occupied the whole seacoast region of S. Babylonia. They were not without political ambition and from this time on more than one Babylonian king was of Chaldean origin. The capital city of the Kaldū was Bit-Yakin. The Assyrians found in the Kaldū most determined opponents of their supremacy in Babylonia (see MERODACH-BALADAN). Finally, the Chaldean Nabopolassar, c. 626 B.C., on the eve of the downfall of Nineveh, established himself on the throne of Babylon, thereby founding the new Babylonian or Chaldean kingdom of which his son Nebuchadnezzar was the greatest ruler (see BABYLONIA, §§ 18-22). For 'Ur of the Chaldees' see UR, and for Chaldeans in another sense see MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7; and WISE MEN, § 1. E. E. N.

CHALKSTONES: In Is 27 9 the word is used as a symbol of brittleness. The altars of idols were to be as easily destroyed as if made of chalkstones.

CHAMBER. See HOUSE, §§ 5, 6; and TEMPLE, §§ 11, 20, 21, 28.

CHAMBERLAIN (II K 23 11): The chamberlain occupied a position of trust involving political duty, which was, therefore, somewhat more important than that of the steward. Here the Heb. šārīš, 'eunuch,' is not to be taken strictly in its literal sense. On Ro 16 23, see ERASTUS.

CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN: The term 'chamberlains' (II K 23 11; Est 1 10 ff.) is a somewhat euphemistic rendering of ס'רץ, šārīš, 'eunuch.' The same idea is contained in the phrase ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος, 'over the sleeping-room,' applied to Blastus (Ac 12 20). It was the custom for kings to have eunuchs supervise the affairs of their harems. The seven eunuchs of Xerxes, according to Est 1 10 ff., were Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas. Others, however, are also mentioned, as Hegai (2 3), Bigthan and Teresh (2 21, 6 2) and Hatach (4 5). To what extent these persons are historical is unknown. See ESTHER, BOOK OF. E. E. N.

CHAMELEON, ka-mī'li-an. See PALESTINE, § 26.

CHAMOIS, shami' or sham'wə. See PALESTINE, § 24.

CHAMPAIGN, sham-pēn': In Dt 11 30 ('Arabah,' RV) the original means a low-lying, open plain.

CHAMPION: In I S 17 51 this word renders gibbōr, 'mighty man.' In I S 17 4, 23, it is a good translation of the Heb. אִישׁ מִן הַמִּלְחָמָה, 'man of the middle places,' i.e., the man who stands between two armies to decide the case of one against the other. See also WARFARE, § 4.

CHANAAN, kē'nān (Χανάαν): The AV spelling for Canaan (q.v.) in Ac 7 11, 13 19.

CHANCELLOR: The title of Rehum, Ezr 4 8-17. The exact significance of the Aram. רִבְנָא, 'master of taste, judgment, command,' is obscure. Most modern scholars take it in the sense of 'chief official,' Batten in ICC renders 'reporter.' (see REHUM).

CHANGE OF RAIMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 5.

CHANGER. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

CHANT. See MUSIC, § 5.

CHAPEL: The AV rendering of miqdāsh, 'sanctuary,' in Am 7 13.

CHAPTER. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CHAPLET. The RV at Pr 1 9 of the Heb. liwyath, 'wreath.'

CHAPMAN. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

CHAPT (Jer 14 4, AV; 'cracked,' RV): The Heb. term hāllāh means 'broken,' 'terrified,' or 'dismayed.'

CHARASHIM, kar'a-shim. See GE-HARASHIM.

CHARGER. See PLATTER.

CHARIOT. See WARFARE, § 4; and ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6.

CHARIOT HORSE. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6; and HORSE.

CHARITY: The AV rendering in about 28 passages in Paul's Epistles, the Catholic Epistles, and Revelation of the very frequent Gr. ἀγάπη, 'love,' in the sense of 'Christian love for one's fellow men.' 'Charity,' without doubt, crept into the Eng. Bible from the Latin Vulgate, in which caritas was often used to render ἀγάπη. Caritas, however, means 'dearness,' 'high esteem,' rather than 'love' in the broad sense of the Gr. ἀγάπη; consequently charity should not be used to render ἀγάπη, since, in the modern English, it is not synonymous with love. See also LOVE. S. D.—M. W. J.

CHARM, CHARMER. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

CHARRAN, kar'an (Χαρράν, Ac 7 2, 4): The AV spelling for Haran (q.v.).

CHASTE (ἀγνός, 'unsullied'): Used to indicate inward, personal purity which shrinks from contamination or pollution, consequently free (1) from imperfection generally (I P 3 2); (2) from carnality (II Co 11 2, 'pure' RV; Tit 2 5). S. D.—E. E. N.

CHASTEN, CHASTENING, CHASTISEMENT, CORRECT, CORRECTION. These words in the O T are usually translations of the Hebrew yāšar, māšār, or of yākhāh. The latter word is more commonly translated 'reprove' or 'rebuke,' but appears several times in late literature under one of the above terms. The underlying idea of yāšar is that of discipline or moral training. Chastisement may be included since the Hebrew moralists were accustomed to commend the rod as one of the most important instruments of education. See numerous passages in Pr. But the idea of instruction as a part of discipline is found in Dt 4, 37, 8 5, 11 2, in all of which 'discipline' should be the translation. God is entreated not to chasten in anger, Ps 6 1, 38 1; but it is recognized that punishment for sin is a necessary part of God's training, as it is of the parents' (cf. Ps 94 12; Pr. 3, 11, 12, etc.).

In the N T the Greek words are παιδεῖα and παιδεύω. In classical Greek these words covered simply the physical and mental education of the boy (παῖς), but as they were used in the LXX to translate yāšar and māšār they came to have the additional idea of moral education, and are used much as the above words in the O T. There is a beautiful description of the results of chastisement in He. 12 5-11. In II Ti 3 16 'correction' is the translation of another word which means 'a setting straight,' and παιδεῖα is translated 'instruction.'

CHEBAR, kī'bār (כְּבָר, kēbhār): Assyr. ka-ba-ru; A river by which Ezekiel and the exiles dwelt in Babylonia (Ezk 1 1, 3, 3 15, etc.), now identified as a navigable canal, Kabaru, just E. of the ancient site of Nippur adjoining one of the great ship canals of Babylonia. I. M. P.

CHECKER-WORK. See TEMPLE, § 14.

CHEDORLAOMER, ked'or-lə-ō'mər (כְּדֻרְלָאוֹמֶר, Χεδωρλογομορ, LXX). A king of Elam, mentioned in Gen ch. 14 as one of the leaders of an invasion of Palestine in the time of Abraham. The name has not yet been found upon any Oriental inscription, but it is correctly compounded of Elamite elements, and there is no reason to doubt that it once existed entire. The first part of it is a good Elamite word Kudur which means 'servant' and is represented in the Elamite names Kudur-Nankhundi, Kudur-Mabug and Kudur-Ellil. The second part of the name appears as the name of an Elamite god La-ga-ma-ru and La-ga-ma-ri, and the whole name would therefore be Kudur-Lagamaru, or 'Servant of (the god) Lagamar,' and this form for the name finds confirmation in the Greek. The determination of the name is important, but it does not solve questions about the historical situation. The Genesis narrative portrays a movement into the W. from the E. in which an Elamite king, named Chedorlaomer, whose name has not yet been found in Elamite or Babylonian documents is a leader against petty kings or princes in Palestine. After a preliminary success and the sacking of Sodom and Gomorrah he is defeated in a night surprise by small forces under the leadership of Abraham. No confirmation of the story has yet appeared, but on the other hand no contradiction has been secured by those who have doubted its historical character. Nor is there sound reason for doubt. It is known that Elam had contacts both with Babylonia and with Palestine, and there is no inherent improbability in the main outlines of the narrative. See also AMRAPHEL; ARIOCH; and TIDAL. R. W. CHEESE. See FOOD, § 6.

CHELAL, kī'lal (כֶּלֶל, kēlāl): One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab' who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30.)

CHELLUH, kel'ū. See CHELUHI.

CHELUB, kī'lub (כֶּלֶב, kēlūbh, another form of Caleb): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah, possibly a place-name (I Ch 4 11). 2. The father of Ezri, one of David's officers (I Ch 27 26).

CHELUBAI, kī-lū'bai. See CALEB.

CHELUHI, kī-lū'hai (כֶּלֶה, kēlūhī, Chelluh, AV): One of the 'sons of Bani' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 36).

CHEMARIM, kem'a-rim. See PRIESTHOOD, § 2

CHEMOSH, kī'mōsh (כֶּמוֹשׁ, kēmōsh): The national deity of the Moabites. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 17.

CHENAANAH, kī-nē-ā-na (כְּנַעֲנָה, kēna'ānāh):

1. Father of the court prophet Zedekiah (I K 22 11, 24; II Ch 18 10, 23). 2. Head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 10).

CHENANI, kī-nē'nai (כְּנַנִּי, kēnānī): One of the assistants at the reading of the Law (Neh 9 4).

CHENANIAH, ken'a-nai'a (כְּנַנְיָהּ, kēnanyāhū), 'J' establishes': 1. A prominent Levite musician (I Ch 15 22, 27). 2. One of David's officers (I Ch 26 29).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI, kī'fār-am'an-ai (כְּפָרִאֲמֹנִי, kēphar hā'ammōnī, Chephar-Hammoni, AV), 'village of the Ammonites': A town of Benjamin (Jos 18 24), perhaps the mod. Kefr Anā, Map III, F 5. E. E. N.

CHEPHIRAH, kī-fai'ra (כְּפִירָה, kēphīrāh): One of the cities of the Gibeonites (Jos 9 17), later assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18 26) and reoccupied after the Exile (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29), Map, II E 1.

CHERAN, kī'rən (כְּרָן, kērān): A Horite clan (?) (Gn 36 26; I Ch 1 41).

CHERETHITES, ker'-thiits (כֶּרֶתִּים, kerēthî): The name of a people in the S. of Philistia, perhaps a division of the Philistines themselves (I S 30 14; Ezk 25 16; Zeph 2 5). The word may indicate the Cretan origin of a portion of the Philistine population. The Cherethites and Pelethites are frequently mentioned as composing David's body-guard (II S 8 18, 15 18, etc). The word Pelethite (פִּלְתִּי, pelethî) is probably but a variant form of 'Philistines.' Thus David's guard was recruited largely from the Philistines. See PHILISTINES.
E. E. N.

CHERITH, kī'rith (כֶּרֶתִּי, kerith): The torrent-valley or wady where Elijah sojourned for a while (I K 17 3-5). The statement that it was 'before,' i.e., E. of the Jordan, is indefinite and the site remains uncertain.

CHERUB cher'ub (כְּרֻב, kerūbh, pl. CHERUBIM) The Hebrew conception of the cherubim varied at different periods of history. In the O T they are referred to in four connections. After the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden, they appear as guardians of the tree of life (Gn 3 24 J.). A different version of this story is alluded to by Ezekiel (28 14, 16); a cherub expels the Prince of Tyre from Eden, the Garden of God. In the Tabernacle there were two golden cherubim at each end of the propitiatory or mercy seat (see ARK). Figures of cherubim were embroidered on the curtains and the other hangings of this sanctuary (Ex 25 18, 26 1, 31 P; cf. He 9 5). In Solomon's Temple two huge cherubic figures of olive-wood overlaid with gold stood in the Holy of Holies. Their outstretched wings overshadowed the ark (I K 6 23-28). Cherubim, sculptured in bas-relief and alternating with palm-trees, ran in a frieze round the wall of the Temple, and decorated the base of the great sea, the capitals, and doors (I K 6 29, 32, 35). They were figures connected with religious symbolism; they acted as bearers of Deity, and were consequently emblematic of Jehovah's presence. Cf. the phrase 'Thou that sittest above the cherubim' (Ps 80 1). In the Holy of Holies they were guardians of the ark and its treasures, as well as symbols of God's presence, and consequently emblematic of His unapproachability. We have a similar conception of the cherubim in the living creatures of Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1; cf. 10 2). These composite figures, each with four wings and four faces—man, lion, ox, and eagle—carry the firmament which supports the throne of Jehovah. In discussing the origin and significance of the cherubim, a crucial passage is Ps 18 10 (cf. II S 22 11). The poet describes the descent of Jehovah on the lowering thunder clouds: 'He rode upon a cherub, and did fly; Yea, he soared upon the wings of the wind.' The function of the cherub in this passage is similar to that of the symbolic figures in the sanctuary and the living creatures in prophetic vision. But we have here also a hint of their origin. Primarily they were a personification of the storm cloud or wind, and this poetic passage has preserved this ancient popular conception of the cherubim. Three theories have been held in regard to the form and nature of the cherubim: (1) That they were real existences, (2) that they were mythological beings, (3) that they were mere symbols. The view that they were supernatural spiritual essences is now generally discarded, altho it was long dominant in the Church. The facts point to a combination of the symbolic and mythical theories as the true view. The religious imagination of the Hebrews, working on mythological figures which they had in common with their neighbors, produced these symbolic forms. To them they were not mere allegories, but had a real existence. As to their actual shape and form there is considerable uncertainty. They were winged and composite, and consequently have been compared to the colossi at the entrances to Babylonian temples and palaces. These often had a man's head, a lion's body, and eagle's wings; sometimes they were winged bulls with human heads. Cheyne thinks they were more like the Hittite griffins in figure, and had a similar function as guardians of sacred things. The Egyptian representation of human winged figures, kneeling between their outspread wings and facing each other, which were found in the zodiacal sanctuary of Dendera, correspond very nearly to the description of the cherubim of the Hebrew sanctuary (Ex 37 9; I K 6 23 f.) cf. Fig. 160 in Gressmann, Texte und Bilder. In Palestine itself cherubic figures have been recovered; they occur on the altar of incense found at Taanach and also on seals from the excavations at Gezer. In later Jewish theology they are one of the three highest classes of angels, and are evidently the original of the four living creatures of the Apocalypse (Rev 4 6-8).

CHESALON, kes'-a-len (כֶּסֶלֹן, kesālōn): A town on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 10), between Kirjath Jearim and Bethshemesh, modern Kesla, 10 m. of Jerusalem. Map II, E. 1.

CHESD, kī'sed (כֶּסֶד, kesedh): A 'son' of Nahor (Gn 22 22). Probably the name of an Aramean clan.

CHESIL, kī'sil (כֶּסֶל, kesil): A town of Judah (Jos 15 30) called Bethul in 19 4). See also BETHUL.

CHEST: In II K 12 9 f.; II Ch 24 8 ff., the Heb. 'ārōn means simply a box or chest suitable for the purpose mentioned. In Ezk 27 24 the term g'nd-zim is of doubtful meaning. There is no sound basis for the rendering 'chest.' Rich garments or cloths may be meant.

CHESTNUT. See PALESTINE, § 21.

CHESULLOTH, kī-sol'eth (כֶּסֶלּוֹת, kesullōth): A town of Issachar (Jos 19 18), probably the same as Chisloth-Tabar (Jos 19 12), the mod. Iksal, Map IV, C 7.

CHEZIB, kī'zib. See ACHZIB 2.

CHIDON, kai'den. See NACHON.

CHIEF: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms, all of which express the idea of headship, but generally in a somewhat loose and non-technical sense. The most commonly used term is רֹאשׁ, rō'sh, 'head.' In Nu 25 14 f., Jos 22 14, the Heb. is 'ābh, 'father,' and RV renders 'fathers' house.' For other cases needing special mention see CHIEF MEN. See also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4; and WARFARE, § 1. E. E. N.

CHIEF MEN: A term used in the N T to render two Gr. words. (1) οἱ πρῶτοι. (a) In Mk 6 21 ('chief estates' AV) it refers to the leading provincials of Galilee, who doubtless formed the unofficial retainers of Herod's court. These, with the chief civil dignitaries (μεγιστάνες) and the chief military officers (χιλιάρχαι), constituted the invited guests at the feast. (b) In Ac 13 50 it refers to the board of magistrates of the city. (c) In Ac 28 7 it is used in the singular ('chief man'). It is not clear whether it refers to Publius as the procurator of the island—an official assigned to Malta under the Empire (CIL, x, 7494; IGSic. et Ital. 601; also see PUBLIUS) or as the actual Governor of the island (CIL, x, 6785), or whether it was simply a title of compliment (CIG, 5754 = Kaibel, IGSic. et Ital. 601). (d) In Lk 19 47 it is rendered 'the principal men' ['chief AV] (of the people), in Ac 25 2 'the principal men' ['chief AV] (of the Jews), and in Ac 28 17 'the chief (of the Jews).' In the first passage it is seemingly unofficial and has reference to the socially prominent laymen among the people, who were sympathetic with the 'chief priests and the scribes' in their hostility to Jesus. In the second passage it is probably official and refers to the Sadducean leaders in the Sanhedrin (cf. 25 15, 24, 23 14). In the third passage it is more general and includes doubtless the elders (πρεσβύτεροι) and chiefs (ἄρχοντες) of the congregation, and the synagog rulers (ἀρχισυνάγωγοι), of the various communities into which the Jews in Rome were divided (cf. Schürer, HJP. II, ii. § 31).

(2) ἡγούμενοι, which in Ac 15 22 refers to Judas Barsabbas (q.v.) and Silas (q.v.) in a wholly unofficial sense, simply as men prominent in the Christian community for their work and counsel and instruction (cf. v. 32) and so preeminently fitted to accompany Paul and Barnabas on their return mission to the brethren in Antioch. CHILEAB, kil'i-ab (כִּילְעָב, kil'ēbh): According to the Heb. text of II S 3 3, a son of David by Abigail. In I Ch 3 1 he is called Daniel. The LXX. of II S 3 3 reads Δαλoutα, which may imperfectly represent the original name, but this can not now be recovered. E. E. N.

CHILION, kil'i-en (כִּילְיֹן, kilyōn): Chilion and Mahlon were sons of Elimelech and Naomi (Ru 1 2). They married two Moabite women, Orpah and Ruth, Chilion being the husband of Orpah, and both died in the land of Moab (Ru 4 10, 1 5). The names Chilion, 'wasting,' and Mahlon, 'sickness,' are significant possibly of artificial elements in the story. E. E. N.

CHILMAD, kil'mad (כִּלְמָד, kilmadh): A place mentioned in Ezk 27 23 along with Sheba, Assyria, etc. The identification is doubtful. Some, following the Talmud, would read 'כִּלְמָד, 'all the Medes,' or 'all Media,' but this is only a conjecture. E. E. N.

CHIMHAM, kim'ham (כִּמְחָם, kimhām): The son (probably) of Barzillai of Gilead who was given a place at David's court in return for kindness shown to the king (II S 19 37-40; I K 2 7). Geruth-Chimham, 'the habitation of Chimham' (Jer 41 17; cf. RVmg.) near Bethlehem, may refer to a lodging-place or inn erected by this person. Another well-supported reading is 'sheepfolds of Chimham.' E. E. N.

CHIMNEY. See HOUSE, § 6 (j).

CHINNERETH, kin'i-reth (כִּנְרֶת, kinnereth); CHINNEROTH, -reth (כִּנְרוֹת, kin'erōth); CINNE-ROTH, sin'e-reth: 1. The name of a town (Jos 19 35) extended also apparently to a district (I K 15 20). The name is old, being found on the Egyptian list of towns captured by Thotmes III (16th cent. B.C.), the form there being Kinneroth. Its significance is a matter of dispute, also its relation to the name Gennesaret. It was located probably in the plain of Gennesaret. 2. For the Sea of C. (Jos 11 2, etc.), see GALILEE, SEA OF. E. E. N.

CHIOS, kī'os or cai'os (Χίος): A mountainous island, off the Asiatic seaboard (Ac 20 15). It joined Cyrus in 546 B.C., but fought the Persians in 480. It became independent in 355 and later favored Rome. It has now about 100,000 inhabitants and a considerable commerce in blue marble, antimony, ocher, silk, mastic, fruits, and brandy. J. R. S. S.—E. CHIRP (occurs only in Is 8 19, 'peep,' AV). See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

CHISLEV, CHISLEU, kis'liu. See TIME, § 3.

CHISLON, kis'len (כִּסְלֹן, kislōn): The father of Elidad (Nu 34 21).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, kis'leth-tē'bar. See CHE-SULLOTH.

CHITHLISH, kith'lish (כִּיתְלִישׁ, kithlish, Kithlish, AV): A town of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 40). Site unknown.

CHITTIM, kit'im. See KITTIM.

CHIUN, kai'un: A deity mentioned in Am 5 20. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 18.

CHLOE, klō'i (Χλόη): Paul was informed of the conditions in the church at Corinth by 'them which are of the household of Chloe' (I Co 1 11). It is unknown whether this woman had her home in Ephesus or in Corinth and nothing whatever is known of her relation to the church. E. E. N.

CHOR-ASHAN, kōr'-ash'an. See ASHAN.

CHORAZIN, kō-rē'zin (Χορᾶζιν): One of the cities condemned by Jesus for its indifference to His works (Mt 11 21; Lk 10 13). The site is not certainly identified; but is probably the modern Kerdesh, N. of Tell Hum (Map IV, E 6.) J. M. T.

CHOSEN: The word is sometimes used in the general sense of 'choice,' 'superior' (cf. Ex 14 7, 'six hundred chosen chariots,' or Jg 20 15, 'seven hundred chosen men'). In a more restricted and quasi-technical sense, it is applied to believers, and denotes from the Divine point of view their distinctive character. 'Ye are a chosen generation' (I P 2 9 AV; cf. also Rev 17 14). In a still more restricted sense, it is applied to the people of God as a whole (I Ch 16 13, 'children of Jacob, his chosen ones,' cf. also Ps 105 6; Is 43 20). See also ELECTION. A. C. Z.

CHOZEBA, ko-zī'bā. See ACHZIB, 2.

CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST and MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN: The name applied to the followers of Christ by the heathen populace of Antioch (Ac 11 26; cf. Tac. Annal. XV, 44)—a city famous, as was Alexandria, for its habit of nicknames. The reason for giving it was not simply the extended size and the organized form which the body of disciples had attained, but the preponderating Gentile element which in that city had entered its membership and which marked it as distinctly different from Judaism.

As an adjective derived from a personal name its ending (-ανός) is Latin and not Greek (cf. Zahn, Introduction, § 40, n. 10; Blass, NT Gr., § 27.4). If its primary form was Chrestianos (Χρηστειανός), as we might be led to suppose from Suetonius (Claud. 25; cf. Kaibel, IGSicil. 78, 754; CIL. X, 7173; also codex B, in all the N T passages, and the possible word-play in I P 2 3 'gracious' = χρηστός), then there was a mild contempt intended in its giving, Chrestos (Χρηστός) signifying a 'worthy fellow.' It is in this spirit that the name is used by Agrippa in his reply to Paul's impassioned appeal (Ac 26 28), whether the form he actually used was Chrestianos, or Christianos which came to be adopted by the disciples and which consistently is used in the N T.

In I P 4 13 the name is used from the point of view of the hostile heathen world, and indicates a date for the Epistle when the followers of Christ were condemned if they confessed to being Christians (cf. Ramsay, Church in Rom. Empire, Index [s.v.], and see PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF).

The references in Ac 5 41 and Ja 2 7 are not to the appellative, Christian, but to the personal name, Christ. M. W. J.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF: 1. Contents. The Books of Chronicles, together with those of Ezra and Nehemiah, are the compilation of an author whose name has not been handed down to us, but who may be conveniently termed the 'Chronicler,' and who wrote probably not before 300 B.C. The books embrace the period from Adam to the edict of Cyrus permitting the exiles to return to Judah, 537 B.C.: they thus cover substantially the same period as the other great series of historical books, Gn to II K (from the Creation to 561 B.C.); but they are written from a very different point of view, and with a much more limited aim. Their main object, viz., is to give a history of Judah, with special reference to the institutions connected with the Temple; and whatever has no bearing on one or the other of these subjects is either passed over rapidly or omitted altogether. The author begins (after the manner of the later Semitic historians) with Adam; but I: ch. 1 consists merely of genealogies, excerpted from Gn, leading up (ver. 34) to Esau and Jacob; 2 1 f. enumerates the sons of Jacob; and the rest of ch. 2 is devoted to statistical particulars (genealogies of clans and clan settlements) of the tribe of Judah, as ch. 3 is devoted to the descendants of David. In I: chs. 4-8, dealing from the same point of view with the other tribes, the priestly tribe of Levi is treated at greatest length (I: ch. 6). I: 9 1-34 is on the postexilic residents in Jerusalem and certain arrangements relating to the Temple. The introduction (I: 1 1-9 34) ended, the history proper begins. The account of Saul is limited to his genealogy (I: 9 35-44) and the narrative of his death (I: ch. 10). The history of David begins with his election as king over all Israel at Hebron; all events in his reign of a personal or private character (e.g., his crime against Uriah and Bathsheba; the revolt of Absalom) are omitted; on the other hand, the arrangements for a temple attributed to him are narrated at considerable length (I: chs. 22-29). After the division of the kingdom the history of Judah occupies almost entirely the compiler's attention, the N. kingdom being referred to only where absolutely necessary. This silence with regard to the North is significant and is adequately explained by the historical situation at the period when the Chronicler wrote; it is in reality an indirect criticism of the ecclesiastical pretensions of the Samaritans whose temple on Gerizim was designed to rival Jerusalem; it is a passionate endeavor to vindicate the religious uniqueness of Jerusalem and the temple. The writer dwells throughout with the greatest satisfaction upon the ecclesiastical aspects of the history. The same interest is not less apparent in Ezr, Neh; and hence the entire work (Ch, Ezr, Neh) has been not inaptly termed by Reuss the 'Ecclesiastical Chronicle of Jerusalem.' The compiler, because of his marked interest in the Levites, is usually supposed to have been a Levite, perhaps in particular a member of the Temple choir.

2. Character of Contents. The basis of the Chronicles consists of a series of excerpts from the earlier historical books (Gn to II K; I: 9 2-17a is also from Neh 11 4-19a), with which is combined much entirely new matter. These excerpts are not made throughout upon the same scale. In the preliminary chapters (I: chs. 1-9) they are often condensed, and consist chiefly of genealogical notices; in I: ch. 10-II: ch. 36 (which is parallel to I S ch. 31-II K ch. 25) passages are, as a rule, transferred in extenso with but slight variations of expression; not infrequently, however, the excerpted narratives are expanded, sometimes remarkably, by the insertion either of single verses or clauses, or of longer passages, as the case may be. It is impossible to give here a list of all the Chronicler's additions; the following are, however, the principal longer passages: I: chs. 22-29 (dealing mostly with David's preparations for a temple, and organization of the Levites, etc.), II: 11 5-23, 12 1, 25-26 (inserted between I K 14 25 and 26), 13 3-22; 14 3-15 15, 16 7-10, 17 15-19, 19 1-20

30, 21 2-4, 10b-19, 24 15-23, 25 5-10, 12-16, 26 5-20 (to 'because'), 27 4-6, 28 5-15, 17-20, 29 3-31 21 (Hezekiah's passover, etc.), 32 2-8, 25-29, 33 11b-10 (Manasseh's captivity, repentance, and restoration), 34 3-7, 35 1b-17 (Josiah's passover), 21-23 (inserted between II K 23 29a and 30).

The reader who desires properly to understand the method and point of view of the Chronicler should mark in his RV—by underlining in the case of simple words or verses, and by drawing a line along the margin in the case of longer passages—these and the other passages peculiar to him. He will then soon discover that they have a character of their own, in language and expression, not less than in subject-matter, which differentiates them materially from the parts transferred unaltered from Samuel or Kings.

Thus (1) they often comprise statistical matter, genealogies, lists of names, etc. (e.g., most of I: chs. 2-9, 12, 15 4-10, 25 9-31, etc.).

(2) Very frequently they relate to the organization of public worship, or describe religious ceremonies, especially with reference to the part taken in them by Levites and singers, as I: 13 1-5, 15 1-28, 16 4-42 (where the older narrative of the transference of the ark to the city of David has been enlarged, or, as in 15 25-28 = II S 6 12b-15 altered, from this point of view) and most of I: chs. 22-29, II: 8 13-15, 20 14, 19, 21, 28, 29 3-31 21, 35 1b-17.

(3) In many cases they have a didactic aim: in particular they show a tendency to refer events to their supposed moral causes, to represent, for instance, a great calamity as a punishment for wickedness, and a great deliverance as the reward of piety; notice, for example, II: 12 1, 2b-8 (the cause of Shishak's invasion), 13 18, 17 10, 21 10b, 22 7, 24 23-24, 26 6, 18-20 (only the fact of Uzziah's leprosy is narrated in II K 15 5), 27 6, 32 25 f., 33 11-13, 35 21-23; and in speeches put into the mouths of various prophets, II: 12 5-8, 13 4-12, 16 7-10, 19 2-3, 20 14-17, 37a, 21 12-15, and elsewhere. Attention should also be directed to the short insertions introduced often into the narratives excerpted from Samuel or Kings for the purpose of supplementing them from the points of view just indicated. Comp., for instance, the notes of this kind on ritual, or the parts taken by Levites, singers, etc., in II: 5 11b-13a (inserted in the middle of I K 8 10), 6 13, 7 1-3, 6, 23 2, 4, 6a (and much besides in this ch., altered from II K ch. 11), 34 12b-13; and the explanations, or reflections, in I: 10 13 f. (the cause of Saul's death), 21 6 f., 29 f. (justifying David's sacrifice on Zion), II: 1 3b-6a (legalizing the worship at the high place of Gibeon), 8 11b, 12 12, 14, 16 12b, 18 31b, 22 3b, 4b, 24 25 (middle), 25 20b, 27a.

3. Sources Used by the Compiler. One main source of the Chronicler has been sufficiently indicated viz., the earlier historical books from Gn to II K (especially I S-II K). What, however, were the sources from which the additional matter contained in Ch was derived? The notices contained in I: chs. 1-9 were derived, it is natural to think, from genealogical and other tribal records (cf. I: 5 17, 9 1). But from the time of David onward the Chronicler, like the compiler of Kings, refers, as a rule, at the end of each reign, to some definite source where further particulars are to be found.

The source most frequently cited is the 'book of the kings of Judah and Israel' (or 'of Israel and Judah'), II: 16 11, 27 7, etc.; elsewhere (where this book is not mentioned) he refers to some special authority bearing the name of a prophet (I: 29 29, II: 9 29, 12 15, 13 22, 20 34, 26 22, 32 32, 33 19); once (II: 24 27) he cites the 'Commentary (midhrash) of the Book of the Kings' (cf. II: 13 22, the 'Commentary (midhrash) of the prophet Iddo'). That the first of these books is not the canonical Book of Kings is apparent from its being cited for particulars which this does not contain (as II: 27 7, 33 18): inasmuch, moreover, as the prophetic histories just mentioned are never cited with the 'Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel' (tho this must have extended at least from Asa, II: 16 11, to Jehoiakim, II: 36 8), and as two of these histories are stated to have formed part of that book (II: 20 34, 32 32), it is generally supposed that they were not independent works written by the prophets in question, but sections of the great 'Book of the Kings' relating to them, and hence familiarly cited under their names. Whether the 'Commentary of the Book of the Kings' (II: 24 27) is another name for the 'Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel' is uncertain; but in any case the name is significant; for 'midhrash' (common in postbiblical Hebrew) means a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (such as To or Sus): the 'midhrash' here referred to will thus have been a postexilic work intended to develop the moral or religious lessons deducible from the history of the kings. Now this is just the leading motive in many of the narratives peculiar to Chronicles, which have been apparently derived by the compiler from the 'Book of the Kings'; the last-named work, therefore, even if not (as many scholars suppose) identical with the 'Commentary of the Book of the Kings,' will have been similar in character and tendency. The 'Commentary of the Prophet Iddo' will have been either a particular section of the same work or a separate work of the same kind, in which Iddo was the prominent figure.

4. Historical Value. Much of the additional matter peculiar to Chronicles can not be historical. In some cases the figures are incredibly high (II 17 14-19); in others the scale or character of the occurrence is such that, had they really happened precisely as described, it is difficult to think that they would have been passed by in Samuel and Kings (II 33 11-17); while as regards the speeches assigned to historical characters, and the motives attributed to them, these are nearly always conceived largely from a point of view very different from that which prevails in the earlier narratives, and agreeing closely with the compiler's. (II 13 4-12). The compiler lived in an age, two centuries or more after the return from Babylon, when new religious interests and a new type of piety had been developed, and asserted themselves strongly. The Chronicler reflects faithfully the spirit of his age. A new mode of viewing the past history of his nation began to prevail: preexilic Judah was pictured as already in possession of the institutions, and governed by the ideas and principles, which were in force at a later day; the empire of David and his successors was projected on a magnified scale: the past, in a word, was idealized, and its history, where necessary, rewritten accordingly. 'Thus it was quite impossible in the Chronicler's time to represent the age of David and Solomon as great and glorious unless the moderate figures given in Kings were altered to correspond with the ideas of men accustomed to think of the mighty armies of the Persian monarchs or of Alexander the Great.' (W.A.L. Elmslie, p. xv.) Thus the Levitical organization of the compiler's own time, especially the three choirs, are represented as established by David; the ritual of the Priests' Code is duly observed under the early kings; religious ceremonies, including even some not mentioned in Samuel and Kings at all, are described with an abundance of detail suggested evidently by the usage of the compiler's own day; David amasses for the Temple enormous treasures (I 22 14); and his successors have the command of large armies, and are victorious against even larger than their own (e.g., II 13 3, 17, 14 8, 9, 17 14-19). There is doubtless a genuine historical nucleus at the basis of many of these representations; but it has been expanded by the Chronicler and thrown by him into a form adapted to describe past events as he conceived they must really have happened, and to inculcate the lessons which he understood the history to teach. There is thus nothing improbable in the statement that David collected materials for a temple; but the details in I:chs. 22-29 must be greatly exaggerated. The narrative in II S 6 of the removal of the ark to Zion makes no mention of Levites as present on the occasion; but in I:13, 15-16 (see above) the Chronicler introduces many additions with the object of making good the omission, and in 16 8-36 places in David's mouth a Psalm composed of parts of three postexilic Psalms (105 1-15, 96 1-13a, 106, 1, 47, 48). In I K 8 3 the ark is borne by priests; but in II Ch 5 4 'Levites' is substituted to make the usage conform to the later Levitical law; I K 8 6 is similarly altered in II Ch 7 9 f. to harmonize with the custom of the Second Temple. In II K 11 Jehoiada's assistants in the deposition of Athaliah are the foreign body-guard; in II Ch 23 they are Levites, in accordance with later usage, which did not allow aliens to approach so near to the holy things; a series of deliberate alterations has been made in the older narrative, and a new coloring given to the entire occurrence. In II: 2 3-16 the correspondence between Hiram and Solomon (I K 5 2 a) has been rewritten by the Chronicler in his own style. Other similar instances could be quoted. It is also hardly open to doubt that both the speeches attributed to various prophets, and the representations of the history itself, are in many cases strongly colored by the compiler's theory of the prompt and direct punishment of sin and reward of virtue (comp. above, § 2 (3) and the short insertions quoted just afterward). The Chronicler supplies evidence of the highest value for the ideas and institutions of the age in which he himself lived; but his representations of the past must be accepted with great caution and discrimination. He is not, however, on that account to be regarded as a falsifier of history; on the contrary, he is a man of deep moral earnestness, and a pleasing and doubtless also a characteristic example of the type of godliness prevalent in Israel at his time; he simply viewed the past as his contemporaries viewed it, and described it accordingly.

5. Linguistic Peculiarities. The Hebrew style of the Chronicler is peculiar; it is marked by many mannerisms (some of which are perceptible even in a translation), and also by the occurrence in it of numerous words and expressions which are not only peculiar, but distinctly late (see particulars in HDB I, 389 ff., or Driver, LOT, p. 535 ff.). This fact is of importance; for it is conclusive evidence that no part of the additions can be an excerpt from the autographs of any preexilic writing; if such autographs were accessible to the compiler, the information derived from them must have been entirely recast by him and presented in his own fashion. The speeches contained in the additions form no exception to what has been said: these also, even the shortest (e.g., II 16 7-9) are shown, by their close similarities in both thought and expression to the postexilic narratives peculiar to the Chronicles, to be one and all the Chronicler's own composition.

LITERATURE: The standard commentary is still that of Bertheau (1873), to be supplemented, where necessary, by Benzinger (1901) and Kittel (1902). The Eng. reader may consult W. A. L. Elmslie's Comm. in the Cambr. Bible (1916), E. L. Curtis (ICC) and W. Harvey-Jellie. W. H. Bennett's vol. in the Expositor's Bible, tho not a continuous commentary, contains much that is suggestive and useful, especially on the aims and method of the Chronicler.

CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION. 1. The Church not Organized by Jesus. The Christian Church as an organization, rather than a Brotherhood bound to Jesus as God's Messiah, Head of His coming Kingdom in and through Israel (see KINGDOM OF GOD), did not exist in the lifetime of Jesus. Further, altho the choice of the Twelve and the references to a Church (Congregation) of His own (Mt 16 18), and to His building a temple not made with hands (Mk 14 58), may be evidence that He had in view a renovated Congregation (ἐκκλησία cf. 'the Congregation in the wilderness,' Ac 7 38) of Israel, 'the Kingdom of God' (Mt 8 11; Lk 13 28 f.), He gives no rules for its constitution or organization. It is vain to seek such either in Mt 16 18 ff. or in Mt 18 15 ff. Even the ordinance of baptism is connected in the N T only with the risen Jesus (see BAPTISM § 3); and even if we accept as historical—rather than as the Church's reading of its Lord's intention in the light of its own usage—the command to repeat certain acts of the Last Supper (I Co 11 24 f.; Lk 22 19; but not Mk or Mt), nothing is said as to the manner. The life and organization of the Church are visible only after the Pentecostal gift and experience of Messiah's own Spirit. They are, in fact, the free product of this great event (cf. "What happened at Pentecost?" in The Spirit [1919]).

2. Earliest Apostolic Church life. The earliest picture of Church life is given in Ac 2 42; 'They devoted themselves assiduously to the teaching of the Apostles and to (the) fellowship—the Breaking of the Loaf and the prayers.' In these four particulars Luke has given the notes of the Church in its first days. The Apostles had a unique place in it by virtue of their unique relation to Jesus. 'Unlearned and laymen' (ἰδιῶται, Ac 4 13) in technical religious teaching (doctrine AV), as they were, there was one thing they knew better than others; they knew Jesus and could bear witness to Him (Ac 1 8). Their teaching was given, it seems, in the Temple (2 46), in Solomon's Portico (see TEMPLE §27) or Colonnade, where religious teachers of any kind could instruct those who cared to listen (Jn 10 23; Ac 3 11, 5 12). Its character may have been a rudimentary form of such witness to Jesus and His teaching as we have in developed form in the Synoptic Gospels. But the Church was devoted, also, to fellowship, κοινωνία (see C. A. Scott, The Fellowship of the Spirit, [1921], for this and for all it implied and issued in). Its members had a profound sense of unity (ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ, 'together in unity' [2 47] describes them), conjoined with exultant joy (ἐγαλλίασις, 2 46). 'None of them said anything of the things he had was his own' (4 32).

There was no compulsory communism (Ac 5 4), but an immense generosity of which the case of Barnabas was a specially shining example (4 36 f.). Out of common funds voluntarily given, distribution was made according as any had need (Ac 4 35). A spontaneous and genuine attempt was made to realize brotherhood, the oneness of the children of God. Of such 'fellowship' a characteristic expression was the breaking of bread. This was daily and domestic (κατ' οἶκον, 2 46), and is interpreted by the phrase, μετέλαβον τροφῆς, 'partook of food.' If it was sacramental, it was a sacramental meal, and not a sacrament in the modern sense, which excludes the idea of a meal. It is not 'the daily ministration' of Ac 6 1 which is here in view—this last is akin rather to a food dispensary for relief of distress—but a sacred meal (like that of Jesus and His inner circle, hallowed by blessing over a loaf, cf. Lk 24 30, 35) shared in by all Christians, such as that described in I Co 11 20 ff., and under the title Agapé ('Feast of Charity,' 'Love Feast') in Jude ver. 12. What we speak of as the Lord's Supper or Eucharist, i.e. the Thanksgiving or Blessing of God over His gifts of bread and wine, and solemn eating together the elements thus blessed, was in the beginning part of such a 'love-meal' or 'Lord's Supper' (I Co 11 20 f.). According to the close analogy to Jewish sacred meals of this order, prefaced by 'Hallowing' (Kiddush) or solemn blessing of God's name over a broken loaf and a common cup (see Mansfield College Essays, 55 ff.; E. von der Goltz, Tischgebete u. Abendmahlsgebete, [1905]), this 'Breaking of the Loaf' with Thanksgiving Prayer came at the opening of the meal. It was only the emergence on heathen soil of such disorders as are referred to by Paul, which led to the two being separated and made in the strict sense a sacrament.

The other form of Christian Fellowship named in 2 42 is the prayers, the definite article showing that special prayers are meant, probably those associated with the 'Breaking of the Loaf,' round which grew up the only distinctive Christian worship at the first. Otherwise the believers in Jesus, 'those who had believed together' (so 2 44 in WH's text), shared the ordinary Jewish forms of devotion in the Temple (3 1, cf. 2 46; Lk 24 53).

There is no trace at this stage of any definite organization in the Church. The Apostles were its natural and inevitable, rather than its official, leaders; and not only witnessed to Jesus, but had the management of the common funds (Ac 4 35—5 2), tho the actual daily relief work fell on others, but rather informally (see below). The Jewish type of thought in the new Israel comes out in the choice of Matthias, in order to make their number again correspond to its twelve tribes (Ac 1 15 ff.) All who were of the Church were inspired with 'holy Spirit' the specific Messianic gift (2 16 ff., 33, 38). In relation to one another they were brothers: in relation to Jesus they were disciples. This last word is found only in Ac and the Gospels. Altho it signifies not only a pupil but an adherent, its suggestion of actual personal relationship with Jesus as Teacher seems to have caused it early to die out (save for martyrs, as specially 'learners' of their Lord in His earthly example: so e.g. Ignatius).

3. Extent of Organization in the Jerusalem Church. The first indication of more official organization is given in Ac ch. 6: the appointment of the Seven. There is no hint of a constitution Divinely fixed beforehand, and now put in effect. A new need emerges in the Church's life; and reasonable steps are taken to meet it. Neither is there any idea that all office in the Church is implicit in the apostolic function, and that the Apostles here delegate part of their authority to what may therefore be called an apostolic ministry. The very reverse is the case. The Apostles say: 'This daily ministration, this serving of tables, is not our business; it is not meet that we should leave the word of God to attend to it; look out trusted and qualified men, and we will entrust it to them' (Ac 6 1-6). This was done. It is an irrelevant question to ask whether the Seven were deacons. Later on, to be a deacon was to have a certain office; but these men were not invested with an office, they were appointed to a function, 'to serve (διακονεῖν) tables,' which was relief in kind. They are never in Ac called 'deacons' (Philip, one of them, is described later simply as 'one of the Seven,' 21 8). Plainly Stephen had gifts proper to more 'spiritual' functions than those here entrusted to him; so, too, Philip, the Evangelist, did distinguished service in other ways, and in places far from Jerusalem (Ac 8 5, 26, 40 21 8). Possibly this Board of Almoners, as such, was broken up finally by the persecution aroused by Stephen, particularly against 'Hellenist' Christians, the element in the Church from which they seem specially to have been taken (6 1, 5, 8 1, 11 19). If it is an anachronism to call the Seven 'deacons,' it is an additional anachronism to speak of prayer and imposition of hands in their case as ordination (see § 8, below). They were chosen as already 'full of Spirit and (practical) wisdom' (6 4). Prayer naturally accompanied their formal appointment (as it did all solemn Church actions), which was expressed symbolically, in keeping with Jewish usage, by laying on of hands (cf. Ac 13 2 f., where equally there is no idea of 'conferring orders').

We come across elders in Judea (not Jerusalem in particular), without warning, in Ac 11 30). It was so natural for any Jewish society to rule itself by zqēnīm (זקנים), that the historian takes their existence for granted. It is clear from Ac 15 2, 4, 6, 22, 16 4, where they are mentioned at Jerusalem in connection with the Apostles, that they had an important place in the administration of the Church (see § 8, below). 'The whole Church' there, indeed, is associated with both in Ac 15 22: but the Apostles and elders took the lead in guiding its deliberations, and formulating and carrying into effect its decisions. In all these passages the Apostles are, no doubt, the Twelve. According to Ac they exercised a general supervision over the spread of Christianity, and maintained in this way the sense of unity in the Church. Thus, when Philip preached in Samaria, they sent Peter and John down from Jerusalem to make sure the new development in principle had the Divine approval, and to keep the work in contact with the center. The prayers of the two Apostles, accompanied with the laying on of hands, procured for those Samaritans who had been baptized the gift of 'holy Spirit' (Ac 8 14). As the gift here spoken of was a sensible one—it 'fell upon' them, i.e., there was an ecstatic burst of glossolalia or prophecy—it is not what is either asked or expected in the modern sacrament of Confirmation; it was the proof to men of God's acceptance of any (here a fresh class) into His holy Ecclesia; hence to speak of what happened here as 'confirmation' is one anachronism more. The extent to which the life of the Church was consciously under Divine guidance is shown especially in the stories of Philip and Peter in Ac 8 26, 29, 39, 10 3, 10, 19. Every step in its expansion is supernaturally indicated and sanctioned; and it is by the ministry of its inspired men—by the exhortation of the Holy Spirit' (Ac 9 31)—that it is multiplied. Prayer and the ministry of the word are the main duties of the Twelve (Ac 6 4): there is no trace of official preachers, appointed for this function which thus far depends solely on direct 'holy Spirit' gifts.

Prophets are mentioned, several by name (Ac 11 27, 13 1, 15 32); also an inspired kind of 'teachers' (13 1). Any one might 'speak the word' who had the spiritual gift to do so (8 4, 11 19). It was, in point of fact, unofficial and unordained preachers to whom the Gospel owed much of its diffusion (e.g. 8 4, 11 19 generally, 8 5-40 Philip); and in the most important cases, like Samaria (8 5 ff.) and Gentiles at Caesarea (11 1, 18) and Antioch (11 22), the Apostles and the mother-Church supervised and approved as they could. Life was abundant, free, inspired; the conscious of its own unity and with an instinct for its preservation, it neither was nor could be organized in legal forms.

A singular phenomenon in the primitive Palestinian Church was the authority wielded by James, the Lord's brother (see JAMES). We have a hint of this in Ac 12 17; it is clear in Ac chs. 15, 21, and Gal. ch. 2. It rested, no doubt, in part on the special appearance of the risen Savior to him (I Co 15 7); but in part, also, on his natural relation to Jesus (cf. the later case of his kinsman, Symeon, Euseb. H. E. III, 11), and on the congeniality of his type of piety to the mass of Jewish believers (and even to the Jews generally, if we may trust Josephus, Ant. XX. 9, 1, and Hegesippus ap. Eus. H. E. II, 23). But even if he was counted an apostle (Gal. 1 19, see APOSTLE), his ascendancy was personal, not official.

4. Paul's Ideas of the Church. So much for primitive Church life as moving on lines continuous with Jewish ideas and forms of religious order and organization, while yet raised to a higher power by the new inspiration ('holy Spirit') due to faith in Jesus as Messiah. A more varied scene meets us when we pass to the Church in the Gentile world and to the abundant information of the Pauline Epistles. Some of it is occasional, dealing with things as they were in this church or that, e.g. in I Co; some is more doctrinal, dealing with the ideal of the Church and its life and ministries, e.g., in Eph. Only in Paul the real and the ideal do not so much contrast, as interpenetrate each other. The community of believers in Corinth is the Church of God (in miniature) in that city; the Apostle describes it as σῶμα Χριστοῦ Christ's body (I Co 12 27); and the ideal and eternal Church of Eph. 1 23, 'His body, the fulfilment (full realization) of Him that is coming to universal fulfilment' (τὸ πλῆρωμα τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐν πάσιν πληρουμένου, cf. 4 16; Col 1 17 f.), is actually represented in the local churches to which Paul sends this circular letter.

The life of the Church is one because it is the life of one Spirit in it; and this vital unity, or unity of the Spirit (Eph 4 3), is the only unity with which Paul is concerned. But it can not be realized save in and through actual Church unity, as distinct from factions and schisms in the visible community, both local and universal. When he says there is one Body, he uses the word body in the organic or physiological sense. The Church is one body because one life pervades it and unites its members; it is not one corporation, in the legal sense; or one organization, with a legal constitution, to vary from which is schism or death. True Christians are one in Christ, in the one Spirit which all have drunk (I Co 12 13), or in the common life of Love by which they are all animated (Eph 4 1-4); they have 'one Lord, one faith (in Him), one baptism (into Him)' (Eph 4 5). But it is another matter to say that they form one visible organization or corporation throughout the world. This was not the case.

5. The Church a Living Body. To get a proportioned look at the life, organization, and ministries of the apostolic Churches, we must start with this conception of the 'the body of Christ.' Every Christian is a member of the Body of Christ,—at once universal and particular or localized—and every member has his function in the Body. That function is the διακονία, service or ministry, which it can render to the whole; and Christian ministry is not primarily official, but a function of the Body. Every member ministers in virtue of his or her membership, and of the specific function immanent in the special grace-gift (charisma, Spiritual gift, EV) of each member. Such was the basis of the Christian ministry. Therein lay its primary Divine authority, the purpose for which God through Christ gave the gifts for the common profit (Ro 12 4 ff.; I Co 12 4-7, 11 ff.; Eph 4 7 ff.). The Church's action, giving its corporate commission to certain of its members to exercise special representative functions of ministry, came, in time, to add, indeed, something of authority ad homines, but only on the basis of its own Spirit-taught recognition of the Divine will in its members' gifts of grace. Such authority, that is, was secondary and derivative.

Fundamentally, then, God by 'grace-gifts' determined function or ministry in the Church; this, by common recognition crystallized into office (I Th 5 12 ff.; I Co 16 5 ff., 18); and this in turn led in certain cases to formal commission or ordination. These principles we now proceed to elucidate in more detail. Here the chief passage is I Co chs. 12-14; and it is a striking fact that neither there nor throughout the Epistle do we meet the idea of official ministry at all. 'God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, divers kinds of tongues' (I Co 12 28). A parallel to this is found in Ro 12 3-8, where also ministry is conceived as the exercise of a grace-gift. Only, here we see that every member of the Church has such a gift, and therefore is potentially, at least, part of its organic ministry, which is ideally co-extensive with its membership. There is, that is, no difference in principle at first between the ministry which we should call respectively 'churchly' and 'social.' 'Prophecy' (the most 'spiritual' of functions), and lowly practical service to others' need (diakonia); 'teaching' the word, or applying it personally as 'exhortation,' and 'sharing with others' deeds of beneficence (cf. He 13 16); leadership and showing pity—all these equally are treated as ministry to and of the Body of Christ. And the laws of the ministry (as explained in Ro 12; I Co 12-14) are the same for all. The first is humility; it is only with what we have received that we can minister, and therefore gifts are never to be used for vain glory. The second is love; nothing that we have received is for ourselves alone; the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον, in the interests of the whole. Here comes in Paul's 'Psalm of Love' (I Co 13).

6. The More Important Ministries. There was, however, a grading of grace-gifts and ministries, according to their value and rarity in the Church. In the first class came Apostles, Prophets, Teachers (I Co 12 28), all of whom 'spoke the word of God' with the insight implying specially fresh and full inspiration. In idea their ministry was for the Church generally rather than as localized, tho in different degrees, this being chiefly so of Apostles and least of Teachers. None of these were elected or ordained by men. Their gift was self-attesting; the spiritual power which accompanied the exercise of it was the only guaranty it had. Besides the stricter sense of the word apostle, according to which it came in the end to include only the Twelve and Paul, there was a larger sense in which it included all primary 'missionaries' of the Gospel (see I Co 15 5, with ver. 7, 9 1-5; Ro 16 7). (See APOSTLE). The prophet was a man who had more than the common Christian inspiration (see Eph 2 20), and who spoke the word of God with manifest power, unto edification, encouragement, and consolation (I Co 14 3). The Divine impulse in him was of a less ecstatic kind than the gift of 'tongues' (glossolia), and could be used more self-consciously; 'the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets' (ver. 22). Altho inspired, however, the prophet was not infallible; and when he had spoken, it was for the Spirit-bearing Church itself to discriminate the value of the message given in God's name (I Th 5 21). We have an instance of the sort of principle determining this in I Co 12 3; and we read of discernment of spirits as itself a prophetic charisma (I Co 12 10, cf. 14 29). Paul's injunction not to despise prophecies—lest it mean 'quenching the Spirit'—but to prove all such fervid words, and hold fast what was good (I Th 5 19 ff.), implies that there was already a tendency to look askance at such inspired spontaneity on account of its abuses—a tendency which grew as time went on—and also as impostors, morally false prophets (cf. II P 2 1 ff.; Jude 19 and passim; Rev 2 20) began to ape the prophetic manner. Prophets, no doubt, spoke often of things to come, on the lines of O T prophecies, as of the glory to be revealed I Co 2 9 ff.; Rev passim), and especially of the Parousia (cf. I Th 4 13 ff.; II Th 2 2 ff.; I Th 4 1 ff.), and may sometimes have let the imagination run wild. Sometimes, as in the case of Agabus (Ac 11 27, 21 10, cf. 20 23, 21 4), they concerned themselves with a nearer future. But for the most part Christian 'prophecy' was rather powerful preaching of the deeper aspects of the Gospel as present spiritual truth (Cf. I Co 12 8, 13 2, 14 3, 6). About the teachers it is not easy to be definite. In Ac 13 1 they are combined, as in I Co 12 28 (cf. 14 6; Ro 12 7 ff.), with the prophets; in Eph 4 11, at a rather later stage, they are more closely connected, perhaps to some extent identified, with the pastors, as if 'teaching' were now becoming a function of the latter's practical ministry of oversight (see below no. 8). Probably 'teachers' had in a more reflective form, acquired through others, something of the insight into what is called in I Co 12 8 'the word of wisdom' and 'the word of knowledge,' which 'prophets' had more intuitively, by fresh spiritual vision. Hence the message passed on by the teacher was 'instruction' (didaché) in the form suited to become part of the Church's tradition (paradosis) of truth. Thus, tho the gift of teaching, or the right to teach, was not at first connected with any office (cf. I Co

14 26, 'when ye come together every one hath a didache,'—a lesson to teach), it would be an advantage, when once local offices did come into being, to have them filled, other things being equal, with men who could also render the Church this service. In Jewish Christianity both 'wisdom' and 'knowledge' were largely practical in meaning, concerned with the 'way' of life or truth; and probably the 'teacher' was mostly an expounder of Christian ethics (cf. the traditional 'Didaché of the Twelve Apostles,' especially V. 1, 'this way of the teaching'; also the use of didaskalos in Ja 3 1). One other inspired minister is mentioned in Eph 4 11, the evangelist. As applied to Philip (Ac 21 8), the name means a missionary of the Gospel, without the higher powers of Apostleship or of Prophecy, as its order in Eph 4 11 suggests. In II Ti 4 5, Timothy is bidden 'do an evangelist's work,' in the sense of 'proclaim the message' (ver. 2) of the Evangel, as he had learned it from Paul and taught it by his side. Far later, the name is used by Eusebius (H. E. III. 37, cf. V. 10) of missionary disciples of the Apostles, i.e., secondary Apostles (cf. those of the Didaché), which is very much the N T meaning.

7. The Less Important Ministries. The other inspired 'gifts' and ministries are of minor importance for our subject. Paul describes them by abstract nouns in the plural number—δυνάμεις, χαρίσματα ιαμάτων, ἀντιλήψεις, κυβερνήσεις, γέννη γλωσσῶν (I Co 12 28)—as tho the person here were of less significance. Here, too, the order, probably, shows Paul's relative valuation of them for the Church of his day. It is striking, then, that at first 'helping' was held higher than 'governing'; cf. I Co 16 15; Ro 12 7 f. and contrast the later Ph 1 1. The first two we should regard as 'supernatural,' the next two as not so. To Paul they were all 'manifestations of the Spirit' (I Co 12 7-11), 'tongues' coming last because of least 'profit' to Church life.

Powers ('miracles,' EV) were acts most patently revealing super-human power, inclusive of exorcism (Ac 19 11 f.) and other exceptional 'wonders' of healing or judgment (Ac 5 12, 15 f., cf. 1-11 9 34, 13 11 f., 19 12, 20 10-12; I Co 5 5; II Co 12 12, 13 2 f.). Charisms (gifts) of healings were healings of a less striking kind (Ja 5 15; Ac 28 8).

Coming now to the less abnormal grace-gifts, helps (ἀντιλήψεις) suggests the practical ministry of service (Ro 12 7; I Co 16 15 f.), such work as came later to be assigned to official deacons; and governments (κυβερνήσεις), lit. 'steerings,' suggests such a function of guidance or administration as came later to be assigned to official elders. But neither in Ro nor I Co is there any trace of officials. Such gifts are freely given by God and spontaneously exercised by those who have them; e.g. the house of Stephanas (I Co 16 15) who 'set themselves to minister unto the saints.' All Christians were called to put their χαρίσματα into the common stock and no official organization cancelled freedom, lest it should, as Paul says, 'quench the Spirit.' The last gift specified in I Co ch. 12 is kinds of tongues (ver. 28), 'speaking with tongues' (ver. 30, 14 2). It is frequently combined with prophecy as one of the most characteristic of spiritual gifts (χαρίσματα, Ac 2

4-11, 10 46; I Co 13 1, 14 2). Paul, himself, possessed it in a conspicuous degree (I Co 14 18), and thanked God for it, but he ranked it lowest of spiritual gifts. It is his account of it in I Co ch. 14, and not the transformed one in Ac ch. 2, on which we must base our conception of it (see also TONGUES, SPEAKING WITH). It had nothing to do with foreign languages. It was an emotional, not a linguistic, gift; the man who spoke with a tongue, spoke out of an emotional rapture. His 'spirit' was active in this—as we might say now, his religious nature was engaged in it; but his nous, understanding, was not. There might be some one present in the assembly who could interpret this overwhelming emotion, better than the man who was subject to it: if so, to speak in a tongue might be allowed in church; otherwise, not. For, after all, unlike prophecy, it was a 'sign' meant for non-believers rather than believers (14 22). It is clear from Ac 2 11, 10 46; I Co 14 10, that in its general character 'speaking with tongues' was an ecstasy of praise, a magnifying of God and His mighty works of redemption, a thanksgiving to which Amen was the natural sequel. Its dangers were evident, and Paul warns against them. They lay partly in the temptation to indulge in a sub-personal religious experience; partly in a tendency to vanity, making a display of one's 'supernatural' gift without regard to others' good. Hence Paul discouraged 'tongues' in favor of the intelligible gift of prophecy, by which one could build up not only himself but also the Church (I Co 14 3); and in course of time it died out.

8. Organization of Local Churches. The ministry which is a function of Church-membership and depends on the free exercise of spiritual gifts, tho it is the vital one, on which the being of the Church depends, is not the only one. No society can long live and act without some kind of more formal organization, some official ministers to act as its representatives; and the beginnings of such a ministry can be traced in the N T. We have seen that there were elders in the church at Jerusalem; and in Ac 14 23 we read that Paul and Barnabas appointed elders in every church founded on their first journey. On the mode of appointment Luke is not quite explicit (see Ramsay, St. Paul The Traveler, pp. 120 ff.). Probably (cf. 6 3) the Apostles described the kind of men wanted and the church chose them (what follows may all refer to the churches, not the elders, cf. 20 32). The duties of elders are not defined, but can be inferred indirectly. It is clear from 20 28, compared with 20 17, that they were mainly pastoral—that is, duties of moral supervision. The elders of Ephesus are exhorted to take heed to the flock of God in which the Holy Spirit has made them bishops (ἐπίσκοποι, overseers mg.)—here used to express function, not office—and to shepherd the Church of God. So in I P 5 1, Peter exhorts 'elders' among his readers (here, probably, simply 'seniors,' as the Apostle calls himself their 'fellow-elder,' cf. 'juniors' in ver. 5; see I Clem. I. 3; Polycarp, ad Phil. V. 1, 3 for such age-distinctions in the Church) to shepherd the flock of God ('exercising the over-sight,' ἐπισκοποῦντες, is absent from the best MSS.). Broadly speaking, the antecedents of the name πρεσβύτερος, 'elder', were more Hebrew, and those of 'bishop' more Greek (see Concordance to LXX. s.v.). The facts justify us in saying that 'elder' is a title of dignity, and 'bishop' a corresponding title of function. The persons were at first and for long the same. In every church there were several men who had the rank of elders and the duties of bishop (in Ph 11 'with bishops,' without the article), that is, 'oversight' (cf. Tit 1 5-7). Pastors (Eph 4 11) is a more pictorial name for the same persons (elders) viewed in another aspect (see I P 2 25, 'the pastor and bishop of your souls'). Moral supervision and discipline were their preeminent concern.

The edifying of the Church by prophesying, teaching, praise and public worship generally (eucharistic prayer was the special function of 'prophets,' Did. X. 7), belonged at first to the apostles, prophets and teachers who might visit it, or to the free exercise of their spiritual gifts by members generally (I Co 14 26). In course of time, however, men would often be chosen as elders who possessed, also, other gifts useful to the Church; and, as the enthusiastic inspiration waned, the conduct of the public worship—and not only the function of presiding and overseeing its order—and especially the administration of the sacraments (in which the Church must act through authorized representatives, if all is to be done decorously and in order), would fall into their hands. Thus we see the same class of ministers called 'pastors and teachers,' and contrasted with the non-local ministry—apostles, prophets, and evangelists—in Eph 4 11. Elders, 'who labor in word and teaching,' as well as in their more proper function of moral oversight (episkopé, 31), are to be reckoned worthy of exceptional honor (I Ti 5 17, cf. 3 2 διδασκαλίας 'apt to teach'). The whole body of elders in a local church was called the πρεσβυτέριον, the presbytery (I Ti 4 14). At Lystra it joined with Paul in laying hands on Timothy, when he was set apart as an evangelist. The gift of God given in this ordination (I Ti 4 14; II Ti 1 6) must be interpreted of Timothy's fresh experience at the time, as conditioned by (διὰ) prophesy (revealing its latent presence), on the one hand, and the solemn laying on of hands by Paul and the local presbytery, on the other. It meant a greater fulness of the spirit of courage, love, and self-discipline (ver. 7), fitting him better for his task, and coming to him naturally by the grace of God in that impressive hour. Probably in many cases like Timothy's, there were 'prophecies leading the way to' (I Ti 1 18; cf. I Clem. XLII, 4 'testing them by the Spirit') the men to be chosen; that is, inspired voices named fit persons for any particular task (Ac 13 2). But, tho they were appointed because they were fit, such persons got a new degree of fitness through the experiences connected with their appointment and setting apart to a given ministry.

In the later N T books (Ph 11; I Ti 3 1-13), we find side by side with elders a set of officers called technically deacons. This word is applicable to every minister of the Church, from the apostle down, but in its special sense, used of women as well as men (Ro 16 1; I Ti 3 11), it indicates a class of officers—acting in association with, but of less authority than, the elder-bishops or pastors—who had duties connected with the Church's charities, its care of the poor, strangers, etc. Their qualifications are all those of character and common sense; nothing is said of teaching. When, in course of time, the 'elder-bishops' succeeded 'prophets' in the lead of the local church's corporate (and not merely domestic) Eucharistic worship—and particularly in offering with prayer the church's 'gifts' of thanksgiving—deacons shared in this ministry, as assistants in the handling of the elements (Did. xiv-xv. 2 shows the transition most clearly; cf. I Clem. XLIV).

Men like Timothy at Ephesus or like Titus in Crete were not church officers, but apostolic delegates; they do not represent the normal organization of the Church, but help us to see how the organizing was directed. The development of the monarchical episcopate or pastorate, as distinctive from the collective oversight just explained, lies beyond the limits of the N T (cf. Hort, as below, p. 232).

9. Essential Unity of the Church. The variety of gifts, functions, and offices in the N T Church is only the foil to its essential unity under its one Head, and as indwelt by the one Spirit. It is expounded in Ro 12, I Co 12, and Eph 4, in relation to that unity. The great conception of the Body of Christ underlies it everywhere. The sense of the one Brotherhood (I P 5 9) comes out in numberless ways: in the salutations of the churches to each other through correspondence (Ro 16 16; I P 5 13; He 13 24); in the holy kiss of love, which became a regular part of the church service (Ro 16 16; I Co 16 20; II Co 13 12; I Th 5 26; I P 5 14); in the collections which they made for each other's help in times of distress (Gal 2 10, for Paul's great collection in all Gentile churches, for the poor saints at Jerusalem, cf. Ac 24 17; I Co 16 1-4; II Co 8, 9; Ro 15 25-31); and even linguistically, in the multiplication of compounds with σύν. Of these the commonest are συνεργός, variously rendered in AV fellow-helper, -laborer, -worker, and work-fellow; συνστρατιώτης, fellow-soldier, the Christian ministry being conceived as a campaign (Ph 2 25; Phm 2); συναιχμάλωτος, fellow-prisoner in war, the same figure continued (Col 4 10; Phm 23; Ro 16 7); and σύνδουλος, fellow-slave (Col 1 7, 4 7). Yoke-fellow, σύνζυγος, and fellow-elder, each occurs once (Ph 4 3; I P 5 1). Most significant of such terms are συκληρονόμα, σύσσωμα and συμμετοχα, fellow-heirs, fellow-members of the body, fellow-partakers (Eph 3 6), all together expressing 'the mystery' of God's grace and power in annulling the age-long barrier between Jew and Gentile in the one Headship of Christ.

CHUZAS, χυζας (Χουζας, Chuza, AV): The steward (ἐπίτροπος) of Herod (probably H. Antipas)

(Lk 8 3). As general manager of Herod's estates and household (cf. Plummer, ICC., ad loc.) he was probably a man of rank and means.

CIRCUMCISION: The cutting off of the foreskin (præputium). Among the Hebrews, the Law required the submission to the rite by all the male members of the community on the eighth day after birth (Lv 12 3; Gn 21 4 [P]). In later Judaism, this specification of time was so strictly interpreted that even the Sabbath might be disregarded for the sake of conforming to the law (Shabb, 19 2 f.; Jn 7 22). The person whose duty it was to perform the rite was primitively the father of the child (Gn 17 23); but in exceptional cases in earlier days women were known to have administered it (Ex 4 25), and in later times it became more and more common either to call in a physician (Jos. Ant. XX, 2 4) or to relegate the duty altogether to a special official (the Mohel), as at the present day. Besides the male children of the household, it appears from Gn 17 22 f. that slaves also were circumcised; and according to the law of Ex 12 48 (P) also strangers who wished to participate in the Passover. The practise was not peculiar to the Hebrews. Among the Egyptians there is no doubt that some (Ebers Aegypt u.d.Buch. d. Mos., I, 278, 283), and if Herodotus was correctly informed, all persons were circumcised (Herod. II, 36; cf. also Philo 2. 210, ed. Mangey Erman Egypt, p. 32 f., 539). The Semitic peoples generally seem to have practised the rite with the possible exception of the Assyrians and Babylonians. The reproach of uncircumcision, is especially held up against the Philistines; from which it has been inferred that the Canaanites practised the rite. Among extra-biblical peoples the primary and original aim of the rite was that of a sacrifice designed to secure fertility; but among the Hebrews from the earliest days the idea of purification appears to have supplanted this conception. The ceremony indicated the casting off of uncleanness as a preparation for entrance into the privileges of membership in Israel. In the N T, with its transfer of emphasis from the external and formal to the inner and spiritual side of things, it was first declared unnecessary for Gentile converts to the Gospel (Ac 15 28), and afterward was set aside even by Jewish Christians. In the Pauline Epistles it serves as the basis of a figure signifying the casting off of the uncleanness of sin (Gal 2 7 f.; Eph 2 11). Cf. ERE (1911) sub. v. and see DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6. A. C. Z.

CIS, sis. See KISH.

CISTERN: The character of the land-surface of most of Palestine is such that the rain penetrates but a little way and is soon drained off from the steep hillsides through the numerous ravines and watercourses. Recourse must be had, therefore, to artificial means for collecting and holding the water, and cisterns have been numerous and much used in Palestine ever since it has been inhabited. Every well-ordered house had a cistern in its court (see HOUSE, § 6 (f); FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 12). The RV uses 'cistern' for 'well' AV in Dt 6 11 (mg.); I S 19 22 (mg.); II Ch 26 10; Neh 9 25, and for 'pit' AV in Is 30 14 and Jer 14 3. See PALESTINE, §§ 19, 20; and also Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, Vol. I, p. 245 f. E. E. N.

CITIZENSHIP: The civic side of community life is almost never referred to in the O T. This was partly because the basis of Israel's social organization was the clan or tribe rather than the city (q.v.) partly because of the emphasis laid on the religious organization of Israel, rendering city and state secondary features in social life and the congregation or theocratic kingdom primary, and partly because of the life of the people which was mainly agricultural during the greatest part of its history. The good citizen was the faithful Israelite and the lawless a 'son [man] of Belial' (Jg 19 22; I K 21 10 AV). With the admission of Greek ideas secular relations were distinctly recognized (II Mac 5 8, 14 8). In the N T the figure of the state is so prominent that even the religious community is at times symbolized by it ('commonwealth of Israel,' Eph 2 12). Likewise the privileges of the spiritual community are figured under the conception of citizenship (πολιτεία, Phil 3 20; but AV conversation, and RVmg. 'commonwealth'). In fact, citizenship is the type of the whole sphere of conduct both social and moral (cf. II Co 1 12, 'behave ourselves' RV, 'conversation' AV, and Eph 2 3, 'live' RV). For this figure the conception of the kingdom of heaven furnished proper foundation ('fellow citizen,' Eph 2 19). Of citizenship in the literal sense mention is made but once (Ac 22 25, 28, freedom AV). See ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, §§ 27, 31; and ROMAN. A. C. Z.

CITY: 1. Age of Israelitic Cities. The beginnings of city building are referred by Israelitic legend to the earliest period of human history, and are associated not with nomadic (Abel), but with agricultural (Cain) life. As a matter of fact, most of the cities of the Israelites were originally Canaanite, and came into the hands of the Israelites only as the result of a gradual conquest. When the Israelites reached Palestinian territory, they succeeded in establishing themselves first in the open places and especially in the mountain districts; but as nomads they could not at first secure possession of the fortified cities. In course of time, however, these Canaanite cities were subdued and to them were added also others distinctively Israelite.

2. Significance of City Names. Many of the names of cities are characteristic, and give us the points of view which were determinative in the selection of localities. (1) Names like Ramah, Mizpah, Geba, etc. (all from roots signifying elevation) indicate that a mountain or a hill site was preferred, evidently because it could be easily defended against assault. (2) En-gedi, En-gannim (En = 'spring'), Beer-sheba (Beer = 'well'), etc., indicate the importance of the nearness of a spring, a stream, etc. (3). Designations such as Jearim ('forest'), Kerem ('vineyard'), Abel ('meadow'), etc., show that the location of these cities was marked by such natural features. Cities in valleys, such as Hebron, constituted an exception, since cities usually were built on the slope of a hill—the citadel, or castle, perched on the summit always offering a sure refuge and one difficult to capture.

3. Distinction Between 'City' and 'Village.' Villages and hamlets (hātsēr, p'rāzōth, kāphār, kōpher) on one side, and cities ('ir', poet. qiryāh) on the other, are clearly distinguished in the O T. The hātsērīm are open localities without walls (Lv 25 31); also the 'ārē p'rāzōth' (Est 9 19) are designated as places without walls, without gates and enclosures (Ezk 38 11), for which latter kōpher is the characteristic name. The city ('ir'), on the contrary, was surrounded by a wall (cf. Lv 25 29, 'ir hōmāh', 'city of a wall'), sometimes also by a moat (Dn 9 25, 'wall' AV), and even by a second smaller wall (hāl) in the nature of a rampart (II S 20 15, trench AV; I K 21 23), and had a citadel (migdāl), the gates of which were closed during the night (Jos 2 5, 7), and in later times on the Sabbath (Neh 13 19). (See Plan under NINEVEH.) Such cities were called fortified (II Ch 11 10, etc., fenced AV). The gates were provided with bronze or iron bars and bolts (Dt 3 5; Jg 16 3; Neh 3 6, lock, AV), and were built with chambers overhead (II S 18 24 ff.). From the roof of the structure (II S 18 24), or from a tower by the gate (II K 9 17), a watchman looked out in order to announce approaching danger (Jer 6 17). Near the gates within the city were to be found open places (broad places, broad ways, r-hōbōth, streets, AV Jer 5, Am 5 16), the centers of communal life. Here contracts were entered into (Dt 25 7; Ru 4 1 f., 11; Gn 23 10, 18), assemblies for judicial or deliberative purposes were held (Am 5 12, 15; Is 29 21), buying and selling took place (II K 7 1; cf. market-place, Mt 20 3), and public announcements were made (Jer 17 19). Here was the center of social intercourse in general (Gn 19 1; Ps 69 12). Here strangers who had no friend in the city passed the night (Gn 19 2 ff.; Jg 19 15).

4. Principal Features of a City. The plan and construction of cities were not in ancient times essentially different from those of the Orient of to-day. As walled cities were used more or less as strongholds, it was of advantage not to extend the walls too far from the center. In consequence there was a tendency to contract cities into as small a space as possible. The streets (hātsōth) were as narrow as they are to-day (cf. Jos. Ant. XX, 5 3; BJ. II, 14 9, 15 5; VI, 8 5). For the most part they ran through the city in circuitous courses, so that a straight one was quite the exception (Ac 9 11). In cities which were built on steep hillsides, the roofs of the lower houses served as the street for the higher ones, as at the present day. The streets were not paved. It is in the days of Herod Agrippa II that we first hear of the paving of the streets of Jerusalem with white stones (Jos. Ant. XX, 9 7). This was, however, after the principal street of Antioch had been paved with stone slabs at the expense of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XVI, 5 3; BJ. I, 21 11). Street-cleaning was as unusual in ancient times as it is to-day. Garbage was thrown out of the houses and left to be disposed of by the dogs that roamed at will about the city (Ex 22 31; Ps 59 6, 14 f.). There was also no such thing as the lighting of the streets. The only care of them that is referred to is that by night-watchman (Song 3 3, 5 7; Is 21 11; Ps 127 1, 130 6). The custom practised even to-day of establishing bazaar-streets (shūq; cf. sh'wāqīm, I K 20 34; Ec 12 4; Song 3 2)—i.e., streets in which artisans or merchants of the same class ply their trades—is traceable to ancient times. We read of a bakers' street in Jer 37 21, of a goldsmiths' quarter and a quarter of spice-merchants in Neh 3 31 f., of a fish-gate in 2 Ch 33 14, Neh 3 3, and of a valley of craftsmen in Neh 11 35. Josephus mentions the quarters of wool-merchants, of smiths, and of cloth-dealers (BJ. V, 8 1). To provide an adequate supply of water was frequently a matter of great difficulty. It was necessary at times to construct cisterns or aqueducts. Jerusalem, for example, had quite early in its history a conduit, which was later improved (Is 7 3, 22 9, 11). See JERUSALEM, §§ 13, 34.

5. City Government. As to the administration of the affairs of cities, we know but little. In the days of the Deuteronomist there is evidence of elders and along with them judges (Dt 16 18 ff., 19 12, etc.). Probably the former were the heads of the most influential families. Over Samaria we find a governor (I K 22 26). In fact, Jerusalem must have had several high officials (II K 23 8, etc.). This ancient Jewish administration of cities by elders and others was preserved in the specifically Jewish territory down to the days of the Herods, while other cities adopted a Hellenistic policy (cf. also TOWN CLERK; TREASURER; and CITY, RULERS OF). W. N.—L. B. P.

CITY, FENCED. See CITY, § 3.

CITY OF DAVID See JERUSALEM, § 15.

CITY OF DESTRUCTION: The similarity of hereš (הרש), 'destruction,' to hereš (הרש), 'sun,' apparently caused confusion in Is 19 18. Many MSS. and several versions read 'City of the Sun,' which, as indicating Heliopolis, have been supposed to be the original reading. But the LXX. reads 'city of righteousness,' which Gray thinks (ICC ad loc) the only satisfactory and therefore original reading. E. E. N.

CITY OF PALM-TREES. See JERICHO.

CITY OF SALT (עִיר הַמֶּלַח, 'ir hammelah): A town of Judah in the wilderness (Jos 15 62). The identification with the ruin Tell el Mülh (Map II, E 4) is unsatisfactory.

CITY OF WATERS. See RABBAH; and ROYAL CITY.

CITY, ROYAL. See RABBAH.

CITY, RULERS OF (πολιτάρχαι, 'politarchs,' Ac 17 6): Civil magistrates of a Greek city as contradistinguished from Roman officials. The term politarch is self-explanatory, but it was confined to Macedonia and the sphere of Macedonian influence.

Luke's use of the unusual title is confirmed by an inscription on an arch in Thessalonica mentioning magistrates as politarchs. They are mentioned also in seventeen other inscriptions. In Ac 16 19 'rulers' are 'archons,' the ordinary title of the magistrates in a Greek city. J. R. S. S.*—E. E. N.

CLASPS. See TABERNACLE, § 3.

CLAUDA. See CAUDA.

CLAUDIA (Κλαυδία): Probably a Roman Christian (II Ti 4 21), perhaps a freedwoman of the Claudian gens. She figures in later tradition as the mother or wife of Linus. (Ap. Const. VII, 46).

J. M. T.

CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος, Ac 11 28, 18 2): The fourth Roman emperor (41-54). He was nephew of Tiberius and grandson of Mark Antony. He was proclaimed emperor by the Pretorian guards in 41. C. was a harmless, well-intentioned man, but was induced to bloodshed by his favorites Narcissus, Pallas, and his wife Messalina. He was poisoned by Agrippina his niece and second wife in 54.

The relations of Claudius to Herod Agrippa I, to whose political energies he largely owed his advancement to the throne (cf. Jos. Ant. XIX, 4 5), were most friendly throughout his reign (cf. Dio Cassius, LX, 8; Jos. Ant. XX, 7 1, 1 3), and even led him to grant to the Jews in general throughout the Empire the right of religious worship, warning them at the same time to use it peacefully (cf. Jos. Ant. XIX, 5 2 f.). This did not imply a love of the Jewish people as such; so that, if the warning attached to it was not heeded, restrictive measures against them on the Emperor's part can easily be understood, for example, their expulsion from Rome referred to in Ac 18 2 (cf. Suet. Claud. 25)—whether the expulsion of the entire Jewish community actually occurred, which seems doubtful (note the silence of Tacitus and Josephus regarding it), or was merely attempted and found impracticable (cf. Suet. Tiber. 36), or was not an expulsion at all but only a prohibition of tumultuous assemblages of the general Jewish populace, apart from their ordinary religious services, the right to which they still possessed (cf. Dio Cassius, LX, 6 6). In any case the action of the Emperor would cause many of them to leave the city and account for the presence of Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth when Paul arrived there; since the date of the 'edict,' while not possible of accurate determination, is quite likely to have been between 50 and 52 (cf. Schürer, HJP. II, ii. § 31, n. 69; Zahn, Introd., part XI, Chron. Survey; Ramsay, Paul, p. 254; Knowling on Acts in Expos. Greek Testament).

Under C. Christianity had not been proscribed as a religio illicita, but was still protected sub umbraculo religionis licitæ of Judaism. Consequently, Gallio, proconsul of Achaia (51-52 A.D.), dismissed the Jews' impeachments against the apostle, Ac 18 12 ff. The imperial cult, so obnoxious to the early Christians, was promoted by C. who consecrated his grandmother Livia as Diva and her husband Divus Augustus. He permitted a temple to be erected for his worship at Camulodunum (Colchester) in Britain (Tac. Ann. XIV 31) and after death he was apotheosized by the Senate. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS: The military tribune (χιλιάρχος, 'chief captain') holding the chief command in Jerusalem, who rescued Paul from the mob and sent him to Cæsarea to Felix (Ac 21 31-23). He had under him a cohort of Roman auxiliaries, about 1,000 strong, which upon the occasion of the Jewish festivals was always held in readiness in their headquarters in the castle of Antonia, which was connected by stairs with the Temple court. Lysias had bought his Roman citizenship at a high price, and had probably taken the cognomen Claudius from the Emperor Claudius, whose wife and court drove a flourishing trade in such sales. Paul's inherited citizenship greatly impressed Lysias.

CLAY: This term renders (1) hōmer, from a root meaning 'red' (Is 45 9, etc.); (2) ἔη, 'mud,' 'slime,' etc. (Ps 40 2; Is 41 25); (3) hūṣaph, 'pottery' (i.e., made of potters' clay) (Dn 2 33-45); (4) πηλός, either 'mud' made of soil and spittle (Jn 9 6 ff.) or clay proper (Ro 9 21). The rendering 'clay ground' (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17) is uncertain, and the AV 'clay' of Hab 2 6 is corrected into 'pledge' by the RV. In the low lands of Palestine clay is abundant and its use for brick, mortar, and pottery was common in O T times. In Job 4 19, etc., the word is used figuratively for the flesh (as made from earth) and in Is 64 8, etc., it represents human subjection to the divine sovereignty. At Jer 43 9 cf. RV. The Heb. text of I K 7 46 = II Ch 4 17 should be corrected to read 'at the ford of Adamah.' E. E. N.

CLEAN, CLEANNES, CLEANSE. See PURE, PURIFICATION, §§ 1, 2.

CLEMENT (Κλήμης): A fellow worker with Paul at Philippi (Ph 4 3). There is nothing to justify his traditional identification with Clement of Rome. E. E. N.

CLEOPAS (Κλεόπας): One of the early disciples, mentioned only in Lk 24 18. Not to be confused with Cleophas.

CLEOPHAS. See CLOPAS.

CLOAK, CLOKE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 3.

CLOPAS (Κλωπᾶς, Cleophas AV): Mentioned only in Jn 19 25 as the husband of a certain Mary, thought by many to be the sister of Jesus' mother. See MARY.

CLOSET. See HOUSE, § 6 (h).

CLOTH, CLOTHES, CLOTHING. See BURIAL, § 1; and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5.

CLOUD: The cloud is of frequent occurrence in figurative speech. (1) Its darkness serves as the image of mystery (Ps 97 2; Job 3 5), especially the profound mystery of the creation (Job 38 9). (2) Its distance from the earth is made to represent the unattainable (Is 14 14; Ps 108 4; Job 20 6). (3) Its changeableness is the image of the transitory, especially of short life (Job 7 9, 30 15; Hos 6 4). (4) But the most suggestive use of the figure is in connection with the divine presence. Not only is Jehovah said to ride upon the cloud (Is 19 1; Nah 1 3), but He makes a special cloud the sign of His presence (Ex 13 21, etc.) both in the guiding of the Israelites toward Canaan and in the dedication of the Temple (I K 8 10 f.; II Ch 5 13 f.) A. C. Z.

CLOUT: In Jer 38 11 f. 'clouts' means 'rags,' or 'ragged cast-off clothes.' In Jos 9 5 it means 'patched' and has been so translated by the RV. Here the reference is to patched shoes. E. E. N.

CLUB. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 5.

CNIDUS, noi'dos (Κνίδος, Ac 27 7): A city at Cape Crio in Caria. It lay on a small island (Triopium), connected by a causeway with the mainland. It had two harbors and contained a temple of the Cnidian Aphrodite (by Praxiteles). Games in honor of the Triopian Apollo were celebrated conjointly with Rhodes and Cos.

J. R. S. S.*—J. M. T.

COAL: The following words, wrongly translated 'coal' in AV, are correctly rendered in ARV or ARVmg.: resheph (Song 8 5; Hab 3 5), a poetic word for 'flame'; retseph (I K 19 6) or ritspāh (Is 6 6), a heated stone; sh'hōr (La 4 8), 'blackness.'

Mineral coal is not found in Palestine, and the deposits in Lebanon have been little mined. The words properly rendered 'coal' in EV refer either to charcoal (pehām, 'black'; Is 44 12, 54 16, and especially Pr 26 21), or, more broadly, to live embers of any kind (gaheleth), including glowing charcoal. The latter is the common Heb. term (Ps 120 4; Is 44 19; Ezk 24 11). It is written more fully 'coals of fire' (e.g., Pr 25 22 = Ro 12 20, ἀνθρακες πυρός), and is frequently used metaphorically (II S 14 7; Ps 18 8). The N T ἀνθρακία (Jn 18 18, 21 9) was, of course, a fire of charcoal. See also HEARTH; HOUSE, § 6 (i); and CHIMNEY. L. G. L.—E. E. N.

COAST: A term frequently used in the AV, but largely displaced by other more correct terms in the RV. (1) In the many cases where the Heb. is g'bhūl, the RV reads 'border(s)' instead of 'coast(s).' (2) In the other instances 'coast(s)' AV is displaced in RV by 'regions' (Jl 3 4), 'shore' (Jos 9 1), 'side' (Nu 13 29, 34 3; Jg 11 26), 'height' (Jos 12 33), 'whole number' (Jg 18 2), 'among them' (Ezk 33 2), 'end' (Nu 34 3), 'parts' (Mt 15 21, 16 13), 'borders' (Mk 5 17, 7 31, 10 1; Ac 13 50), 'places on the coast' (Ac 27 2), and 'country' (Ac 26 20).

COAT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2.

COAT OF MAIL. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 9.

COCK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

COCKATRICE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

COCK GROWING. See TIME, § 1.

COCKLE. See PALESTINE, § 22.

CŒLE-SYRIA, sī'li-sir'-iā (Κολύνη Συρία), 'hollow Syria': A term of frequent occurrence in the OT Apocrypha. Strictly considered, it was the designation of that part of Syria that lay between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges, but it was often used to cover all the Syrian possessions from the Lebanons S. as far as Egypt. E. E. N.

COFFER: Used in I S 6 8 ff. as the rendering of 'arghāz, the meaning of which is obscure.

COFFIN: Used only in Gn 50 26. The Heb. word ārōn means literally a 'chest' or 'box', but is used here evidently in the sense of 'mummy-case.' See also BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 4.

COIN. See MONEY.

COL-HOZEH, kol-hō'ze (קול-הוזע, kol-hōzeh), 'he sees all' (8): A Jew of Nehemiah's day (Neh 3 15, 11 5).

COLLAR, COLLARS (Jg 8 26). See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, 2.

COLLECTION. See TAX, and CHURCH, § 9.

COLLEGE. See JERUSALEM, § 36.

COLLOP: An old English word meaning 'slices of meat' made tender by beating (see Skeat's Dict.). It is used only in Job 15 27, where RV reads 'fat,' which is the meaning of the Heb.

COLONY (from the Latin colonus, 'farmer'): Settlers sent to foreign parts to establish trading-stations generally retained their native institutions and their allegiance to the mother country. The Greeks were very successful colonists (Asia Minor, Black Sea, lower Italy [Magna Graecia], southern France, Spain, northern Africa), and Alexander colonized many cities from Egypt to Bactria. Rome established military colonies (of invalid soldiers) everywhere, of which Philippi (Ac 16 12) was an instance. Roman colonists as such enjoyed certain well-defined privileges which were not granted to ordinary provincials. J. R. S. S.*—E. E. N.

COLORS: Both the O T and the N T illustrate the general fact that ancient literature knows little of the modern sensitiveness to color-effects and their subtle gradations. Most of the references are casual and involve merely primary distinctions. The only passages where colors are emphasized are the account of the materials and vestments of the Tabernacle and Temple (Ex 25-28, 35-39; Nu 4, 15; II Ch 2-3), the diagnosis of leprosy (Lv 13-14), and the apocalyptic visions of 'horses' (Zec 1, 6; Rev 6, 19).

1. White and Black. White is the symbol of purity, as shown in comparisons with snow (Ps 51 7; Is 1 18), in the vesture of angelic beings and of the redeemed (Dn 7 9, 12 10; Mt 17 2; Mk 9 3; Lk 9 29; Mt 28 3; Mk 16 5; Jn 20 12; Ac 1 10; Rev 3 4, 5, 18, 4 4, 6 11, 7 9, 13, 14, 19 8, 14), in the mystic 'stone' with the 'new name' and the heavenly 'throne' (Rev 2 17, 20 11). It was also the color of nobility and elegance (Est 8 15; Ec 9 8; La 4 7; Jg 5 10; cf. Rev 19 11, 14). From it came the name 'Lebanon'—the 'white' mountain. Reference is made to the whiteness of the skin, the teeth, and the hair (Song 5 10; Gn 49 12; Mt 5 38), of wool (Ezk 27 18; Rev 1 14) of milk (La 4 7), of alabaster or marble (Est 1 6; Song 5 15), of ripe wheat-fields (Jn 4 35), of bread (Gn 40 16), of walls (Mt 23 27; Ac 23 3), and of blinding heat (Is 18 4). Whiteness of the skin and hair was a symptom of leprosy (Ex 4 6; Lv 13-14; Nu 12 10; II K 5 27, etc.), as paleness was of fear (Is 29 22). Doubtless 'white' often means 'gray' or 'light brown,' as in the description of garments of linen or byssus.

Black, or some dark hue, is the symbol of disaster or mourning, as in the visage of the overwhelmed (Job 30 30; Jer 8 21; La 4 8, 5 10; Jl 2 6; Nah 2 10) or the garb of the sorrowing (Job 30 23; Ps 42 9; Jer 14 2, etc.). But swarthy skin or hair was a sign of race (Song 1 5 f., 5 11), as of Ethiopians and other Africans. The blackness of night or tempest is noted (I K 18 45; Job 3 5; Is 50 3; Jer 4 28; He 12 18; Jude 13, etc.), of the raven (Song 5 11), of ice on the streams (Job 6 16), and of porphyry or dark marble (Est 1 6). Black hairs are mentioned in testing the leper (Lv 13), and the visions include black horses (Zec. 6; Rev. 6). Brown (Gn 30 32-40 AV) is properly black as in RV. The 'black marble' referred to in Est 1 6 (cf. margin 'stone of blue color') was probably a drab slate or marble.

2. Scarlet, Purple, and Other Reds. Bright red, 'scarlet,' or 'crimson,' a color obtained from the kermes-worm or cochineal, and a richer 'purple' from a mollusk, were the badges of royalty, or at least of wealth. The two often occur together (Ex 25-28, 35-36, 38-39; Nu 4 8, 13; II Ch 2 7, 14; 3 14; Pr 31 21 f.; Rev 17 3 f., 18 12, 16), but also the former alone (Gn 38 28, 30; Lv 14; Nu 19 6; Jos 2 18, 21; II S 1 24; Song 4 3; Is 1 18; Jer 4 30; La 4 5; Nah 2 3; Mt 27 28; He 9 19), and the latter alone (Jg 8 26; Est 1 6, 8 15; Song 3 10, 7 5; Jer 10 9; Ezk 27 7, 18; Dn 5 7, 16, 20; Mk 15 17, 20; Jn 19 2, 5; Lk 16 19). Lydia was a dealer in purple (Ac 16 14).

It is likely that the term rendered 'blue' was some variety of purple. It occurs only with dyed stuffs (Ex 25-28, 35-36, 38-39; Nu 4, 15 38; II Ch 2 7, 14; 3 14; Est 1 6, 8 15; Jer 10 9; Ezk 23 6, 27 7, 24).

Ruddiness, such as that of a clayey soil, is often indicated, as of the flesh (Gn 25 25; I S 16 12, 17 42; Song 5 10; La 4 7), a sore (Lv 13), the lips (Song 4 3), animals (Nu 19 2; Zec 1, 6; Rev 6, 12 3), wine (Ps 75 8; Pr 23 31; Is 27 2), pottage (Gn 25 30), dyed leather or cloth (Ex 25 5, 26 14, 35 7, 23, 36 10, 39 34; Is 63 2), painted wood (Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14; Nah 2 3), a kind of stone (Est 1 6, porphyry?), and the fiery twilight sky (Mt 16 2-3). The word for the 'red' eyes of the drunkard (Gn 49 12; Pr 23 29) probably means 'unclear' or 'darkened.' The term bay—a bright red—(Zec 6 3, 7 AV) is properly rendered 'strong' in RVmg.

3. Green and Yellow. Green is naturally often indicated as the attribute of vegetation in all its forms (as Ps 52 8; Jer 17 8; Hos 14 8; Rev 9 4, etc.). In one description of dyed stuffs (Est 1 6) the word rendered 'green' may mean simply a special kind of linen. A greenish color occurs in the test for leprosy (Lv 13 49, 14 37), and also a glistening yellow (Lv 13 30-36); the former of these two words is also used with gold (Ps 68 13).

In the disposition of the precious stones in the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28 17-20, 39 10-13; Ezk 28 13) and in the foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21 19-20) there was probably an intentional color-scheme. W. S. P.

COLOSSÆ, ko-lōs'ī (Κολοσσαί): A city of Phrygia Pacatiana, situated on the S. bank of the Lyens, on rising ground in the open plain (11 m. from Laodicea, 13 m. from Hierapolis) on the highway between Ephesus and the Euphrates; 3 m. NW. of modern Khonai. The acropolis was on the N. bank. Tho now quite deserted, Colosse was the great city of Phrygia when visited by Xerxes (481) and Cyrus the Younger (401). It lay on the main trade-route from the seaboard to the East. It was ruined by the change of the road-system and the establishment of Laodicea. C. was famous for its wool of violet hue (colossinus). Philemon, Onesimus, Archippus, and Epaphras, the probable founder of the Church at C., all lived here (see COLOSSIANS and PHILEMON). The 'worship of angels,' against which Paul preached (Col 2 18), was perpetuated in the great and pretentious church of Michael the Archistrategus, which was destroyed by the Turks (12th cent.). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. 1. Attestation. The external evidence for the Epistle is quite adequate. It is mentioned by Irenæus, and included in the Canon of Muratori, as well as in that of Marcion.

2. Relation to 'Ephesians.' Its intimate relation to the epistle to the Ephesians presents a complicated problem which has never been successfully handled—various attempts have been made in this direction, notably that of H. J. Holtzmann. His theory is that Paul himself wrote briefly to the Colossians: that on the basis of this letter, a later writer composed the Epistle to the Ephesians as we have it; and that into Paul's original letter to Colossæ he interpolated passages from Ephesians and other fragments, so that thus the Epistle to the Colossians as we possess it took shape. The hypothesis has not obtained wide approval, as it depicts the whole situation in a most artificial and cumbrous fashion.

3. Purpose. It is clear that the purpose of the Epistle is to emphasize the complete adequacy of Jesus Christ both with reference to the church and the world.

4. False Teaching. But it seems impossible to identify the positions combated in the epistle with any of the definite movements known in the history of the Church at the time. All that can be said is that the age was one given to syncretism in religion, and we can not be surprised to find changes of doctrine in a Phrygian community like Colossæ. Certain elements stand out distinctly. Stress was laid on ascetic practises. Obviously these which had to do with eating and drinking, and the observance of festivals and holy days, formed part of a theosophy, which detracted from Christ. A prominent feature in this devotion was the worship of angels, which suggests that they dabbled in a false spirituality. Most probably they shrank from matter as evil. Perhaps this zeal for angel-worship implied a hesitation to come directly to God in Christ. Plainly they were beguiled by some esoteric teaching, on which they prided themselves (2 8). A tantalizing meagerness is shown in the description of the more mystic conceptions in 2 18, which used to be regarded by Lightfoot, Hort, and others, as a corrupted text. Various bold emendations were proposed, but, as so frequently, subsequent discovery confirms the existing text. The crucial word of the passage, ἐμβατεύων, has been found in some inscriptions from the temple of Apollo at Klaros in Asia Minor. In these inscriptions the word is closely associated with mystic rites. Sir W. Ramsay believes that it points to the culminating act of the mystic ritual, symbolizing the entrance on a new course of life (Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day, pp. 288-304). There seems to be no sufficient ground for describing the curious Judaistic doctrine as Essene. As a matter of fact, we know far too little about the Essenes to detect traces of them, especially so far away from their reported habitation. Probably some of the terms used suggest Gnosticism, but the incipient stages of that movement are singularly elusive. All we can say is that it, like the erroneous teaching at Colossæ, was eclectic in its character.

LITERATURE: The best commentary is that of E. Haupt, being the 6th edition of Meyer's Kommentar. Cf. also Comm. by Lightfoot (1890); T. K. Abbott in ICC (1902), and Currie Martin in New Cent. Bible (1902); also Introd. to N. T. by Zahn (1917) and Moffatt (1915). H. A. A. K.

COMFORTER. See HOLY SPIRIT, § 2.

COMING OF THE LORD. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 34-36, 41, 46-48.

COMMANDMENT: All but three of the O T words rendered 'commandment' (and these three derived from the same root) signify primarily 'that which is uttered or spoken.' The idea of authority is read into these terms from the character or office of the person who makes the utterance. A commandment is, therefore, in the Biblical sense of the term, the word of one who has a right to be obeyed. In the N T the conception of authority has crystallized in the terms used. A. C. Z.

COMMANDMENTS, THE TEN. See DECALOG.

COMMENTARY (שׁוֹרֵשׁ, midhrāsh, from dā-rash, 'to inquire,' 'investigate'): In II Ch 13 22 a reference is made to the 'commentary' ('story' AV) of the prophet Iddo and in 24 27 to the 'commentary' ('story' AV) of the 'book of the Kings.' The Heb. term means 'didactic or homiletic exposition,' or 'an edifying religious story' (Driver). Some such works are referred to by the Chronicler as among his sources. See CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF. E. E. N.

COMMERCE. See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

COMMON: The Biblical conception of what is common includes: (1) The broad and general idea of the ordinary as distinguished from the exceptional (Jer 26 23; Lv 4 27; Ezk 23 42; Ac 5 18 AV; I Co 10 13 AV, etc.); (2) the conception of that which belongs to all as a general characteristic (Tit 1 4; Jude ver. 3) or that in which all participate (Ac 2 44); and (3) the notion of ceremonial uncleanness, in which sense the word is used in I S 21 4 f.; Jer 31 5 RVmg.; Ac 10 14, 28). See PURE, §§ 5 ff. A. C. Z.

COMMONWEALTH. See CITIZENSHIP.

COMMUNICATE, COMMUNICATION: These words are employed: (1) In their original tho now rather obsolete English meaning of 'making common,' i.e., of sharing, dividing, taking another as one's partner, having fellowship with—in temporal goods (Gal 6 6), afflictions (Ph 4 14 AV), necessities (Ro 12 13), giving and receiving (Ph 4 15 AV), or of Christian fellowship generally (I Ti 6 18; Phm 6 AV; He 13 16). (2) In the usual modern sense of sharing or imparting information, knowledge, etc., by speech, hence meaning 'word,' 'speech,' 'discourse' (II S 3 17; II K 9 11 AV; Mt 5 37 AV; Lk 24 17; Gal 2 2 AV; Eph 4 29 AV). In I Co 15 33 AV the Gr. ὑμῶν probably means 'conversations,' 'disputings' rather than 'companionships' (ARV). In Col 3 8 AV by αἰσχρολογία abusive as well as obscene speech is intended. S. D.—E. E. N.

COMMUNION. See LORD'S SUPPER; and HOLY SPIRIT, § 3.

COMPANION: This word is the rendering of nine Hebrew terms and one (four AV) Greek. Five of the Hebrew originals indicate general community of interest and enterprise (cf. Ezr 4 7 ff.; Is 1 23; Mal 2 14), whereas the other four convey the idea of delight in personal association (cf. Ex 32 27; Jg 14 11 ff.; Pr 13 20). In the N T the Greek terms signify simple association or partnership in a common work or cause (cf. Ac 19 29; also in AV Ph 2 25; He 10 33; Rev 1 9). A. C. Z.

COMPANY. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

COMPASS. See COSMOGONY, § 3.

COMPOUND. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2.

CONANIAH, ken'ā-nai'a (כְּנַנְיָהּ, kōnanyāhū):

1. A tithe supervisor in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 31 12 f.; Cononiah AV). 2. A prominent Levite who lived in the reign of Josiah (II Ch 35 9).

CONCISION: A term which occurs but once in the Bible, Ph 3 2, where it renders the Gr. κατατομή ('incision')—a word not found at all in the LXX. nor in prechristian Gr. in this connection. It is a paronomasia evidently used here by Paul to characterize as nothing less than the flesh-cutting forbidden in the Law (Lv 21 5; cf. I K 18 28), the circumcision which was wholly ceremonial and lacked all regard for its spiritual significance. The term is to be distinguished from the yet stronger expression ἀποκόπτειν ('to cut off') in Gal 5 12, where the reference is to the prohibition of Dt 23 1. See CIRCUMCISION. M. W. J.

CONCUBINE. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 3; and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3.

CONDEMN, CONDEMNATION: The rendering of a group of N T Gr. words, the chief element in which is made up of κρίνειν, with its compound (κατακρίνειν) and its derivatives (κρίσις AV], κατάκρισις, κρίμα, κατάκριμα, αὐτοκατάκριτος). In some passages the meaning is confined to human action and refers (1) to one's judgment against another ([κατακρίνειν] Jn 8 10 f.; Ro 8 34; [κατάκρισις] II Co 7 3; [κρίμα] I Ti 3 6). In Ro 2 1, 14 23 ('damned' AV), where κρίνειν is the original, there seems to be included also the element of one's judgment against himself (cf. ver. 22 AV); or (2) to the judgment into which another's conduct is brought by one's own good life ([κατακρίνειν] Mt 12 41 and ||; He 11 7). In the great majority of passages, however, the meaning is distinctively that of the Divine judgment against sin ([κρίνειν] Ja 5 9 AV; Jn 3 17 f. AV; [κατακρίνειν] Ro 8 3; [κατάκρισις] II P 2 6; I Co 11 32; II Co 3 9; [κρίμα] Mk 12 40 and ||; Ja 3 1 AV; I Co 11 34 AV; Ro 3 8 RV; [κατάκριμα] Ro 5 18, 18, 81). In Jn 3 17-19, 5 24 (where only the AV renders κρίνειν and κρίσις by 'condemn' and 'condemnation') there is meant the judgment brought by men upon themselves because of their rejection of Christ. Parallel with this is Tit 3 11 (ἀποκατάκριτος), where the reference is to the judgment brought upon oneself by persistency in evil. In Ac 13 27 (κρίνειν); Lk 24 20 (κρίμα); Mt 27 3; Mk 10 33 and ||s, 14 64 (κατακρίνειν), the reference is to the sentence of a court, expressing the general judgment of the people; in Lk 23 40 (κρίμα) to the sentence of a court resulting in condemnation to death.

The rest of the group consists of the compounds καταδικάζειν, καταγιγνώσκειν and ἀκατάγνωστος. In all but one of the passages where these words occur the meaning is confined to human judgment. Twice it is the censorious judgment against one's fellow man (καταδικάζειν) Mt 12 7; Lk 6 37; twice it is the self-judgment which comes from the condemning character of one's own conduct (καταγιγνώσκειν) Gal 2 11 RV; I Jn 3 20 f.; once it is the sentence of a secular court—as an instrument of oppression (καταδικάζειν) Ja 5 6). Once only is the meaning that of Divine judgment against evil (καταδικάζειν) Mt 12 37).

There are two passages (I Ti 5 12 RV [κρίμα]; Tit 2 8 [ἀκατάγνωστος]) where the reference seems to be to a judgment implying more or less of ecclesiastical oversight and review. See also JUSTIFICATION.

CONFEDERACY, CONFEDERATE. See CONSPIRACY.

CONFESS, CONFESSION (ὁμολογεῖν [ἐξομολογεῖν], ὁμολογία): A term which in the N T has several varieties of meaning: (1) 'To concede,' 'allow' (Jn 1 20; Ac 24 14; He 11 13). (2) 'To acknowledge one's 'sins'—confess' in the narrower sense (Mt 3 6; Mk 1 5; Ac 19 18; Ja 5 16; I Jn 1 9). (3) 'To openly acknowledge' or 'profess one's faith in anything' (Ac 23 8 [cf. Gr. of Tit 1 16]), especially in Jesus as the Messiah Son of God, etc. (Mt 10 32a; Lk 12 8a; Jn 9 22, 12 42, Ro 10 9; II Co 9 13; Ph 2 11; I Ti 6 12 f.; He 3 1, 4 14, 10 23; I Jn 2 23; 4 2 f., 15; II Jn 7). Also of Jesus' acknowledging His own in the judgment (Mt 10 32b; Lk 12 8b; Rev 3 5 [cf. Gr. of Mt 7 23]). In the papyri ὁμολογεῖν is the official formula for publicly acknowledging a contract, sale, receipt, etc.; cf. also Gr. of Mt 14 7; Ac 7 17, where it is used in the sense of a public assurance or promise. (4) Of thankfully and worshipfully acknowledging God, so 'to praise' Him (Ro 14 11, 15 9 RVmg. [both cited from LXX.]; He 13 15). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 8, 16.

CONFISCATE, CONFISCATION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

CONFORM, CONFORMED: The translation of the Gr. σύμμορφος (Ro 8 29; Ph 3 21 RV); of the ptcl. συμμορφίζμενος (Ph 3 10); and of συνασχηματίζεσθαι (Ro 12 2, 'fashioned' RV; cf. Gr. of I P 1 14). It is evident that in the N T the compounds σύμμορφος and συμμορφίζειν place the emphasis on the internal (moral and intellectual) aspects, while συνασχηματίζειν refers primarily to the external (physical and formal) relations.

CONGREGATION: Predominantly an O T word. In the N T found only in Ac 13 43 AV ('synagogue' RV). The AV uses the term as the translation of a variety of Hebrew words in all of which the notion of meeting is primary. The RV has properly substituted in all cases which designate the place of the meeting of God with the people in the person of their representative Moses (Ex 27 21, etc.) the more accurate form Tent of Meeting. Another change introduced in RV, in the interest of greater clearness and uniformity, is the substitution of assembly for 'congregation' wherever the theocratical convocation of the people is meant, as when the original Heb. is qāhāl (Lv 4 14). The term 'congregation' (in the RV) is thus almost limited to the designation of the stated meetings of the people for the transaction of political or legislative business. The distinction can not be pressed too closely, but in general it will hold true. The word is preeminently a 'priestly' one, confined almost entirely to the priestly elements of the Hexateuch and to Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah. See also ASSEMBLY (5) and (7).

CONIAH, ko-nai'a. See JEHOIACHIN.

CONONIAH. See CONANIAH.

CONSCIENCE: This word is not used in the O T, (but cf. Ec 10 26 [LXX.] and, in the Apoc., Wis 17 11). In the N T it is used mainly in the Pauline Epistles; twice in Paul's speeches in Acts (23 1, 24 16). Elsewhere it appears only in Hebrews, and in I Peter. Outside its Biblical usages the Greek word (συνείδησις) had not yet obtained the fuller meaning given to it in the N T. It was used somewhat vaguely for the consciousness with which a man views his completed act, for the feeling aroused as he recalls and contemplates a wrong deed (Cremer's Lexicon and P. Ewald). In the N T a distinct development is found.

1. Pauline Usage. In Ro 2 14 f., Paul finds a double proof that the law of God is real for the heathen world, first in the very character of their works which imply the power of making moral distinctions; and, second, in a twofold inner movement described in two independent clauses in the passage. The second clause is not explanatory of the first. Their 'thoughts' in mutual intercourse (λογισμοί) are not identical with their 'conscience.' The latter is private conscience and individual; the former are social. The occurrence of συνείδησις here presupposes a well-known meaning which may be found elsewhere. It appears clearly, in the two passages in Acts, where Paul, reviewing his past, expresses his consciousness of having always tried to preserve his sense of integrity before God. At this point the N T agrees with extrabiblical usage, except that the religious reference is present. But that is the new element which makes a great change ultimately in the idea of 'conscience.' In the remaining passages of Romans (9 1, 13 5) the meaning is the same. In fact, it will be found that, as its fundamental meaning, Paul uses the word for that sense of integcity, or of righteous standing before God (or Christ), which accompanies the moral and religious conduct of the believer. All other new meanings of the word grow out of consideration of that function of human Christian consciousness.

The passage where 'conscience' occurs most often (I Co 8-10) illustrates the manner in which the conception grew as soon as the fact began to live in the Christian environment. In the presence of a difficult practical problem conscience appears as a complex fact. (1) The Christian man who recognizes God's relation to all things and the nothingness of idols knows that the consecration of food to idols means nothing. He is, therefore, free to eat whatever is set before him. His knowledge of the facts becomes the ground of his integrity before God when he partakes. His conscience is clear and sound. (2) But he recognizes also that his action affects other consciences, of which in this regard there are two classes. (a) The weak conscience of a brother 'used until now to the idol' (8 7). This man can not rid himself of the feeling that in eating meat he continues a former heathen practise. He eats 'as of a thing sacrificed to an idol.' He therefore eats with a 'weak conscience,' because of an unclear judgment of the facts, and therefore with a 'defiled' (8 7) or 'wounded' (8 12) conscience—that is, with a lack of conscious integrity before God. Now Paul will not despise his ignorance nor merely pity his confused judgment; he will reverence his conscience. For while the conscience is ignorant, lacking knowledge (8 7a), yet it is conscience, which if it be forced by example instead of being set free by insight is wounded, and he perishes (8 10 f.). (b) The ignorant conscience of the heathen man (10 27a). If the Christian man purchase his food in the open market he must do so in his own freedom—ignoring the ceremonial connection between meat and idol-worship (10 25 f.). But as soon as the relation becomes personal, the problem is changed. If a heathen host (10 27) sets meat before you without remark, your own conscience is free. But as soon as any one (τις 10 28) calls attention to the connection of the meat with idol-worship, the feast becomes a sacred meal, a heathen sacrament. That makes abstinence a duty, but only for the sake of the other's conscience. To him your partaking now would be a denial of the very thing which you know, that this consecration of the meat is nothing. From this it is clear that the oft-quoted verse (I Co 8 13) does not mean that Paul practised or enjoined permanent abstinence from meat. The abstaining conscience must keep its own dignity and rights by making abstinence wholly relative to the good of others, and must not erect its act into a new law of permanent and universal authority. There is a dangerous tendency in the 'weak' conscience to become censorious (Ro 14 3b, 10a) and in the strong and free conscience to become contemptuous (Ro 14 3a, 10b), and against both the Apostle utters urgent warnings. The guiding principle in this passage (I Co 8-10) is the same as in Ro 14, altho in the latter for 'knowledge' the Apostle substitutes the word 'faith' (14 22, 23). In both passages the awful significance of conscience appears in this that, if a man eat who feels or thinks that it may be against the honor of Christ to do so, he thereby abdicates his own judgment and acts outside of faith. And whoso does this is 'destroyed' (Ro 14 15b) and 'perishes' (I Co 8 11). And in both passages any other Christian man who by his example deliberately exerts that compulsion on him is held responsible for the disaster. In II Co 'conscience' is applied not to his own approval of his conduct, but to its approval by others (4 2, 5 11). This is a most important step in the growth of the general conception, for here 'conscience' is identified as an organ of moral judgment. And yet it came naturally through the intensely social Christian spirit. For it is the same inner power in virtue of which I appraise my own conduct and that of others.

In the Pastoral Epistles conscience is named six times; in three cases (I Ti 1 5, 19, 3 9) with 'faith' or 'heart,' as if it had begun to define itself before Christian eyes as a fundamental element or faculty of human nature. In Tit 1 15 it can be, along with the 'mind,' defiled. And in I Ti 4 2 it is said that certain who fall away from the faith are 'branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron.' This does not mean that they lose the power of making moral distinctions, a quite un-Pauline idea; but that they suffer the intolerable shame of their defection. It is the intense pain of ineradicable guilt which is theirs.

2. The Petrine Usage. The three passages in I Peter in which 'conscience' occurs yield the same meaning as the Pauline. In the first two (2 19, 3 16) the general context is similar. The believer is amid hostile critics and even persecutors. His strength and peace must be found in the possession of 'a good conscience' which must be the inner sense of 'a good manner of life in Christ' (3 16). The word is used in a startling way, however, when (2 19) the author speaks of the συμβίτητος Θεοῦ, which is variously translated. Is it 'conscience toward God,' or, as Canon Bigg (ICC. p. 144) prefers, 'consciousness of God'? The phrase was apparently so constructed because the writer saw that there is no consciousness of God, in the Christian sense, without a good conscience toward God. It marks the dawn of the great idea that conscience is the voice of God in us. But here it means that in the sense of uprightness before Him a man already possesses Him. The very difficult passage which almost immediately follows (3 20 f.) repeats the word in a sentence that is grammatically dark. The baptized man is saved 'into God,' as the eight souls into the ark. But this baptism is not concerned with the outward man, 'the flesh,' but with the inner man. In the baptismal rite 'the good conscience' is the matter of inquiry, the decisive fact.

3. Usage in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In four out of the five places where 'conscience' is named in the Epistle to the Hebrews the general topic is the subjective effect of the atonement of Christ. Whatever effect the gifts and sacrifices, the blood-shedding, under the old covenant produced, they did not reach the conscience. The worshiper remained in that regard unperfected (9 9); he still had the conscience of sins (10 2) or dead works (9 14). But the blood of Christ does 'cleanse conscience from dead works to serve the living God,' and men may have their 'hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience,' so that they can 'draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith' (10 22). It is evident that in all these passages the good conscience is regarded as the sense of righteousness before God (cf. 13 18,) somewhat in the Greek sense noted above. Our sense of guilt prevents all approach to God; and that is removed only by the blood of Christ. His work of sacrifice has made it possible for men to enter the holy presence of God with bold hearts and confident prayer—that is, with clear consciences. The conscience is that in us on which forgiveness through atonement operates.

4. The Philosophy of Conscience. It is evident that in the N T we have no clearly defined doctrine or theory of conscience, nor even a description of it. Like other Greek words, συνείδησις was passing into a new world, to describe great facts which were now more clearly perceived than was possible for prechristian eyes. Some of these may be stated here. (1) The feeling of guilt or of joyous confidence before God, as in Hebrews, is the deepest fact in human religious experience. The work of Christ deals with that, and it is called 'conscience.' (2) The believer's feeling of personal integrity and sincerity in conduct before God and man, as in Acts, Romans, Corinthians, is traced to the same inner seat of authority. (3) But this feeling is so closely allied with and dependent upon 'knowledge' or intelligent 'faith' (1 Co, 1 Ti) that the conscience is seen to be a moral scrutinizer of all human conduct. (4) As thus conceived conscience is the supreme, the most sacred fact in human nature, to preserve which is essential and to destroy which can only be the doom of the individual. There can be little doubt that N T writers, by their emphasis upon this phase of human nature, by making it so concrete, and by attaching to it the very highest and most solemn significance in relation to the final destiny of man, presented fresh material and a new stimulus to ethical inquiry. It may be added with some confidence that no theory of conscience can hold its own which takes no account of those aspects of it which are set before us in these brief but momentous N T discussions.

CONSECRATE: This term is the correct rendering of the Heb. קָדַשׁ, qādhāsh (and cognate words), signifying 'to be holy,' i.e., 'separate' from that which is common or profane (see HOLY). But there are a number of passages where the Heb. or Gr. terms are not adequately represented by the Eng. word 'consecrate.' In Mic 4 13, 'devote,' in Nu 6 7, 9, 12, 'separate,' 'separation,' in He 10 20, 'dedicate,' and in He 7 28, 'perfected,' all RV, are more correct renderings. In the majority of instances, however, where 'consecrate' (and consecration) occur, they render a peculiar Heb. expression meaning literally 'to fill the hand,' or 'filling' with 'hand' understood (cf. Ex 32 29; Jg 17 5, 12 for passages where the force of the literal expression can still be discerned). The expression goes back probably to a remote antiquity when the priests' hands were 'filled' with the offerings, etc., from which he derived his income. See PRIESTHOOD, § 2 a. E. E. N.

CONSOLATION (παράκλησις): The 'consolation of Israel' (Lk 2 25) was an expression derived probably from Is 40 1 (LXX.). The comfort or consolation there predicted was popularly understood in later times as referring to the Messianic age rather than to the return from the Exile. The 'consolation of Israel' was consequently the time when the promises of the prophets would be fulfilled and all—especially the lowly—would rejoice in the rule of righteousness and peace. E. E. N.

CONSPIRE, CONSPIRACY: The only instance where the term 'conspiracy' calls for comment is Is 8 12, where AV reads confederacy. Here the term qesher refers probably to the coalition of N. Israel and Damascus against Judah which was filling all minds with apprehension (cf. 7 1-2). E. E. N.

CONTROVERSY: The Heb. word רִיב, rīb, often translated 'controversy,' means 'a case or suit at law' (Dt 17 8; II S 15 2). In the prophets the term is frequently used for Jehovah's 'case' against Israel. Once (Is 34 8) for the 'case' of Zion against Edom. E. E. N.

CONVERSATION: This word is frequently used in the AV to render various terms signifying 'behavior' or 'manner of life.' These have had other expressions substituted for them in the RV. In Ph 3 20 the Gr. is πολιτευμα, 'citizenship' (q.v.).

CONVERSION, CONVERT. The RV retains 'convert' only in Ps 51 13; Ja 5 19 f. The Hebrew and Greek originals (almost uniformly translated 'to turn') are applied to physical movements (cf. Jos 19 12; 2 S 23 10; Ru 1 16; Mk 5 30, 8 33; Lk 2 39 Jn 21 20; II Pet 2 22). Once ἐπιστρέφειν is used of relations between persons (Lk 17 4). The technical use of the English word 'conversion' for the turning of the soul to God arose from its use in certain passages which all go back to Is 6 10. (cf. Mk 4 12; Mt 13 15; Ac 28 27). This might imply only a change from heathen religion (1 Th 1 9; Ac 15 19), but when allied with the deep Christian conceptions of repentance and faith, it implied an inner change of motive and spirit which has come to be associated always with the word conversion (cf. Lk 22 32; Ac 3 19, 11 21, 26 20; Ja 5 19, 20). See also FAITH, REGENERATION, REPENTANCE. W. D. M.

COOK, COOKING. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 11.

COOL: As a noun in Gn 3 8 (Heb. rūah, 'wind,' 'breeze') it is evidently used to indicate the time of day when a breeze is apt to arise as the heat declines to its lowest degree before sunset. It was in the cool of the early evening that the Orientals usually roused themselves from their midday rest.

CORBAN. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

CORD: The only instance of the occurrence of this word in the Bible that calls for special comment is in Job 30 11, where the sense is obscure. ICC, ad loc., suggests 'bowstring,' used figuratively for Job's means of self-defense (against God.) E. E. N.

CORE. See KORAH.

CORIANDER SEED. See MANNA.

CORINTH (Κόρινθος): The capital of Corinthia and of Rom. Achaia. Its location was incomparable strategically and commercially, as it commanded the sole land route by the natural bridge between the continent and Peloponnesus, and was supplied with deep-water harbors (Lechæum, Cenchræ and Schœuss) on both sides of the Isthmus (31 m. wide). Thessalian Minyans settled here c. 1350 B.C. on the northern foot of the lofty (1,750 ft.) and impregnable Acro-Corinthus. The purple-fish of Greek waters early attracted Phenicians to Corinth. These brought with them their traditions and gods (especially Astarte-Aphrodite, with the hierodouli). They introduced also many manufactures, which made Corinth the center of industrial art at an early period (purple dye, artistic weaving, cloths, rugs, bronze objects, tables, coffers, armor, and pottery). Later, emigrants from Attica became supreme. These probably changed the name to Corinth. They glorified the games in honor of Poseidon at the Isthmus, and opened them to other states.

The Dorian conquest, (c. 1074 B.C.) brought a Dorian element to Corinth, but this did not make Corinth really Dorian; she detested Dorian exclusiveness and remained luxurious, immoral, and commercial. A new era of prosperity was introduced by Cypselus who reintroduced the monarchy 657-629 B.C. Under Periander (629-585) and Psammetichus (585-582) triremes were invented, and a series of trading-stations (colonies) were established in the W. and N., and relations with Miletus, Mitylene, Lydia, and Egypt were cultivated. The Cypselids were succeeded by the old Dorian conservative oligarchy, under which Corinth became famous for her wealth, luxury, extravagance, and licentiousness (abounding in hetære and religious prostitutes). Hence the proverb, 'I do not advise every man to visit Corinth.' Not only Corinth's position between two seas, but the difficulty of circumnavigating Peloponnesus, and the easy transfer of wares and even smaller ships by a wooden railway (ὀλολυσος) across the Isthmus made C. the meeting-place of Occident and Orient, and a commercial and banking center. Being a commercial city, C. was lukewarm in the Persian wars. Philip and Alexander were proclaimed leaders of the Greeks at the Isthmian Games (in 338 and 336). Corinth and Greece were declared free by Rome at the Games of 196. But it later became the head of a new Achæan League, and at the command of the Roman Senate was totally destroyed by Mummius in 146. The art treasures were carried as spoil to Rome. Its subsequent checkered history includes the refounding as a Rom. colony by Julius Cæsar in 46 B.C.; its rapid emergence again into prominence (in 2d cent. A.D. C. was the richest city of Greece); embellishment by Rom. emperors; raids by the Goths in the 3rd and 4th cents.; the sacking of the Normans 1147; incorporation into the Latin duchy of Morea, 1210; capture by the Turks 1459; endemic malaria; and final destruction by earthquake in 1858. A portion of the ancient site has been excavated by American archeologists.

Paul, tho not originally intending (Ac 16 9 f.; 1 Thes. 2 17 f.; cf. Ac 18 1) to settle in C. remained there for 18 months because of a revelation (Ac 18 9, 10), the elements of which were probably the realization of strategic position of C. for the dissemination of new religious ideas, contact with Priscilla and Aquila recently arrived from Rome, the numerous Jewish colony, the open door which he found for work among the Gentiles, and the protection of Rom. law and tolerance (illustrated by the incident before the proconsul Gallio). Here Silas and Timothy joined him later. Altho C. was a Jewish center the membership of the church was predominantly Gentile (1 Co 12 2). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE: 1. Criticism of the Epistles. Two of Paul's undisputed letters, written, the first from Ephesus during his extended work there on his third missionary journey, the second from Macedonia, preceding his last visit to Corinth. Both, in the year 55, or more probably 56 A.D. They belong to a group of Paul's Epistles (Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans), whose authorship, apart from certain sporadic attacks, conspicuous by their failure (Evanson, 1792; Bruno Bauer, 1852; Dutch Critical School, 1882), has never been questioned. In fact, this group has been made by such radical critics as the Tübingen School the standard of Pauline literature, over against which the remainder of the canonical Epistles bearing his name were shown, to their satisfaction, to be pious forgeries.

As a consequence, the chief matters of interest in these letters center, not in their authorship, but in the conditions of church life in the Apostolic Age and in the relations to that life borne by the work and the personality of Paul.

I Corinthians. It is evident from 16 8 f. that I Co was written from Ephesus shortly before Pentecost. As to what year, it is plain that it could not have been that of Paul's first visit to the city, on his return from his second mission tour (Ac 18 19-21, 52 A.D.), since the Epistle was written after Apollos had been preaching in Corinth (1 12, 16 12), which was subsequent to this time (Ac 18 24-19 1). It must have been some year during the longer stay in Ephesus on his third mission tour (53-56 A.D.)—most likely at the end of the period; since it was written after Timothy had been sent to Corinth as the representative of the Apostle (4 17, 16 10) and after the Apostle himself had planned a journey soon to follow to the same place (4 19, 16 5, 7) which from Ac 19 10, 21 f. was after he had been two years engaged in his Ephesian work. The probable date may, therefore, be given as late in the winter, or early in the spring of 56, or possibly 55.

2. Condition of Corinthian Church. The situation disclosed by I Co is one of marked unspirituality among the members of the Christian community and of distinct pastoral anxiety for their condition on the part of Paul. The people were returning, in a measure, to their old pagan habit of living, as shown particularly in the party spirit which seemed to possess them all (1 10-17, 3 3 f.), the sensuality which existed unrebuked among them (5 1 f.), the skeptical questionings to which they were giving themselves (15 12, 35, cf. Ac 17 32), and the general attitude of independency in life and worship (8 9-13, 10 27-33, 11 1-6, 20-22, 12-14) which was threatening their respect and reverence for Paul himself (4 3-19, 5 9-11, 9 1-3).

3. Early Correspondence. Indeed before I Co the Apostle had been moved by their lack of sensitiveness to moral conditions to write the people bidding them not to keep company with fornicators (5 9). To this they had apparently replied that the command was impracticable, indicating either an indifferent or a designed misunderstanding of it as involving the general population of the city (5 10)—a misunderstanding which Paul corrects by showing them that his reference was to immoral members within the church itself (5 11).

It was in this reply, evidently, that they laid before the Apostle other troublesome problems in their church life, such as marriage and divorce (ch. 7), meat offered to idols (chs. 8 and 10), the exercise of spiritual gifts (chs. 12-14), the collection for the Jerusalem poor (16 1-4), and the possible return to them of Apollos (16 12).

4. Oral Information as to Partizan Groups and Other Matters. In addition to this, oral information had come to him through members of the household of Chloe concerning the wide prevalence in the church of more or less clearly defined parties (1 11 f.) arising from the habit of factionalism which gathered around claimed excellence in certain of their ministers and boasted superiority in certain of their members.

Doubtless through the same informants Paul had learned of the aggravated case of immorality in the membership (ch 5) and possibly also of the litigious spirit among them (ch. 6), as well as of their skeptical attitude of mind toward the fact of a general resurrection of the dead (ch. 15).

5. Motive and Contents of I Corinthians. It was to rebuke this factionalism in its various forms of manifestation, to denounce this skepticism as to the truth, and to discuss the questions laid before him that I Co was written.

I. The Apostle takes up, first of all, the reported factionalism. After telling them how he had come by the news of it, he visits upon it a plain and outspoken reproof, which extends practically through the first three chapters of the Epistle. He shows them that this spirit is contrary to the divine purpose behind the ministry which he had accomplished among them (1 12-17)—in fact, against the spirit of the Gospel itself and God's calling of them to its privileges (1 18-21); that it was opposed to the principle which had controlled his preaching of this Gospel, not only among them (2 1-5) but in general (2 4-16); that it was against the spirit which had actuated himself and Apollos in their ministry to them (3 1-15) and against the true spirituality of the life implanted in them by God (3 16-23).

II. Such plainness of speech, however, calls for apology, which he gives (4 1-5), stating that the reason for his reproof had been his desire for a humbleness of life in them such as was seen in Apollos and himself (4 6-16), to bring which desire to realization he had sent to them Timothy (4 17-21).

III. With his mind relieved on this first point of difficulty between them, he takes up the reported immorality (ch. 5), accusing them not of being themselves immoral, but of not being sensitive to those of their number who were, and that too altho the particular case which had been cited to him as condoned by them was one of infamous nature (5 1 f.). He prescribes the punishment in the case, which involved exposing the offender to the infliction of a physical suffering (cf. II, 12 7; Ac 13 11), tho with the purpose of the saving of his soul in the day of judgment (5 4-5). He then renews his reproof of their lack of moral judgment, taking occasion to remind them of his commands to them on this matter in his former (unpreserved) letter (5 6-13).

IV. In ch. 6 he comes to their irritating habit of going to law in cases of dispute among themselves. He shows them that such a spirit is out of all harmony with the high dignity of their relationship to the world and the true fellowship of their relations to one another (6 1-11), which leads him to a statement of the principle of Christian liberty, tho the special application he makes of the principle is to the matter of immoral relationships (6 12-20).

V. 1. This application presents to him the first of the specific questions laid before him in the letter from the Church—the question concerning marriage. On this he takes high ground. He holds marriage to be wise and honorable (7 1-7)—a bond not to be loosened even where it involves an unbelieving companion (7 8-17). In general, he holds that existing relationships both in and out of wedlock should best remain as they are, though his personal preference is for the unmarried state (7 18-40).

2. The second question concerns the eating of meats offered to idols, in reply to which he urges the principle of a self-denying regard for others' opinion (ch. 8), as illustrative of which principle he refers to his own action in the matter of receiving support from churches, answering objections to his course (ch. 9), and exhorting against a spirit of self-confidence (10 1-13), and against idolatry (10 14-22). To this he adds a fuller statement of the principle of Christian liberty (10 23-11 1).

3. There then follows a rather prolonged discussion of the complicated question of public worship (11 2-14 40). He considers first the matter of appropriate head apparel in their assemblies (11 2-10), from which he proceeds to the vital situation involved in their conduct of the Lord's Supper, which had grown so disorderly as not only to become a scandal but to bring a deadening influence on their spiritual life (11 17-34). Finally he takes up the confusion which had fallen upon their exercise of spiritual gifts, disclosing the spirit of order and mutual service that should actuate it (ch. 12), while he leads them up to a consideration of love as the greatest gift of all (ch. 13) and shows them the practical worth and value of the gift of speaking with tongues (ch. 14).

4. With ch. 15 he apparently digresses to the orally reported difficulties in the Church, and takes up one of the most important and significant of their troubles—their skeptical attitude of mind toward the resurrection. With great earnestness and apologetic skill he meets the objections raised against the doctrine, showing how it is necessitated by the historical fact of the resurrection of Christ (15 1-19) and by principles involved in Christ's relationship to them (15<sup>20-26</sup>) and fundamental to their spiritual living (15<sup>27-36</sup>).

5. In ch. 16 he returns to the stated questions from the Church—first that concerning the collection ordered among them for the Jerusalem poor, which was evidently languishing for lack of proper method (16<sup>1-4</sup>), and finally, after a discussion of his own and Timothy's plans of travel (16<sup>5-11</sup>), that concerning their request for the return of Apollos to them—a request which the Apostle himself had favored, but Apollos for the present had declined (16<sup>12</sup>).

This ends the Epistle's message, and a few verses bring it to its conclusion (16<sup>13-24</sup>).

II Corinthians. The Second Epistle was written after Paul left Ephesus and had come by way of Troas into Macedonia (2<sup>12</sup> f.). He had been despondent about the Corinthian church before leaving Ephesus and had consequently sent Titus (by the short sea route) to Corinth for a betterment of its affairs. Titus had met him in Macedonia, coming north from Corinth (7<sup>5-7</sup>; cf. 2<sup>12</sup> f.). If Paul left Ephesus in the spring or the summer of 55, or possibly 56, II Co was written in the summer or the autumn of the same year.

6. Condition of the Church. The situation in Corinth at the time II Co was written is a development of that disclosed by the First Epistle. The moral sensitiveness of the community seems to have improved, but the factionalism appears to have concentrated itself in an actual movement of party hostility against Paul (10<sup>10</sup> f., 11<sup>5-12</sup>, 16, 12<sup>11</sup>, 15-18, 13<sup>1</sup> f., 5-7), emanating seemingly from the Christ party (10<sup>7</sup>, 11<sup>13</sup>, 22<sup>1</sup> f., 13<sup>3</sup>) and in all likelihood possessing the spirit, if not actuated by the claims, of the Judaizers (11<sup>4</sup> f. [cf. Gal 1<sup>6</sup>, 2<sup>8-9</sup>], 11<sup>13-15</sup> [cf. Gal 1<sup>8</sup> f.], 11<sup>18-20</sup> [cf. Gal 2<sup>4</sup>, 4<sup>3</sup>, 9, 5<sup>1</sup>]).

That this development endangered the relationship of Paul to the Corinthian Church of course needs no proof. Its seriousness, however, gives significance to several indications in II Co that the Apostle had been personally involved in the process by which it had come to its strength.

7. Sorrowful Visit. There are, for example, certain passages which seem to show that the visit to Corinth Paul has in mind when writing is to be his third visit to that city (12<sup>14</sup>, 13<sup>1-3</sup>), while it has promise of being a second visit of sorrow (12<sup>21</sup>). The explanation formerly given, by which these passages were referred to the Apostle's third plan to go to them, rather than to his third actual visit, is now generally abandoned, and a visit, unrecorded in Ac, is admitted to have been made from Ephesus after I Co. Its occasion was the development of this personal hostility which Timothy, who had been sent to Corinth in connection with the First Epistle, had apparently been unable to hold in check. Its result was unsuccessful (10<sup>10</sup> f.), and the Apostle returned to Ephesus in great despondency of mind, from which he had not recovered when he left the city (2<sup>12</sup> f., 7<sup>5</sup>).

8. Painful Letter. All this is borne out by certain other passages which seem to hint at another letter sent by the Apostle to Corinth—a letter of 'many tears,' written out of 'much affliction and anguish of heart' (2<sup>4</sup>, 7<sup>8-12</sup>)—a description that can not suit I Co which, tho a letter of censure and blame, was written rather in a balance between anger and meekness (I Co 4<sup>21</sup>) than in the abandonment of grief. Added significance to the foregoing description is afforded by the fact that it is found in the passages which refer to events evidently connected with this unrecorded visit (2<sup>1</sup> f. [3<sup>1</sup> f.], 5-8 [9], 10 f.) and with Titus' mission in the emergency (7<sup>5-7</sup> [8 f.], 10 f. [12], 13-16).

9. II Corinthians a Composite Epistle. Apart, however, from all such admissions regarding a special letter of tears, tho gaining significant interest through them, there has been a growing conviction among scholars that the peculiar difference in tone and contents of chs. 1-9 from chs. 10-13 points to the composite character of II Co. The cheerful and satisfied character of the earlier chapters discloses a situation in the Church of general loyalty to the Apostle; the dissatisfied and anxious character of the latter chapters betrays one of general disloyalty to him. In fact, when we note the peculiar cross-references between 2<sup>3</sup> and 13<sup>10</sup>, 1<sup>23</sup> and 13<sup>2</sup>, 2<sup>9</sup>, and 10<sup>6</sup>, it would seem that the states of feeling on the Apostle's part, which in the later passages are considered as threatening the Corinthians, in the earlier passages are regarded as laid aside and removed—as tho between the situation referred to in chs. 10-13 and that referred to in chs. 1-9 there had come a change for the better.

It is significant that in these last four chs. no mention is made of the Jerusalem collection as being the object of any present visit of Titus to the church, the reference in 12<sup>18</sup> being to the visit in connection with the beginning of the collection (cf. 8<sup>6</sup>). This would go to show that Titus' mission at the time of the painful letter (7<sup>6-13</sup>) was to a situation so disturbed as to prevent any consideration of this benevolence. This contrasts with the eager urging in chs. 8 and 9 that the collection be completed, which was possible only because the trouble in the church had ceased.

In view of these peculiarities it would appear not only that these last four chapters were written before the first nine, but that they contain at least a portion of the painful letter, written after Paul's return to Ephesus from the unsuccessful visit—a position which gains significance from the fact that in the foregoing cross-references those in the earlier chapters (1<sup>23</sup>, 2<sup>3</sup>, 9) are all taken from the passages which expressly refer to this visit and the letter connected with it.

This theory is strongly confirmed when the contents of these chapters are considered in the order in which this arrangement places them.

In ch. 10 Paul begins abruptly with an assertion of his apostolic authority, over against a state of criticism and open hostility toward him such as is not hinted at in any of the preceding chapters (10<sup>1-11</sup>). In proof of the fact of his authority he cites three things: (a) The independence of his ministry (10<sup>13-15</sup>), which united with it a jealousy of affection for them (11<sup>1-13</sup>)—an affection which was all the more marked in comparison with the selfishness of his opponents' conduct (11<sup>18-21</sup>), which lacked the background of the labors and sufferings that belonged to all his missionary life (11<sup>21</sup> b-32); (b) the visions granted him by God (12<sup>1-4</sup>), together with the infirmities laid upon him by the same divine hand and the contact with God's strength into which these weaknesses brought him (12<sup>5-10</sup>); (c) the manifestation of his apostolic power in the working of miracles among them (12<sup>11-13</sup>). This assertion of his challenged authority is then followed by a passage which, for the heaviness of heart and bitterness of spirit that it discloses, is unique among Paul's writings (12<sup>14-13</sup> 10). It is burdened with anxious fear for the stability of his relations to them (12<sup>14-21</sup>), while it is sharp with threatened action against them at his coming (13 1-10). With this his message closes.

When we turn to the first nine chapters this stress and strain would seem to be all over. The opening chapter, to be sure, takes up a criticism which is being urged against him by the people; but the charge is a mild one, concerning simply his delay in coming to them as he had promised, which seemed to them to be a show of fickleness (1 15-17). This charge he meets in a spirit of abounding confidence in his own sincerity and in their loyalty toward him (1 13-14), showing that his delay had been due to his desire to spare them in giving himself time to recover from his sorrow over their condition and themselves time for a change of their condition, indicating that the case of hostility toward him, which they had furnished, should now be forgiven by them, as it practically had already been by himself (1 12-2 10). Then, after showing how his anxiety to hear from them through Titus had left him no peace of mind on his journey (2 12 f.), he comes, by a short transition (2 14-17), to a review of his ministry among them, confirming their renewed approval of it over against such unfriendly element as still remained in the Church. He shows the fruit of service to be the proof of a true ministry (3 1-10), while he displays before them the plainness and honesty of his preaching (3 12-4 9) and at the same time the hardship of his ministry and the secret of his endurance (4 7-5 10), closing with an assertion of the absence from his mind of all spirit of self-glory (5 11-21) and an exhortation to them to make their lives effective in the service to which they were called (6 1-10). This is evidently the end of his message; for there follows upon this simply the practical warning against fellowship with unbelievers (6 11-7 1—unless 6 14-7 1 be a remnant of his first letter to them, referred to in I Co 5 9 f.),—a plea for yet closer fellowship with them, with an acknowledgment of the comfort their loyalty toward him had already produced (7 2-16) and the urging on them of the Jerusalem collection (chs. 8 and 9; see above).

It is seen from this that, while in both sections in our II Co there is a personal element in the motive for the writing, there is between them a marked difference of direction in which this motive proceeds. In chs. 10-13 it is straight toward a determination to meet and master the hostility which had manifested itself against the Apostle since I Co, but in chs. 1-9 it is all toward a desire to lay hold of and safeguard the loyalty which had finally shown itself in the church.

With such an understanding of the contents of these two parts of our Epistle and of the purpose which lay behind them, it would seem that the only arrangement of them possible is that of the theory that chs. 10-13 belong to the painful letter written at Ephesus and chs. 1-9 to the letter which followed it on the journey from Ephesus to Corinth.

There would thus be four letters of Paul to the Corinthians: (1) The initial letter of prohibition, referred to in I Co 5 9 f., a fragment of which may probably be preserved in II Co 6 14-7 1. (2) The letter in answer to the Corinthian communication and preserved in our I Co. (3) The painful letter, preserved in part in II Co 10-13. (4) The final letter, preserved practically entire in II Co 1-9.

Of these letters the second (our I Co) is the only one which has been preserved entire. The third and fourth did not become known in the church (as we have them in II Co) until some time after I Co was current. If during this time they were lost, they are likely to have had rough handling and have suffered as all MSS. do under such conditions—fray away at one or both ends. When they were discovered, one including obviously the beginning and the other as evidently the ending of a letter by Paul (I 1 f., 10 1, 13 11-14), it was natural to suppose they formed one letter of the Apostle, and so were put together as we have them now.

10. What the Epistles Show of Paul's Work. When Paul went into Europe on his second mission tour his work was carried on much more among the Gentiles and was consequently different in its character from what it had been previously. The cities of his first tour, tho in Asia Minor, were much nearer Syria and, therefore, more likely to have in them a distinctive Jewish element. In fact, Ac 16 1-4 shows us that, while still having this near-by region in mind as his immediate field of labor, Paul felt the Jewish situation must be especially respected in the way his work was done.

In Europe, however, not only was the Jewish element in the communities less in number and in influence (cf. Ac 16 13, 18 12-17), but in view of the agreement reached at the Jerusalem Council (Gal 2 9) the Gentiles were now much more specifically and admittedly the object of Paul's work. The Corinthian Epistles disclose the character of that European work as it developed in a large city center among people uninstructed in religious principles, whose difficulties and shortcomings were not so much in the direction of doctrinal preconceptions as of sheer ignorance of doctrinal truth and crude conceptions of ethical obligation. Yet it is clear this element was present (II Co 11 5, 13, 12 11 cf. Gal 11, 10, 15, 17, 2 6; 11 15, 22 cf. Gal 2 21, 3 7-9, 4 28). In fact the Christ party, who seem to have been the main source of opposition to the Apostle (II Co 10 7-11, 11 23, 12 10, 13 3-7), is likely to have been of Judaizing spirit, on the basis that they were following Christ in His observance of the law. (See Bacon, Expositor, 1914). Consequently, whatever Judaizing element may have entered into the opposition to the Apostle between I and II Co, it must have been of a less developed kind than that which animated the great controversy in Galatia. For, tho it is clear that another gospel was being preached among the people (II Co 11 4, 12 f.; cf. Gal 1 6) there is no evidence that the propaganda of circumcision as necessary to salvation was being carried on; it was rather the preliminary personal opposition to Paul's apostleship than the central debate and controversy over doctrinal truth (cf. II Co chs. 10-13) taking advantage of the Gentile critical individualism to break down his authority.

The Pagan background of these letters is obvious.

The philosophy of the Cynics and Stoics proclaimed the universal rights of man, which naturally resulted in an unrestrained individualism. It also held to a worship of the instincts of nature, which led to a dissolution of moral distinctions. The influence of this philosophy and life is evident in the condition of this church. (1) There is the individualism of their factional spirit (I 1 11-14); of their disorderly exercise of spiritual gifts (I chs. 12-14); of their idea of the emancipation of woman (I 11 2-16); of their tendency to disputatious contests before the civil courts, (I 6 1-8); of their criticism of the apostolic authority of Paul, the founder of their church (II chs. 10-13) (2) There is the moral lack seen in their carelessness of intercourse with the Pagan world (I 6 9-11, 15 33 f., II 6 14-18); in their willingness to ignore the obligations of marriage (I ch. 7); especially in their failure to rebuke the case of gross immorality in their midst (I ch. 5) (3) There is the skeptical tendency evident in their speculative denial of the resurrection of the body (I ch. 15).

Paul's first letter particularly is a pastor's meeting of these difficulties. He emphasizes their obligations in their relations to others, urging the law of purity (I ch. 6 cf. II 7 8-11); the law of self-denial (I chs. 8-10 cf. II ch. 9); and above all the law of love (I ch. 13 cf. II 2 1-11).

CORMORANT. See PALESTINE, § 25.

CORN. In AV and ERV this word is used in a generic sense (inclusive of barley, wheat, etc.) for which, in accordance with American usage ARV substitute 'grain.' In Job 24 6 RV reads 'provender.' See also AGRICULTURE, §§ 4-7; and FOOD, § 1.

CORNELIUS, kor-nī'li-us (Κορνήλιος): A Roman official referred to in Ac 10 1 as a centurion of the 'Italian band' (margin 'cohort,' see AUGUSTAN BAND), and resident in Caesarea, either in connection with his troops stationed there—an Italian cohort being stationed in Syria, Cir 69 A.D. according to an inscription discovered some years ago near Vienna—or on detached duty from his command, or even possibly retired altogether from active service, his Roman name probably indicating that he himself was an Italian.

At the same time, the terms in which he is religiously described (ver. 2, 'a devout man and one that feared God,' εὐσεβῆς [differing from 'devout,' εὐλαβῆς, of Jews, Ac 2 5, 8 2, 22 12] καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν; ver. 22, 'a righteous man and one that feareth God,' δίκαιος καὶ φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν) show him to have belonged to those half-way followers of Judaism who, tho not circumcized (cf. ver. 28 with 11 3) and consequently not members of the congregation of Israel, had in their feeling after the true God adopted certain Jewish practises (cf. vs. 2, 30), in virtue of which they not only came into good favor with the Jews (cf. ver. 22; also Lk 7 4 f.), but were permitted to take part in the worship of the Synagog (cf. Ac 13 16, 26, 43, 17 17). He was thus of a class who were not proselytes, in the accepted meaning of the term. (See PROSELYTES). In these circumstances the baptized admission of himself and his household into the Christian brotherhood (ver. 47 f.) was such a breach of the Jewish principles which then ruled in the Church that upon his return to Jerusalem Peter was called to account for his connection with the incident (11 2 f.) His justification of his action on the basis of the visions received by himself and Cornelius and the outpouring upon the convert of the gifts of the Holy Spirit was accepted and the case was doubtless treated as exceptional, its significant relation to the ideal racial unity within the Church not being comprehended.

CORNER: The exact equivalent of the Heb. pin-nāh, pānāh, zāwīyyōth, and the Gr. γωνία, in the majority of instances where the word occurs. The word is also used to render (1) pa'am, 'foot' (E 25 12, AV); (2) miqtsōā', 'angle' (Ex 26 24); (3) pē'āh, 'quarter' or 'side' (Ex 25 26); (4) kānāph, 'wing' (Is 11 12); (5) kāthēph, 'shoulder' (II K 11 11, AV); (6) tsēlā', 'rib' (Ex 30 4, AV); (7) qātsāh, 'end' (Ex 27 4); (8) Hoph'al participle of qātsa', 'turn' (Ezk 46 22); and (9) the Gr. ἀρχή, 'beginning' (Ac 10 11).

CORNER-STONE: In Is 28 16 the 'precious corner-stone' that J' is to lay in Zion is the great principle of genuine faith in Him, in contrast to the false confidence exhibited by the prophet's contemporaries. In Ps 118 22 it is Zion (viewed ideally) over against the world (its oppressor) that is the corner-stone of J'. In the N T both of these ideas are subordinated to the application of the passages to Christ as fulfilling them in the widest sense possible (Mk 12 10 and ||s; Ac 4 11; Eph 2 20; I P 2 6 f.) E. E. CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF (II K 23 13): The literal meaning of the Heb. mashhūth is 'destroyer,' tho it may have been taken in this passage in the sense of 'destruction.' The reference is probably to the S. elevation of the Mount of Olives, afterward called the Mount of Offense. E. E. N.

COS (Κῶς, Coos AV): A long, narrow island between the promontories of Cnidus and Halicarnassus (Ac 21 1). The ancient capital, Astypalaea, was supplanted by the town Cos (366 B.C.). Cos belonged to the Dorian Hexapolis and the Athenian Confederacy. It was declared free by Claudius. The island was often devastated by earthquakes. Cos was much favored by Herod. It was the birthplace of Apelles, Hippocrates, Aristo, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. It contained a temple of Asclepius and a medical school and was also a banking center. J. R. S. S.—E. E. N.

COSAM (Κωσάμ): One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 28).

COSMOGONY. 1. The Biblical Accounts of Creation. Besides a number of references in the poetical books (e.g., Job 26, 38; Ps 24 2, 104), the O T contains two chief accounts of the Creation. (a) Gn 1-2 4a belongs to the Priestly narrative (see HEXATEUCH), whose regard for system is seen in the arrangement of the entire book under ten generations or 'begettings' (2 4a, 5 1, 11 10, etc.). In the case of 'the heavens and the earth,' the term 'generation' is, of course, employed mythologically; and 2 4a probably stood originally before 1 1—i.e., at the beginning of its section, as in the other occurrences of the expression. The characteristic formal arrangement of the Priestly writer is also seen in the recurrence of stereotyped formulas in Gn 1-2 4a: 'And God said,' 'and it was so,' 'and God saw that it was good,' 'and there was evening and there was morning, a . . . day.' (b) Gn 2 4b ff. is from the earlier Jehovistic narrative, and differs from 1-2 4a not only in being more simple, concrete, and anthropomorphic, but also in its content. It is concerned almost entirely with the creation of man, and the cosmogonic features are secondary.

2. Gn 1-2 4a. Turning now to Gn 1-2 4a, we notice that there are eight creative works, distinguished by characteristic formulas; and of these one falls on each day, excepting the third and sixth days, which have two works each. Again the six days are divided into two groups of three each, whose relation of preparation and accomplishment will at once be seen from the following summary:

| 1. Light   | 4. Lights: sun, moon, and stars.   |
| 2. The waters divided by the firmament.                  | 5. Living creatures in the waters, and birds that fly in front of (Heb. 'on the face of') the firmament. |
| 3. (a) Dry land separated from the seas. (b) Vegetation. | 6. (a) Land animals. (b) Man.  |
|  | 7. Sabbath of Rest.  |

Without attempting a detailed exegesis of Gn 1-2 4a, the following points should be mentioned for their bearing upon the general subject under discussion: The Hebrew word bārā' ('shape,' Gn 1 1), while it here denotes the production by Divine power of something fundamentally new, does not necessarily mean 'to create' ex nihilo. An original creation out of nothing is not denied by Gn 1, but the narrative begins no farther back than the picturing of a vast, dark, chaotic, watery mass, the deep, (cf. II P 3 5), upon the face (i.e., surface) of which the spirit (literally 'breath' or 'wind') of God was 'brooding,' or 'stirring,' as a bird over her nest.<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1 is rendered incorrectly both by AV and RV; it should be translated: 'In the beginning of God's creating the heavens and the earth, while the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, then God said; 'Let there be light.' The primeval light is here represented as a substance, independent of the luminaries (cf. ver. 14 ff.). Furthermore, darkness seems to be thought of as having a distinct existence and abode, and not as the mere absence of light (cf. Gn 1 5, 18 with Job 26 10, 38 19 f.).

3. Gn 1-2 4a and Modern Science. Thus it appears that the conceptions of Gn 1-2 4a are not those of modern astronomy, geology, or paleontology. Other discrepancies might be noted, of which the following are perhaps the most obvious: (1) There is no reason for supposing that the Hebrew word yōm in Gn 1 is used in any but its ordinary sense of a day of twenty-four hours; but even if the writer used this word figuratively, the periods there mentioned could not possibly be identified with the geological ages. (2) The sun and stars are said to have been created after the earth. (3) According to Gn 1 there is light, and evening and morning before there is a sun. (4) Plant life precedes sunlight. (5) Birds precede all land animals, and vegetation is complete in its highest forms before any animal life appears.

Attempts to reconcile these statements with the teachings of modern science have been marked either by a dogmatic denial of scientific truths<sup>2</sup> or by a distortion of the plain meaning of Hebrew and English words. The efforts of the most eminent harmonists<sup>3</sup> are remarkable only for their uniform failure.<sup>4</sup> 'Read without prejudice or bias, the narrative of Gn 1 creates an impression at variance with the facts revealed by science: the efforts at reconciliation . . . are but different modes of . . . reading into it a view which it does not express' (the italics are Canon Driver's). The preeminence of the religious conceptions of the narrative will be dealt with later; but we can not, and need not, escape from the conclusion, that here as elsewhere in the Bible, the inspired writer shares the 'scientific' beliefs of his contemporaries.

The Hebrew conception of the universe or world may be briefly stated as follows: The earth is the center of all; a circular disk, consisting of the mountain-island of the dry land, surrounded by the waters of the ocean (cf. Is 40 22), resting upon unseen foundations (Job 38 6; Zec 12 1). The firmament (sky or heaven), like a thin, solid dome (cf. Job 22 14, 'vault' [circuit AV]; Pr 8 27, circle [compass AV]; Ps 104 9, bounds), restrains the waters above it (Gn 1 6), except when its windows are opened to let down rain (Gn 7 11). The firmament also rests upon mysterious foundations (II S 22 8; Job 26 11). In it are fastened the luminaries (Gn 1 14-17), which move in their fixed courses. Sometimes a plurality of heavens (? seven; cf. II Co 12 2; Eph 4 10) are spoken of (Dt 10 14; Ps 148 4), in the highest of which God dwells (Dt 26 15; II Ch 6 21; Am 9 6, upper chambers, rather than stories [i.e., 'successive heights'] of AV. Beneath the disk of the earth is the dark abode of the departed, called Sheol, Abaddon, Hades, or the Pit (Nu 16 33; Pr 15 11; Is 38 18; cf. Rev 6 8, 9 11) which forms a bowl under the ground that corresponds to the vault of the sky above. Beneath the dry land is the great deep (Is 51 10), whose storehouses and fountains (Gn 7 11) feed the seas.

Such a rapid generalization, however, is apt to give the impression that the O T portrays a rigid, mechanical universe; and the outlines of the picture need to be softened by a consideration of the following important facts: There is no single connected passage which describes the cosmos as a consistent whole, or even brings together all the fundamental conceptions just mentioned. A large proportion of the cosmological references are found which were held by the Babylonians and the Assyrians.<sup>7</sup> These beliefs have long been known in an incomplete form through Greek-Christian references to the writings of Berossus, a Babylonian priest (c. 300 B.C.); but it was not until 1875 that fragments of a cuneiform account of the Creation were discovered at Nineveh by George Smith. Since then other tablets have been brought to light, until now we have more than enough to indicate the general plan of the Babylonian cosmogony.<sup>8</sup>

in poetry, and ought not to be interpreted as literal prose; while others are in highly figurative prophecy or apocalypse. The inspired writers showed no more hesitancy in employing cosmological conceptions that were shifting and contradictory than do we in using these same conceptions in modern poetry and colloquial prose.<sup>5</sup> Indeed, the whole question of the original creation and present structure of the universe is frequently stated to be beyond the comprehension of human reason (e.g., Jer 31 37; Is 40; Job 26 14, 36 29, 37 18 f., 38). In the light of such an understanding of the Hebrew cosmology, one class of apologetic problems simply vanishes.

4. The Babylonian Creation Epic. The narrative of Gn 1-2 4a has points in common with several ancient cosmogonies<sup>6</sup>; but archeologists are now agreed that its immediate source is to be found in the beliefs concerning the beginning of the universe have been discovered which show that the poem was originally composed at least as early as 2500 B.C. This great epic, entitled 'When in the Height,' from its opening words, consists of 994 lines, divided into seven sections of approximately equal length, each inscribed upon a separate tablet. The poem embodies the beliefs of the Babylonians and Assyrians concerning the origin of the universe; it describes the coming forth of the gods from chaos, and tells the story of how the forces of disorder, represented by the primeval water-gods, Apsū and Tīamat, were overthrown by Ea and Marduk respectively, and how Marduk, after completing the triumph of the gods over chaos, proceeded to create the world and man.' Its central theme is the glorification of Marduk, the supreme god of Babylon, and the actual account of the creation of the world does not begin till near the end of the Fourth Tablet. The Seventh Tablet gives the fifty titles of Marduk, and ends the poem with a fine hymn of praise. A few lines from the opening and closing are given to illustrate the style of the epic (King's translation):

'WHEN IN THE HEIGHT heaven was not named,
And the earth beneath did not yet bear a name,
And the primeval Apsû, who begat them,
And chaos, Tîamât, the mother of them both,—
Their waters were mingled together,
And no field was formed, no marsh was to be seen;
When of all the gods none had been called into being,
And none bore a name, and no destinies [were ordained];
Then were created the gods in the midst of [heaven],
Lakhamu and Lakhamu were called into being [ . . . ].
Ages increased [ . . . ],
Then Anshar and Kishar were created. . . .'

EPILOG.

'Let them [i.e., the names of Marduk] be held in remembrance, and let the first man proclaim them;
Let the wise and the understanding consider them together!
Let the father repeat them and teach them to his son;
Let them be in the ears of the pastor and the shepherd!
Let a man rejoice in Marduk, the Lord of the gods,
That he may cause his land to be fruitful, and that he himself may have prosperity' etc.

A study of the entire epic reveals many remarkable parallels between the Hebrew and Babylonian narratives. The general course of the two accounts is the same, and the following specific agreements (among others) are striking: (1) Both narratives begin with a description of primeval chaos. (2) The early creation of light (Gn 1 3) is parallel in the original form of the Babylonian myth, according to which Marduk was a solar deity. In both accounts there is light before the creation of the luminaries. (3) The Deep (T'hom) of Gn 1 2 shows even a verbal similarity to the Babylonian chaos-monster, Tîamât; and the occasional personification of the Deep as a sullen, crouching monster (Dt 33 13; see also SERPENT, DRAGON, RAHAB, LEVIATHAN) is undoubtedly a survival of the Babylonian dragon myth. (4) The creation of a firmament to divide the waters (Gn 1 6) is parallel to the act of Marduk, who used half of the cleft body of Tîamât for a similar purpose. (5) The Biblical account of the creation of the heavenly bodies (Gn 1 14-19) finds an exceedingly close parallel in the beginning of the Fifth Tablet. (6) In each narrative the culminating act is the creation of man. According to the Babylonian epic, he was made from the blood of Marduk, who spoke thus:

'My blood will I take, and bone will I [fashion],
I will make man, that man may . . .
I will create man who shall inhabit [the earth?].
That the service of the gods may be established, and that [their] shrines [may be built].'

5. Superiority of the Biblical Account. Finally, tho it is not mentioned in what has been recovered of the creation epic, the Sabbath (q.v.) (Gn 2 2 f.) was probably of Babylonian origin.<sup>9</sup> These resemblances in the framework of the Hebrew and Babylonian cosmogonies serve only to emphasize the infinite superiority of the content of the Biblical narrative. The Babylonian epic is verbose in language and grotesque in its polytheism; chaos is anterior to deity, and Marduk gains the supremacy only after a fearful struggle. In Gn 1-2 4a the language is simple yet majestic, God is from the beginning supreme, and the processes of creation are but the orderly working out of His unimpeded plan.<sup>10</sup>

The foregoing considerations lead to two conclusions: (1) Historically: there must have been a long period of naturalization in Palestine to allow the Babylonian cosmogony to be so refined and stripped of all its mythological features. The Babylonian creation legends were probably already current in Canaan when the Israelites entered the Promised Land. (2) While Gn 1-2 4a does not attempt to teach scientific facts which we could find out for ourselves, its revelation of transcendent, religious truths evidences the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The general outline of the Babylonian epic survived, together with the common Semitic conception of the universe; but the grossness and polytheism of the earlier cosmogony were divinely transmuted into monotheism and spirituality. By a series of representative pictures we are taught that the universe was not self-originated, but dependent for its existence and present form upon the decrees of the one omnipotent God, whose plan penetrated every detail of creation; while man is shown in his ideal state as head and center of creation and the image of his Maker.

COUNCIL, THE: 1. Origin of the Council. The chief court of the Jews. Under the Romans a measure of self-government was conceded the Jewish nation, both as a religious community and as a race. The recognized headship of the community was accordingly vested in the council of leaders known in the Jewish writings as Beth-din-haggādhol, or by the Greek name Συνέδριον, synedrion, reduced into the Aramaic Sanhedrin (erroneously Sanhedrim) Συν-βόλιον, Mk 15 1. The original of this body lies probably, in the Persian period, altho it can not be traced clearly farther back than the time of the Greek dominion. In this early stage of its existence, however, it was known only under the name Senate, γερουσία (Ac 5 21; Jos Ant. XII, 3 3). The name Sanhedrin appears first under Herod.

2. Constitution and Membership. The membership of this court was according to the Mishna (Sanh. 1a) fixed at 71 in imitation of the ancient court of elders (Nu 11 16). Those qualified to be members were in general of the priestly house and especially of the Sadducean nobility. But from the days of Queen Alexandria (78-69 B.C.) onward there were with these chief priests also many Pharisees in it under the name of scribes and elders. These three classes are found combined in Mt 27 41; Mk 11 27, 14 43, 53, 15 1. How such members were appointed is not entirely clear. The aristocratic character of the body and the history of its origin forbid the belief that it was by election. Its nucleus probably consisted of the members of certain ancient families, to which, however, from time to time others were added by the secular rulers.

3. High Priest's Place in It. The presiding officer was the high priest, who at first exercised in it more than the authority of a member, claiming a voice equal to that of the rest of the body. But after the reduction of the high priesthood from a hereditary office to one bestowed by the political ruler according to his pleasure, and the frequent changes in the office introduced by the new system, the high priest naturally lost his prestige. Instead of holding in his hands 'the government of the nation,' he came to be but one of many to share this power; those who had served as high priest, being still in esteem among their nation and having lost their office not for any reason that could be considered valid by the religious sense of the community exerted a large influence over the decisions of the assembly. In the N T they are regarded as the rulers (Mt 26 59, 27 41; Ac 4 5-8; Lk 23 13; Jn 7 26), and Josephus' testimony supports this view.

4. Functions. The functions of the Sanhedrin were religious and moral, and also political. In the latter capacity they further exercised administrative as well as judicial functions. As a religious tribunal, the Sanhedrin wielded a potent influence over the whole of the Jewish world (Ac 9 2), but as a court of justice, after the division of the country upon the death of Herod, its jurisdiction was limited to Judea. Here, however, its power was absolute even to the passing of the sentence of death (Jos. Ant. XIV, 9 3, 4; Mt 26 3 f.; Ac 4 5, 6 12, 22 30), altho it had no authority to carry the sentence into execution, except as approved and ordered by the representative of the Roman government.

5. The Law It Observed. The law by which the Sanhedrin governed was naturally the Jewish, and in the execution of it this tribunal had a police of its own, and made arrests at its discretion (Mt 26 47). Accordingly, to the extent that the provisions of this law were respected in the trial of Jesus, that trial and execution were legal (but cf. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus, 1899; Rosadi, The Trial of Jesus, 1905). The trial and stoning of Stephen, however (Ac 6 12 f.), appear to have been too summary and out of harmony with the procedure prescribed by the law, and therefore illegal.

6. Taxation Among the administrative duties of the Sanhedrin was the collection of taxes. Under the procurators, the custom had been established throughout the empire of committing the levying of taxes to the local authorities of the subject countries, for the most part to the senates of the towns. In accordance with this practise the Sanhedrin became responsible for the collection in Judea (Jos. BJ. II, 17 1). In carrying out this provision it sold the revenue to tax-purchasers or speculators (publicans)

7. Temporary Limitations of Power. The foregoing holds true of the period between 6-66 A.D., i.e., the period of the Roman procurators. Before the opening of this period restrictions and restorations of the jurisdictions took place alternately. Gabinius, the proconsul of Syria, for instance (57-55 B.C.), subdivided Judea into five districts, assigning each to a separate council (συνέδριον, σύνδοκος, Jos. Ant. XIV, 5 4; BJ. I, 8 5). Thus he limited the jurisdiction of the Jerusalem council very materially. This was, however, done away with by Julius Cæsar in 47 (Ant. XIV, 9 3-5; BJ. I, 10 7), and the Sanhedrin was restored to its former supremacy. With the destruction of Jerusalem the council was abolished.

8. Extent of Jurisdiction. While the general authority of the Sanhedrin extended over the whole of Judea, the towns in the country had local councils of their own (συνέδρια, Mt 5 22, 10 17; Mk 13 9; βουλαί, Jos. BJ. II, 14 1) for the administration of local affairs. These were constituted of elders (Lk 7 3), at least 7 in number (Jos. Ant. IV, 8 14; BJ. II, 20 5), and in some of the largest towns as many as 23. What the relation of these to the central council in Jerusalem was does not appear clearly. They were probably not inferior courts in a uniform system with the right of appeal from the lower to the higher, but rather independent judicatories with a definite recognized work. And yet their independence did not amount to absolute unrelativeness to one another. Some sort of mutual recognition existed among them; for whenever the judges of the local court could not agree it seems that they were in the habit of referring their cases to the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. IV, 8 14; Mishna, Sanh. 11 2).

A. C. Z.

COUNCIL, also COUNSEL: A conference more or less informally held (ᾠδή, Ps 55 14; Pr 15 22), but not necessarily of those who bore no office or responsibility. The council of leaders in Jerusalem (συμβούλιον, Mt 12 14; Ac 25 12) included probably members of the Sanhedrin, as well as leading laymen. The act of holding such councils (counsels) is called 'consulting' (Ps 83 3) and its finding 'counsel' (βουλή, Lk 23 51).

A. C. Z.

COUNT: Besides being the usual rendering of mānāh, šāphar, ψηφίζειν, and συμψηφίζειν, all meaning in general 'to calculate,' the word renders (1) the Heb. hāshabh = Gr. λογίζεσθαι, 'to think' or 'impute' (Gn 15 6; Ro 2 26; Ph 3 13). (2) pāqadh, 'to inspect' (I Ch 21 6). (3) ἔχειν, 'to hold' (Mt 14 5; Phm 17), and (4) ἡγείσθαι, 'to account' or 'estimate' (Ph 3 7, 8; He 10 29).

A. C. Z.

COUNTENANCE: In most instances this is the rendering of words meaning 'face' or 'appearance.' In Dn 5 6, 9, the original zīw means the 'brightness' or 'color' of the face. In I S 16 12 'eye,' in I S 25 3 'form' is the literal meaning of the Heb.

COUNTRY: In most instances the suitable rendering of terms meaning 'land,' 'field,' or 'place.' The following cases call for remark: In Dt 3 14 the original word means a 'district marked off'; in Mk 6 1, 4 and ||s; Jn 4 44; He 11 14, it means 'fatherland'; in Lv 16 29, 17 15, 24 22; Nu 15 13; Ezk 47 22, the one Heb. word means 'native'; in Mk 12 1 and ||s and Mt 25 14, 'went into a far country' is simply 'went away from home.' In Jos 17 11, Jer 47 4, and Ac 4 36 RV gives the more correct rendering. E. E. N.

COUNTRYMAN: The translation of γένος, 'race' (II Co 11 26), and of συμφοιλέτης, 'of the same tribe' (I Th 2 14). In the first instance Paul is referring to the Jews, in the second to the fellow citizens of the Thessalonian Christians.

COURSE: This term signifies one's way or habit of life (Jer 8 6, 23 10). In Eph 2 2 it renders the Gr. αἶψα, 'age.' In Ac 13 25, 20 24; II Ti 4 7 the Gr. is δρόμος, 'running course,' i.e., the task or mission of life. In Ja 3 6 the Gr. τροχός, 'a running thing,' 'a wheel,' refers to one's natural disposition, temperament, tendencies, etc.; in other words, to the entire compass of one's life. See Ropes' extended note in ICC, ad loc. Other occurrences need no explanation. (See also COSMOGONY, § 3; and PRIESTHOOD, § 10.) E. E. N.

COURT. See HOUSE, § 6 (f); PALACE; and TEMPLE, §§ 6, 20, 27, 29 f.

COUSIN: In AV of Lk 1 36, 58, for Gr. συγγενής 'kinswoman' or 'relative' (so RV); In Col 4 10 (ἀνεψιός) 'cousin,' RV, is preferable to 'sister's son,' AV.

COVENANT: 1. General Idea. (נִתְּנָה, berith, Assy. birītu; cf. Zimmern, Bab. Bussps. 59, 82, from a root bārāh, 'to determine,' Assy. barā, Gr. διαθήκη, 'disposal'): Broadly, a compact or agreement. In this sense covenant is used frequently of contracts among men. Abimelech at Gerar entered into covenant with Abraham (Gn 21 27), and afterward under similar conditions with Isaac (Gn 26 28). Abraham entered into covenant with the Amorites (Gn 14 13 'were confederate,' EV), Laban with Jacob (Gn 31 44), Jonathan with David (I S 18 3, 23 18), Solomon with Hiram (I K 5 2-6), Ahab with Ben-hadad (I K 20 34), etc.

2. The Biblical Covenant. But in Biblical usage, this general conception of covenant developed into a much more specific one. For (1) as a contract includes a binding element, or creates an obligation, a covenant becomes a bond, imposed by two covenanting parties upon each other, or by one upon himself and the other. Hence in passages such as Gn 15 18 f. the covenant is made by J' (cf. also Jos 24, by Joshua in behalf of J'; Jos 9 7, Joshua with the Gibeonites; II K 11 4 by Jehoiada, and II K 23 3 by Josiah, in behalf of J'). The part of Abraham (or those who may be called the second party in the affair) is passive. It is quite proper to speak of it as voluntary; but the covenant is not in these instances entered into by God and man upon absolutely the same terms. (2) The second limitation of the general idea is introduced with the religious element in it. A covenant is not merely a contract as between men and before men. God is invoked in it as a third party. He has a share in its terms and results. Even when the agreement aims at outward material ends, it is not complete until by a religious service J' has been brought into the transaction. To this end an oath, curse, or sacrifice is an indispensable ceremonial accompaniment. When Abimelech (Gn 26 26 ff.), acting for himself, Ahuzzah, and Phicol, proposed to Isaac that they should enter into covenant, he used the formula 'Let there now be an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee,' and 'let us make a covenant' (ver. 28). The word used here for 'oath' may also be rendered 'curse' (cf. also Gn 31 44 ff., the covenant between Laban and Jacob). (3) A third limitation is the creation of a new relation between the covenanting parties. In the later development of the idea and in some extrabiblical expressions of it, this is symbolized by some act or acts denoting the possession of a common life. The partaking of a sacrificial meal, of salt (which is in such cases the substitute of blood), or of blood itself, either poured out in the form of a libation or used in other emblematic ways (W. Robertson Smith, Rel. of Sem., p. 451), was made to serve as the sign of the new and irrevocable relationship, the object of which was mutual benefit and helpfulness. So far as the covenant was concerned, those who entered upon it were bound to regard each other as members of a new organic entity. So sacred and intimate was the new relation that nothing could surpass the enormity of the sin of covenant-breaking. The sin is loathed and denounced by the prophets in unmeasured terms (cf. Hos 6 7, 8 1, 10 4; Is 24 5; Jer 11 10). On the other hand, it is a sure manifestation of God's perfection that He can not and does not forget His covenants, but remains constant to the rights and obligations created by them (cf. Ro 3 1-4).

3. God's Covenant an Expression of His Grace. Accordingly, the covenant of God with His people is an expression of His love for them. It may be called the divine constitution or ordinance, which is designed to govern human relations with Himself. As such it appears in the record of His dealings with Noah (the Noachic covenant, Gn 9 11 ff.). Even the story of Eden has been read by some in the terms of the covenant idea. But it is more particularly the Divine mode of defining the relation with the Chosen People. Abraham was taken into covenant at the very beginning (Gn 15 18) with a symbolical and impressive ceremony. With Moses and the new stage of development in the life of the people, Israel as a nation is pictured as entering into covenant with J' in an even grander and more impressive transaction (the Sinaitic covenant, Ex 34 10, 27, 28). By a covenant with Phinehas an everlasting priesthood was established (Nu 25 12 f.). Other covenants with the same ruling idea are those with Joshua and Israel (Jos 24 25), David (Ps 89 4, 132 12; Jer 33 21), Jehoiada (II K 11 17), Hezekiah (II Ch 29 10), Josiah (II K 23 3), and Ezra (Ezr 10 3).

4. Covenant with Collective Bodies. It was characteristic of the covenant idea that when entered into it bound not only the individual but his family and posterity, and as a counterpoint the benefits and privileges secured by it were transferred to the offspring of the parties to it. The covenant with Abraham was made with him and with his seed forever (Gn 17 10). Moses was not an individual but a representative of the whole people before J". The covenant with David was the means of blessing to the whole lineage of the great king (II S 23 5; II Ch 13 5, 21 7; Jer 33 21). The national poetry embodied in glowing terms the conviction that the covenant with David was the ground for the unfailing care on the part of J" over the royal dynasty as well as over the people ruled by it.

5. The Prophetic New Covenant. Israel's experiences with the covenant led the prophets to despair of its continuance, but its lapse would not be final (Hos 1 9 f., 2 2, 23, 3 3). They predict its renovation and reestablishment under better conditions. In this form they called it the New Covenant differing from the old (1) in spirituality. It should be a covenant written on the hearts of God's people (Jer 31 31), and God's people should be not a tribe or nation but a society of individuals who should know Him and keep His covenant. (2) In universality. Through Israel the new religion of God should extend to other nations and the covenant should embrace these too (Is 49 6). (3) Its results would be forgiveness of sin and a new righteousness (Jer 31 34).

6. Covenant in N T. The covenant conception, having served its purpose in the O T, disappears from the N T, yielding to the expression of God's relation to man in the terms of an individual fellowship and indwelling. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, however, it is still made to serve as the basis of the difference and contrast between the better order of things introduced through Jesus Christ and the old order either under the Abrahamic or the Sinaitic covenants (7 22, 8 6 ff., etc.) A. COVERING. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (2). For usage in Ex 22 27; Job 31 19, cf. DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 3.

COVERT: (1) In I S 25 20 the meaning is that Abigail was concealed from view as she drew near to David and that the meeting between them was sudden. (2) In II K 16 18 RV reads 'covered way.' The sense of the entire verse is obscure, and what is meant is not known. E. E. N.

COVET, COVETOUSNESS: This term expresses various ideas: (1) Desire to have. As such it is not only innocent, but when its object is worthy, commendable (I Co 12 31, 14 39, 'desire' RV). Also, however, (2) desire inordinate and without any ulterior purpose, in which case it is folly (Lk 12 15 ff.) and idolatry (Eph 5 5; Col 3 5). (3) Desire to possess that which belongs to another. Such desire is contrary to the moral law (Ex 20 17, 'lust' AV; Ro 7 7). Possibly (4) the effort to secure what one has no right to possess (I Ti 6 10, 'to reach after' RV). A. C. Z.

CRESCENS, kres'senz (Κρήσενς): An early Christian mentioned in II Ti 4 10 as having gone to Gaul (Gr. Γαλατίας, or as in some MSS. [κ, C], Γαλλίαν; cf. Zahn, Introd. to N T, § 33, n. 8). The fact that Titus was sent at the same time to Dalmatia suggests that both journeys may have been undertaken for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in new regions. According to later tradition (see Tillemont, Mem. I, 585) C. was the founder of the Church in Vienne and Mainz. J. M. T.

CRESCENTS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, 2.

CRETE, krit (Κρήτη): An island in the Mediterranean, 60 miles south of Greece, known to the Venetians and then to geographers of a later time as Candia. It is 150 m. long and from 7 to 30 m. wide. Crete was one of the chief seats of the worship of Zeus, whose legendary birthplace was on Mt. Ida or in the cave of Dicte. Minos was the son of Zeus and the founder of the civilization of the island, which is commonly known as Minoan. The excavations made since 1900 by Dr. A. J. Evans and others have shown that there was a substantial basis for the ancient legends about the greatness of the house of Minos. The chief religious symbol was the double ax, or labrys; and in speaking of the great Minoan palace at Knossos Dr. Evans says it is 'probable that we must recognize in this vast building with its maze of corridors and chambers and its network of subterranean ducts, the local habitation and name of the traditional Labyrinth.' There was a considerable degree of culture with a system of pictographic writing as early as 2500 B.C. and by 1500 they were using 'a highly developed form of linear script, with regular divisions between the words, and for elegance scarcely surpassed by any later form of writing.' The theory of Dr. Evans that the Phenicians derived the alphabet from this script is accepted by Moulton in his Greek Grammar as well as by some other scholars. (See Scripta Minoa, 1909, p. 86 ff.) About 1400 B.C. the great Minoan palace was burned and this civilization overwhelmed. It is thought by many that the Philistines (q.v.) were emigrants from Crete just after this catastrophe. The island possessed a large number of independent cities, in some of which, notably Gortyna, many Jews were settled before the middle of the 2d cent. B.C. The Romans occupied Crete in 67 B.C., during the great war with the pirates, and under the Empire it was made a senatorial province along with Cyrene. By universal testimony the Cretans were avaricious, fraudulent, and sensual, as their poet Epimenides (600 B.C.), called by Plato a 'divine man' and quoted in Tit 1 12, also affirms. If the Gospel was first carried there after Pentecost (Ac 2 11), it did not apparently make headway until the visit of Paul and Titus (Tit 1 5). See also FAIR HAVENS; and PHOENIX.

CRICKETS. See PALESTINE, § 26.

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS: 1. Hebrew Penology. The fundamental principle of Hebrew penology is strict retribution. The lex talionis, including property as well as the person, is enunciated in all three sections of the Mosaic codes (Ex 21 23-25; Lv 24 17, 19 f.; Dt 19 21). This was a primitive Semitic penal custom and was common to all the codes of law of W. Asia that have been recovered; to CH [Code of Hammurabi (c. 2000 B.C.)], to AC [Assyrian Code (c. 1600 B.C.)], to HC [Hittite Code (c. 1350 B.C.)]. In the CH it is expressed in phraseology almost identical with Biblical language: son for son, §§ 116, 230, daughter for daughter, § 210, eye for eye, § 196, limb for limb, § 197, tooth for tooth, § 200, life for life, § 229, slave for slave, §§ 219, 231. The punishment of crime had two great purposes: (1) deterring others from similar offenses (Dt 17 13), (2) the extirpation of the evil from Israel (Dt 13 5). In reviewing this subject the historical development of the Hebrews must be kept in mind. In the nomadic state crime was revenged rather than punished, and it was looked upon as an injury done to a tribal brother (see BLOOD, AVENGER OF). Down to the later monarchy the solidarity of the family involved every member in the crime and punishment of the guilty individual (Achan Jos 7 24 f.; kinsfolk of Saul II S 21 1-4), but this principle was abrogated in the Dt. law (Dt 24 16; cf. II K 14 5 f.). When the nation passed into the agricultural and later to the commercial state of society, the object of punishment was to protect life and property. The Hebrews, like other peoples of antiquity, did not make a sharp distinction between crime and sin, and consequently we find religious laws included in the same code with civil and criminal enactments (cf. LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 1.) Under the ethical influence of the religion of Jehovah, crime came to be regarded as a violation of the righteousness and holiness of God, and was punished in order to vindicate these Divine attributes. The N T reflects Roman as well as Hebrew ideas in regard to both crimes and punishments.

2. Crimes. The more serious infringements of the Law may be grouped into three classes: (a) Injuries to property. Under this group falls theft, which is absolutely prohibited in the Decalog (Ex 20 15). The CH is more severe than the Biblical codes in its treatment of this evil. In the former, stealing is a capital crime—the receiving, purchasing, and selling of stolen goods, man-stealing, the detention of a slave, brigandage, looting at a fire, appropriating state levies—all being punishable with death (cf. Ex 21 16, 22 2; Dt 24 7; Jos 7 25). The owner of a vicious bull was liable for any injury inflicted on the slave of another by the goring of the animal (Ex 21 28 f.). The CH, §§ 250-252, inflicts a fine for a similar case. The practise of extortion was no doubt common enough in O T times (Ps 109 11, 'extortioner'='usurer'), but in the N T (Mt 23 25; Lk 19 8) it refers to a form of blackmail levied by the publicans (q.v.).

(b) Injuries to person or life. Bribery, also termed a gift, not only might prevent justice, but place the person of the accused in jeopardy. The Biblical codes have the former evil in mind (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19), while the CH contemplates the latter: 'If a man in a case bear witness for gain or money, he shall himself bear the penalty imposed in that case' (§ 4). Lying, forswearing, and bearing false witness also resulted in the miscarriage of justice and were fraught with danger to the accused person. They were prohibited (Ex 20 16; Lv 19 12; cf. Mt 5 33), and the guilty party was to be punished according to the lex talionis. In the CH the false charge of a capital crime makes the accuser liable to the death penalty (§1), and the slanderer of a priestess or of a married woman was to be branded on the forehead (§ 127). The breaking of a vow that had been strengthened by an oath was not permissible (Nu 30 2; cf. Lv 5 1-4; Jg 17 2 f.). The oath of purgation is required in seven instances by the CH (§§ 131, 227 et al.). The O T regards human life as sacred, because it was created in the Divine image (Gn 9 6). Manslaughter is carefully distinguished from murder, the latter being the result of premeditation and malice, the former of accident (Ex 21 13; Dt 19 4). In the case of manslaughter the offender could find an asylum (Nu 35 11, 15; Dt 19 5), but murder was always a capital crime and the penalty could not be commuted by a ransom or blood-money (Nu 35 31 f.). Parricide and infanticide are not mentioned in the Mosaic codes, but there are many instances of assassination and suicide in the O T (Jg 3 20 f.; I S 31 4 f.). The tribal custom of blood revenge (see BLOOD, AVENGER OF) which is entirely unknown to the CH, prevailed among the Hebrews in the earlier periods of history, but the attempt was made later to regulate it (Dt 24 16; Nu 35 12-34).

(c) Offenses against the moral order and the fundamental laws of the theocracy: Every improper use of the Divine name (Lv 24 11), speech derogatory to the majesty of God (Mt 26 65), and sins with a high hand—i.e., premeditated transgressions of the basal principles of the theocracy (Nu 9 13, 15 30; Ex 31 14)—were regarded as blasphemy; the penalty was death by stoning (Lv 24 16). The Mosaic codes dealt with the improper relation of the sexes in detail. To lie carnally, and fornication are general terms for illicit sexual intercourse (Lv 18 20). The prevalence of prostitution, at a later date in Israel as well as in the Greco-Roman world, was appalling (Pr 7 6-19; Ro 1 28), but it was strictly prohibited (Lv 19 29; Dt 23 17 f.). See also HARLOT. The abominable Canaanitic practise of having temple prostitutes (q'dheshōth) was forbidden (Dt 23 17).

The devotee, or sacred prostitute, enjoyed the privileges of special legislation in the CH (§§ 110, 178, 181, 182). The Mosaic codes, however, debarred a son of harlotry or of fornication from the congregation (Dt 23 2). Adultery is a capital crime in the CH (§ 129). Incest in its various forms is prohibited in Lv 18 6-18. The CH, §§ 154-158, deals severely with this crime, in one case—a man with his son's wife—drowning being the penalty, in another—a man with his mother—death at the stake. Sodomy, common enough among the Canaanites, is looked upon as an abomination and absolutely prohibited (Lv 18 22; Dt 23 17). It may be noted that AC has numerous barbarous penalties for sexual crimes, §§ 18, 19, 39, 50, 51, et al.

3. Punishments. The purpose of punishment has been noted above. Torture and barbarous methods of inflicting penalties—e.g., blinding, maiming, tearing out the tongue, and suffocating, which were common in antiquity, a prominent feature of AC—are foreign to the spirit of the O T. Torture was first introduced by the Herods. (a) Capital punishment was administered in various ways. Stoning was the ordinary method of inflicting the death penalty among the Hebrews (Ex 19 13; Lv 20 27, 24 10-23; Dt 13 5, 10, 21 21; Ac 7 59). The stoning took place outside of the camp and in the name of the congregation (Lv 24 14), the witnesses casting the first stones. Beheading was not known as a judicial penalty in the Mosaic codes, and when death by the sword is mentioned in the O T we are to think of thrusting rather than decapitation. The latter was first introduced among the Jews in the Roman period (Mt 14 10 ff.). The hanging of the living was introduced by the Romans; the Hebrews sometimes impaled or hung the lifeless body on a tree (Dt 21 23; Gal 3 13), the exposure of the body being intended as an added indignity. The Heb. yāqā' (translated 'hang') is uncertain in meaning (Nu 25 4; II S 21 6). Gallows are mentioned as a Persian institution in the story of Haman (Est 2 23, 7 9). According to the CH, § 153, a woman who murders her husband is to be impaled; in AC, § 51, the same penalty is imposed on a woman who brings on a miscarriage. The Babylonian code imposes burning as a penalty for incest (§ 157; cf. Lv 20 14, 21 9), for theft at a fire (§ 25), and upon a priestess for entering or conducting a wine-shop (§ 110). The oft-recurring phrase cut off is not a designation for the death penalty, but signifies excommunication (Ex 12 15, 19; Lv 7 20 ff., 23 29; Nu 9 13). Crucifixion was a terrible method of punishment adopted by the Romans from the Orient, and used by them only on slaves and the vilest criminals (Cicero: extremum summumque supplicium). Roman citizens were always exempt. The method of administering this punishment was, immediately following condemnation, to scourge the prisoner. (The fact that Jesus was scourged before the sentence [Jn 19 1 f.] may have been due to a desire on Pilate's part to offer this milder punishment as a compromise between the full penalty and release). Then the transverse beam of the cross was laid upon his shoulders and borne by him to the place of execution (Mk 15 2 and ff.), while the tablet on which was written the accusation against him was either hung around his neck or carried before him. (See SUPERScription).

On arrival at the place of execution, the prisoner was stripped of his clothing by the soldiers detailed to carry out the sentence, who appropriated it as their booty (Mk 15 24 and ff.). The beam was then placed on the ground and the victim laid upon it, his hands being fastened to its ends, sometimes with cords, usually with nails (Jn 20 25). After this the beam with the victim was raised up and securely fixed to the upright stake, already permanently planted in the ground, the body resting astride a projecting piece of wood nailed to the upright. By this means the strain on the hands was relieved and they were prevented from being torn from their fastenings. As a last act the feet were securely fastened to the lower part of the upright, either with nails or with cords, and the victim was left to die from exhaustion, which did not issue sometimes for days.

The upright being a stake rather than a tall pole, the doomed man was fully exposed to the insults of the populace, who out of curiosity or malice might be present. There was, however, in Jerusalem at least, a humane custom of alleviating the torture of the final hours by giving the sufferer a stupefying draft (Mk 15 23 and ff.), and at times an end was put to the agony by breaking the sufferer's legs (Jn 19 31 f.). (The different treatment in Jesus' case (vs. 33 f.), may have been due to brutality, or a desire to make doubly sure of his death). (See CROSS, I.)

(b) Physical punishments other than capital: From its frequent mention in the O T (Ex 21 20; Pr 10 13, 17 26, 26 3; Jer 20 2, 37 15, Is 50 6), we infer that beating was a very common punishment among the Hebrews. According to Dt 25 2 f. the penalty was inflicted before the judge, with the culprit in a recumbent position. The phrase 'cause him to lie down' (Dt 25 2) suggests the bastinado. The humane spirit of the Deuteronomic legislation mitigated the severity of this penalty by restricting the number of strokes to forty. The words chasten and chastise sometimes refer to corporal punishment (Dt 22 18; I K 12 14). The scorpion is mentioned as a terrible instrument of castigation; it consisted probably of thongs armed with pieces of lead (I K 12 14; II Ch 10 14). In the N T the terms stripe and scourge have a twofold signification. In some passages the writer had in mind the Jewish form of punishment which was administered with a whip of three lashes (II Cor 11 24; cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 8 21). Again the reference may be to the Roman custom of beating slaves and criminals (Ac 16 22, 22 25; II Co 11 25). At Philippi Paul alludes to the Porcian law, which exempted Roman citizens from this penalty (Ac 16 37). This is not to be confused with the scourging of Jesus, which was flagellation with thongs. The branding of slaves was a common custom (Is 44 5; CH, §§ 226, 227), and, according to Babylonian law, the slanderer of a woman was to be branded on the forehead (§ 127). Imprisonment is a penalty unknown to both the CH and the Mosaic codes, but it is mentioned toward the close of the monarchy (Jer 32 2, 37 16), and implied in the mention of prison garb (II K 25 29), and use of chains, fetters, and stocks (II S 3 34; Jer 20 2, 29 26; Ac 16 24). The so called law of jealousy was really an ordeal for a woman suspected of adultery (Nu 5 11-31). In the CH the ordeal by water was employed as a test for a sorcerer and a suspected wife (§§ 2, 132).

(c) Penalties in means or money: Fines in our modern sense were unknown, but the injured party received an indemnity for loss or injury from the guilty person. Three instances are given in the O T (Ex 21 32; Dt 22 19, 29), while the CH punishes twenty-one offenses in this way. The restoration of things lost, stolen, or injured in a fundamental principle in the Mosaic codes, and is quite prominent in the CH, which contains forty-eight enactments exacting restitution in some form. The restitution of a stolen ox must be fivefold, of a sheep fourfold (Ex 22 1; cf. Lk 19 8); in the CH, § 112, goods lost by carrier in transportation must be restored fivefold. For other O T instances see Ex 22 1-9; Lv 6 4 f., 24 21. A Roman jailer or guard allowing a prisoner to escape made himself liable to the penalty imposed on the criminal (Ac 12 19, 16 27). The CH, in fifteen enactments, punishes with forfeiture, which is twice mentioned in the O T (Dt 22 9; Ezr 10 8). Confiscation was not practised by the Hebrews, but is referred to as a Persian custom (Ezr 7 26).

CRISPUS, kris'pus (Κρ(σ)πος): The ruler of the Jewish synagogue in Corinth who with his household accepted Christianity on hearing Paul's preaching and was himself baptized by Paul (Ac 18 8; I Co 1 14). J. M. T.

CROOK-BACKED. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

CROSS (σταυρός, probably a 'stake' or 'pole,' radically cognate with ἵστυ-μι): The N T word for the instrument on which Jesus was put to death.

I. Physical: The early usage of the term σταυρός corresponded to its primary meaning (cf. Odyssey, 14 11, 'poles for fencing'; Xen. Anab. V, 2 21, 'stakes for fortification'; Hdt. 5 6, 'foundation piles'). As a means of execution it was first used in the form of a stake (crux simplex) for impaling the victim—the custom being practised by the Assyrians, Persians, Phoenicians (Carthaginians), and Egyptians, and passing from the Persians and Carthaginians to the Greeks and Romans. This form was later elaborated into the crux compacta, of which there were, in the times of Christ, two varieties—the crux commissa ('St. Anthony's cross') shaped like a T, and the crux immissa (the 'Latin cross') shaped, as we generally know it, like a +. The 'St. Andrew's cross' (crux decussata), shaped like an X, was of much later origin and of a usage much disputed. The cross used at Jesus' death was almost certainly the crux immissa, not only because this is the testimony of the oldest tradition, but because it is impossible otherwise to understand the setting 'up over his head' of His 'accusation' (Mt 27 37; cf. also ||s).

The upright (staculum) was of some strong wood and, after implanting in the ground, did not stand more than 9 ft. high. This was left permanently erected outside the walls of the city, only the cross-bar (patibulum) being carried by the criminal to the place of execution, where it was affixed to the upright. On this upright there was placed a short piece of wood (sedile or cornu) on which the body rested as on a saddle. Whether there was also a support for the feet (suppedaneum lignum; cf. Greg. of Tours, De Glor. Martyr. vi) is still in question. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

II. Religious: The infamy of such a punishment, together with the primary significance of Jesus' death in His redemptive work, quickly brought the crucifixion into prominence in the thought and preaching of the Apostolic Church (cf. Peter's early references to it, Ac 2 23, 36, 4 10, 10 39). The Cross thus became not only in its suffering and shame a mark of the self-sacrificing love of Jesus (Ph 2 8; He 12 2), but also in its infamous indignity an assertive symbol of the disciples' faith, in which they gloried (Gal 6 14), for which they were willing to be persecuted (Gal 6 12; cf. He 13 13), to which those of unchristian living were counted enemies (Ph 3 18; cf. He 6 6), and in which, because of its infamous character as a penalty, the unbelieving were scandalized (Gal 5 11) and found nothing but ridicule and contempt (I Co 1 18). From this it easily grew to be the term in which the work of Christ was most strikingly presented in its triumph over the condemnation of the Law (Col 2 14) and its consequent reconciliation of sinners to God (Col 1 20) and thereby to each other (Eph 2 13-16). In fact, with Paul it came to stand as the symbolic term for the Gospel of God in Jesus Christ, the proclaiming of which was his consecrated life-work (I Co 1 17; cf. ver. 23, 2 2, Gal 3 1; also vs. 10-13);

Altho Jesus' allusion to the manner of His coming death was unintelligible to the Jews (Jn 12 32 ff.) and to his disciples until they realized its necessity (Mk 8 31 f. and ||s.), His warning to His disciples of the necessary cross-bearing which their following of Him would involve (Mk 8 34 and ||s; Mt 10 38; Lk 14 27) was perfectly clear, in view of the crucifixions inflicted by Antiochus Epiphanes, Alexander Jannæus, Varus, and Titus. There is, therefore, no anachronism in the statement; while to Jesus Himself it was part of His prophetic consciousness of His death. See JESUS CHRIST, § 16.

CROSSWAY. The Heb. pereq., Ob 14, indicates the 'parting,' rather than 'crossing' of the ways.

CROW. See TIME, § 1.

CROWN: 1. Linguistic Usage. An ornamental head-dress symbolic of unusual honor or prerogative.

Crown, diadem, and fillet are used in the Bible without very strict regard to different shades of meaning. In general, the first of these terms takes the most conspicuous place among them. It is applied (1) in a literal sense: (a) to the round border or edge of objects like the ark or the altar (Ex 25 11, 30 3, zēr, 'rim or molding' RVmg.) and (b) to the headgear of persons distinguished from the ordinary as kings and queens (nēzer, II K 11 12; kether, Est 1 11, etc.; āfārāh, II S 12 30; διδάγμα, AV Rev 19 12; στέφανος, Mt 27 29, etc.); also to the emblem of priestly office worn upon the miter (Ex 29 6; cf. also Zec 6 11. Wellhausen and Nowack, however, think Zerubabel and not Joshua must be meant). Brides and bridegrooms also wore crowns as they do at the present day in Asia Minor (Ezk 16 12; Is 61 10, 'garland,' RV, but cf. mg.). Victors in athletic contests were crowned (I Co 9 25; cf. PRIZE). (2) Metaphorically, 'crown' is the head as that member of the body on which the literal crown is worn (godhōdh, Job 27) and also any cause of justifiable pride (Pr 12 4, 16 31, 17 6; Is 28 5; Ph 4 1; Ja 1 12).

2. The Royal Crown in Israel. The Egyptian and Assyrian kings wore crowns of definite shape, the former combining the two emblematic head-dresses of the upper and the lower country, and the latter using a truncated cone with a low projecting point on its summit. That the Hebrews had something of a similar nature distinguishing their kings is probable, but no data have survived as to its form. The material of crowns was generally some precious metal (Zec 6 9-15). The date of the introduction of crowns is fixed by Nowack (Hebr. Arch., 1894, I, p. 307) as the reign of Solomon. But if so, II S 1 10 must be regarded as due to a later working over of the narrative. On Zec ch. 6 see Driver in New Cent. Com. ad loc. A. C. Z.

CRUCIFIXION. See JESUS CHRIST, §§ 15-17.

CRUCIFY: 1. As a mode of punishment see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (a). 2. The term is used figuratively by Paul (Gal 2 20, 5 24, 6 14) to denote his own moral unity with Christ's death as a death unto sin, and by the author of He (6 6) to show the terrible nature of the sin of apostasy. (See Cross, II). E. E. N.

CRUSE: The rendering of three different Heb. terms: (1) bagbūq (I K 14 3) means a small earthenware jar or flask. (2) ts'lēhāth (II K 2 20), an earthenware dish. (3) tsappāhath (I S 26 11 ff.; I K 17 12 ff., 19 6), a bottle-shaped vessel, probably of metal, used on journeys for carrying drinking-water, or for oil, etc. In the N T, RV substitutes 'cruse' for AV 'box' in Mt 26 7; Mk 14 3; Lk 7 37. A small jar or flask of alabaster is meant.

CRYSTAL: In Ezk 1 22 read 'ice' (RVmg.). See GLASS; and STONES, PRECIOUS §§ 2, 3.

CUB, kūb (כוב, kūbh, Chub AV): Probably a mistake in the Heb. text of Ezk 30 5 for Lud (so LXX.), i.e., Lydia.

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

CUCKOO, CUCKOW. See PALESTINE, § 25

CUCUMBER. See FOOD, § 3; and PALESTINE, § 23.

CUD. In Lev 11 3 ff. || Dt 14 6 ff. the statement that the cony and hare 'chew the cud' is not in accord with the fact, but only with the appearance of so doing, as these animals chew their food.

CUMI. See TALITHA-CUMI.

CUMMIN. See PALESTINE, § 23; and FOOD, § 4.

CUN, kūn (כון, kūn, Chun AV): An Aramean city belonging to Hadadezer, taken by David (I Ch 18 8). In the || II S 8 8 Berothai is given as the name of the city. The identification is uncertain, but Kuna between Laodicea and Heliopolis, may be the place.

CUNNING: The various words rendering 'cunning' in the AV all have the general meaning 'skilful' or 'able to plan and execute' and are accordingly rendered usually in the RV by 'skilful.' In Is 3 3 the Heb. means 'wise' ('expert' RV). In Dn 1 4 RV renders yōdh'e' (pl.), 'knowing,' by 'endued with.' In Job 5 13 the Heb. nīphlālīm has in it the idea of fraud or deceit ('cunning RV, 'froward' AV). E. E. N.

CUP, CUPS: The exact form and size of some of the vessels called 'cups' in EV are uncertain. The ordinary drinking-cup was the kōs (Gn 40 11; II S 12 3) or ποτήριον (Mt 10 42; Mk 14 23). The qaswāh (I Ch 28 17; Nu 4 7) seems to have been a jug (cf. Ex 25 29 'flagons'). The gābhā'a in Benjamin's sack (Gn 44 2) was probably a large goblet (cf. Jer 35 5 'bowls'). The aggān (Is 22 24) and ṣaph (Zec 12 2) are both elsewhere translated 'basin' (q.v.). L. G. L.—E. E. N.

CUPBEARER (literally 'drink-giver'; in Gn 40 1-41 9 translated butler; cf. 'butlership,' Gn 40 21): On account of frequent intrigues and attempts at poisoning, the office of cupbearer to an Oriental monarch was one of considerable responsibility and honor. The loyalty of the persons who served the king's wine had to be above suspicion, and they often, like Nehemiah, enjoyed the esteem and confidence of their royal masters. The O T mentions the cupbearers of Pharaoh (Gn 50 1), Solomon (I K 10 5=II Ch 9 4), and Artaxerxes (Neh 1 11). L. G. L.—E. E. N.

CURE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, 3.

CURIOUS: To devise 'curious' ('skilful' RV) works (Ex 35 32) means to plan works requiring thought. In Ps 139 15 'curiously' means 'woven together'; the 'lowest parts of the earth' being the womb. For Curious Arts see MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 9. E. E. N.

CURSE: 1. In General. In the Bible 'curse' means in general an expressed wish or prayer for evil, i.e., an imprecation. It may be pronounced with reference to all sorts of beings, such as the day (Job 3 8). When its object is God it is tantamount to blasphemy (bārakh [in Piel] Job 1 5, 11, 2 5, 9, AV 'renounce' RV). More frequently, however, it is a prayer addressed to God for some evil toward another person or thing. As such it may be as vague as a mere oath or invocation of the Divine name, and is properly translated by the English oath (Jg 17 2; Is 65 15 ['oath' RVmg]).

2. The law of the ban. More specifically a curse is an act of dedication. Anything (primarily objects taken in war) may be devoted to God. Such an act carried with it the prohibition of appropriating things thus devoted to private uses (herem Lv 27 28, etc.). According to a primitive Semitic custom, the inhabitants and goods of a city or territory in time of war were vowed to God as the Lord of Battles and when conquered devoted to Him, each according to its nature. Men and animals were slaughtered in sacrifice (Dt 20 12-14; Jos 6 25 ff.). But virgins and children were redeemed (Nu 31 7 ff.; Dt 21 11 ff.). Things capable of being burned were consigned to the flames (Dt 7 25), and incombustible objects such as metals were taken into the Temple (Jos 6 24). Whoever violated the law of the curse ('devoted thing') was himself made a curse (cf. Achan, Jos 6 18, 7 1 ff.).

3. Destruction of the Accursed. From the destruction which followed the ban the accursed thing (Jos 6 17, 7 12) was viewed simply as that which was consigned to destruction. The Canaanites were thus put under the ban of extermination (Jos 2 10, 6 17, 'devoted,' RVmg.). The conception in this form is transferred to the N T as anathema (Gal 1 8 f.; Ro 9 3). When Christ is said to have become a curse (Gal 3 13) it is because according to the Law (Dt 21 23) the mode of death which He suffered rendered its subject accursed (devoted his body to destruction). 'Curse' and 'accursed' seem to be used here as exact synonyms. A. C. Z.

CURTAIN: The curtain was a much more necessary and familiar piece of household furniture in Oriental life than elsewhere, especially in the transition from the tent of the nomad to the house of a more settled condition of society. Accordingly it is of frequent occurrence in poetic composition as the symbol of that which either hides or adorns. Of the latter use Is 40 22 'geuze' RV; Ps 104 2, and of the former Jer 4 20, 10 20, are illustrations. See also TABERNACLE, § 3. A. C. Z.

CUSH, kušh (כּוּשׁ, kūsh): I. 1. A descendant of Noah, the eldest son of Ham (Gn 10 6, etc.; I Ch 1 8). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §12. 2. The name of a Benjamite (Ps 7, title) supposed to be the enemy (of David) referred to in the Psalm. A. C. Z.

II. The name of a country. Until recently it was thought that all the occurrences of this word in the Heb. O T (except possibly in Gn 2 10) referred to the same country, viz., Ethiopia, consequently it is often so translated (e.g., Is 11 11, 18 1, etc.). But recent researches (especially by Winckler; cf. KAT 3 p. 144 ff.) have made it probable that two districts were known both to the Assyrians and to the Hebrews under the same name, 'Cush.' One of them was Ethiopia (q.v.). The other was in the W. and S. of Arabia, not always exactly defined. Winckler considers that the Arabian Cush is meant in the following passages: Gn 2 13, 10 6 ff.; Nu 12 1; II S 18 21; II Ch 14 8 ff., 21 16; Is 20 3, 43 3, 45 14; Hab 3 7; Ps 87 4. E. E. N.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, kū'shan-rīsh''s-thē'im (כּוּשָׁן רִישַׁתַּיִם, kūshan rish'āthayim): King of Mesopotamia, Aram-Naharayim (AVmg. and RVmg.), who oppressed the children of Israel for 8 years when a rebellion under Othniel, the son of Kenaz and younger brother of Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, put an end to his rule (Jg 3 8-10). It has been questioned whether there is a foundation in tradition for the story as thus given. The grounds for the doubt are (1) the improbability of the subjugation of Canaan at this time by an enemy from such a distance, and (2) the equal improbability that Othniel, a Kenizzite clan in the extreme S., should be the liberator (cf. Moore on Judges, in ICC 1895, and Burney, Judges, 1918). But the improbability of an Aramean conquest of Canaan is not conceded in view of the inactivity of Assyria just before the reign of Tiglath-pileser I (1120 B.C.). (Cf. McCurdy, HP and M. I, p. 230). As to the Kenizzite clan of Othniel, it is not certain that it was so insignificant. If there be no corroboration from without of the substantial correctness of the story, there is, on the other hand, nothing to compel its being set aside as untrustworthy. But see JUDGES. A. C. Z.

CUSHI, kū'shai (כּוּשִׁי, kūshī): 1. 'The Cushite' designates the woman whom Moses married (Nu 12 1); also of the messenger sent by Joab to report to David the death of Absalom (II S 18 21). Probably both persons were of Ethiopian origin (see CUSH, II). 2. The great-grandfather of Jehudi (Jer 36 14). 3. The father of Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1).

CUSHION: This term does not occur in the AV. It has been introduced into the RV (Mk 4 38) as the rendering of προσκατάλιον, 'a rest for the head,' ('pillow' AV), perhaps a rower's cushion. E. E. N.

CUTH, CUTHAH, kuth, ku'thā (כּוּתָּה, kūthā; כּוּתָּה kūthāh): A place whence the Assyrians deported colonists to plant them in Samaria (II K 17 24, 30). The same place is mentioned on the Assyr. inscriptions as Kutū. It was an ancient city 20 m. NE. of Babylon and was the chief center of the worship of Nergal, a god of war, hunting, pestilence, and of the realm of the dead. (Cf. KAT 3 p. 412 ff.)

CYPRUS (Κύπρος, 'copper'): An island of 3,584 sq. m., 45 m. from the coast of Asia Minor and 60 m. from that of Syria. A very fertile plain running E. and W. is bounded on the N. and S. by two mountain ranges in which there were formerly rich copper-mines that gave the island its name. There was also a valuable export of timber, which, together with other productions, made a large trade. In the O T its inhabitants were called Kittim (Gn 10 4; Is 23 1, 12; Ezk 27 6) from Kitti (Kition = modern Larnaka) on the S. coast. In very early days there were Mycenaean settlements on the island, but afterward the Phenicians took possession, altho side by side with them Greeks were found, who, isolated by the Persian rule, organized themselves, in dependence upon Egypt, in autonomous cities according to Greek polity (Mommson), their coinage being very well known. Paphos, at the W. end of the island, was the home of the wide-spread cult of the Phenician Astarte, the Greek Aphrodite. After the time of Alexander the Great, Cyprus became one of the most valuable possessions of Egypt. Taken by Rome in 58 B.C. it first came under imperial administration, but was transferred a few years later to the control of the Senate (see PROVINCE) and was in the time of Paul governed by the proconsul Sergius Paulus (Ac 13 7, 12), whose name has been with probability identified on an inscription. Jews had settled in Cyprus in early times and were there in large numbers at the beginning of the Christian era; in the reign of Trajan they massacred thousands of the native Cypriotes and were thereafter forbidden to live on the island. Soon after the persecution that arose on the death of Stephen, Christianity secured a foothold in Cyprus. This island was the first place visited by Saul and Barnabas, a native of Cyprus (Ac 4 36), on their first missionary journey. They landed at Salamis on the E., the largest city of the island, and traversed its entire length to Paphos, the capital, about 100 m. to the W. (Ac 13 4-12). Later, Barnabas, with Mark, returned to the island, evidently to carry on the work already begun (Ac 15 36). It was men of Cyprus and Cyrene who first preached the Gospel to Greeks in Antioch (Ac 11 19 f.), and the early disciple Mnason, with whom Paul lodged in Jerusalem, was a Cypriote (Ac 21 16). Nothing further is known regarding the history of Christianity in Cyprus in the Apostolic Age.

CYRENE, sai-rī'nī (Κυρήνη): The rich and powerful capital city of Cyrenaica, founded 631 B.C. by people from the island of Thera under Battus. C. was situated on a lofty hill 10 m. from the sea and was a center of Greek learning and culture. It was the birthplace of Aristippus, Carneades, and Callimachus. Its kings took part in the games of Greece (cf. the Charioteer of the group at Delphi). While C. fought successfully against the Libyans and Egyptians, it was worsted by Carthage and became tributary to Cambyses 524 B.C. The Cyrenaic Pentapolis under the protectorate of the Ptolemies was founded in 321 B.C. Under the Ptolemies C. became the home of large numbers of Jews (cf. Ac 6 9). It became an independent kingdom in 117; was bequeathed to Rome in 96 and with Crete was made a Roman province in 67 B.C. Its ruins are vast in extent. Excavations have been conducted in the region by the Italians (Notiziario Archeologico, II; Not. arch. sulla Tripolitana). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

CYRENIUS, sai-rī'ni-us. See QUIRINIUS.

CYRUS, sai'rus. In Persian the name is Kurush, and in Elamite, Assyrian and Babylonian it is Kurash, in Hebrew Kūresh (כורש), in Greek Kūros. The origin and meaning of the name are alike unknown. It has been supposed by some to have been of Elamite origin, but there is no positive proof. The Greeks preserved a tradition that the great king's name was originally Agradates, which is certainly Persian. If this were his name originally we know no reason for the change to Kurush, or Cyrus. By this name, in any case, was he known in ancient times, and still is. It is the only ancient Oriental royal name which has come into common modern use, perhaps partly because it appears in the Bible and partly because it makes no unpleasant sound in our ears. Whatever his name may be in origin or signification he claimed direct descent from one line of the ancient Persian dynasty of Achamenes. He was probably born about 598 or 599 B.C., in the kingdom of Anshan or Anzan, a small state under the suzerainty of Astyages, the Median king. There, in 559 B.C., he succeeded his father as king. In some way, to us unknown, war began soon thereafter with Media. In 550 Cyrus took Ecbatana the capital of Media and sacked it. He had at one stroke become ruler of a very considerable kingdom, and in Western Asia had only two serious rivals. These were Croesus, king of Lydia beyond the river Halys in Asia Minor, and Nabonidus, king of Babylon. When Cyrus had become king of the Medes, and inherited by this portions of the Assyrian empire which they had conquered, the outer fringes of his empire extended into Asia Minor as far as the Halys. Croesus perceived the danger of proximity to such a neighbor, and took what steps he could to protect himself against it. He formed alliances with Amasis king of Egypt, with Nabonidus king of Babylon, and with Sparta for the addition of her fleet. Cyrus decided to strike before the allies could combine. Battle with Croesus was at first indecisive, but in a second movement Croesus went down to defeat. The winter prevented further operations, but in the early spring Sardes was taken and Croesus was a prisoner (546 B.C.). From this year until 539 Cyrus marched and countermarched, fought, conquered, organized and solidified the greatest empire the world had then beheld. Cyrus had now become a figure of world dimensions. The Hebrews knew him and were confident of his future. To one of their mightiest prophets (Isaiah 45 1-4) he was the Lord's anointed, 'though thou hast not known me,' and the end of Babylon was predicted (Isaiah 46 1, 2 and 47 1-5). Nabonidus was much more concerned for the safety of his gods than of his kingdom or people, and when Cyrus struck he had no adequate defense. Babylon was readily and quickly taken. With it (538 B.C.) there had come into the hands of Cyrus also the Phenician and Philistine coasts with their hinterland, Syria and Palestine. He was, therefore, king of the Jews, and showed his friendly temper by the issue of a decree which permitted the exiles in Babylonia to return to their homes, and tho the permission was not universally accepted the influence of it was great and far reaching. Babylon was now one of the chief capitals of his empire, and the city acquired a new position of honor and power. Cyrus appointed his son Cambyses king of Babylon, and took for himself the title 'king of the lands,' signifying thereby the wide extent of his rule. For ten years he held undisputed sway from Ecbatana or from Babylon, the summer season in the former, the winter in the latter. In a campaign against the Parthians and Massagetae on a great steppe east of the Caspian Sea Cyrus fell wounded and there died. Brought by faithful hands, his body was finally laid away in a stately and dignified tomb upon the great plain of Pasargadae. The world could not soon forget his deeds, for it had not seen his equal. Humane to the conquered, as a strategist and commander in the field supreme, none that preceded him, whether Sargon or Thotmes, could vie with him, and it would be long ere any to rival him would be seen among men.

DALPHON, dal'fen (דַּלְפֹּן, dalphōn): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 7).

DAMARIS, dam'ə-ris (Δάμαρις—possibly Δάμαλις ['heifer'], a frequent feminine name): One of Paul's converts in Athens (Ac 17 34). The title τιμή, 'honorable,' given her in one N T MS. (E), may have been due perhaps to a desire to save her reputation, in view of the fact that a respectable woman of Athens would not have been present in such a public gathering. Her association with Dionysius may be intended to imply that she was a woman of rank.

DAMASCUS, də-mas'kos (דַּמָּשֶׁק, dammeseq, but also darmeseq, I Ch 18 5, II Ch 28 5, and dummeseq, II K 16 10.) 1. Name and Location. In the Egyptian lists of the 16th cent. the city is called timasqu and of the 13th cent. ti-ramaski (W. Max Müller, Asien u. Eur., 1893, pp. 162, 234). Assyrian, dimaski. (Etymology obscure): A well-known city located in the NW. end of a fertile plain which the rivers Abana (the modern Barada) and Pharpar convert into a beautiful garden spot. (See Map I, 1 H.) The whole plain is exceptionally rich in natural features, and must from the first have offered attractions to travelers between the Mediterranean seaboard and the Mesopotamian valley as a convenient place for rest, and also to the merchants as a suitable site for a center of distribution. Consequently a commercial center of much importance and a prosperous town grew up at this point as early as the country on either side was fairly settled. See ARAM § 4 (3).

2. Early History. The origin of the city is unknown, altho the belief prevailed among the later Jews that it was founded by Uz, grandson of Shem (Jos. Ant. I, 6 4). It is mentioned as existing in the days of Abraham (Gn 14 15). Eliezer, Abraham's steward (Gn 15 2), is called a Damascene. It is very probable that between the 15th cent. B.C. and the 13th Damascus was a subject of warfare between the Egyptians and the Hittites; but it was about the year 1200 that the Syrians (Arameans) secured possession of it and made it the capital of their kingdom. In the days of David the city as well as the kingdom of which it was the capital was made subject to Israel (II S 8 5). But this relationship could not have lasted very long, for soon afterward (c. 950) Rezon (Hezion), son of Elhadad, established a strong dynastic rule at Damascus (I K 11 23-25), which lasted until the complete collapse of Syria under the irresistible blows of the Assyrian power in 732.

3. Later History. Rezon was succeeded by Tabrimon (I K 15 18), of whom, however, nothing more is known than that he was the father of Benhadad I (c. 900). Benhadad helped Asa against Baasha and later made war against and defeated Omri of Israel (I K 20 34). Benhadad II (870-844, Hadadcozer in the inscriptions of Shalmancozer II) came into conflict with Ahab and was by him defeated at the battle of Aphek and compelled to yield the king of Israel the right to 'make streets' (i.e., bazaars) for himself in D. Shortly after this, Benhadad put himself at the head of a confederacy including Israel and other neighboring states, which was designed to stem the growing power of Assyria in Western Asia. But in this plan the confederacy completely failed, being defeated at the decisive battle of Karkar (854). These reverses undoubtedly rendered Benhadad unpopular in his own realm. Finally he was slain by Hazael, who assumed his place on the throne (II K 8 15). Under Hazael (844-813) the prestige of D. revived in spite of two defeats sustained at the hands of Shalmancozer II (843 and 840). In his wars with Jehu, this king succeeded in wresting from Israel the territory E. of the Jordan and S. as far as the river Arnon (II K 10 32 f.; Am 1 3) and threatened Judah into paying him a large tribute (II K 12 17 f.). Hazael's son and successor (Ben-hadad III, or Mari, 812-770) was obliged to abandon the war against Israel and defend himself against Assyria. In the twenty years between 773 and 753, Damascus suffered five separate attacks, all of which resulted in the exhaustion of its resources. The immediate successor of Mari is not certainly known. The names of Tabeel and Tabrimon II both occur (770-740). It was under Rezon (740-732) that Damascus finally succumbed to the attacks of Tiglath-pileser III. Its beautiful territory was devastated, its people taken into captivity, and its king put to death (Schrader, COT. I, 252).

4. Damascus from 732 Onward. For the next five centuries Damascus was simply the residence of Assyrian, Babylonian, or Persian governors. Biblical allusions to it are scarce and doubtful (Jer 49 23-27; Ezk 47 16 ff., 48 1). In the Greek period it even ceased to be the capital of Syria and was supplanted in that capacity by Antioch, altho the Seleucids kept possession of it throughout. In 85 B.C. it was captured by the Nabataean king, Aretas (Jos. Ant. XIII, 15 2), and in 65 acknowledged the sovereignty of Rome. When the Apostle Paul fled from it, it was under command of an ethnarch. In N T times, there were evidently many Jews in D. (Ac 9 2; II Co 11 32; Jos. BJ. II, 20 2, VII, 87). That one of its streets which has acquired fame as the 'street which is called straight' (Ac 9 11) was probably flanked by pillars. The houses of Judas and Ananias (Ac 9 10 f.) and the window in the wall through which Paul was let down (II Co 11 33; Ac 9 25) are still shown in the modern city, which has been under Mohammedan rule since 624 A.D.

DAN (דָּן, dān), 'judge': I. A son of Jacob and Bilhah, Rachel's maid, and the ancestor of one of the tribes of Israel. See TRIBES, §§ 2 and 4. II. A city in the extreme N. of Israel's territory, once called Laish (Jg 18 29, 'Leshem' by mistake in Jos 19 47), but changed to Dan after its capture by a large section of the tribe of Dan that emigrated thence in the early days of the occupation of Canaan by Israel (Jg 17 f.). The exact site is a matter of dispute, opinions being divided between Tell el-Kādi, a mound from which flow two of the streams that unite to form the Nahr Leddan, or 'Little Jordan,' and Banias, the ancient Paneas, also called Cæsarea Philippi. See Map IV, E 4, F 4. The fact that the Arabic Kādi is the equivalent of the Hebrew dān is strongly in favor of the site of Tell el-Kādi, and with this agree express statements in Jos. Ant. I, 10 1, V, 31, VIII, 84; BJ. IV, 1 1 and in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome which locate Dan at the source of the 'lesser' Jordan and about 4 m. from Paneas. For the argument for the site of Paneas see

G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 472 f. Dan was counted the northern limit of Israel's territory, 'from Dan to Beersheba,' meaning the whole extent of Israel N. to S. (I S 3 20, etc.). At Dan was one of the most ancient sanctuaries in Israel, over which Jonathan, a grandson of Moses, was said to have first presided (Jg 18 30). As situated near a large spring (the mound being that of an extinct volcano), it was probably always considered a sacred spot. Here, at a later time, was placed one of the two golden calves made by Jeroboam I (I K 12 20). E. E. N.

DAN, DANITE. See TRIBES, § 4.

DANCE: Throughout the O T period down to the Greek era, the dancing in vogue among the Hebrews was predominantly a religious exercise. In very ancient times it was customary for worshipers to engage in a joyous religious procession around the sacred tree or other sacred symbol. (See accompanying illustrations.)

The common word for dance, māhōl, m'hōlāh (from hāl, 'to move in a circle,' 'to twist') refers to such circular rhythmic movement (Ex 15 20, 32 19; Jg 11 34, 21 21; I S 21 11, 29 5). This dancing was generally accompanied by music and song. It was engaged in by men, or more often women, or both together (cf. Ps 68 25), frequently in two antiphonal companies (cf. Song 6 13 RVmg.). Other words for dancing as kāvar, 'to turn' (II S 6 religious 'feast' [cf. Ex 5 1], is derived) is evidence for the original religious character of dancing. During the Greek period the Jews became acquainted with professional dancing women, and sometimes did not hesitate to imitate them (cf. Mt 14 6). But the dances most loved by the people retained their primitive character of pure and joyous simplicity. Social dancing, as practised to-day in the Occident, was unknown to the Hebrews. DANIEL (דָּנִיֵּאל, dāniyyē'l), 'God is my judge':

1. Son of David and Abigail, the Carmelitess (I Ch 3 1). 2. Son of Ithamar, one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Ezr 8 2; Neh 10 6). 3. A sage whose reputation entitled him to be classed with Noah and Job (Ezk 14 14, 20). In addition to his exemplary piety, he had also acquired a great name for his exceptional wisdom (Ezk 28 3). There is no valid reason for distrusting the traditional identification of this Daniel with the Daniel of the book bearing that name. Neither is there any other man of the name mentioned by an earlier writer (except 1 and 2 as above). Outside the book, however, the three references in Ezekiel are the only ones made to him until a very much later time (I Mac 2 59 f.; Mt 24 15 [Mt 13 14]; Jos. Ant. X, 27). But the name of Daniel became the rallying-point of apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings (Bel and the Dragon; History of Susannah; Prayer of Azariah; Song of the Three Children; cf. also Fabricius, Cod. V. T., i, 1124).

DANIEL, BOOK OF. 1. Contents. Part I. This book consists of two parts easily distinguishable. The first part (chs. 1-6) is narrative in form and has for its theme Daniel as a Jew loyal to the Levitical law, a sage and interpreter of dreams; the subject of the second (chs. 7-12) is a series of visions seen by him. The first part opens with a portraiture of D. and of three young Jewish nobles, who because of ceremonial scruples refused at Babylon to eat the king's food and were prospered for their fidelity to the ceremonial law (ch. 1). This incident is followed by an account of Daniel's successful interpretation of Nebuchadrezzar's dream of the composite image (ch. 2). Next comes the story of the refusal of D. and his three associates to worship the image set up by the king and their subjection to the ordeal of the fiery furnace (ch. 3). D. is then pictured as interpreting the king's dream of a tree (ch. 4). He also plainly explains the meaning of the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's banquet (ch. 5), and is promoted by Darius the Mede, but on account of envy is subjected to the ordeal of the lions' den (ch. 6).

2. Part II. The second part of the book contains an account of four great visions seen by D. The first is an apocalyptic representation of the four great world powers (Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Persian and Macedonian or Greco-Syrian) in the form of four beasts, followed by the establishment of the 'people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom' (ch. 7). The second vision (also apocalyptic) pictures Alexander the Great in the form of a he-goat who overcame the ram (the Persian Empire). From one of the four divisions of the Greek Empire a king arises who proceeds to desecrate the sanctuary (ch. 8). The third vision is given in answer to a prayer of penitence and is cast in the form of a Divine communication through the angel Gabriel, which concerns the Messianic Kingdom to come in 70 weeks (ch. 9). The fourth vision is given by direct angelic visitation assuring D. of God's love for His faithful people and detailing the course of events under the tyrannical and sacrilegious king of the N., Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 175-165 B.C., chs. 10-12).

3. Language. One striking feature of the book is its bilingual character. Chs. 2 4-7 28 is in Aramaic, all the rest in Hebrew. To account for this fact, some think (Meinhold, Kom. z. B. Dn., in Strack-Zückler, pp. 261, 262) that Dn is drawn from sources of which the first, an Aramaic document of c. 300 B.C., furnishes the basis of chs. 1-6, and the second, a Hebrew work of the Maccabean Age, makes up chs. 7-12. Another explanation is to the effect that the original Hebrew of this portion of D. was lost and the gap filled up by the adoption of a later Aramaic version. A third attempted explanation is the theory that the speech of the Chaldean magicians in 2 4 is given in their own language. But as the conversation with the Chaldeans is so brief, the continuation of the narrative in the Aramaic dialect is on this theory unaccounted for. As against these grounds a more satisfying explanation may be found in a comparative use of the two languages at the time of the composition of the book. If this be fixed in a period when Hebrew was being largely supplanted by Aramaic in popular usage, the author resorted to the more intelligible dialect in portraying affairs in Babylonia and turned to the less familiar Hebrew when desirous of limiting the circle of those who could understand his meaning; i.e., in the more purely apocalyptic sections of his book. As this dealt with current affairs, the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Syrian authorities would be thus lessened. At the same time the encouragement and confidence in a speedy relief would be imparted to the narrower circle of the faithful.

4. Date and Authorship. Strictly speaking Dn is anonymous. In this it differs from Is, Jer, and Ezk. So far as it contains any traces of the date of its origin and its authorship, the proper use of these data will depend upon a correct conception of its literary form. The difficulty of the problem concerning the date and authorship of the book is much relieved when it is realized that Dn is an apocalypse, written according to the current methods of composition governing the writing of apocalyptic productions. It is characteristic of apocalypses in general that their authors transfer themselves back to the times of great God-fearing men and by impersonating them endeavor to convey their messages to their own generation. In so doing they embody such knowledge as they possess of the age and environment of their heroes. In no case, however, do they, on this supposition, aim to produce the impression that their work is that of the sage himself.

This is the conclusion reached in recent times from the study of Apocalyptic literature (q.v.). It has led to the belief that Dn is the work of a Jewish patriot of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, who aims to address his contemporary fellow-Israelites in an apocalypse.

5. The Exilic Date. The earlier understanding of Dn was that a prophet of the name had written during the Exile. The argument for this view is based chiefly on the alleged traditional acceptance of it as such from the earliest days. It is, however, also supported by such features of it as come into view in the effort to defend this traditional theory against attacks from the critical view-points. The weakness of the argument is that the tradition, when traced to its earliest date, becomes quite uncertain. The Baba-Bathra (146) ascribes the writing of Dn not to D. but, along with that of some other books, to 'men of the great synagog.' The first portion of the book, at least, bears out the assertion that D. is rather the hero and subject of it than the author. Even the second part lays no claim to have been written by Dn but is incorporated as a report of Dn's words by the author (cf. 7, 1 ff.). Of the latest advocates of this position the ablest are C. H. H. Wright, Daniel and his Prophecies (1906); Kennedy, Daniel from the Christian Point of View (1898); R. Dick Wilson, Stud. in the Bk of Dn. (1917).

6. The Maccabean Date. External Evidence. The Maccabean date of Dn is supported by considerations both external and internal. Of the former (1) the place of the book in the Hebrew canon between Esther and Ezra in the group of Hagiographa, and not with the prophets, shows that it was composed after the second group of the canon (the N'bhī'im) had been closed. The effort to break the force of this fact by pointing to the Psalter, which is also put among the Hagiographa, altho completed before the second division of the canon had been closed, is unavailing, because from the nature of the case the Book of Psalms could not have been put either in the first division (Pentateuch) or in the second (Prophets). A better analogy is furnished by the Book of Jonah, which, altho in every respect exactly like Dn, found a place among the prophets simply because it was composed before the collection of the N'bhī'im had been completed. (2) The silence of Ben Sira (c. 180 B.C.) regarding the prophet indicates that D. was not prominently before the mind of the faithful Hebrew, as would have been the case had such an account of him as Dn presents then been published (cf. Sir ch. 49). According to Ben Sira no man has arisen like Joseph since Joseph's day, but as Koenig points out (Einl., p. 386) D. is such a perfect analog to Joseph, especially in the matter of rising to a first place in a foreign realm because of the successful interpretation of dreams, that the failure to recognize him is unaccountable upon the Exilic dating of the book. (3) The total absence of any trace of the influence of Dn upon subsequent affairs is also a fact not accounted for by the theory of its Exilic date.

7. Internal Evidence, Historical Aspects. The internal grounds for the Maccabean date may be grouped as (1) those which are drawn from the nature of the historical details included in the book. These show that to the author the conditions of the Exile were not the familiar environment of his own day but an atmosphere and surrounding into which he had mentally transferred himself. On the other hand, the history of the Maccabean Age as reflected in the book is minute and accurate (cf. Farrar on Dn in Expositor's Bible, pp. 38-62). (2) The fact that the author touches upon the conditions of the Exile passes over the entire period between Cyrus and Alexander, and, glancing at that conqueror as a landmark, proceeds at once into a minute description of events during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes is accounted for best by the Maccabean dating of the book. The historical conditions of the Exile were necessary as the literary framework for this great hero. The intermediate period was irrelevant and therefore omitted. The details of the Maccabean Age were introduced because they were of all-absorbing interest. Upon the theory of an Exilic date such a selection of historical material is unexplainable.

8. Internal Evidence: Linguistic Aspects. The linguistic aspects of Dn point to the Maccabean Age. The language of the Hebrew section affiliates it with that of Esther and Chronicles, the latest books of the O T (Driver, LOT<sup>6</sup>, p. 504 ff.). Its Aramaic is not the Babylonian but the Palestinian variety of that language (cf. Koenig, Einl., p. 387; Driver, op. cit., p. 502; see also ARAMAIC LANGUAGE). Certain Persian words (about 10 to 15) fix the earliest limit for the composition of the book as c. 500 B.C., while the Greek terms for musical instruments used in 3 4 f. point to a date subsequent to 331 B.C. The explanation sometimes offered for the intrusion of these words in a book of the 6th cent. B.C. which assumes that they might be stray names introduced through occasional intercourse between Babylonia and the Greeks of Asia Minor is inadequate, inasmuch as two of them at least belong to a much later age. Šāmpōnyāh ('dulcimer,' συμφωνία) is first found in Plato, and psanṭērīn ('psaltery,' ψαλτήριον) by its change of l into n betrays the influence of the Macedonian dialect and must therefore be later than the conquest of Alexander.

9. Internal Evidence: Type of Religious Thought. The type of religious thought which prevails in the book confirms the conclusion pointed to by the considerations already adduced. The theology of the book is akin to that of the Books of the Maccabees and quite different from that of the Exilic productions or even from that of the writings of Haggai, Zechariah, Ezra, and Nehemiah.

10. Authenticity. If Dn was not intended to be taken as the work of the man whose name it bears but as an apocalypse in which the prophet's figure was used as the vehicle of a Divine message to the persecuted generation of Jews who lived in the middle of the 2d cent., there can be no question of its authenticity. For the question of authenticity can arise only when facts are discovered that point to a conclusion contradicting the claim of authorship made by a book for itself. As a book cast into the apocalyptic form, Dn could not but be put, in accordance with the legitimate literary principles governing such forms, into the mold in which it is found. Even such a statement as 12 4 belongs to the literary framework, and does not constitute a claim of Danielic authorship.

11. Canonicity. Whether Dn deserves a place in the canon of Scripture does not depend either upon the personality of the author or the species of literature he may have chosen for his message, but upon the recognition of the book by the spiritual consciousness of God's people as containing a real message of permanent value. This recognition was accorded to the book in the days of Jesus and by Jesus Himself. It has been concurred in by almost the unanimous body of believers. No investigation of a literary historical character can shake its place in the rule of faith.

12. Interpretation and Modern Use. The use of Dn as an apocalypse rather than as a book of history does not involve the denial either of the truth of such historical facts as underlie the composition or of the possibility and actuality of prophetic prediction in the Bible. Surely no believer in the omniscience of God will adopt Porphyry's negative position on the subject. An apocalypse, however, incorporating the point of view of an ancient devout man, may very well give an explanation of events already past as included and provided for in the plan of God. From the view-point of the ancient sage, such events, because they are as yet in the future, must be given in the form of predictive prophecy.

The chief teachings of the Book are: (1) The supremacy of the God of the Jews over all other powers human or supposedly divine. (2) The existence in the world of tendencies towards brutalizing and debasing human life and the breaking out of these tendencies especially in the sphere of civil government. Hence the great governments of the past are all symbolized by great and monstrous brutes. (3) The inevitable struggle against the evil forces and the consequent testing of the faithful. Such testing may occasion intense sufferings, as it did in the case of Daniel, was doing in the case of the faithful in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes and was bound to do in other cases in the future. (4) The ultimate triumph upon earth of God and the establishment of a universal and eternal Kingdom of God, which in contrast with the brutalempires of the world is to come with the Son of Man. (5) The reward of the faithful in this life, but if not in this life in a future readjustment of affairs (resurrection, ch. 12 2).

DANIEL, BOOK OF, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO: In the Greek text of the Book of Daniel are found the following additions: (1) The Prayer of Azariah and the Thanksgiving of the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace. (2) The History of Susannah. (3) The Story of Bel and the Dragon. The first of these has a much closer relation to the Book of Daniel than the other two.

1. The Song of the Three Children. This is an apocryphal addition of 67 verses to the Book of Daniel inserted after 3 23. The title does not fully express all the contents of the section, for it contains also the Prayer of Azariah (1-22), and a brief narrative (23-27) of the heating of the furnace, and of the coming of the Angel of the Lord to the rescue. Codex B has the heading 'The Prayer of Azariah' and 'Hymn of the Three.' It has been often noted that the prayer, which is really as if a nation was speaking, confessing its past sins and seeking mercy, is singularly inappropriate to the circumstances. So too the Hymn is quite as unlikely in such a situation. It is more like a litany, and seems to be modeled after Ps 136. Both are unauthentic amplifications of the story in the canonical Dn, that are meant to fill out the account of the miraculous deliverance of the three Hebrews by giving the prayer which one of them offered, beseeching God for deliverance, and the hymn of praise which they sang when they saw that this prayer was answered. It is entirely unknown who composed them. Their date also is unknown. They have been preserved for us in the Greek Bible and in the versions made from it. It has been much discussed whether the original of this section was Hebrew or Greek. The question is not easy of settlement, since every extant version is based on the LXX. As yet there is no unanimity in the matter.

2. The History of Susannah. This apocryphal addition to the Book of Daniel is entitled in some MSS. 'The Judgment of Daniel.' In Greek MSS. and in the Old Latin version it is placed before Dn ch. 1; in the Vulgate it stands at the end as Dn ch. 13. The Greek text is extant in two recensions, the LXX., and that of Theodotion, which differ from each other in some details. There are also several Syriac versions. The story is as follows: Susannah, the wife of a wealthy Babylonian Jew, was accustomed to walk daily in her garden. Two elders, who had been recently appointed judges, becoming enamored of her beauty, concealed themselves one day in the garden and when Susannah was taking her bath suddenly appeared and made shameless proposals to her. Her outcry discovered them, and to save themselves they publicly accused Susannah of adultery with a young man whom they had found in the garden. The innocent woman was condemned to death, but was saved by Daniel, who by sharp cross-questioning exposed the falsity of the elders and secured their punishment.

This narrative can not be regarded as historical. It is full of improbabilities. Ball (Speaker's Bible, Apoc. II: 325) following Brühl finds the origin and motive of the Susannah story in a tradition of two elders of the time of the Captivity, who by promising women that they would become the mothers of great prophets led them astray, and he suggests that in the time of Ben Shetach (100 B.C.) we can find reasons for the presentation of the story in the form in which it here appears with the trial attached. If this theory be correct, several important teachings are exemplified in the story. Julius Africanus was the first to dispute its canonicity. It is still regarded by the Roman Catholic Church as canonical.

3. Bel and the Dragon. These are two distinct stories which have been added to the Book of Daniel in the Greek and other versions. They both have as their aim, along with the glorification of D., the exhibition of the emptiness and deception of idolatry. In the story of Bel, Cyrus the Persian king discovers that D. does not worship the Babylonian idol Bel, and calls him to account for his conduct. D. denies that Bel is a living god, and offers to prove it. The test is to be made in reference to the daily offerings of meat and drink which Bel was supposed to consume. If it should be found that these were made away with by other means than by the god himself, then D. was to be honored. Upon the floor of the temple D. had spread a thin coating of fine ashes and after the food had been deposited before the god, the king himself shut and sealed the door. The next morning when the door was opened the food was gone, but the marks of human feet were upon the pavement. This led to the discovery of a secret door, through which the priests with their wives and children had entered the room. The proof was irrefutable, the false priests were slain, and D. was honored.

In the story of the Dragon the same question was at issue as to whether it was a living god. Daniel denied it and offered to slay him. The king gave him permission to try, and D. making lumps 'of pitch, and fat, and hair' gave them to the dragon to eat, whereupon he burst asunder. Babylon was indignant at the death of their god and compelling the king to give up D. cast him into the lion's den, where he was miraculously kept unharmed. The king's wonder at this led him to honor the prophet and to acknowledge the prophet's God.

Neither of these stories, of course, is authentic, but each is framed from material taken from current legends and ideas. The dragon myth had wide circulation. As in the case of the History of Susannah, the two Greek recensions, that of the LXX, and that of Theodotion, differ in details. The original language of these stories has generally been considered to be Greek. Gaster's discovery of an Aramaic text of the Story of the Dragon in the Chronicles of Jerahmeel gives strong support to the few who have stood for an Aramaic original and has started again the question of Aramaic originals for them both, but as yet a clear decision is not possible. Prof. Witton Davies in Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T. I (1913), gives reasons for rejecting Gaster's view and favors a Heb. original.

The Roman and Greek Churches accept these stories as canonical; the Protestant Church holds them to be apocryphal. J. S. R.—W. G. J.

DANJAAN, dan''jē'an (דַּנְיָאן, dānāh ya'an) (II S 24 6): The text here seems to be corrupt. The LXX. is unintelligible, but indicates that 'Dan' occurred twice. Some would amend: 'And from Dan they went round to Sidon.' Others would read 'and to Ijon' for 'Jaan.' E. E. N.

DANNAH, dan'ā (דַּנְיָה, dānnāh): A city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 49). Map II, D 2.

DARDA, dār'da (דַּרְדָּא, dardā'): A person famous for his wisdom (I K 4 31). He is called a son of Mahol, but in I Ch 26, where the same set of names occurs, he is called Dara and counted as a son of Zerah, son of Judah. Mahol may have been the name of a family of the clan of Zerah, a subdivision of the tribe of Judah. E. E. N.

DARIC. A Persian coin. See MONEY, I, § 5.

DARIUS, dā-rui'us (דָּרְיָוֶשׁ, dāryāwesh): 1. Darius Hystaspes, King of Persia (521-485 B.C.), the restorer of the empire of Cyrus, who followed the policy of the founder in his treatment of the subject states, and acted generously toward the Jewish settlement in Palestine which had been made under Cyrus. He commanded by a special decree, in his second year, that all those who had hindered the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem should cease their obstruction, and that money and material for sacrifice should be granted from the revenue of the province (Ezr 6 6-12; cf. Hag. 1 1, 15, 2 10; Zech 1 1, 7). 'Darius the Persian,' whose reign is mentioned in Neh 12 22 as the date of registration of certain priests, was probably also the great Darius. 2. Darius the Mede is named in Dn 5 31 as succeeding Belshazzar, at the age of sixty-two, on the throne of Babylon. In 91 he is said, in addition, to have been 'the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes' (cf. 11 1). Both of these alleged personages are unhistorical; and, judging from the character of the other references to matters of history in the Book of Dn, it is perhaps not necessary to assume that the author, writing nearly four centuries after the fall of Babylon, had any definite individuals in mind. Fortunately, the cuneiform inscriptions have given us the history of the Babylonian succession after the fall of the native dynasty. The last Chaldean ruler was Nabonidus, not Belshazzar, who was the crown prince. After the surrender of Babylon, and the formal entry of Cyrus three months later, his son Cambyses, as it would appear, was made king, but only for less than a year; thereafter Cyrus himself assuming the title and function. It is barely possible that some tradition of Gobryas, the Median general of Cyrus who occupied the city till his sovereign came to take possession, may have lain at the foundation of the references in Daniel. But this hypothesis would at best be only another illustration of the author's notion of the relative unimportance of the minute details of history. R. W. R.

DARKNESS: In figurative language darkness often appears as the symbol of mystery (Ps 139 12; I Co 4 5), of ignorance (Is 42 7; Ps 82 5), and oftener of moral evil or sin (Is 5 20; Mt 4 16; Jn 3 19). Cases of physical darkness are alluded to in connection with the creation, the plagues in Egypt, and crucifixion of Jesus (Mt 27 45), and the last day (cf. ESCHATOLOGY, § 39).

DARKON, dār'ken (דַּרְקֹן, darqōn): The ancestral head of a subdivision of 'Solomon's servants' in postexilic days (Ezr 2 58; Neh 7 58).

DARK SAYING. See PROVERB.

DARLING: The rendering of the Heb. דַּרְלִיךְ, yāhīdh, 'only,' 'only one,' in Ps 22 20, 35 17, where it is used poetically for one's life or soul.

DART. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

DART IN THE LIVER. See LIVER.

DATHAN, də'ḥān (דָּתָן, dāthān): In Nu 16 two stories, one from JE, the other from P, are fused. In the former, Dathan and Abiram, Reubenites oppose Moses' leadership of the people accusing him of having failed to fulfil his promises. At M.'s prayer to J' the rebels and their families are swallowed up by an earthquake (Nu 16 1b, 3, 12-15, 25-31, 32-34 in part). See also MOSES, § 9. E. E. N.

DAUGHTER. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 5, 6.

DAVID. 1. Name. The name David (דָּוִד, dāwīd) is probably related to דָּוִד, dōd, 'beloved one.' Some take it to mean 'paternal uncle' (cf. Gray, Heb. Pr. Names, p. 83). Others refer it to Dodo, the name of a deity.

2. Sources for the History of David. In the Biblical material relating to D. later and earlier narratives have been fused together in the accounts in the Books of Samuel and I K chs. 1-2. The account in I Chronicles is based for its main facts on the earlier Books of Samuel and Kings. While the Chronicler may have had some access to other ancient sources of information, most of the remarkable differences between his narrative and that in the earlier books must be laid to his unhistorical imagination. He projected back into D.'s time the fully developed liturgical and other arrangements of the Temple service in his own day. Compare, e.g., I Ch ch. 15 with the earlier account in II S ch. 6, and the differences in point of view will at once be apparent. See CHRONICLES.

We are thus practically limited to the accounts in I and II S and I K chs. 1-2 for our knowledge of D. This material consists, in the main, of excerpts from older narratives combined by the addition of editorial notes of various kinds. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

D. is introduced, for example, in I S ch. 16. The account in 16 1-13 is a natural sequence to ch. 15. But at 16 14 a new strand of narrative appears. Saul is persuaded to send for D., already famous as 'skilful in playing, a mighty man of valor, and a man of war,' etc. as one who by his playing on the harp might soothe the troubled spirit of the king. D. comes to Saul, who likes him, makes him his armor-bearer, and provides for his permanent stay at court. The sequence to this narrative is certainly to be found in such a passage as 18 6 ff. (note that in ver. 6 the correct reading is 'Philistines' [plural] and the reference originally may not have been to the Goliath story). But instead of this we have intervening the account of D. and Goliath, 17 1-18 6, in which D. is introduced, as if for the first time. Here D. is very young (vs. 14, 33), knows practically nothing about war (33 ff.), is unknown to Saul (33 ff., 55 ff.), and his place at court is due to his great deed of valor in slaying Goliath (18 1-5). Similarly 20 2 is irreconcilable with 19 1 ff., and ch. 24 is practically a duplicate of ch. 26. Such clear indications prove on close examination, to be supported by so many others that little difficulty is experienced in making out several separate strands in the composite account of D.'s career.

(1) One of these (A), the one beginning (so far as D. is concerned) with 16 14, is a sober, straightforward narrative, a fine example of Hebrew prose, in which the facts are left largely to speak for themselves. No attempt is made to idealize D., and the religious motif is not unduly conspicuous. Its outline is as follows: D.'s introduction to Saul (16 14-23). Saul, jealous because of D.'s success and popularity (18 6-8), attempts to kill him, first privately (18 9-11), then through the dowry demanded in the offer of Michal to D. as wife (18 20-29). D. now flees (19 11-17) after revealing Saul's murderous intent to Jonathan, who is surprised, but finds that it is so and takes an affectionate farewell of D. (20 1b-42). D. secures bread at Nob (21 1-7) and then becomes the head of a band (22 1-2). Saul slays all the priests at Nob but Abiathar (22 6-23) and hunts for D. from place to place (23 1-14). During these experiences D. marries Abigail, the rich widow of Nabal of Carmel, SE. of Hebron (25 2-42), also Ahinoam (25 43 f.) and on one occasion spares Saul's life (26 1-25). D. finally seeks the protection of Achish of Gath and is given Ziklag, on the SW. border of Palestine (27 1-12). Summoned by Achish to march against Saul (28 1-2), he is sent back because of the opposition of the Philistine nobles (29 1-11). Returning to Ziklag he finds it plundered by Amalekites whom he overtakes and routs and makes a shrewd use of part of the spoil by sending presents to leading men in Judah and elsewhere (30 1-31). An account of Saul's defeat and death follows (31 1-13) and of D.'s grief at the news (II S 1 1-16), also the beautiful elegy he composed on the occasion (1 17-27). D. now moves to Hebron and is chosen king of Judah (2 1-4). A message to Jabesh-gilead has no immediate effect (2 5-7). Abner gradually regains control of N. Israel for the house of Saul (2 8-10). War breaking out between D. and the house of Saul, D. is victorious and Abner capitulates (2 11-3 21). The murder of Abner by Joab (3 22-39) and of Ishbosheth, Saul's son (4 1-12), does not prevent the crowning of D. as king of all Israel at Hebron (5 1-2). The Philistines now attempt to crush D., but are defeated (5 17-25). A brief account of D.'s other wars follows (8 1-14) and the narrative closes with a summary statement regarding D.'s government (8 15-18).

(2) Interwoven with A is another account (B), in which D., a mere lad, is anointed by Samuel (I S 16 1-13) after Saul's rejection. D. comes into public view, still a mere youth and unknown to the king, by his triumph over Goliath (17 1-58). At the court he and Jonathan become fast friends (18 1-5), but Saul becomes jealous and tries in various ways to kill D. (18 12-19, 30). Jonathan brings about a reconciliation (19 1-7), but when Saul again attempts to kill him (19 8-10) D. flees to Samuel (19 18-20 1a), then goes to Nob and gets the sword of Goliath (21 8 f.) and thence flees to Achish (21 10-15). Taking his parents to Moab, D. next finds refuge in the forest of Hereth (22 3-5, 23 15-18). Later, D. spares Saul's life in the wilderness of Ziph (23 19-24 22). After Samuel's death (25 1), Saul, hard pressed by the Philistines, has recourse to the witch of Endor, in order to get a message from Samuel, from whom he hears his doom (28 3-25). These passages are marked by the tendency to idealize D. and to show how it was the Divine will to take the kingdom from Saul and give it to his successor. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF; and SAUL.

(3) The most of II Samuel is from an ancient history of D. as king in Jerusalem (symbol Da<sup>J</sup>), perhaps the oldest piece of consecutive historical narrative in the O T. This began, perhaps with 5 3, telling of the union of the tribes under D. The capture of Jebusite Jerusalem follows (5 6-10), then a notice of D.'s palace and family (5 11-16). The basis of ch. 6 (the Ark brought to Jerusalem) and of ch. 7 (the Divine promise regarding D.'s dynasty) belonged to this source. Chs. 9-20, practically entire, constituted a large section of this ancient history, concerned mainly with internal affairs. Only in ch. 10 (the parallel to 8 3-12) and 12 26-31 is any notice given to foreign affairs. Here 10 6-19 awaken suspicion as perhaps being a later insertion. The points included are D.'s kindness to Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (ch. 9), the trouble with the Ammonites (10 1-5, 11 1) mainly as a setting for the story of D.'s sin with Bathsheba (11 2-27), the rebuke of D. by Nathan (12 1-16), the death of Bathsheba's child (12 15-23), the birth of Solomon (12 24 f.), the successful issue of the war with Ammon (12 26-31), and the story of Absalom's rebellion which is traced from its beginnings in the trouble between Absalom and Ammon to its conclusion in the death of Absalom and D.'s restoration to his throne (chs. 13-19). As a sequel we have the story of Sheba's unsuccessful rebellion (20 1-22). The notice (20 23-26) concerning D.'s cabinet seems to have closed the account of D.'s active reign, while I K chs. 1-2 (in the main) probably formed the closing section of this history.

(4) Finally we have a little collection of material in II S chs. 21-24 of various dates and inserted by the compilers of II S in their present position. It contains (a) an old notice of a famine and the execution of the sons of Saul to satisfy the Gibeonites (21 1-14); (b) a group of stories of heroic deeds by D. and his men in the Philistine wars, in which Goliath's death is accredited to Elhanan, not D. (21 15-22); (c) a psalm of praise attributed to D. (ch. 22 = Ps 18); (d) an ancient poem, 'the last words of David' (23 1-7); (e) an old list of D.'s heroes (23 8-39); (f) the story of the census, with its disastrous result, and its sequel, the purchase of the threshing-floor of Araunah as a place of sacrifice, the site of the later Temple-altar (ch. 24).

Of these sources Da<sup>J</sup> is probably the oldest. It was written out of full information, in a spirit of impartiality, D.'s faults and limitations being set forth with no apologies. It was compiled not long after D.'s death and before the dominance of the tendency to idealize him, so marked in later Hebrew literature. Narrative A is of almost equal antiquity and impartial objectivity. Most of the material in IIS chs. 21-24 is also old and historically trustworthy. On the other hand, narrative B is late and belongs to the time when D. was looked back to as the ideal man and king. See the discussion of this narrative in SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. We possess, therefore, an abundance of good material wherewith to construct a history of the life and work of D.

3. David's Life. D. was born c. 1040 (see CHRONOLOGY OF O T), the son of Jesse, a farmer of Bethlehem. His early life, that of a shepherd lad, gave him opportunity to develop his musical talents. The border warfare with the Philistines early attracted his daring spirit, and he had already gained some renown when he was called to quiet the spirit of the afflicted king by his skill on the harp. At the court (such as it was) D. soon became popular. Between him and Jonathan, Saul's eldest son, a warm friendship grew up. In war D. performed such deeds of valor that in popular song his name was placed above Saul's. These things at last aroused Saul to a violent jealousy, and he saw in D. an enemy to his house and felt that his death was a public necessity. D. acted with forbearance and magnanimity in this trying situation. At last D. saw that he must leave court and bade an affectionate farewell to Jonathan. Gradually a band of like-minded spirits gathered about him, some of them wild, lawless men, a condition of affairs made possible only through Saul's inefficient government. These years gave D. lessons in war and strategy, in command of others, and in self-reliance that proved valuable in later years. At the end of this period D. had a strong hold on the affections of the clans of Judah, had materially increased his personal possessions, and was head of a band of about 600 trusty followers who placed allegiance to him above that to any other person or cause.

D.'s recourse to Achish of Gath was the only solution of a difficulty. Otherwise he would have become involved in civil war with Saul. By taking a position in the S. at Ziklag, under a nominal vassalage to Achish, D. was free from entanglements and could await the issue of circumstances.

With the defeat of Israel by the Philistines and the death of Saul and his sons on Mt. Gilboa came D.'s opportunity. But he moved cautiously. He was still the vassal of Achish. The move from Ziklag to Hebron, there to be recognized by the tribe of Judah as king, was not significant enough in the eyes of the Philistines to provoke hostilities. The Philistines were concerned with controlling Central Israel rather than Judah. The court at Hebron was not a magnificent establishment, nor did the power of D. at first appear formidable. N. Israel was not yet ready to accept D. as king. But when Abner, after five years of patient effort, had partially succeeded in putting N. Israel on an independent basis and had placed Ishbosheth, Saul's youngest son, on the throne, a civil strife was inevitable. The conflict lasted about two years and the inevitable goal of the whole course of events in Israel for ten or more years was reached when the elders or representatives of the tribes met at Hebron and there constituted D. king of all Israel. This was done on the basis of a covenant or agreement, the particulars of which are not given. Of this we may be sure, that N. Israel accepted D. as king not because he was king of Judah, but for what he was in himself.

There was no recognition of a suzerainty of Judah over the other tribes in this transaction. The Philistines now attempted to crush David before he had fully organized his kingdom. Two signal defeats (II S 5 17-25; cf. 23 13-17), followed by others (II S 8 1, 21 15-18, 23 9-12), taught them that Israel under David was supreme in Palestine. Excavations on Philistine sites are revealing that this people were very formidable; which only emphasizes the energy and ability of David in conquering them.

Unlike Saul, D. saw the need of a strongly centralized government. To this end a capital, centrally located and capable of being strongly fortified, was a necessity. Such a location was at hand in the old Canaanite fortress of Jerusalem (q.v.), still unconquered and occupied by the Jebusites. One of D.'s first acts was the capture of this strong position and the establishment here of his seat of government. See JERUSALEM §§ 19-24. Here he built a palace, otherwise improved and more strongly fortified the city, and, as adding both dignity and sanctity to his capital as well as doing honor to the national religion, to this place he brought the Ark, the most ancient symbol of the national faith.

D.'s wars with neighboring nations all occurred probably in the first decade of his reign. The occasion of the war with Ammon is explicitly given (II S 10 1-5). The Syrian wars were an outgrowth of the Ammonite war (10 6-19; cf. 8 3-12). The reasons for the conflicts with Moab and Edom are not stated. The outcome of these campaigns was to give Israel the foremost place among the small nationalities between the Euphrates and Egypt. The overlordship of Israel, involving the payment of annual tribute, was recognized by Edom, Moab, Ammon, and a number of the petty Syrian kingdoms to the NE.

Following these wars was a period, probably of ten to fifteen years' duration, of peace and prosperity. The central government was strong and efficient. The king was a supreme court of appeal, open to every Israelite, where impartial justice was sure to be decreed. The spoils of war and the tribute of conquered nations brought in a revenue more than sufficient to meet all demands without heavy internal taxation. The king was popular, the people happy and contented. Seeds of future trouble indeed were being sown, but that harvest was not all to be reaped in D.'s day. It was in this period that Nathan the prophet declared the unique significance of D.'s dynasty, a prelude to the prophetic view of the Messianic significance of that dynasty (II S ch. 7).

Absalom's rebellion, altho prompted mainly by his own ambition, was made possible only through the presence of certain elements of disaffection in Judah, D.'s own tribe. That Absalom won over to his cause Ahithophel of Giloh in Judah and that he organized his rebellion in Hebron, David's old capital, shows that it was in Judah that the opposition to D. was strongest, tho at no time was the majority of the population on Absalom's side. D.'s strict adherence to the terms of the covenant arrangement, in not favoring Judah unduly at the expense of Israel, may have caused resentment in Judah.

Into the details of the story so fully told in II S chs. 13-20 we do not need to enter. Nowhere else do D.'s greater qualities appear so conspicuously. The story of the quarrel between N. Israel and Judah after the defeat of Absalom's forces, while it reveals the jealousy between these two parts of Israel, also shows the strong affection felt for D. in the nation as a whole.

Absalom's rebellion occurred probably in the last decade of D.'s life. It was a severe ordeal and after his restoration D. entrusted most of the duties of government to others. This gave Adonijah his opportunity for his unsuccessful attempt to prevent the succession of Solomon, whom D. had already designated his successor. With the installation of Solomon, son of Bathsheba, as his successor, D.'s public life closed. Not long after he died, 70 years old.

4. Estimate of David's Reign and Work. D.'s work for Israel was of greatest importance. In a sense he but completed what had been partially accomplished by Samuel and Saul. But even with this reservation his fame will endure as Israel's greatest ruler after Moses. He not only reunited Israel and gave it for the first time a strong, well-organized, and well-administered government, but he gave it a new national consciousness. Under him Israel attained to a true sense of her national significance among the small nationalities of SW. Asia. It was due to D. that Israel emerged from the condition of a body of loosely confederated tribes to that of a nation acting as a unit along well-defined lines of national policy. The Davidic Age was an age of awakening for Israel, and D. was its incarnation. Under him for the first time Israel had a capital city, a central government, a standing army, a court, and a supreme court of justice.

That all this was without influence upon Israel's religion is unthinkable. D. himself was sincerely loyal to Jehovah, Israel's God. His battles were fought and his victories won in the name of J'. None of his public acts was marked by any disloyalty or unfaithfulness to J', as such things were understood at the time. In his royal sanctuary at Jerusalem the most ancient and revered symbol of the national faith was highly honored and carefully guarded. It is probable that the worship at this sanctuary was somewhat elaborate and dignified, and that the later view of D. as the founder of the Temple liturgy was not entirely without foundation. Through D. the popular conception of the power of J' must have been greatly strengthened.

Of the personal character of D. an estimate founded mainly on the objective account of Da' and of the old elements in A and in II S chs. 21-24 can not be far from correct. He was a child of his age, and his faults, as they appear to us, were mainly the faults of his age. This is the only just way to judge of his readiness to accept Saul's stipulations regarding his marriage to Michal (I S 18 25 ff.); of his harsh treatment of conquered enemies (II S 12 31, mild in comparison with those of Assyria at a later date); of his yielding to the demands of the Gibeonites for blood revenge on Saul's house (II S ch. 21), since by refusing he would bring the same nemesis upon his own house; or of his charge to Solomon to see that Joab paid the just penalty for his murders of innocent men (I K 2 5 f.). For his criminal connection with Bathsheba there is no excuse. D. sinned grievously and knew that he was doing wrong. But the real nature of the man is best seen in his sincere repentance at the rebuke of Nathan. That D. was a man of strong natural passions the narrative makes clear. But he was not a man of unbridled lust. His large harem was altogether in harmony with an age when all rulers had many wives, mainly from motives of state policy.

D. was a man of strong feelings. He was a musician and a poet. His lament over Saul and Jonathan (II S 1 19-27) is one of the gems of the world's literature and perhaps more truly reveals the real D. than anything else we know of him. One who could thus write of the man who had sought his life was a rare spirit indeed. Altho none of the Psalms was certainly written by him, he was capable of writing some of those attributed to him. (e.g. Ps 18).

D. was brave, generous, and magnanimous. He was a master-spirit who drew others to him and for whom they would gladly lay down their lives (cf. II S 23 13-18). He was a discernor of men and knew how to use each in the place for which he was best fitted. As a king he showed a kingly dignity and bearing, but was withal affable and approachable. Politically he was shrewd and far-seeing, and his military skill gave him victory in all his wars. His people trusted and loved him as a just ruler. In his family life his affection for his children often got the better of his judgment, and yet his bitter cry 'Would I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!' must touch every parent's heart.

It was then not without reason that later Israel looked back to D. as the ideal man and king, and made him the type of the ideal Head of the Messianic Age.

DAVID, CITY OF. See JERUSALEM, § 15.

DAY. The uses other than literal of the term day are: (1) A period of time (Dt 16 3b; pl. I K 10 21). (2) Some outstanding single day, such as the birthday of an individual (Job 3 1; Hos 7 5) or the day of death or destruction (Ps 37 13; Jer 50 31) or of a great battle (Is 9 4; Ps 137 7). (3) An apocalyptic measure of time (Dn 12 11, etc.; Rev 2 10, etc.), and (4) figuratively (Jn 9 4; I Th 5 5, 8).

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 9.

DAY OF JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 5, 36, 49.

DAY OF THE LORD. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 4-7.

DAY'S JOURNEY. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

DAY'S MAN (Job 9 33, Umpire RV): The Heb. term (יוֹמָן) means 'one who judges' or 'decides.' Job longs for some one to come between him and God and decide the case impartially (cf. the same expression in Gn 31 37).

DAYSRING (דָּוֶשׁ, shaḥar): Literally, 'the dawn,' in Job 38 12. The Gr. ἀνατολή (i.e., the 'rising' of the sun or a star) is applied in Lk 1 78 figuratively to the new light of the Messianic Era, full of spiritual comfort.

DAY-STAR: This term is applied to (1) the king of Babylon, because he had exalted himself to the highest heights (Is 14 12 hēlāl, Lucifer AV); and (2) to Christ, as the light-giver (II P 1 19, φωσφόρος). The heavenly body underlying the figure of speech may be Venus as implied in the LXX rendering ('Εωσφόρος), or the moon (as seen at dawn in its last quarter). E. E. N.

DEAD SEA. 1. Name. (יָם, yām, 'sea' [Am 8 12; Mic 7 12]; יָם הַמֶּלַח, yām hammelaḥ, Salt Sea [Gn 14 3; Nu 34 12]; יָם הָאֲרָבָה, yām hā'ārābhāh, 'the sea of the Arabah,' 'sea of the plain,' AV (Dt 3 17, 4 49); יָם הַתְּמָנִי, yām haqqadhmonī, east sea, former sea AV [Ezk 47 18; Jl 2 20; Zec 14 8]. In extrabiblical sources 'Asphaltitis,' 'Sea of Asphalt' (Pliny, H.N. V, 15 15; Diod Sic. 2 48, 19 98; Josephus often; also Σοδομίτις, 'Sea of Sodom' Ant. V, 1 22). Modern name (Arab.), Bahr-Lut, Sea of Lot (?). The name 'Dead Sea' is not Biblical; and in its N T there is no reference to it whatever.

2. Physical Features. The Dead Sea is the most striking of the geographical features of Palestine, or at any rate the most remarkable of its inland bodies of water. It is 47 m. in length and 9 to 10 m. in width. It is divided into two unequal parts by a small peninsula projecting from the E. shore in its southern part. This peninsula is called lisān ('tongue'), but offers no specially interesting features. The lake is surrounded by high cliffs on the W. side, rising sometimes to the elevation of 1,500 ft., and by mountains on the E. side, the highest of which reach up to 2,500 ft. above the water. It has no outlet to the S., and receives the waters of the Jordan from the N. The constant evaporation caused by the intense heat and the great depth of the valley is so rapid as to counterbalance the accession of water from the Jordan and the other affluents and to maintain the level. The basin of the Dead Sea is made up by the junction of two valleys running respectively from N. to S. and from S. to N., and becoming deeper as they approach each other. The soil of these valleys abounds in certain saline substances (chlorides of sodium, calcium, and magnesium, to which must be added certain compounds of bromium). These give the water its bitter and its salt taste and its oily consistency, as well as its great density. Owing to this last feature, eggs will float on the surface of the sea, and the human body is borne up, only the head showing a tendency to sink, which makes swimming difficult.

3. Incorrect Notions. It is an error to imagine that the shores of the Dead Sea derive their barrenness from the quality of its waters. The truth is rather that the characteristics of the water are due to the nature of the soil. As this furnishes so much mineral material for solution in the water, it is impossible for any form of life to flourish within the sea or on the shores about it. Even salt-water fish are unable to live in these waters. For the same reason, the mineral ingredients of the soil around the Dead Sea basin make it impossible for vegetation to flourish. The idea, however, that there is anything preternaturally pestiferous either in the atmosphere or in the water of the Dead Sea is an unfounded superstition. See also PALESTINE, § 12. (c). A. C. DEBIR, dī'bir (דִּבְרִי, dibhār): I. An Amorite, king of Eglon, one of the five who formed a confederation against Israel, and were defeated at Makkedah and put to death by Joshua (Jos 10 3 ff.)

II. 1. A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 10 38), also called Kiriath-sepher 'book-city' (Jos 15 15; Jg 1 11), supposed to be in the neighborhood of Hebron, but its exact identification with any modern site seems impossible (cf. Map II, D 3). In history it figures as captured by Othniel, in the forward movement of Judah led by Caleb (Jg 1 11-15). The account in Jos (10 38) contradicts the older tradition of Jg 1 and is of no historical value. 2. Another city of the name appears in Jos 15 7, located in the NE. section of Judah, but the text seems confused and the LXX. translates as if from an original דִּבְרִי, instead of דִּבְרִי. 3. For the Debir in Jos 13 26 ('Lidebir' RVing.) see LODEBAR. A. C. Z.

DEBORAH, deb'o-ra (דִּבְרָה, dibhōrah), 'bee': 1. The associate and inspirer of Barak in the conflict with the Canaanites under Jabin and Sisera (Jg 4). She is described as the prophetess who judged Israel during the period, holding her court at a place named after herself between Ramah and Bethel in the hill-country of Ephraim. When the oppression became intolerable, Deborah sent for Barak and together they planned the campaign which culminated in the overthrow of the Canaanites at the battle of Kishon. The victory won by Israel in this battle is the subject of a poem of great fervor and vivid imagery entitled 'The Song of Deborah' (Jg 5). (Cf. G. A. Cooke, The History and Song of Deborah, 1892. and C. F. Burney, Judges (1918), pp 85-176). 2. The name of Rebecca's nurse (Gn 35 8). A. C. Z.

DECALOG (Δέκα Λόγοι, the Ten Words, EVmg. Ex 34 28; Dt 4 13, 10 4, more commonly the Ten Commandments): 1. Two Versions. The moral code prefixed to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21-23). The account of the giving of the Decalog is recorded in Ex ch. 19, and need not be recounted. The text as given in Ex 20 3-17 has been called the Classic Decalog and has always been regarded as the summary of O T ethical teaching. Another version of it appears in Dt 5 6-21.

2. Arrangement. The arrangement of the moral precepts in the form of ten commandments was neither demanded by the nature of the subject nor suggested by logical or philosophical considerations. It is the result of deference to the popular regard and conventional value of the number ten, recognized at the time. There are traces of the use of this number in the construction of similar decalogs, e.g. Ex 34 10-26, the decalog pointed out by Guthe and further defined by Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex., p. 331; Smend, Altliche Religionsgeschichte, p. 47, and Stade, GVI, I, p. 457, and called the Jahvistic Decalog. Ten such decalogs are pointed out by Paton, JBLE, 1893, pp. 79-93). The ten words were inscribed upon two tables of stone, but just how many upon each table does not appear. It has been customary since the days of Philo and the Christian Fathers to make one pentad of the first five commandments under the head of 'Precepts of Piety' and another of the last five under that of 'Laws of Probity.' There has been further a difference of practise as to the numbering of the commandments. The Roman Catholic Church, following Augustine, includes the one prohibiting the making of images with the first and preserves the original number by subdividing the last commandment. Among the Jews, whom the Greek Church and Protestants (except Luther) generally follow, the arrangement naturally suggested in the EVV is held to be correct.

3. Original Form. The Classical and Deuteronomic versions of the Decalog differ mainly in the reasons annexed to the fourth and fifth, and in the arrangement of the tenth commandment. Upon the ground of these differences and the historical situation reflected, which shows not a ritualistic but an ethical setting, some have judged that the Classical Decalog was not a product of the Mosaic, but of the early Prophetic Age. The pre-Prophetic Age could produce only the ritualistic decalog of Ex 34 10-28 (so Wellh., etc.). Midway between this and the traditional views lies the theory that a rudimentary decalog was given in the Mosaic Age as follows:

1. Thou shalt have no other gods besides me.
2. Thou shalt not make unto thee any (graven) image.
3. Thou shalt not take the name of J' thy God for a vain end.
4. Remember the Sabbath-day to hallow it.
5. Honor thy father and thy mother.
6. Thou shalt not kill.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's home.

This simple decalog was then enlarged to its present form between 800 and 625 B.C. This view is supported by the considerations (1) that an original of this compass would best account for the textual variations of the Classical and Deuteronomic Decalogs, (2) that it may best be divided into two nearly equal pentads as inscribed on two tables, and (3) that it was best calculated to be remembered as a fundamental law. See also ISRAEL RELIGION OF, § 6.

4. The Decalog in the N T. In the N T the Decalog is recognized as of Divine authority. But Jesus called attention to the vital element in it both by his interpretation of some of its parts (Mt 5 17 ff.) and by identifying the substance of its content with the positive commandments of love (Mt 22 36-40, cf. Ro 13 8, 10; Ja 2 8). He thus lifted it from the level of a small collection of rules for a special people in a definite environment to that of a standard expression of the highest ethical ideal for all mankind. And the Christian Community has consistently used it as the condensed form of its comprehensive code for conduct (along with the Apostles' Creed as its symbol of faith and the Lord's Prayer as its symbol of worship).

DECAPOLIS, di-kap'o-lis (Δεκάπολις): The name applied in Roman times to a region E. of the Jordan including parts of Gilead, Gölân, and Ammonitis, with Scythopolis (W. of the Jordan). The boundaries of D. were never defined geographically, as it was not a geographical unit with connected territory, but consisted of city districts, most of which were contiguous. In the wake of Alexander's conquest Greek colonies were planted E. of the Jordan on those high plateaus which Israel had used for pasturage. These Hellenistic colonies had a common history: that of independent civic communities under the Seleucids and Ptolemies, to whom they owed nominal allegiance, and paid taxes and contributions.

Most of them were annexed to Judea by Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.). When Pompey conquered and reorganized Palestine in 63 B.C. he restored freedom to these cities, which about this time formed a league consisting originally of ten cities (δέκα, 'ten,' πόλις, 'city'). As the term Decapolis appears only in Roman times, and as the era of most of these cities began in 63 B.C., the League dates probably from the reorganization by Pompey. The cities were subject to the Roman Senate, but administered their own affairs, had the right of coinage, their own courts, financial budgets, and era. The number and names of the cities composing the Decapolis are variously given and the title was preserved even after other cities were added to the list. Pliny gives (perhaps the original ten): Damascus, Philadelphia, Raphana, Scythopolis, Gadara, Hipus, Dium, Pella, Gerasa, Canatha. Ptolemy's list omits Raphana and adds Abila, Abila Lysania, Capitolias (perhaps Raphana), Saana, Ina, Samulis, Heliopolis, Adra, and Gadara. Other sources mention Canata and Bosra (Bostra). Scythopolis commanded the trade-route and was the outlet to the sea for the Decapolis. Hipus and Gadara were given to Herod by Augustus, Abila to Agrippa II by Nero, but the League was not dissolved until the third century, when Philadelphia, Gerasa, Canatha, Canata were incorporated into the Provincia Arabia. Gadara was the birthplace of Philodemus (Epicurean), Meleager (epigrammatist), Menippus (satirist), and Theodorus (rhetorician). In the time of Christ the Decapolis was a great intellectual and commercial center, Greek being everywhere spoken. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

DECISION, VALLEY OF: See JERUSALEM, § 5.

DECREE: (1) In Dn 6 7-15, 'ēšār, 'decree' AV, is rightly changed in RV to 'interdict.' (2) In Dn 4 17-24 q'zērāh means 'decision.' (3) In Dn 2 9, 13, 15, and in Est, chs. 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, dāth means 'law.' (4) In Ezr 5 13, etc., and in Dn 3 10, 29, 4 6, 6 20, t'ēm; in Est 1 20 pithgām; in Jon 3 7 t'a'am; in Lk 2 1; Ac 17 7, δέγμα mean 'edict.' (5) In all other instances but two the term rendered 'decree' has the sense of 'statute,' i.e., something fixed by authority. In II Ch 30 5 dābhār means no more than 'agreement,' and in Est 9 32 ma'āmār refers to Esther's letter ('commandment' RV).

DEDAN, di'dan (דִּדָּן, d'dhān [pl. DEDANIM, ded'a-nim, DEDANITES]): A Cushite or N. Arabian people and the district inhabited by them (Gn 10 7, 25 3; Is 21 3, etc.) See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

DEDICATE, DEDICATION. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 18.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

DEED: In the account of the transference of a piece of property to Jeremiah by his cousin (Jer 32 6 ff.), there is a reference to the 'deed' (vs. 10 ff., Heb. šēpher, 'writing,' 'evidence' AV) which was signed by Jeremiah and witnessed by competent witnesses. As there is no statement as to an official record or register of the deed, it is probable that no such custom was in vogue, the deed alone properly witnessed being sufficient evidence of ownership. Deeds, with their signatures and seals were commonly inscribed on a soft clay tablet or block which was then dusted with sand and enclosed in an envelop of soft clay. The whole was then dried or baked. In the case of a clay deed the copy was inscribed on the outer surface of the envelop and duly signed and sealed like the original enclosed within.

This is the only instance in the O T where such details are mentioned, but it may be taken as a fair illustration of common procedure. E. E. N.

DEEP, THE. See COSMOGONY, §§ 2 and 3.

DEER, FALLOW. See PALESTINE, § 24.

DEFENSE, DEFENSED CITY. See CITY, § 3.

DEFILEMENT. See PURE.

DEGREE. See DIAL.

DEGREES, SONGS OF: A title applied in AV to Psalms 120-134 (Song of Ascents, RV). See PSALMS, § 4.

DEHAITES, di-hs'uits (דְּהַיִּטִּים, dehāwē', Dehavit, di-hé'vuits, AV): Apparently the name of a people (Ezr 4 9). No satisfactory identification has been reached. Perhaps we should take dehāwē as a corruption of the Aram. dihū = 'that is' and read with LXX. (B) 'Shushanchites, that is Elamites.'

E. E. N.

DEKAR, di'kar. See BEN-DEKER.

DELAIAH, di-lē'ya (דְּלַיָּה, dēlāyāh), 'J' has drawn out' (?): 1. A descendant of David, I Ch 3 24 (Dalaiah AV). 2. The ancestral head of the 23d course of priests (I Ch 24 18). 3. The son of Shemaiah and one of the princes who entreated King Jehoiakim not to burn the roll on which the prophecies of Jeremiah were written (Jer 36 12, 25). 4. The ancestor of a postexilic family (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62). 5. The father of Shemaiah and son of Mehetabel (Neh 6 10).

DELILAH, di-lai'la (דִּלְיָה, dēlīlāh): A Philistine woman, Samson's mistress (Jg 16 4 ff.). E. E. N.

DEMAS, di'mas (Δημάς): A companion and fellow worker of Paul, mentioned in the salutations of the Epistles to the Colossians (4 14), and to Philemon (ver. 24) and, consequently, known in Christian circles in Asia. At the writing of these Epistles he was with Paul in Rome. Later, at the time of Paul's second imprisonment, he forsook him and apparently gave up his faith (II Ti 4 10). Nothing more is known of him.

E. E. N.

DEMETRIUS, di-mī'tri-us (Δημήτριος, i.e., 'belonging to Demeter'): 1. The name of two Seleucid kings of Antioch. D. I, 162-150 B.C., and his son D. II, 145-138 and 129-124 B.C. (cf. I Mac 7 1-4, 10 87 ff.; Jos. Ant. XIII, 13 4). 2. A silversmith in Ephesus, one of the chief instigators of the movement against Paul, on the ground that his preaching interfered with the sale of miniature silver models of the great temple of Artemis in Ephesus (see DIANA), Ac 19 24 f. 3. A Christian mentioned in III Jn (ver. 12), where it is said that he is 'commended by all and by the truth itself.' He may have been the bearer of the Epistle.

DEMON, DEMONOLOGY 1 Early Hebrew Belief. Belief in the existence of superhuman good and malevolent spirits is probably as old as any form of religious belief, and is very possibly the survival of primitive religion. This is doubtless true in the case of the earlier Hebrews. The oldest form of such belief seems to have included 'hairy se'irim' (rendered 'wild goats'), which correspond in a way to the satyrs of the Greeks and the jinn of the Arabs (cf. Lv 17 7; Is 13 21). These demons were believed to inhabit the deserts. Another class was composed of the storm-demons, the shedhīm (Dt 32 17), who were supposed to bring destruction to the people. Most of these demons were malevolent and were supposed to have come from the underworld rather than from heaven. Belief in such was probably inherited by the Hebrews from their Semitic ancestors, if not from the ancient Sumerian religion. There was early a further tendency among the Hebrews to identify various diseases with demons, as in the case of the evil spirit that troubled Saul in I S 16 14-16. Generally, however, in the O T diseases are conceived of as sent from J' and are not attributed to demons.

2. Influence of Babylonian and Persian Beliefs. A new period of belief in demons began when Israel came into contact with the Babylonians and the Persians. All such survivals of primitive religion among the Hebrews were given new significance through the influence of the highly developed demonology of Babylonia of this period. Thanks to this influence the supernatural beings came to be sharply separated into two classes, the good, or angels, and the bad, or devils. There was, in fact, a tendency to associate with each the mythology of Babylonia. (See DRAGON.)

3. Development in the Greek Period. In the Grecian period, particularly in the two centuries immediately preceding the Christian Era, demonology developed very rapidly because of the general polytheistic spirit of the day. The Jews of this period, altho uniquely monotheists, saw no inconsistency in a highly developed belief in an unseen world peopled with angels and demons. They came to believe also more distinctly in the influence of these superhuman beings upon men. Angels watched over the birth and subsequently cared for the welfare of individuals (cf. Mt 18 10 and see ANGELS). The popular belief that demons (devils AV) caused sickness of various sorts, both physical and psychical, is well illustrated in the story of young Tobias (To 3 7 ff., 6 7, etc.), and in the statements in the Gospels of their entering into men and possessing them (cf. Mt 8 28 ff.). Diseases attributed to such possession were to be cured by exorcism (cf. Ac 19 13-16; Mt 12 27). This was particularly the case in nervous affections. The rabbinical method of healing was in accordance with the general processes of magic and involved the use of various noxious materials and magical names and formulas (cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 2 5). While it is not true that all diseases were regarded by the Jews of Jesus' day as caused by evil spirits, there can be no doubt that such a belief formed a very large, if not a controlling, element in therapeutics. Similar beliefs are still common among primitive peoples and among those nations like the Chinese which have not come under the influence of modern scientific conceptions.

4. Satan. These evil spirits came to be regarded as forming a kingdom by themselves with a supreme ruler, Satan. To cast evil spirits out from those whom they possessed was therefore an attack upon the kingdom of Satan (Mk 3 23 ff.). It was believed that when the Messiah finally came to judge the world and to save his people, he would be involved in a final struggle with this kingdom of Satan and would destroy it and the demons who with Satan would be cast into the lake of fire (cf. Mt 25 41; Eth. Enoch, 55 4; Test. Levi, 18).

5. N T Conceptions. The Christianity of the N T does not materially modify the belief in demonology of the people of its time. Jesus is represented as struggling with Satan in His casting out of demons (cf. Mk 3 27), and the power to perform the latter act was made coordinate in His instruction to the Apostles with the injunction to preach the coming of the kingdom of God (Mk 6 7). The demonology of the N T is not concerned with the moral character of an unfortunate man or woman. The demoniac was not necessarily a bad man. He was rather a diseased man, one to be cured rather than to be converted, altho the victim of Satan; in many cases the moral recovery followed the physical. The early Church believed that a man could come under the possession of an evil spirit as well as under that of the Holy Spirit. Sometimes so similar were the phenomena of the two possessions that it was impossible to tell just which spirit was in control of the personality until it was tested by the question as to the lordship of Jesus (I Jn 4 1; I Co 12 3, 10).

In all this there is no evidence that Jesus and His disciples consciously accommodated themselves to current beliefs they knew to be erroneous. They seem rather to have shared in the popular demonology, altho they never committed themselves to the absurdities which marked some of the rabbinical teachers. In this fact may be seen another illustration of the survival of elements of Judaism in early Christianity. See also UNCLEAN SPIRIT.

DEN: Palestine was hilly and abounded in caves and rocky fastnesses where wild beasts and robbers could make their hiding-places. References to such places abound in the O T. The den of lions, in Dn ch. 6, was a pit or cave where the royal lions were kept.

E. E. N.

DENOUNCE: In Dt ch. 30 is this word is used in the sense of 'declaring fully or plainly' the real meaning of the Lat. denuntiare.

DEPTH, DEPTHS: In AV often used to render t'hōm, which RV renders by 'deep' or 'deeps.' See COSMOGONY, §§ 2 and 3.

DEPUTY: An officer of lower rank than the governor of a province (satrap), whose exact functions are, however, not clearly to be defined from the data available. The word renders mitsābh (I K 22 47) and pehāh (Est 8 9, 9 3 AV; Ezk 23 6 RVmg.). See also PROCONSUL for N T references.

DERBE, dōr'bī (Δέρβη): A city of Lycaonia on the frontiers of Isauria. It is first known as the residence of the robber-prince Antipater (friend of Cicero, about 54 B.C.), who was killed by Amyntas who annexed Derbe to Galatia (36 B.C.). After the death of Amyntas, Derbe (in 25 B.C.) passed to Rome. It received the title Claudio-Derbe in 41 A.D. The location was first identified by Sterrett (Wolfe Exped. p. 22 f.). The early site is to be sought in the mountains of Hadji Baba Dag, the later site at Güdelissin. (Cf. Ramsay, Cities of Paul, p. 385 f.). D. was a center of early Christian activity, being visited by Paul, c. 46 A.D. (Ac 14 6, 20) and later (Ac 16 1). It was probably the birthplace of Gaius (Ac 20 4). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

DESCRY: A term that means 'to catch sight of,' especially from a distance, as does a scout or spy:

used in Jg 1 23 AV in the sense of 'to investigate,' 'spy out,' or 'explore' ('spy out' RV).

DESERT. See WILDERNESS.

DESIRE (noun): On Ec 12 5, see DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3; and also PALESTINE, § 21.

DESOLATE, DESOLATION: In the O T, especially in the Prophets, these terms occur frequently. In the great majority of cases they stand for Heb. words signifying literally 'terror or astonishment,' i.e., at awful waste and deserted condition. Only in two instances does the original term mean literally 'desolate,' i.e., 'solitary' or 'forsaken' (Job 15 28; Is 27 10). In a number of cases the Heb. means 'dry' or 'waste.' For all these 'desolate,' 'desolation' are satisfactory renderings.

The following instances need explanation: In Is 7 19 the meaning is 'cut off,' i.e., 'steep' valleys. In Job 15 34, Is 49 21, the Heb. means 'unfruitful,' 'barren.' In Ps 34 21 f., Is 24 6, Hos 13 16, and Jl 1 18, the AV is wrong, for the Heb. means 'guilty,' cf. RV. In Is 13 22 and Ezk 19 7 'palaces' is the correct rendering.

In the N T passages the idea is that of a 'waste,' 'desert' condition, except in I Ti 5 5, where the Gr. means 'to be alone.' See also ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

E. E. N.

DESTINY: As used in Is 65 11 (RV) the word refers possibly to a Semitic deity (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 21).

DESTRUCTION. See ABADDON.

DETESTABLE THINGS: The rendering of shiq-qūts (often translated 'abomination'), in Jer 16 18; Ezk 5 11, 7 20, 11 18, 21, 37 23. The term is always applied to idol-worship as something utterly abhorrent to the true Israelite. See also ABOMINATION.

DEUEL, diū'el (דֵּוְעַל, dō'u'el): A Gadite, the father of Eliasaph, a prince of Israel (Nu 1 14, 7 42, 47, 10 20, called Reuel in 2 14).

DEUTERONOMY: 1. Name. The fifth book of the Bible, called by the Jews elleh hadd'bhārīm or d'bhārīm (from its first words). The name Deuteronomy is from the Grk. δευτερονόμιον, 'second law-giving,' the erroneous LXX. rendering at 17 18 of the Heb. which means simply 'a copy of' the existing law. It was applied to the whole book by the Alexandrian Jews, probably because they considered it to be a restatement of the whole preceding legislation (in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers).

2. Synopsis of Contents. The questions of the authorship, dates, etc., of Dt can be discussed only on the basis of a clear view of the contents of the book. These can be exhibited as follows:

I. Introductory, chs. 1-4<sup>43</sup>

1. Narrative—a résumé of Israel's experiences from Horeb to the Plains of Moab (chs. 1-3)
2. A hortatory section, somewhat reminiscent, urging whole-hearted loyalty to Jehovah (4 1-49)
3. A minor notice as to cities of refuge (4 41-43)

II. The Law given to Israel by Moses, 4 44-26 (also 28 1-29 1)

- Introductory statement as to the place and time (4 44-49)
1. The Ten Commandments, with an exposition and application, especially of the first two (chs. 5-11)
- (1) The Commandments stated, the circumstances of their promulgation recalled, with an urgent plea that they be obeyed (ch. 5)

- (2) The fundamental principle that Jehovah is one God to be supremely loved and honored and obeyed (ch. 6)
- (3) No compromise whatever with the Canaanite worship (ch. 7)
- (4) Promises, warnings, reminiscences, and appeal (chs. 8-11)
2. The Code, chs. 12-26

The arrangement of the Code is unsystematic. There are a number of long sections dealing with important subjects, and on the other hand there are many brief sentences, each dealing with a specific subject. The following analysis is based upon that given by Carpenter-Harford (Comp. of the Hex., p. 474 ff.):

  - A. Laws Governing the Main Theocratic Institutions (chs. 12-18 and ch. 26)
    - (1) Centralization of worship (12 1-17)
    - (2) Apostasy (12 28-13 18)
    - (3) Ceremonial Purity (14 1-21)
    - (4) Tithes (14 22-29)
    - (5) Debtors and Slaves (15 1-18)
    - (6) Firstlings (15 19-23)
    - (7) A Sacred Calendar (16 1-17)
    - (8) Administration of Justice (16 18-20)
    - (9) Offenses against Religion (16 21-17 7; cf. (2) above)
    - (10) Judgment and Rule (17 8-20)
    - (11) Priests and Prophets (ch. 18)
    - (12) The Offering of First-fruits and the Tithe (ch. 26; cf. (4) above)
  - B. A Miscellaneous Collection of Laws (chs. 19-25)
    - (1) Administration of Justice (19 1-21, 21 1-9, 22 1)
    - (2) Warfare (20 1-26, 21 10-14)
    - (3) The Family and Purity (21 15-31, 22 18-30, 23 12 1)
    - (4) Kindness and Humanity (22 1-8, 23 19 1, 24 10, 21)
    - (5) A large number of other laws difficult to classify (cf. the passages not included above)
  3. Concluding peroration, with solemn warnings against disobedience (28 1-29 1)
- III. Additional Material, not Closely Connected with the Foregoing (27 and 29 2-34 12)
  1. The directions by Moses and the elders (ver. 1) or the priests (ver. 9) regarding the blessing and the curse (ch. 27)
  2. A supplementary discourse, reminiscent and hortatory, with warning and promise (29 2-30 20)
  3. The last words and work of Moses (31 1-34 12)
    - (1) Encouragement (31 1-9)
    - (2) Direction to teach the Law (31 9-12)
    - (3) Moses and Joshua at the Tent to receive a charge (31 14 1, 23)
    - (4) The Song of Moses, with directions concerning it (31 16-22, 24-30, 32 1-47)
    - (5) Moses commanded to ascend Mount Nebo to die (32 48-52)
    - (6) The Blessing of Moses (ch. 33)
    - (7) Moses' Death (34 1-12)

3. The Unity of Deuteronomy. With the exception of the last four chapters D. is marked by a generally uniform style throughout. But this fact is not in itself sufficient to establish the unity of the book as altogether the work of one hand. The analysis given above, would seem to justify, as a first result, the following points: (1) In the first place there are evidently two introductions to the Code. One (4 44-11 32) is very closely linked to the Code, while the other (1 1-4 43) is not. (2) Ch. 27 breaks the connection between chs. 26 and 28. (3) The whole section from 29 2 to the end of the book is marked by many abrupt transitions and changes and by much confusion as to the order of thought and events. (4) If small sections, such as 2 10-12, 20-23, 3 9, 11, 10 6 f., are evidently later insertions, it is a priori probable that other material in the book is also due to editorial work on it subsequent to its original publication. It might easily be concluded from the above that in 4 44-26, with ch. 28, we have the kernel of the original book. Until recently this was considered a well 'established result' of criticism. But minute investigations by a number of scholars have shown that within this apparent unity there are many cross-lines, indicating originally separate strands, or blocks, of material, now put together in new connections; and also that some of the material in chs. 1-4 has close literary affinity with that in chs. 9-10. No clear solution of this intricate problem has yet been proposed. The 'Kernel' spoken of above may never have existed in that precise form. It is still perfectly justifiable, however, to say that D. in its original form purported to give the fundamental law of Israel together with a hortatory address of Moses urging loyal obedience to this law with warnings as to the danger of apostasy.

To this nucleus there were added from time to time the material which brought the book to the form it had when it was combined with JE (see HEXATEUCH, § 20). When this took place excerpts from JE or other sources (27 5-7a, 31 14 f., 23, 33, 34 1b-5a, 6, 10) were inserted in its text. When JED were finally combined with P (see HEXATEUCH, § 30) a few additional statements from P were added (1 3, 32 48-52, 34 1a, 5b, 7b-9).

4. The Relation of Deuteronomy to the Preceding Books of the Pentateuch. The Book of Deuteronomy, whether we think only of the original kernel or of its final form, is a distinct work only loosely connected with the preceding Book of Numbers or the following Book of Joshua. At Nu 27 12 ff. Moses is ready to ascend the mountain to die just as in the case at Dt 31 14 ff., 32 48 ff. It is in only the few extracts from JE and P (see the preceding section) that the connection is made between the history in Numbers and that in Joshua.

The book, as a whole, makes no claim to Mosaic authorship, but the addresses and the law are referred directly to him. The nature of this reference must be estimated in the light of the following facts: (1) The lack of unity in the book, which limits the question to the portions assigned directly to Moses. (2) The peculiar literary style of these portions, which is very marked and such as to strongly distinguish D. from the other books of the Pentateuch. This is apparent, even in a translation such as we have in the English Bible, and is more apparent in the Hebrew. The hypothesis of the actual Mosaic authorship of both the material in Genesis-Numbers and that in D. involves an insoluble literary puzzle. A satisfactory solution is possible only when actual Mosaic authorship is posited in neither case. (3) There are discrepancies between the narrative of Exodus-Numbers and that in D. Compare, e.g., Dt 1 9-13 with Ex 18 13-26; Dt 1 22-23 with Nu 13 1-3; or Dt 10 1-4 with Ex 25 10 f., 36 2, 37 1 (as to the time of the making of the Ark). These are only a few of a number of such discrepancies (see the list in Driver, Int. Crit. Com., pp. xxxv ff.). (4) The narrative in D. presupposes the JE but not the P portions of the Pentateuch. This is true notwithstanding the discrepancies just alluded to, which only tell against identity of authorship. The general view of the Exodus-wilderness history and the events noted are just such as would be expected from one who knew JE, but felt at liberty both to quote it verbatim and to handle its contents somewhat freely. But in no case is any dependence on P evident, and the general view of D. is decidedly not that of P. (5) The kernel of D. is an expansion of the code of JE (Ex 20-23 and 34 12-26). The whole of this code (with the exception of the long section on penalties, Ex 21 15, 17-22, and 20 25 f., 22 29b) is taken up, enlarged, commented on, and added to in D., in such a way as to create the impression that in D. we have a revision of ancient law in order to adapt it more perfectly to changed conditions, i.e., to a more advanced social and economic stage of national life. The relation of D. to the code of P is very different. D., indeed, touches many points which are also included in P. But in many of these cases the legislation of D. is different, both in letter and spirit, from that of P. Cf., e.g., the law as to the place of sacrifice, Dt 12 1-28 with Lv 17 1-9 (in this same connection note the different views as to ordinary slaughter and sacrifice) or the law concerning the eating of the firstlings, Dt 15 19-23 (where the worshipers eat them) with Nu 18 17 f. (where the priests have the flesh as a part of their revenue). In D. all Levites are priests and there is no reference (except in the insertion in 10 6) to the Aaronic priesthood, while in P only the sons of Aaron are priests and the Levites are their assistants. The elaborate cultus-system of P with its emphasis on the Tabernacle (only mentioned once in D. [and then as the 'Tent'] in the JE passage 31 14 f.), the priesthood, the sacrificial system, finds no emphasis in D. In its sacred calendar (ch. 16 the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev 16 and 23) is not mentioned. These and many other similar facts lead to the inference that D. has no knowledge of the fully developed code of P and stands midway between the ancient legislation in JE and the later code in P, in which, naturally, much of the previous legislation would be embodied.

5. Date of Deuteronomy. Indications serving to give us a general date for D. (in its original form) may be found, in addition to the inference just noted, (1) in the relation of D. to the other literature of the O T. There is no definite trace of the presence or influence of D. in the literature of the O T before Jeremiah. The early writing prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, show no acquaintance with the book, nor do the early narratives embodied in Judges-II Kings, or the J and E elements of the Pentateuch. On the other hand, Jeremiah and the editorial material of Joshua-II Kings are full of traces of the influence of D. both in phraseology and in ideas. (2) In connection with the narrative in II K 22 8 f., where we read of 'the book of the law' being found in the Temple and of the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) based on that book. It has long been recognized that the reforms of Josiah were of just that character that D. might have inspired and that the warnings and exhortations of D. were just such as might have aroused the king to action. No other part of the Pentateuch answers to the demands of the situation in II K 22 8-23 25 as D. does. (3) In the religious conditions of Manasseh's reign (c. 690-640 B.C.), a period of religious decline, which must have caused much anxious thought on the part of many who were loyal to the religion of Jehovah. Such conditions would naturally lead to an attempt to restate and reinforce the fundamental principles of Israel's religion. It is likely, therefore, that the original draft or nucleus of D. was written in the reign of Manasseh, some time near 650 B.C.

6. Purpose and Sources of Deuteronomy. The purpose of D. was to set forth the true nature of Israel's religious foundation, and thus counteract the disintegrating and corrupting influences then so powerful. The prophetic teachings of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah had both broadened and deepened the views concerning the religion of Jehovah and Israel's true character. D. sought to combine the teaching of prophecy with the traditional practices of religious and social life. It was an earnest, serious, worthy purpose. Since Moses was traditionally considered the source of all Israel's law, and as there was probably a tradition of a farewell address by Moses, it was natural that the whole presentation was not only made in the name of Moses, but that he was represented as actually speaking it. In antiquity the standards of literary usage were not the same as they are to-day.

The sources at the disposal of the author (or authors) of D. were: the JE history (or histories); the traditional law, especially as it had been developed at the great sanctuary at Jerusalem; and the teachings of prophecy. All these sources were handled with freedom in consonance with the fundamental purpose to produce a comprehensive national constitution rather than a priestly manual or law-book.

7. Author. Naturally the author of D. is no longer known. It may have been the joint product of several writers, altho the uniformity of style is more favorable to single authorship. It is also impossible to say to what class the author belonged. He was well-acquainted with priestly law, but may not have been himself a priest.

8. Ruling Ideas. The religious value and significance of Deuteronomy are very great. Its ruling ideas can perhaps be summed up as follows: (1) The absolute unity and supremacy of Jehovah. (2) The centralization of all formal worship at one sanctuary (i.e., Jerusalem). (3) The heinousness and dangers of all Canaanite forms of worship and of all familiar intercourse with Canaanites (under these terms the pressing religious dangers of the times were indicated). (4) The definite regulation of the whole moral and religious life of the people by the principle of loyalty to Jehovah. These ideas are urged upon the conscience of the people with a fervor and earnestness that are truly remarkable.

9. Influence of Deuteronomy. After its discovery and sanction by Josiah, the 'book of the law,' i.e., the kernel of D., at once seems to have become very influential. It was probably studied by Jeremiah, altho he was not in agreement with all its ideas. It profoundly influenced also the historians who worked up the ancient records into the historical books now known as Judges, Samuel, and Kings (see above).

§5 (1)). In its later enlarged form it was the most influential book of exilic and postexilic Judaism, until the 'priestly' school supplanted it with a new and more comprehensive presentation of Israel's law, now known as the 'Priest's Code' (P).

DEVIL. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, § 3; and SATAN.

DEVOTED THINGS. See CURSE, § 2.

DEVOTIONS (AV for τὰ σεβάσματα, Ac 17 23): The Gr. term does not designate 'religious services,' but 'objects of worship' (cf. II Th 2 4); therefore, the AVmg. 'gods that ye worship,' tho a paraphrase, conveys the right meaning.

DEW. See PALESTINE, §§ 19, 20.

DIADEM, dai'-dem (from δια-δεῖν, 'to bind around'): A band or fillet worn around the headgear by the kings of Persia; hence a badge of royalty. The term is used in the O T (AV) to render (1) tsānēph, 'turban,' in general (Job 29 14 [cf. RVmg.]; Is 62 3). (2) Mitsnepheth, the high priestly turban, in particular (Ezk 21 26, 'mitre' RV), and tsēphirāh, 'chaplet' (Is 28 5). In the N T the Gr. διάδημα, 'diadem' ('crown' AV) occurs in Rev 12 3, 13 1, 19 12.

DIAL (דִּיָּל, ma'ālōth), 'steps': The word several times rendered degrees (AV) and steps (RV) is exactly the same as that rendered 'dial' in II K 20 8-11 and Is 38 8 (sundial, AV). The shadow is spoken of as 'going up' or 'down' the 'steps,' which were at least ten in number. Some have thought that a pillar on a pedestal graduated into a number of successive steps was meant.

DIAMOND. See STONES, PRECIOUS, §§ 2, 3.

DIANA, dai-an'a (Gr. Ἀρtemis, Artemis): A goddess of Ephesus, worshiped under the form of a meteoric stone (Ac 19 23-40). Originally a representative of the 'Earth-Goddess' type (familiar to the Aryans and to Mediterranean primitive religions), she was the great Asiatic nursing mother, the patroness of the sexual instinct, and the mother and nurse of gods, men, animals, and plants. She was worshiped under various names: Ishtar, Ma, Cybele, Anaitis, Artemis Ephesia. Her identification with the Greek Artemis was appropriate only in that Artemis was protectress of men and animals. But as the Artemis of historical times was always a virgin, never a mother, the identification proves that in prehistoric times the Greek Artemis was a mother-goddess, not a virgin, and that the virginity dogma arose with the worship of Apollo. The representations of the Ephesian Artemis in art and her entire cult were in no sense Greek, but persistently Asiatic. The famous statue of the Ephesian Artemis, with its many breasts and symbols, is an Asiatic idol, not conceivable by a Greek brain, for Greeks detested the ugly. Her cult was equally un-Greek, equally Oriental, wild, orgiastic, and impure. Girls gained dowries by religious prostitution in her temple, in which there was an army of eunuch priests, also priestesses of three grades (who gave rise to the Amazon myth), and hierodouli (male and female).

The priests' titles were also Asiatic (Μεγάβουλος, Ἐσσην). Associated with the chief of eunuchs, or archpriest, was an archpriestess. This Artemis was never really Hellenized, tho her priests and the Greeks of Ephesus tried hard to effect it, by associating the Greek Apollo with their goddess, by claiming that Apollo and Artemis were born and nurtured on the outskirts of Ephesus, by building Greek temples in her honor, by decorating them with the works of Greek art, and by introducing Greek games; but the goddess and her worship remained Asiatic. Still less appropriate was her identification with the Roman Diana. The Ephesia or Artemisia in the spring was her chief festival. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

DIBLAH, dib'la (דִּיבְלָה, dibhlāh, Diblath, dib'la th, AV) (Ezk 6 14): No such place is known and the true reading may be 'to Riblah' in the extreme N. of the Lebanon region, making the whole expression mean: 'from S. to N.' i.e., from one end of the land to the other.

DIBLAIM, dib-lē'im (דִּיבְלַיִם, dibhlayim): Father of Hosea's wife, Gomer (Hos 1 3).

DIBON, dai'-ben (דִּיבּוֹן, dibhōn): 1. A city of Moab, Map II, J 3, situated on two knolls covered to-day by ruins of no small extent and significance. D. was in the territory wrested from Moab by Sihon, which, when Israel conquered Sihon, became the possession of the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Nu 32 3, 31-34; Jos 13 8 f., 17). The presence of the Gadites in Dibon is witnessed to not only by the name Dibon-Gad (Nu 33 45 f.), but also by the Moabite stone (see MESHIA). It again came into the possession of Moab in the days of Mesha (q.v.) and was one of the prominent cities of his kingdom, as its extensive ruins still testify (cf. Is 15 2, 9; Jer 48 18, 22). See the interesting account in PEFQ 1913, pp. 57 ff. It was here that the famous stone of Mesha was discovered. In Is 15 9 Dimon is evidently a mistake for Dibon. 2. A city of Judah (Neh 11 25), probably the same as Dimonah (Jos 15 22). Site unknown.

DIBRI, dib'rai (דִּיבְרִי, dibhrī): The father of Shelomith (Lv 24 11).

DIDYMUS, did'i-mos. See THOMAS.

DIKLAH, dik'la (דִּיקְלָה, diqlāh), 'date-palm': A region of Arabia (Gn 10 27; I Ch 1 21). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

DILEAN, dil'i-an, (דִּילְיָן, dil'ān, Dilian ERV): A town of Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15 38). Site unknown.

DIMNAH, dim'na (דִּימְנָה, dimnāh): A Levitical city in Zebulun (Jos 21 35), perhaps the same as Rimmono (I Ch 6 77). See RIMMON.

DIMNESS (Is 8 22, 9 1 AV, but 'gloom' RV): The idea of dimness is in the original quite secondary and incidental.

DIMNESS OF EYES. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7.

DIMON, dai'men, DIMONAH, di-mō'na. See DIBON.

DINAH, dai'na (דִּינָה, dīnāh): According to the text of Gn (30 21) as it now stands, D. was a daughter of Jacob by Leah, and after Jacob moved from Aram into Canaan she was violated by Shechem, son of Hamor (ch. 34). On hearing of this the sons of Jacob, but more particularly Simeon and Levi, avenged the deed by slaying the inhabitants of Schechem and rescuing their sister. Nothing further is said of her.

The narrative in ch. 34 is composite, the oldest elements, in which the personal rather than tribal or political features are prominent, being from J (see GENESIS and Comm. on Genesis). The majority of modern scholars are inclined to view the Dinah incident as a piece of tribal rather than personal history, told in personal form. According to this view Simeon and Levi—tribes—had trouble in early days with the Schechemites because of some wrong done to 'Dinah'—a small Israelite clan. In the attempt to avenge this wrong, Simeon and Levi were not supported by the rest of Israel (34 30 f.; cf. 49 5 ff.). Some scholars are inclined to rule out all the references to Dinah as unhistorical (see Driver, Genesis, pp. 302-308, and EB. s.v. Dinah).

J. A. K.

DINAITES, dai'na-its: The older commentators regarded the Dinaïtes as colonists who were transported by Osnappar (Assurbanipal) to Samaria from Din-Sárru, a city near Susa. Recent writers, both historians and exegetes, are generally agreed that the word is an official title. The Aramaic term, which should be pronounced dayyānāyyā, means 'judges,' and consequently the Dinaïtes were Persian officials who attempted to hinder the rebuilding of the Temple by writing to Artaxerxes (Ezr 4 9). For another interpretation of the whole passage (vs. 7-11) which eliminates this and the other obscure terms, see Batten in ICC, ad. loc.

DINE, DINNER. See MEALS, § 1.

DINHABAH, din'ha-ba (דִּנְהָבָה, dinhābhāh): Capital city of Bela, King of Edom (Gn 36 32). No such place has yet been identified in Edom.

DIONYSIUS, dai'o-nish'i-us, THE AREOPAGITE, ar'i-ep'a-gait (Διονύσιος ὁ Ἀρεοπαγίτης): One of Paul's converts in Athens mentioned in Ac 17 34 with Damaris (q.v.). The writer of Ac is fond of magnifying the influence of Christianity among men of rank (cf. Ac 13 12, 26 28, 29, 28 8), which may account for the mention of D. here as a member of the Areopagus Council. According to Eusebius (HE. III, 4, IV 23), quoting Dionysius of Corinth (about 170 A.D.), D. was the first bishop of Athens. In the later tradition he is confused with St. Denis, the patron saint of France. In this way, perhaps, his name came to be associated with the Neo-Platonic Pseudo-Dionysian writings, which exerted such wide influence in the early Middle Ages.

DIOTREPES, dai-et'ri-fiz (Διοτρεπής) Described in III Jn 9 as one 'who loveth to have the preeminence among them.' He had evidently refused to heed the Elder's written instructions and to 'receive' the brethren. From the fact that he 'forbids' and 'casts out' of the Church, it is evident that he occupied some position of authority which might bring him into conflict with his brethren and the Elder.

DIP. See MEALS, § 2; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

DIPHATH, dai'fath. See RIPHATH.

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS. See CHURCH, § 6.

DISCIPLE (μαθητής, 'learner', μαθήτρια, fem. Ac 9 36): Predominantly a N T word (but cf. 'learner', limmūdū, Is 8 16 and Is 50 4, 54 13, Rvng.). In the N T the conception of learner is maintained, but broadened so that it expresses the relation of learner to teacher as one of companionship and dependence; hence the accessory meaning of 'follower,' 'partizan' (Mt 10 24; Jn 9 28, 'disciples of Moses'; Mt 9 14, of John; Mt 22 16, of the Pharisees). A. C. Z.

DISCIPLINE: This word occurs only once in the AV, Job 36 10, where it is the translation of mūšār. (See CHASTEN.) In the RV it is found II Ti 1 7, where it is more properly 'self-discipline,' and in the margin of II Ti 3 16, as an alternative for 'instruction.'

DISEASE AND MEDICINE. I. Ancient Knowledge and Practise. 1. Oriental Ideas regarding Disease. (1) Ancient peoples regarded disease as a direct sending from the gods or God; as something aside from the regular working of nature. To them disease was the expression of disfavor or hostility on the part of the god, and in the nature of punishment; or was even the result of jealousy of human prosperity on the part of the god.

As a consequence the treatment of disease in the early days lay in the hands of the priests (cf. Lv ch. 13), and in cases of illness they were consulted as to prognosis, and as to the method to be followed by which the anger of the god might be averted. In such medical practise diagnosis could be disregarded and medication naturally played a minor part. In these matters the Israelite belief followed that of the surrounding peoples. The anger of Jehovah was the cause of disease, and by the placation of his anger was disease averted. The prophets also were consulted in case of illness.

The anger of God was often considered the cause of disease, e.g., The plague on Pharaoh for his treatment of Sarah (Gn 12 17); the plagues of Egypt (Ex 9 12); punishment threatened for disobedience (Lv 26 16, 21; Dt 28 22-35); Miriam became leprous for finding fault with Moses (Nu 12 10); plague as punishment for complaining of restricted diet (Nu 11 33); pestilence threatened for disobedience (Nu 14 12); plague as punishment for the spies' evil report (Nu 14 37); David's son smitten for David's sin (II S 12 15); pestilence as punishment for census-taking (I Ch 21 14).

Diseases might be averted by repentance, e.g., Jeroboam's paralysis cured (I K 13 4-6); Hezekiah's illness cured (II K 20 5); Miriam's leprosy healed (Nu 12 14); plague checked by Aaron's use of incense (Nu 16 47); plague stopped by killing of man and Midianite wife (Nu 25 9).

Holy men were consulted for disease, e.g., Ahijah consulted by the wife of Jeroboam for sick child gives unfavorable prognosis (I K 14 17); Ahaziah after a fall sent to consult the god of Ekron. His messengers were met and sent back by Elijah with a fatal prognosis (II K 1 1); Benhadad ill sent to ask Elisha, Shall I recover? (II K 8 8); Hezekiah was treated by Isaiah (II K 20 7).

To-day in the East disease is still generally attributed to influences from the unseen world, often directly from God. The common name for an insane person is majnûn, which means 'possessed by the jinn or an evil spirit.' Such a person is also sometimes said to be mamsûs, which signifies 'touched' (by an evil spirit). Many deformities and defects are attributed to the 'evil eye.' By it is intended the eye of envy. If one looks on a beautiful child, and wishes it were his, it is believed that the child will be smitten by some disease or die. If some object of value is looked upon by another with covetousness, its value to its owner is believed to be lost. To avert this he who speaks of an object of desire, first utters the name of God, to signify that His protection is invoked against envy and covetousness. Thus, instead of saying to a mother, 'What a pretty child!' one should say, 'The name of God upon him, how beautiful he is!' Rupture is known as 'a wind.' Rheumatism bears the same name. Epilepsy is known by the name 'wrestling,' as if one had been overcome in a struggle. Certain catarrhal and inflammatory troubles are called nizel, which signifies a 'descent' from somewhere in the regions above. If you see a man eating, you should say 'two healths!' meaning, 'may God give you two healths!' If you see him working, you say, 'rest,' that is 'may God give you rest!' It is generally believed that God strikes men blind for their sins. One of the most common curses is the word 'blindness!'; that is, 'may God strike you blind!' Also it is believed that God punishes by sudden death. So there is the curse, 'may he cut off your age!' In a general way Orientals are disposed to look for occult causes for diseases. When none can be found, they say that the affection is 'from God.' And when disease is supposed to be incurable, or is very intractable, one says 'may God cure you!' If a person is asked how he recovered from a disease, he is apt to reply 'God,' that is, 'God cured me.'

(2) This belief in occult and supernatural causes of disease leads to superstitious practises among people of the Near East to-day; practises many of which are inheritances from extinct and forgotten heathen rites. Such customs are: pilgrimages to certain shrines renowned for healing; offerings of a jar to be broken; a candle to be burned; a rag tied on a sacred tree; a chicken, goat or sheep sacrificed; passing an emaciated child under a tree root, perhaps as a feint of burial to cheat the destiny that has determined his death.

In ancient times charms were much used in Bible lands to guard against the evil eye, against barrenness, and against death. Such were scarabs, imitations of frogs, of the hand and of the phallus. In modern days charms are often strung as a necklace around a baby's neck or tied on his wrist to protect him from disease. Among these are found the vertebra of a bear (for strength); a blue bead (against the evil eye); a piece of alum (astringent, against ophthalmia); package of antimony powder (against ophthalmia); a wooden cylinder (against cough); a miniature hand (the 'hand of God'); a sealed tin case containing on a tiny scroll a verse from the Torah, or the Koran, or a papal blessing (cf. Pr 6 21). The use of the sacred scroll is often continued in adult life.

(3) Conditions which were plainly attributable to natural causes were treated by those whose circumstances rendered them peculiarly suited for such services. This is the case in the East to-day. The barber does the blood-letting, cupping and lancing, because he has the keen razor. The blacksmith extracts teeth, because he has the pincers for pulling nails out of horses' feet. The goatherd is called in as bonesetter because of his experience with broken bones among his goats on the rocks. The midwife has a recognized specialty. Skill in nursing is supposed to be an attribute of the 'wise women.' There is a self-trained specialist who operates for stone in the bladder, a trade so ancient and so discreditably performed, that Hippocrates forbade it to his pupils in his oath for physicians.

Charlatanism has always been practised by those claiming special gifts. A popular one to-day is the gipsy woman who shakes a worm out of a hollow stick so cleverly that her dupe believes she has extracted it from his eye. Biblical instances of the same character are: Saul and the witch of Endor (I S 28 7-25), and the numerous other cases of those who claimed to have 'familiar spirits'; Simon the sorcerer (Ac 8 9). The sorcerer Bar-Jesus (Ac 13 6); the seven sons of Sceva who tried to imitate Paul (Ac 19 13-16).

2. Diseases of the Near East. (1) The diseases prevalent in the Near East to-day differ not greatly from those found elsewhere in the world. The great common diseases of mankind are found here as elsewhere. Such are tuberculosis, malaria, dysentery, bronchitis and pneumonia, venereal disease, cancer, rheumatism, heart disease, nephritis, insanity.

In the irrigated plains and fields, or in cities with uncovered cisterns mosquitoes propagate malaria and dengue fever. The swarms of flies in summer time, together with polluted water sources, favor the spread of typhoid, dysentery, and, in times of epidemic, cholera. In the ill-ventilated and ill-drained cities tuberculosis (consumption) is dreadfully common; while conditions are favorable for the rapid spread of contagious diseases, as measles and smallpox. Epidemics of plague are carried by the rat flea. As a consequence of the lack of soap and cleanliness that follows in the wake of war and famine, lice and bedbugs spread epidemics of typhus and intermittent fever. Subtropical diseases occurring in Syria and Palestine are the eruption designated Leishmaniasis (here known as the 'Aleppo Button'); trachoma (an infection of the eyelids); intestinal parasites; venereal diseases; scabies (or the itch) and other parasitic skin-diseases. Renal calculus is common; whether attributable to peculiarities of water or diet is disputed. Cancer, while prevalent, is less common than in the west; while scarlet fever, diphtheria, goiter and appendicitis are relatively rare.

(2) Diseases known to have existed in ancient times. Autopsies performed on Egyptian mummies have shown some of the diseases of ancient days.

Tuberculosis, arthritis deformans (or rheumatic gout), thickening and calcification of the arteries, gall-stones, indications of inflammations of the pleura and of the peritoneum, and an eruption resembling smallpox, have all been found. It is interesting to note that syphilis, cancer, and rickets were apparently unknown in ancient Egypt.

3. Knowledge of Anatomy and Physiology; Medical Practise. Anatomy before the time of Vesalius (16th cent. A.D.) was a thing of shreds and patches, and the anatomy known to Biblical writers was no exception to the rule. Only a very few parts of the body are mentioned in the Bible, and these references are vague and general.

In Egypt a considerable knowledge of anatomy had been obtained through the process of embalming, and the Israelites possibly carried with them in their exodus some of the Egyptian learning. Something was learned of comparative anatomy by the examination of the animals slaughtered in sacrifice, e.g., 'The shoulder and the two cheeks and the maw, belong to the priest' (Dt 18 3), or 'The two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and the caul above the liver (or midriff over the liver) and over the kidneys, and his inwards' (Lv 3 10; cf. also 8 17). Inspection of the viscera of sacrificed animals was an essential part of augury (cf. Ezk 21 21) and, among the Babylonians, soothsaying was concentrated in the liver. The liver, as the source of blood, was regarded as the seat of the soul; and, as the god identified himself with the sacrificial animal, to inspect the liver was to see into the soul of the animal and the mind of the god. Terra-cotta models of the liver, about 3000 years old have been found, divided into squares and studded with prophetic inscriptions.

More accurate knowledge of the anatomy of the human body to be obtained from dissection was forbidden by the rule, 'Whoso touches . . . a dead body or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days' (Nu 18 16). In the Talmud, knowledge is displayed of the esophagus, larynx, trachea, the membranes of the brain, and the generative organs. The pancreas is called the 'finger of the liver,' and the spleen, kidneys, and spinal cord are mentioned. In the O T the blood is held to be the vital principle, identical with the soul. 'Ye shall not eat the blood, for the blood is life' (Dt 12 16, 23). The heart is essential to life. It is located by its apex beat as being 'under the fifth rib' where a blow is fatal (II S 2 23, 3 27, 4 6, 20 10, AV).

Physicians were recognized as a distinct class in Egypt. Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father (Gn 50 2).

There were physicians in Gilead (Jer 8 22). Oriental tradition makes Solomon a master of the healing art. King Asa consulted physicians, instead of J' which is mentioned with evident disapproval (II Ch 16 12 f.).

There are several allusions to medical matters in Proverbs (17 22, 20 30).

Job said of his comforters, 'Ye are all physicians of no value' (Job 13 4). Other references to physicians are Mt 9 12; Lk 4 23; Mk 5 26; Col 4 14. How highly a physician might be esteemed by the Jews may be gathered from the impressive language of Jesus, son of Sirach, (180 B.C.):

'Honor a physician according to the need of him with the honors due unto him,
For verily the Lord hath created him;
For from the Most High cometh healing;
And from the King he shall receive a gift.
The skill of the physician shall lift up his head;
And in the sight of great men he shall be admired.' (Sir 38 1-3).

Preventive Medicine. The Mosaic laws enforcing public and personal cleanliness were of great hygienic value. Their purpose was, however, not to render a man clean hygienically, but clean ceremonially. The two were not always synonymous; for example, 'if a leprosy cover all the skin of him that hath the plague, from his head even to his foot, wheresoever the priest looketh. . . . He shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean' (Lv 13 12 f.). Bathing and washing was frequent, and ceremonially obligatory (Gn 35 2; Ex 19 10; Lv 15 6; Nu 19 19). Circumcision may be of great hygienic value, and the same may be said for the rules for the sex life such as are found in Lv 15 19-24. Incest, adultery, sodomy and sex perversions are prohibited (Lv 18 1-23). Garrison says that 'the rigorous Hebrew regulation of sexual hygiene, which, however severe, enforced exogamy, put a ban upon perversions, and invested the figure of a good and virtuous woman with that peculiar halo of respect which has been preserved by all highly civilized nations down to the present time.'

Sanitation. Mention may be made of the use of shovels or paddles on the weapons of the soldiers for the disposal of excreta which was an excellent precaution for the sanitation of camp life (Dt 23 13). The forbidding of swine flesh (Lv 11 17) is defended as a hygienic measure against trichinosis. The institution of the Sabbath day of rest was perhaps the most distinctive and beneficial of all the Mosaic provisions for the physical and moral well-being of the Hebrew people.

Legal Medicine. It is worthy of note, that the Mosaic mandates against sex perversion (Ex 22 19; Lv 18 22 f.), sexual inversion (Lv 18 6-21) are early instances of medical jurisprudence. Other examples are seen in the rule for indemnity for time lost and medical expenses involved in case of injury (Ex 21 19); penalty for the accidental causing of abortion (Ex 21 22); trial of a woman suspected of marital infidelity (Nu 5 11-31); and the regulation for producing proofs of virginity in a suspected bride (Dt 22 17).

It is clear that medicines were largely used. 'A cheerful heart is a good medicine' (Pr 17 22). 'Thou hast no healing medicines' (Jer 30 13). 'In vain dost thou use many medicines' (Jer 46 11). 'The leaf thereof for healing' (Ezk 47 12; cf. Rev. 22 2). Dioscorides gives 90 mineral, 700 vegetable, and 166 animal substances used as remedies. Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and among the other branches of this knowledge medicine was largely cultivated. Assyria and Babylon were learned in the medical science of that day. There was a legal provision for the surgical care of the wounded Hebrew (Ex 21 19). Asa had medical treatment for his feet (II Ch 16 12). King Joram went back to be healed of his wounds (II K 8 29). Of details of treatment and materia medica we have the following:

Balm used for the treatment of wounds (Jer 8 23). Caperberry (RVmg for desire) was used as aphrodisiac (love-philter) (Ec. 12 5), as was also the Mandrake (Gn 30 14). Ointments, are mentioned (Is 1 6) and Eyesalve (Rev 3 18) as a remedy against the prevalent diseases of the eye (see No. 7 below). Oil was used in dressing wounds, and in anointing the sick (Lk 10 34; Ja 5 14). Wine was used as a stimulant for gastric disturbance, and as a dressing for wounds. (Pr 31 6; Lk 10 34; 1 Ti 5 23). We read of a poultice of figs (II K 20 7) and of vinegar and hyssop (origanum?) as a sedative (Jn 19 29). Mint, anise, cinnamon, cloves, were used as carminatives Lk 8 46). Honey, figs and dried fruits were used as laxatives.

Antidotes. An indication of the knowledge of the use of antidotes for poison is given in II K 4 34. Here the bitter fruit of the poisonous colocynth had been mixed in the pot with the stew. Elisha neutralized its effect by meal thrown into the pot. Interesting experiments have recently been made to show the neutralizing effect of the protein of the meal, when cooked, upon the poisonous alkaloid of colocynth.

II. Diseases in the Bible. 4. General Diseases. (1) The general diseases recognized by the ancient Hebrews are listed for those who should disobey Jehovah in Lv 26 16. 'Consumption and the burning ague that shall consume the eyes and cause sorrow of heart.' And in Dt 28 21 f., 'The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee... Shall smite thee with a consumption and with a fever, and with inflammation, and with fiery heat (extreme burning, AV), and with the sword and with blasting and with mildew.' Also in ver. 27, 'The Lord shall smite thee with the boil (botch AV) of Egypt, and with the emerods (tumors or buboes of plague) 'and with the scurvy, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed. The Lord shall smite thee with madness and blindness and astonishment of heart.' In ver. 35: 'The Lord shall smite thee in the knees and in the legs with a sore boil whereof thou canst not be healed, from the sole of thy foot unto the top of thy head.' Ver. 38: 'And those that are left shall pine away (from lack of vitality).

(2) Epidemics of diseases are repeatedly mentioned: The great epidemics of the East are cholera, bubonic plague, small pox, typhoid, typhus and measles. We read of 'boils breaking forth with eruptions (blains) upon man and upon beast' (Ex 9 9; Dt 28 27). Following a plague of cattle, this may have been malignant pustule which is the result in men of the infection with the anthrax bacillus of splenic fever of cattle (murrain EV). Other references to plague or pestilence are Nu 11 33, 14 37, 16 47, 21 27, and 25 1-9. The last, the 'plague' of Baal-peor, has been cited as probably a plague of venereal disease, as the story implies that it was the sequence of promiscuous intercourse with the Moabite women. The point of the story is that the Israelites in marrying Moabite women had also accepted their god Baal-peor, and had thus incurred the anger of Jehovah. The women are referred to in causal relation to the plague, merely on the ground that they enticed the Israelites from the worship of God.

The plague that followed the ark captured by the Philistines in their cities of Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron, may well have been the bubonic plague. It is said that 'many died, and the men that died not were smitten with the emerods of tumors.' The LXX. adds: 'and in the midst of the land thereof, mice were brought forth, and there was a great and deadly destruction in the city.' (I S 5 6-6 21). When the offending ark was returned, it was accompanied with a trespass offering in the form of a box containing five gold images of tumors, and five gold mice. Bubonic plague is characterized by inguinal buboes, or swelling in the groin. Multiplication of rats and the appearance of disease among them, is a precursor of an epidemic of human plague, as the epidemic is transmitted from the rat to man by fleas. Perhaps the ancient observers fail to differentiate the species of rodent involved. An ancient Brahminical authority of the 7th century A.D. warns people 'to desert their houses, when rats fall from the roofs above, jump about and die,' presumably from plague.

As it is said that 50,070 of the Hebrews were smitten 'because they looked into the ark.' (I S 6 19), it would seem that contagion from the Ark was still possible and it was not without reason that the ark was quarantined, as it were, at Kirjath-Jearim for 20 years.

Of the Assyrian army against Ethiopia 185,000 died in one night, smitten by 'the angel of the Lord.' (II K 19 35). Such sudden mortality suggests either cholera or plague. An Egyptian account of a similar event states that the repulse of Sennacherib's army was effected by the Egyptian deity who sent rats (or mice) and crippled the Assyrian soldiers by eating all their leather bowstrings in a single night. The same rats that ate the bowstrings may have introduced bubonic plague. A pestilence of 70,000 mortality is recorded in I Ch 21 14. Reference to the 'pestilence that walketh in darkness' and the 'plague' that enters 'thy dwelling' is made in Ps 91 5-10).

(3) Leprosy. The symptoms of 'leprosy' are given (Lv 13 1-17). The main points are: (1) Peculiar whiteness of the skin. (2) White hairs in the affected area. (3) Lesion or Scab darker than the surrounding skin. (4) Presence of raw granulation tissue. (5) Its continued spread (as a Scab). The outstanding feature is its abnormal pallor. Moses' hand became 'leprous as snow.' (Ex. 4 7). Miriam became leprous 'white as snow' (Nu 12 10). Gehazi went out 'a leper as white as snow.' (II K 5 27). This is not the disease which we term leprosy to-day. It is rather an enumeration of conditions of the skin which are to be regarded as rendering the sufferer ceremonially unclean. The outstanding diseases which it includes are psoriasis and leucoderma. The Hebrew conception applied the condition to clothing and the walls of houses as well. The association of whiteness and leprosy persists in the Oriental mind to-day. A harmless house-lizard of peculiar pallor is given the name 'father-of-leprosy,' and regarded with peculiar abhorrence. Dr. Adams, the professor of skin diseases in Beirut, Syria, reports a case sent to him as 'white leprosy,' which proved to be leucoderma covering almost the entire body. The leprosy of the O T did not disable its victim, and is never spoken of as a fatal disorder. Naaman was able to exercise the function of a general while a leper (II K 7 3). Azariah, the king, was a leper (II K 15 6). In his case the affliction was severe and his son Jotham acted as regent.

On the other hand it is quite probable that the leprosy of the NT (Mt 8 1-14; Lk 17 11-19), is identical with the modern leprosy, the elephantiasis Græcorum of medicine. This is a contagious disease, characterized by nodes under and in the skin; by a dusky, lurid hue, by a leonine expression of the countenance, by deep ulcerations, caries of the bones, destruction of joints, dropping off of fingers and toes, deformities of the limbs, and fever. These grave symptoms cripple the patient, and destroy his life. Only of late has the remedy been found by which ultimately this disease may be healed.

The differential diagnosis of 'leprosy' is given; from a burning boil (Lv 13 18-23); from a hot burning (erysipelas, cellulitis, or eczema) (Lv 13 24-28); from trychophytosis, or javus (Lv 13 29-37 scall AV) from tetter RV (freckles AV) or chloasma (vs. 38, 39); and from alopecia (vs. 40-44).

(4) The 'running issue of the reins' (Lv 15 2) with the accompanying rules of its uncleanness may refer to a discharging sinus or fistula, or to gonorrhea. Its juxtaposition to the rules of uncleanness regarding sexual discharges, suggests the ancient confusion of ideas by which gonorrhea gained its name as a sexual discharge. (5) Sores are ulcers, or tubercular, cancerous, or syphilitic lesions of the skin and tissues beneath it. They are very common in the East and often very disgusting and distressing, and frequently fatal. Putrifying sores (cf. Is 1 6 AV) are gangrenous areas.

5. Individual cases of disease cited: Insanity was feigned by David (I Sam. 21 13, mad, EV). God threatened with madness those who should forsake Him (Dt 28 34). Festus charged Paul with being mad (Ac 26 24). Nebuchadnezzar was insane (Dn 4 33). Saul was afflicted with homicidal melancholia (I S 16 14, 18 10-11, 19 9, 24, 20 33, 22 17).

Dwarfism is mentioned (Lv 21 20). The Egyptian statue which represents the god Bes and Phtah is an image of achondroplasia. Giantism is instanced in Dt 4 11; I S 17 1; II S 21 19-20. The giant with supernumerary digits (II S 21 20) has been mentioned as a possible case of acromegaly or hyperpituitarism. Hezekiah's illness was a boil of such severity as to justify the diagnosis of carbuncle or malignant pustule (II K 20 1). Alcoholism is described (Pr 23 30-35). See also the instances of Noah (Gn 9 20), Lot (Gn 19 33), Uriah (II S 11 13), Ben-hadad (I K 20 16) and others. Sea-sickness is evidently referred to in Ps 107 27. Heart-disease is probably meant by 'trembling of heart' (Dt 28 25). This might merely denote timidity, were it not coupled with the concrete phrase, 'failing of eyes.'

Dysentery and Prolapse. Jehoram's dysentery (II Ch 21 18 f.) was very likely due to the amaba histolytica, a common cause of dysentery in the Near East. The same is to be said of the case mentioned in Ac 28 9 (bloody-flux, AV).

Worms, probably maggots, devoured Herod alive (Ac 12 23).

The dry throat (Ps 69 3) would be caused by strain of the vocal cords from too vehement wailing, resulting in inflammation and hoarseness.

Children's Diseases are occasionally mentioned. Jonathan's son, Mephibosheth, lame at 5 years of age may have had infantile paralysis, altho the narrative mentions only a fall (II S 4 4) (Infantile paralysis is represented on an Egyptian stele of the 18th dynasty in a museum at Copenhagen). The child that Uriah's wife bore to David was very sick, and died on the seventh day (II S 12 15-18). The crisis on the seventh day is suggestive of pneumonia. Abijah, the young son of Jeroboam, fell sick and justified the gloomy prognosis of the Prophet Ahijah (I K 14 1, 17). The Shunammite woman's son cried, 'My head, my head,' and died at noon (II K 4 18 ff.). As he was in the harvest field sunstroke seems likely, but it might have been meningitis (cf. also Ps 121 6; Jon 4 8). Pernicious malaria also may cause such symptoms and sudden death, and it is common to-day in the valley of Jezreel where lay the village of Shunem.

6. Surgical Diseases. A list of recognized pathological diseases is given in the blemishes which are forbidden to priests (Lv 21 18-19), e.g. blindness, lameness, flat nose, superfluous parts, badly united (broken EV) fractures of hand or foot, hump-back (crooked back Lv 21 20; it may be noted that Elliott Smith and Ruffer have described Potts disease in a mummy about 1000 B.C.), dwarfism, eye blemish, scurvy, eczema, orchitis.

Light is thrown on ideas of comparative pathology by the list of blemishes which render a sheep unfit for sacrifice (Lv 22 22 f.), e.g. blindness, fractures, severe wounds, tumors, ulcers, mange, superfluous or lacking parts. Trauma of the testicle or amputation of the sex organ debarred from the congregation (Dt 23 1). Wounds, bruises and putrefying sores are referred to in Is 1 6 and boils in Ex 9 11 and Job 2 7. The severe itching in the case of Job's boils (2 5, 7 4 f.) suggests the probability of itch with secondary infection caused by scratching.

Dislocations are referred to (Job 31 22; Ps 22 14; Pr 25 19) Diseases of the bones, also figuratively, are referred to in Ps 31 10; Jer 20 9; Is 38 13; Hab 3 16. The hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint (Gn 22 35). Mention is made of fracture of the skull (Jg 4 21, a compound fracture of the temporal bone, and 9 35); and of the neck (I S 4 18).

There is a reference to the roller bandage in the treatment of fractures in Ezk 30 22: 'Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and so, it shall not be bound up to be healed, to put a roller to bind it, to make it strong to hold the sword.' Asa's disease of the feet (II Ch 16 12) may have been senile gangrene (cf. II Ti 2 11, canker AV) or elephantiasis. By Cripple (Ac 14 9) or lame (Ac 3 2) any one of various types of disablement may be meant.

Wounds were produced by arrows, darts, javelins, spears, swords, knives, stones, clubs, and bones. Frequent allusion is made to the pain, bleeding, inflammation, putrefaction, and healing of wounds, and to death resulting from them. The maimed (Lv 22 22; Mt 15 30; etc.) were those who had suffered mutilation or loss of some part of the body.

Circumcision is the only surgical procedure mentioned in the Bible. The use of the primitive chipped flint (Ex 4 25; Jos 5 2) in ritual circumcision implies that the antiquity of the custom of circumcision extends back to the pre-bronze, or neolithic age. Flint knives were used by the Egyptians in embalming, and such sacred knives are found mounted with gold handles, indicating that the use of the flint was preserved for sacred rites, long after the introduction of the use of metals.

7. Eye Diseases. Diseases of the eyes are numerous and common in the East. This is largely due to the presence of trachoma and of gonorrheal ophthalmia. Instances of blindness are numerous. Senile cataract dimness EV is referred to in the case of Isaac (Gn 27 1), Eli (I S ch. 4), and Ahijah I K 14 4). Leah was tender-eyed, probably the result of trachoma (Gen 29 17). The blindness of Saul (Ac 9 8 ff.) was cured when something like scales fell from his eyes. This might have been the crusts of dried discharge from some inflammatory condition. Redness of eyes (Pr 23 29) was due to alcoholism.

8. Women's diseases are mentioned, e.g. leucorrhea issue, EV. (Lv 15 19-24), and metrorrhagia issue of blood, EV. (Lv 15 25-30; Lk 8 43-48). Sterility was regarded as a great calamity e.g. by Sarah (Gn 18 11), Abimelech's harem (Gn 20 17 f.), Rebekah (Gn 25 21), Hannah (I S 1 5), Michal, wife of David, (II S 6 23), the Shunammite woman (II K 4 14). In the law it is a penalty as well as a curse (Lv 20 20 f.).

Obstetrics. The suffering of child-birth is the penalty for the sin of Eve. (Gn 3 16). Midwives in the Near East from the earliest time have conducted deliveries upon the obstetric chair (Ex 1 16) and continue to do so to-day. The obstetric chair is mentioned by ancient Greek authors. Rachel offers the use of her knees in lieu of an obstetric chair, as a symbol that the child borne by her maid is her own. (Gn 30 3). Miscarriage from injury by another is dealt within the law (Ex 21 22).

Conceptions of maternal impressions are set forth in Jacob's method of raising speckled and spotted livestock, which are hardly explicable by Mendel's Law. Two fatal cases of delivery are recorded, altho in each the baby was saved (Rachel Gn 33 16-18 and Phineas' wife I S 4 19-22). Two twin births are recorded, one a shoulder presentation (Gn 38 27-30), the other a head presentation (Gn 25 22). A case of a new-born child suffocated by over-lying is cited (I K 3 19).

III. THE HEALING MINISTRY OF JESUS. Jesus, in sharing the frailties of the human body, apparently shared also the limitations of human secular knowledge. His conceptions of the cause of disease seem to have been those of the people of his time. Insanity, hysteria, and epilepsy were treated as due to occupation or seizure by an 'unclean spirit.' Even fever was 'rebuked' as if it were an evil personality (Mt 8 14 f.; Mk 1 29 ff.; Lk 4 38 f.). With regard to the causes of many psychical disorders, our knowledge has as yet made no great advance beyond the time of Jesus. So far as effective treatment of many cases of insanity is concerned, unfortunately it still makes little difference in the practical results, whether the attributed cause be given the ancient names of 'demons,' or 'humors,' or the modern ones of 'autotoxins' or 'germs.'

Among the specific cases recorded as treated by Jesus, the predominance of psychopathic and nervous diseases is noticeable. While Matthew states that 'all manner of sickness and disease were cured,' he considers especial ones worthy of mention.

These are insanity, epilepsy (lunatick, Mt 4 24 AV) and paralysis palsy (Mk 2 3, etc). Prayer and the laying on of hands was commonly, if not always, used. The crowds believed in the healing of the touch of Jesus. Multitudes sought to touch him (Mk 3 10). The importance of faith as an agency of healing is repeatedly stressed. This is particularly emphasized by Jesus in Mk 9 23 where He says to the father of the epileptic boy: 'if thou canst.' Again in Nazareth (Mk 6 4-6) 'he could there do no mighty work . . . and he marveled because of their unbelief.' The use of saliva is mentioned three times (Jn 9 6; Mt 8 23; Mk 7 33) and washing (Jn 9 7), perhaps as a test of faith, once.

The accounts of Jesus' healings contain many general comprehensive statements, in which cures of a number of sick persons afflicted with various diseases are mentioned, without describing any case in particular. A number of individual cures are also related comprising such diseases or afflictions as: fever, two cases (Jn 4 46-54; Mk 1 30 f. and ||s); atrophied or withered hand, one case (Mk 3 1-5 and ||s); Leprosy, eleven cases (Mk 1 40 ff. and ||s; Lk 17 11 ff.); Metrorrhagia, one case (Mk 5 25 ff. and ||s); Arthritis deformans of the spine, one case (Lk 13 10 ff.); Ascites or dropsy, one case (Lk 14 1-6); general paralysis, three cases (Mk 2 1-12 and ||s; Mt 8 5 ff. = Lk 7 1 ff.; Jn 5 1 ff.); Unclean spirits (insanity?), two cases (Mk 5 1 ff. and ||s; Mk 7 24-30 and ||s); Epilepsy (Mk 1 21 ff. = Lk 4 31 ff.; Mk 9 14 ff. and ||s); dumbness, which is most commonly due to hysteria, two cases (Mt 9 32 ff.; Mt 12 22 = Lk 11 14); deafness, with impediment in speech (which is a natural result of deafness), one case (Mk 7 31 = Mt 15 29 ff.); blindness, six cases (Mt 9 27 ff.; Mk 8 22 ff.; Jn 9 1-41; Mk 10 46 ff. and ||s); and three cases of raising the apparently dead (Lk 17 11 ff.; Mk 5 21-43; Jn 11 1-46). DISH. See FOOD, § 11; and MEALS, § 2.

DISHAN, dai'shan, DISHON, dai'shen (דִּישָׁן, dishān דִּישׁוֹן, dishōn) 'mountain goat': A name (or names) occurring several times in the list of Horite clans (Gn 36 21 ff.; I Ch 1 38 ff.). In all cases probably the same clan (represented genealogically as an individual) is meant.

DISPENSATION. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

DISPERSION, DISPERSED: The Eng. transl. of the Gr. διασπορά, used in the N T period for the Jewish population living outside of Palestine. In the new Greek-speaking world resulting from Alexander's conquest the surplus population of the small and crowded Judea found inviting fields to which to migrate. And first (and mainly) into Egypt, particularly the new city of Alexandria, and then into the other lands lying in and around the Mediterranean Sea, a steady stream of Jewish immigration poured forth from the little motherland of Judea. Then 'Hellenistic' Jews, (cf. Ac 6 1) as they were called by their Palestinian kinsmen were organized, wherever possible, around their synagog (q.v.). For, while they adapted themselves readily to their new environment, and ceased to use their native Hebrew or Aramaic and spoke the vernacular Greek (the κοινή, see GREEK LANGUAGE) they remained loyal to their religion and thus constituted one religiously united people, sharing the same hopes, and looking to Jerusalem as their spiritual capital and to the Temple as their one house of worship. Each community had, if possible, a synagog building. They observed their Sabbath by a synagog service in which the Scriptures (the O T in the Greek translation, see VERSIONS I) were read and expounded. Many pagans were attracted by this service and the faith it stood for, so different from the bewildering polytheism and the low morality of the current paganism. Thus the 'Dispersion' was preparing the way, tho unconsciously, for the later proclamation of the Gospel to the Gentiles.

It is in its broad sense that the term is used in Jn 7 35. In Ja 1 1 it is evidently applied to Jewish Christians in Palestine and Syria not members of the motherchurch in Jerusalem; but in the remaining passage, I P 1 1, it is apparently used in a spiritual sense of Gentile Christians as constituting the true Israel, who as pilgrims in this world (1 17, 2 1) are journeying toward their heavenly home.

DISPOSITION (διαταγή) (only in Ac 7 53 AV ['as it was ordained by angels' RV 'as the ordinance of angels' RVmg.]): The meaning is that the law given by God in its essence was put into orderly form by angelic mediation. A. C. Z.

DISTAFF. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 11.

DISTRIBUTION. See CHURCH, § 2.

DIVIDE (διχοτομεῖν, 'handling' RV): Used in II Ti 2 15 of the skilful application of parts or aspects of the truth adapted to affect persons specially in need of such instruction.

DIVINATION. See in general MAGIC AND DIVINATION.

DIVORCE, DIVORCEMENT. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

DIZAHAB, diz'ā-hab (דִּזְאָהָב, dizāhābh), 'of gold': One of the five places that define the territory within which Israel is said to have rested when Moses delivered the discourses recorded in Dt (1 1). Burkhart suggests that the modern Mīna-edh-Dhahab is meant. But any identification is open to question.

DOCTOR. See EDUCATION, § 8; and LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 2 (5).

DOCTRINE. See CHURCH, § 2; and EDUCATION, § 10.

DODAI, DODO, dō'dai, dō'do (דָּדַי, דָּדוֹ, dōdhay, dōdhō): 1. The grandfather of Tola, one of the 'judges' (Jg 10 1). 2. Father of Eleazar, one of David's heroes (II S 23 9; I Ch 11 12), in command of one of the divisions of the army, according to I Ch 27 4 (correct text). 3. Father of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (see II S 23 24; I Ch 11 26). Here there has been, possibly, some confusion with David in connection with the Goliath episode (cf. II S 21 19).

The name Dodo appears to be an old Canaanite name (of a deity?), being found on the Tel el-Amarna tablets and on the Moabite stone, line 12. See MESHIA, STONE OF.

DODANIM, dō'da-nim (דֹּדָנִים, dōdhānīm): A Japhetic people (Gn 10 4). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

DODAVAHU, dō'da-vā'ū (דָּדָוָהוּ, dōdhāwāhū, Dodavah AV): Father of Eliezer (II Ch 20 37).

DODO. See DODAI.

DOE. See PALESTINE, § 24; and FOOD, § 10.

DOEG, dō'eg (דֹּעַג, dō'ēgh): An Edomite, a servant of Saul, who executed Saul's command to slay the priests of Nob (I S 21 7, 22 9-18, 22). The account is obscure at two points: (1) As to the position held by D. The Heb. of I S 21 7 reads 'the mightiest of Saul's shepherds'—a most unusual expression. The conjecture that 'runners' be read instead of 'shepherds' has been widely accepted. The LXX. reads 'tending the mules,' i.e., in charge of Saul's mules or asses. (2) As to the reason why D. was at Nob 'detained before Jehovah,' the most natural supposition is that D. was ceremonially unclean and was at Nob for purposes of purification. Or he may have been awaiting an oracle.

The reference to D. in Ps 52 (title) has no historical value.

DOG. See PALESTINE, § 24; CITY, § 4.

DOK, dek (Δῶκ): A small fortress 4 m. NW. of Jericho, built by Ptolemy, son-in-law of Simon the Maccabee. Here Simon and two of his sons were treacherously murdered by Ptolemy (I Mac 16 15 ff.). The modern 'Ain Dāk. Map III, G 5.

DOMINION. See KINGDOM OF GOD, § 3; and ANGEL, ANGELOLOGY, § 4.

DOOR. See HOUSE, § 6 (k).

DOORKEEPER: In Ps 84 10 'doorkeeper' is not a technical term. It means simply one who is 'at the threshold,' presumably in a humble attitude. See also PORTER.

DOOR-POST: Only in Ezk 41 16 AV, where 'threshold,' RV, is more correct. See also HOUSE, § 6 (m).

DOPHKAH, def'ka (דֹּפְקָה, dophqāh): A station on the Exodus-route between the Red Sea and Sinai (Nu 33 12 f.). Not identified.

DOR, dōr (דֹּר, dōr): An ancient Canaanite town on the Mediterranean coast a little S. of Carmel. The first historical notice of Dor we find in the Papyrus Golenisheff (c. 1050 B.C.), which shows that it was then occupied by the Ta Kara, a subdivision of the sea-people whom we know later as the Philistines who had taken possession of the coast land S. of Carmel a century or so earlier. The Israelites did not gain control of Dor until Solomon's day (Jg 1 27 [which shows the unhistorical character of the later notices, Jos 11 2, 12 23; I K 4 11]). It was counted as belonging to Manasseh (Jos 17 11). Dor retained its importance during the checked history of the following centuries. It was closely allied with the Phœnician towns and was given to Eshmunazar, King of Sidon, by one of the early Ptolemies (c. 300 B.C.). Its prosperity declined after the first century A.D. The modern village Ṭaṭṭurah is small and insignificant.

E. E. N.

DORCAS, dōr'kas (Δορκάς): The Greek name of a Christian disciple in Joppa whom Peter, according to Ac 9 36-43, raised from the dead. The Aramaic original, which is recorded in the same passage for the benefit of Gr. readers is Ṭ'bithā' (Eng. Tabitha) = 'a roe,' which is sometimes used in the O T as a term of endearment (cf. Song 2 9 ts'bhā').

J. M. T.

DOTHAN, dō'than (דֹּתָן, dōthān and דֹּתָן, dōthayin): The name both of a plain and a town. See Map III, F 2. The town was old, being on the list of Canaanite towns taken by Thotmes III, (see Egypt, § 7). The plain is a convenient pass from the coast plain to the Plain of Esdraelon, and is traversed by an ancient and still-used caravan route. Its pasturage is very fine (Gn 37 17; II K 6 13).

DOUGH. See Food, § 2.

DOVE. There is no positive evidence that the dove was regarded as a sacred bird among the Israelites; but from slight indications it may be inferred that some sort of distinction was given it in its class. It was offered in sacrifice (Lv 1 14 here 'turtle-dove'). Jesus calls it harmless (Mt 10 16) and it is made the symbol of the Divine Spirit at His baptism (Lk 3 22). See also PALESTINE, § 25.
A. C. Z.

DOVE'S DUNG (II K 6 26): This appears to be the meaning of the Heb. text. A slight change would permit the rendering 'carob-pods,' the 'husks' of Lk 15 16).

DOWRY. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, §§ 2 and 5; and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3.

DOXOLOGY. See PRAISE, § 5.

DRAW. See FISH. FISHING.

DRAGON: The word 'dragon' frequently in AV renders tannim and tannin, (more correctly in RV 'jackals' and 'monster.') The latter term, however, often has a semimythological significance (cf. Ps 74 13; Is 27 1, 51 9). The dragon was a figure of frequent occurrence in the mythologies of all nations. Considering the relation of Jewish to Babylonian life, it was natural that such a figure should be adopted and used in the Biblical portraiture of non-material realities. But the figure of the dragon or 'monster' was developed strictly within Biblical limits, first as a symbol of enmity against J" and His people (cf. Ezk 29 3, etc.), and then, with much greater definiteness of outline and color, as an apocalyptic conception of Antichrist (Rv 12 3 f.). Here he is finally identified with the arch-enemy of God, 'the old serpent' (20 2). See also PALESTINE, § 26; and COSMOGONY, § 4.

DRAGON'S WELL. See JERUSALEM, § 10.

DRAM, dram (AV): A Persian coin, the same as the Daric (RV). See MONEY, § 8.

DRAUGHT-HOUSE: A place of refuse or garbage (II K 10 27). Baal's temple was converted into such a place to make it altogether unclean and contemptible.

DRAWER OF WATER. See WELL.

DREAM, DREAMER. See REVELATION, § 8; and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 6.

DRESS AND ORNAMENTS. I. DRESS. 1. Earliest Form. The clothing, l'bhush, malbush, beghedh, of the Israelites can not have been essentially different from that of the Syrian peasantry of to-day. The earliest known piece of wearing-apparel was the 'girdle,' i.e., the hip or loin apron, haghōrah (Is 3 24, etc.) or 'ezōr (cf. Jer 13 1 f.), whose origin is ascribed to the awakened feeling of shame in primitive man (Gn 3 7). Frequently it was the only article of clothing worn while at work. Among the nomads it was made of the skin of an animal, 'ezōr 'ōr (II K 1 8), and was often longer than the ordinary apron; consequently we have in Gn 25 25 the expression 'hairy garment,' 'addereth sē'ār. Such was the mantle worn by Elijah and Elisha (II K 1 8, 2 8), who wished thereby to symbolize a return to the ancient shepherd life approved by J" (Gn 4 2-4, 25 27).

2. The Tunic. From the apron was developed the ordinary peasant's garment, k'thōneth, or kuttōneth, 'coat' or 'garment' (N T χιτών, 'coat'; cf. Lk 6 29), which in some respects corresponds to the modern tōb. It was a sleeveless woolen or linen garment reaching down to the knees and worn next to the skin (Gn 9 21; II S 6 20). With the wealthier class it was made of fine white linen, badh, later būts (cf. Targ. and Syr.) or of Egyptian material, shēsh. In Is 3 23, Jg 14 12, mention is also made of garments of 'fine linen,' (s'dhīnīm, sheets, AV). A girdle, haghōrah, 'ezōr, or mē'ziah (Job 12 21 belt, AV), of linen (Jer 13 1) or of leather (II K 1 8) held it together. Into this the garment was tucked in rapid walking or at work. In the girdle also (ζώνη, Mk 6 8, purse EV) money was kept. At night it was taken off (Song 5 3). Inasmuch as in quick motion such as leaping and dancing, or in case of accident, one was liable to be exposed (Gn 9 21; II S 6 20), those who were well-to-do adopted a garment reaching down to the ankles and provided with sleeves, k'thōneth passīm (Gn 37 3). One clothed only with this tunic was considered naked 'ārōm (Is 20 2 f.; Jn 21 7).

3. The Cloak. Ordinarily another garment, the simlāh ('clothes,' 'garment,' 'raiment'), was worn over this, corresponding substantially to the 'abaye of the present day. This consists of a rectangular, seamless piece of coarse woolen so folded and sewed together that the front is left open on either side and large holes provided for the free movement of the arms. This garment was used as it is to-day for a cover at night (Ex 22 25 f.; Dt 24 12 f.), or as a saddle in riding (Mt 21 7), or as a rug (II K 9 13), or as a general receptacle in which things may be bundled and carried (Ex 12 34; II K 4 39; Hag 2 12). Probably in ancient times amulets were hung on the hems, which in later days were adorned with fringes, g'dhīlīm, tsitsīth (Dt 22 12; Nu 15 38 f.). Upon the breast the garment formed a puffy fold, hēq, bosom or lap (Ex 4 6), in which all kinds of articles were placed (II K 4 39; Hag 2 12). At work the simlāh was taken off (Ac 7 58, 22 23), or left at home (Mt 24 18). On account of the importance of this piece of apparel, common law prescribed that, if taken as a pledge, it should be returned to the owner before nightfall (Ex 22 25 f.; Dt 24 12 f.). It is this garment that is probably referred to in the word ἱμάτιον, 'cloak' (Lk 6 29).

4. The robe. Men of means wore over the tunic a more dressy garment—the robe, m'zīl (I S 18 4, 24 5), which is mentioned as worn also by women (II S 13 18, perhaps the same as the mantle, ma'ālā-phāh, referred to in Is 3 22). Female slaves carried the train of such a dress (cf. Ad Est. 15 3 f.). According to Ex 28 4, 31, the priests wore a robe of dark purple, and on account of the shortness of the tunic, also linen breeches (mikhnāšim, Ex 28 42; Lv 16 4), which were peculiar to the priesthood.

5. The Material. The simlāh and the tunic were made of the same material, i.e., wool, tsemer, linen, pishtim, and byssus, shēsh, or būts. After Ezekiel's time silk, meshī (Ezk 16 10), variegated materials, riqmāh (Ezk 16 10), and purple cloth (also called crimson and scarlet), shānīm, also gold embroidered cloth, mishb'etsōth (cf. Ps 45 13), were used.

(Lk 7 38) any more than in holy places (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 15). Accordingly priests were required to perform their work barefoot (yāhēph). Ordinarily walking without sandals was a sign of great poverty (Dt 25 10), or of deep mourning (II S 15 30; Ezk 24 17, 23).

8. Head-dress. As to the head-gear of the Israelites there is almost no information in the earlier writings. Only in I K 20 31 is mention made of ropes upon the head in connection with sackcloth on

VARIOUS FORMS OF SANDALS.

The wealthy preferred pure white garments (cf. Est 8 15) and, therefore, had several changes, hālī-phōth (Gn 45 22; Jg 14 12). Probably also expensive garments, rich in colors, such as are found portrayed on the Egyptian monuments as worn by the Syrians, were known. Inasmuch, however, as they were worn only on public and special occasions and taken off at home, they were called festival robes (maḥā-lātsōth, Is 3 22). Kings and princes kept them in a special room, meltāhāh, robe-chamber, or wardrobe (II K 10 22) over which a special officer had charge (II K 22 14). At the same time it is not improbable that the custom of festival apparel had its primitive root in worship. It was felt that one should not appear before the Deity in ordinary garments.

6. Dress of Women. The dress of the women correspond essentially to that of the men, altho, according to Dt 22 5, there must have existed some difference. Probably the garments of women were longer (cf. the train or skirt, shōbbel, shūtīm, Nah 3 5; Jer 13 22; Is 47 2), provided with sleeves, also broader and, therefore, better designed to conceal the form. Furthermore the clothing of wealthy women was distinguished by a greater richness and ornamentation than that of men, and also scented with expensive perfumes (Ps 45 9; Song 4 11). In Is 3 16 ff. there is a long list of such costly female garments, an exact knowledge of some of which—particularly the robes, qethīgīl, the sashes, qish-shūrīm, and the shawls, mitpāhōth—can no longer be recovered. To the present day a similar luxury in the matter of clothing has been preserved among women of the Orient.

7. Footwear. For the protection of the feet sandals were worn in traveling, na'ālayim, made of wood or leather strips, which were tied about the feet with thongs or shoe-latchets (s'rōkh, Gn 14 23; Mk 1 7). These, however, were not worn indoors the loins. This suggests the portraiture of Syrians on Egyptian monuments, who appear with a cord tied about their long flowing hair. Inasmuch, however, as this would afford no protection against the rays of the sun, to which the peasants were much exposed, this probably very old custom did not survive. It is likely that the Israelites used a head-covering similar to that of the modern Bedouin. It consisted of a rectangular piece of woolen keffiyeh, which is folded into triangular form diagonally and placed over the head in such a manner as to let the middle portion hang over the neck and thus protect it, while the two ends are drawn under the chin and thrown behind the head. A thick cord of wool, 'akāl, holds the piece upon the head. In later times it was the custom of the Israelites, both men and women, to wear a head-covering more like the turban of the fellahin of to-day. These wear a piece of cotton, folded twice or thrice and worked into the form of a small cap, ṭakṭīye, which protects the other parts of the head-gear from perspiration.

Over this is laid one, sometimes two, felt caps (lobbade) and the Turkish national headwear of a red turbush or fez. About this finally is wound a piece of unbleached cotton cloth with red stripes and fringes, or a colored flowered kerchief, or a yellow and red striped keffiyeh, or a black cashmere shawl, or a piece of white muslin, or a piece of green cloth. Such a piece of head-wear not only protects the head from the rays of the sun, but serves as a pillow and is a hiding-place for all sorts of valuables. This sort of head-covering is referred to in the turban, tsānāph, hood, RV of Is 3 23 (cf. Job 29 14 'diadem'). For the act of putting on, the term 'cover,' hābhash (Ezk 16 10; Ex 29 9; Jon 2 6), is ordinarily used. But this properly signifies nothing more than 'to bind about,' while tsānaph means 'to roll up after the fashion of a coil' (cf. Is 22 18). How the winding of the miter, tsānāph (Zec 3 5), of the high priest differed from the common process is not known.

The bridegroom was distinguished by a decoration of the head called head-tire, p'ēr (Ezk 24 17, 23; Is 3 20, bonnet AV 61 3; garland RV), which consisted of kerchiefs wound together and was probably worn over the turban (Ex 39 28, 'bonnet' AV). In ancient times the veil was used by women only in certain cases. In fact, the only mention of it is when the bride veiled herself before the bridegroom (Gn 24 65, 29 22 ff.). In later days, the veil and similar articles of apparel under foreign influences became more customary among the upper classes (Is 3 16 ff.). The veil, tsānāph, is properly nothing but a square piece of cloth (Gn 24 65). Mufflers, r'ālōth (Is 3 19), are probably veils consisting of two pieces, of which the one began over the eyes and was carried backward over the head, thus falling on the neck, while the other began under the eyes and hung down over the breast.

9. Mourning Garments. Sackcloth, saq, was the distinctive apparel of mourners in all ages. It was a garment woven from either goat's or camel's hair and was worn next the skin (Job 16 15), either as the only piece of clothing (I K 20 31, 21 27; Is 3 24, 32 11) or as an undergarment (II K 6 30). It was held together by a girdle (Ezk 7 18; Is 20 2). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS.

II. ORNAMENTS. 1. Worn by Men. From the earliest days, it was the habit of men for the purpose of display to carry a staff (matteh) and a signet-ring (hōthām). According to Herodotus (I, 195) and Strabo (XVI, i, 20) every Babylonian carried a seal-ring and a staff, the head of which was ornamented with a carved flower. From Gn 38 18 the same may be inferred regarding the ancient Israelite.

Amulets Collected in Cyprus.

The signet-ring, hōthām or ṭabba'ath, was important, because the imprint of the seal took the place of the personal signature. It was not worn, as among the Egyptians, on the finger, but in the earlier days hung by a cord from the neck (Gn 38 18). Only later was it put on the finger of the right hand (Jer 22 24).

2. Worn by Women. Much more numerous were the articles of personal adornment among women, as to-day in the Orient. Specially common is the mention of ear- and nose-rings (nezem, Pr 25 12; Is 3 21). Earrings, on account of their round form, are called 'āghāl (Nu 31 50) and on account of their drop-like shape, n'āphōth (pendants Is 3 19, chains AV; Jg 8 26, collars AV). For these pearls were used. According to Gn 35 4, Jg 8 24 f., men also wore such earrings, which served as amulets (bhāshām, Is 3 20), as did also other articles of adornment. The term hah (Ex 35 22) 'bracelet' AV, 'brooch' ARV, indicates some sort of ornamental hook or ring (so BDB.), but just what is unknown. The nose-ring, or nose-jewel, was fastened to the nose as at present in the Orient, where either one of the nostrils or the partition between them is pierced for this purpose (cf. Gn 24 47; Is 3 21; Ezk 16 12; Pr 11 22).

Necklaces, hālā (Pr 25 12; Song 7 2, earrings RV),

helyāh (Hos 2 15, 'earring' RV), and 'ānāq (Song 4 9; Pr 1 9, chains RV), were worn by women (Ezk 16 11; Song 4 9) and by men (Pr 1 9, 3 3). These were often not simply single silver or golden rings, but chains and cords, adapted to neckwear (cf. Song 4 9). More frequently pearls or corals, also disks of metal, were strung on a cord (cf. Song 1 10). On such neck-chains other articles of adornment were fastened, e.g., perfume-boxes or flasks, bāūē nephesh (Is 3 20), crescents, sahārōnīm (Is 3 18 round tires like the moon AV), and perhaps miniature suns, cauls RV, shvkh-

sim. These are found also in the decoration of camels (Jg 8 21, 28). They evidently served the purpose of amulets. Probably the armlets, kāmāz, of Ex 35 22, Nu 31 50, were also neck-ornaments—possibly beads of gold strung together in a chain. What was the appearance of the neck-chain, rābhādh (Gn 41 42), we do not know.

Bracelets, tsāmūdh, are mentioned several times (Gn 24 22 f., Ezk 16 11, 23 42). How these differed from the 'els'ādahā (Nu 31 50; II S 1 10) is not known. Probably the latter encircled the upper arm and the former the wrist. The bracelets or 'chains' of Is 3 18 (RVmg.) were in any case an adornment of the arms like the shērōth of the present day. Finger-rings, ṭabbā'ōth, were also worn by women (Is 3 21).

On the girāle were often carried all sorts of articles of adornment such as perfume-flasks and purses or satchels (Is 3 22, crisping-pins AV), hārā'im, which, however, more often served an ornamental rather than a useful purpose.

Foot with Anklet- and Toe-Rings.

On the feet were worn spangles, 'ākhāšīm (Is 3 18, anklets). These were fastened to the ankles and hung over the feet. The spangles of the two feet were linked together by a chain (ts'ādahā, Is 3 20, ornament of the legs AV, ankle-chains RV) in order to measure off the steps taken by the wearer. The tinkling of these chains is referred to in Is 3 16 (cf. I K 14 6).

DROUGHT. See PALESTINE, §§ 19, 20.

DRUNKENNESS: This was not an uncommon vice in ancient Israel. Noah, Lot, and Nabal are mentioned as being drunken, and in Isaiah's day prophets and priests seem to have been addicted to too free a use of intoxicants (Is 28 7). That Eli should accuse Hannah of being drunk implies that women did not escape the allurements of this vice (I S 1 13). The many warnings of the Wise man (Pr 20 1, 23 31) and the figures of speech based upon the staggering of the drunken man (Ps 107 27; Job 12 25; Is 19 14) are evidences of the frequency of the evil and its power in Hebrew society. That the Savior was termed a wine-bibber, that the Apostles should be accused of being drunk with new wine on the Day of Pentecost, indicate that this vice prevailed also in N T times (Ac 2 13). Among the Hebrews the rich rather than the poor seem to have fallen easy victims to this evil (Is 5 11). The intoxicant is usually termed strong drink (Heb. shēkhār, Gr. σικέρα, Lk 1 15), altho wine is also mentioned as an inebriating beverage. The shēkhār was usually made from fruits—grapes, pomegranates, apples, and dates; but also from grain and honey. A Nazirite was strictly forbidden to use any form of strong drink (Nu 6 3, 8), and the priests were not allowed to use it while on duty (Lv 10 9; cf. Ezk 44 21). Under certain circumstances it could be used as a libation (Nu 28 7; Dt 14 26). In a similar manner the Babylonians used šikaru (strong drink) in their ritual.

DRUSILLA, dru-sil'ā (Δροσυλλα): Granddaughter of Herod the Great and wife of Felix (Ac 24 24). See HEROD, § 9.

DRY THROAT. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

DUKE: The chieftain of a tribe (see TRIBES, § 1).

DULCIMER, dol'si-mēr. See MUSIC, § 3 (6).

DUMAH, dū'mā (דומה, dūmah), 'silence': I A son of Ishmael (Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 20), regarded commonly, however, as a tribal or geographical designation. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

II. 1. In Is 21 11, Dumah is rendered by LXX. as Ἰδουμαία, and may be either an undesigned corruption of Edom or more probably a mystic name of the land. According to still another view, the word in this passage is not a proper noun but an appellative, Massā' dūmah = 'Oracle of Silence' (Dillmann). 2. A city in the mountains of Judea (Jos 15 52). According to Eusebius (Onomast., 250) a large village in the Daroma, 17 m. from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), modern Daume, where important ruins, foundation-walls, rock tombs, and cisterns are to be found (Guérin, Judée, iii. 359 f.). DUNG: This term is frequently used as expressing contempt, worthlessness, or humiliation (e.g., II K 9 37; Ps 83 10; Mal 2 3; and cf. AV rendering of Ph 3 8, 'refuse' RV). The reference in Ezk 4 12 f. is to the common use of the dung of cattle as fuel in the East.

DUNGEON. See PRISON.

DUNG GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

DURA, dū're (דורא): The name of the plain where Nebuchadrezzar set up his golden image (Dn 31). The word dūrā may be the same as the Assyr. dūru, 'wall.' Three places of this name are mentioned in the Assyr. inscriptions. There is also a small river Dura about 6 m. S. of Babylon, on the banks of which are some mounds called the Mounds of Dura. No closer identification of the place mentioned in Dn is as yet possible. E. E. N.

DUST: In a few passages (Ex 9 9; Dt 28 24 ['powder']; Is 5 24, 29 5; Nah 1 3; Ezk 26 10) the Heb. means literally 'fine dust.' In most O T instances the Heb. word is 'āphār, the fine soil of the earth's surface, often used figuratively. To 'shake off the dust of one's feet' was symbolical of freedom from further responsibility or intercourse (Mt 10 14, etc.). See also MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 2. E. E. N.

E

EAGLE (נֶשֶׁךְ, nesher, Gr. ἀετός): The word is used without discriminating between different varieties. Even vultures appear to be called eagles sometimes, cf. Mic 1 16. When strictly used the eagle is made the figure of rapidity of motion (II S 1 23; La 4 19; Rev 12 14), of pride and indomitable spirit (Job 39 27; Pr 30 19), and of strength (Ps 103 5). It appears also in apocalyptic passages symbolically embodying the ideas of strength and keenness of vision (Ezk 10 14; Rev 47). See also PALESTINE, §25. A. C. Z.

EAR: The ear was often made the symbol of willingness to obey God's law. In the ceremony of the consecration of the priest the tip of the ear was anointed with oil in token of readiness to listen to the voice of God (Lv 8 23 f.). The opposite of willingness to receive God's will and to do it is called the 'uncircumcised ear' (Jer 6 10; Ac 7 51), or the 'heavy ear' (Is 6 10). To 'incline the ear' (Ps 17 6) or 'bow down the ear' (Ps 31 2) is to show a favorable disposition toward a petitioner. See also SLAVERY. A. C. Z.

EAR OF GRAIN (Gn 41 5; Mk 2 23 and ||s, etc.): Since the grain of Bible lands was not corn, as this word is commonly used in America (i.e., maize), but barley, rye, or wheat, the 'ears' spoken of are the heads containing the grains. E. E. N.

EAR, TO, and EARING: Terms that are used several times in the AV (e.g., in I S 8 12; Dt 21 4; Is 30 24; Gn 45 6; Ex 34 21) in their old sense of 'to plow' or 'till'; cf. RV and see AGRICULTURE, § 4; and also TIME, § 4. E. E. N.

EARLY: To 'rise up early' is a favorite phrase in Jer (7 13, 11 7, 25 4, etc.; cf. also Pr 27 14), and is used (of God) to express great eagerness and diligence in effort.

EARLY RAIN. See PALESTINE, § 19.

EARNEST: This represents ἀρραβών, a Semitic word, נָכָבִין with the general meaning of 'pledge' or 'surety' (cf. Gn 38 17 f.), later introduced into Greek and Latin, probably through the Phenicians, as a term of trade, and meaning the portion of purchase money in commercial transactions which is given in advance as a pledge for the payment of the remainder, English 'caution-money,' 'arles penny.' Cf. II Co 1 22, 5 5, Eph 1 14, where it is used of the Holy Spirit as the 'foretaste and pledge' of the Christian's heavenly inheritance. In ecclesiastical Greek it is sometimes used also of baptism and betrothal.

S. D.—E. E. N.

EAR-RING. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2.

EARTH, EARTHEN, EARTHY: The terms rendered are: (1) 'erets, which is the most comprehensive term, meaning 'the earth' as distinct from the heavens (Gn 1 1), but also used in a great variety of applications. (2) 'ādhāmāh, the earth as tillable, or habitable, often used in a more general sense, and also of the soil or ground. (3) 'āphār, 'soil' or 'dust' (in only a few passages). (4) רֶחַץ (in the N T), which combines the usage of (1) and (2). (5) heres, 'earthenware,' and yōtsār, (lit. 'of the potter, cf. II S 17 28), are sometimes rendered 'of earth' or 'earthen' in the O T, as is also the corresponding Greek term in the N T (II Co 4 7; II Ti 2 20). In Dn 2 10 the Aram. means 'dry land.' In RV tēbhāl, 'world,' is occasionally rendered 'earth.' In I Co 15 47 f., χοῖνός, 'earthy,' means 'of the material of the earth.' See also COSMOGONY, §3. E. E. N.

EARTHQUAKE<sup>1</sup> (רָאָשׁ, σεισμός): Palestine and Syria have always been subject to frequent seismic disturbances, ranging from the grand convulsions of prehistoric ages to slight shocks in recent years. The recorded earthquakes have usually been most violent in the N.; so that while Antioch, Aleppo, Baalbek, Beirūt, and other cities of Syria have often been overthrown with fearful loss of life, Jerusalem has suffered comparatively little. Josephus (Ant. XV 5 2) describes an earthquake in Judea in 31 b. c. in which about ten thousand men perished by the fall of houses. G. A. Smith (Jerusalem I, 74) thinks that the 'dragon well' of Neh. 2 13 was a spring caused by an earthquake, which afterward disappeared. The most terrible earthquake that Palestine has known during modern times occurred Jan. 1, 1837, when Safed was wholly destroyed with a loss of 4,000 lives, and the shocks traveled, with decreasing force, as far as Hebron.

An earthquake is mentioned in I S 14 15, and there was also a famous one during the reign of Uzziah (Am 1 1; Zec 14 5). There were miraculous earthquakes at the Crucifixion (Mt 27 54) and Resurrection (Mt 28 2), the former being accompanied by darkness (Mt 27 45) and fissures (Mt 27 51; cf. Nu 16 31 f.). A 'great earthquake' shook the prison-house at Philippi (Ac 16 26). Possibly the subsidence of the Vale of Siddim (q.v.) was due to seismic action. Most of the Biblical earthquakes, however, either accompany theophanies (Ex 19 18; cf. Jg 5 4 f.; Ps 68 8; I K 19 11), or else are used as terrible symbols of the Divine majesty and judgment (Ps 18 7; Is 29 6; Mt 24 7; Rev 8 5, etc.). Probably all earthquakes were thought to be directly caused by God (Job 9 6; Jer 10 10). L. G. L.—E. C. L.

EAST (as the determinative point of the compass): With the Hebrews, as with other Orientals, the E. was the determining point of the compass, probably because it was the place of the sunrising. While the E. is often called mizrah, 'the sunrising,' it is also called qedhem—i.e., 'before' or 'the front.' To look toward the place of the sunrising was to look 'before' one.

The West was 'behind one,' tho, since the Mediterranean Sea lay W. of Palestine, the usual expression for W. was 'seaward' (cf. Ezk 47 20 with Dt. 11 24).

The South lay on the 'right hand' (cf. I S 23 24), tho other terms for S. were used, as dārôm and neghebbh (the 'South' in RV [e.g., Gn 12 9], lit. the dry, waste land S. of Judah).

The North was occasionally called 'the left,' as in Jos 19 27, etc., but the usual word for N. is tsāphōn, 'the hidden,' as the northern regions were the most unknown and full of mystery. In Job 23 8 f. will be found a complete illustration of the Heb. usage of the terms 'before,' 'behind,' 'left,' 'right' as equivalent to E., W., N., S. (cf. also Ezk 47 15-20). See also GEOGRAPHY, § 3. E. E. N.

EAST, EAST COUNTRY, CHILDREN OF THE EAST: These terms were often used in a somewhat loose sense, politically, to designate (1) the inhabitants of the country E. (and NE. of Gn 20 1) of Palestine, especially the nomadic tribes (Ezk 25 4; Jer 49 28) of the Syrian Desert, which correspond to the modern Bedouin. Some, if not all, of these peoples were regarded as descending from the concubines of Abraham (Gn 25 6), and therefore closely related to the Israelites. The Benē-qedhem ('children of the East') including Kedar (Jer 49 28), are coupled with Midian and Amalek (Jg 6 3 f.), and were neighbors and conquerors of Ammon and Moab (Ezk 25 4, 10). They were famous for their wisdom (I K 4 30), and the scene of the Book of Job is therefore laid among them (Job 1 3). (2) The farther East beyond the Euphrates, the seat of the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian monarchies (cf. Is 43 5; Zec 8 7; Dn 11 44; Mt 2 1). L. G. L.—E. E. N.

EAST GATE. See TEMPLE, § 20.

EAST SEA. See DEAD SEA.

EAST WIND: The hot, dry wind from the desert, that fills the air with dust and is exceedingly unpleasant for man and often fatal to young vegetation. It blows generally in the spring. It is frequently referred to in the O T. On Hab 1 9 (AV) cf. RV. E. E. N.

EASTER. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

EAT: The moral aspects of eating are taken account of in a series of prescriptions and prohibitions on the manner, time, and articles to be eaten (cf. PURIFICATION). 'Eating together' was a sign of community of life, and symbolized either adoption into the household (II S 9 7; Jer 52 33), or entrance into irrevocable covenant (Jer 41 1). This conception underlies the sacrificial meal in which God is taken as a participant (Ex 24 11). It was the worst form of treason, therefore, to break a covenant entered into through the ceremony of eating together (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18). Another moral bearing of eating was seen in the unsatisfying nature of it when not connected with a righteous life (Mic 6 14; Ezk 12 18). Figuratively, to 'eat up' is to destroy (Ps 53 4). See also MEALS. A. C. Z.

EBAL, i'bāl (עָבָל, 'ebhāl): 1. A 'son' of Joktan, son of Eber (I Ch 1 22, called Obal in Gn 10 28); see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 2. The ancestral head of a Horite clan (Gn 36 23).

EBAL, i'bāl, MOUNT. See GERIZIM, MOUNT; and PALESTINE, § 7 (d).

EBED, i'bed (עֶבֶד, 'ebhedh), 'servant': 1. The father of Gaal (Jg 9 20 f.). 2. A leader of the 'sons of Adin,' who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8 6).

EBED-MELECH, i'bed-mī'lek (עֶבֶד-מֶלֶךְ, 'ebhedh melekh), 'servant of the king' or, possibly, 'servant of Melech' (a name for deity): An Ethiopian (Cushite) who was in the service of Zedekiah. He took compassion on the prophet Jeremiah, who had been thrown into a cistern to die of starvation, and obtained permission from the king to rescue him. For his faith in J' he was promised a safe escape in the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 38 7-12, 39 15-18). E. E. N.

EBENEZER, eb'ī-nī'zār (עֵבֶנֶזֶר, 'ebhen hā 'āzer), 'stone of [the] help': A stone set up by Samuel to commemorate a victory over the Philistines upon the site of the battle where it was obtained (I S 7 12). It was situated a few miles N. of Jerusalem between Mizpah and Shen, and became a familiar landmark in local descriptions. The other two occurrences of the name (I S 4 1, 5 1) necessitate a locality much further west. A. C. Z.

EBER, i'bār (עֶבֶר, 'ebher): 1. The legendary ancestor of one of the (geographical) divisions of the Semitic race (Gn 10 21, etc., also Nu 24 24). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 2. The ancestral head of one of the Gadite clans (I Ch 5 13; Heber AV). 3. A son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 12). 4. A son of Shashak, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 22; Heber AV). 5. A priest, head of the family of Amok (Neh 12 20).

EBEZ, i'bez (עִבְיָ, 'ābhēts; Abez AV): A town in Issachar (Jos 19 20) not certainly identified.

EBIASAPH, i-bai'a-saf (עִבְיָאֶסָפִי, 'ebhyāsāph), 'the father gathers' (or 'adds'). The correct form is Abiasaph as in AV at Ex 6 24: A Korahite Levite, represented in Ex 6 24; I Ch 9 19 as 'son' of Korah, in other passages (I Ch 6 22 f., 37) as a more remote descendant. He was probably considered the ancestor of a division of Levites of postexilic days.

E. E. N.

EBONY. See PALESTINE, § 21.

EBRON, i'bren (עִבְרֹן, 'ebhrōn): A town of Asher, wrongly called Hebron in AV (Jos 19 28); perhaps the same as Abdon. Map IV, B5.

EBRONAH, eb-rō'na. See ABRONAH.

ECCLESIASTES, ek-li'zī-as'tīz: 1. Title. 'Ecclesiastes, or the Preacher,' is derived from the LXX. translation. The Hebrew title is 'Qōhéleth,' or, in full, 'The words of Qōhéleth, son of David, king in Jerusalem.' The LXX. translators regarded Q. as meaning 'one who is a member of, or who addresses an Ecclesia (ἐκκλησία),' an assembly of people of any kind, and therefore named the book Ecclesiastes (Ἐκκλησιαστής). The real meaning of Q. is unknown. Its root suggests the assembling of persons. It is used in the book as a masculine proper name, a nickname, for Solomon, and was certainly meant to be intelligible in that sense to the first readers. Probably it alludes to some story about Solomon now lost. The different renderings, 'collector of sayings,' 'convener,' 'Wisdom' personified in Solomon, 'great orator,' have no real basis.

2. Plan of Book. Ecclesiastes is unique in the extant literature of the Hebrews in that it is a self-communion on the part of the author, something between reflections jotted down as they arose and an ordered philosophy of life, much as in the 'Two Voices' of Tennyson or Fitzgerald's 'Omar Khayyam.' Evidently it was written in the first place by the author for himself, or, perhaps, his friends, and came to the wider public only through some accident. Thus it falls in the class of the 'Pensées' of Pascal, the 'Religio Medici' of Sir Thomas Browne, and the 'Meditations' of Marcus Aurelius. But it goes beyond these in that it has a dramatic element, and tries to reconstruct a historical character. The author takes the figure of Solomon, who had asked of God wisdom and had had added thereto riches, whom the unchanging tradition of the East describes as a preeminently successful man, whatever the religious might say of him, and he asks what such a man, in the end, got out of life. So he creates for us Solomon philosophizing, reciting what he had done, how much had been really worth while, and how the scheme of the universe struck him. But Solomon, speaking thus from the dead ('I . . . was king,' I 11), is only a mask for the author himself, and after the first two chapters he takes off the mask and, except for an occasional 'Qōhéleth,' speaks of himself, his own times and vicissitudes. Apart from this, the book is planless; one idea suggests another, but there is no orderly development. Yet, toward the end, as often in Hebrew books, come a couple of chapters which hold fairly together with some continuity of thought, leading naturally to a finish in the same phrase as that at the opening.

3. Date. One or two allusions seem historical (4 13 ff., 9 14 ff.), but have not been satisfactorily identified. The general atmosphere suggests a time of oppression and the overturning of old things when the wise man will find safety in quiet withdrawal; but also to be remembered are the aristocratic aloofness and philosophic disdain of the author. Finally, the language is unique in the O T, resembling its latest parts, and even post-Biblical Hebrew of the time of the Mishna. Sometimes it is very clumsy, simply scribbled; at others it is handled with elaborate and loving literary skill. Here, too, the strongly subjective personality of the author must be considered; he may easily have been an antiquarian in language, or a lover of the phrases of the marketplace. Possible dates range from the later Persian through the Greek period, perhaps even down to Herod the Great in the Roman period. It is certainly after Malachi (Mal 2 7; cf. Ec 5 6), and most probably before Ecclesiasticus (c. 200 B. C.); almost certainly before the Maccabean revival (168-142 B. C.). There may be general Greek influence, but specific philosophical influence is still unproved. The bases of his thought are Semitic and Hebrew.

4. Fundamental Ideas. (a) Theoretical. (I) The author does not dream of questioning the existence of a personal Being, a Will, omnipotent, omniscient who is absolute ruler of the universe. This, for him, is beyond question. This Being he calls God ('Elohim'), not Yahweh (Jehovah), and His relations are with the entire human race; there is no thought of an elect family or of any process of revelation. In one or two places the author gives advice expressly opposed to the Mosaic code (6 9, 9 9; cf. Nu 15 39; Dt 29 19). His references to public religious functions are general and suggest that men should rather refrain therefrom (5 1 ff.). (II) Between Genesis and Paul he is the only Biblical writer to refer to the Fall. It and its consequences were, for him, of the first importance. Through the Fall man became an object of apprehension to God. The fear of God had to be impressed upon him lest he climb further. Thus it was not a Fall to the author but a step upward which brought loss of tranquility. So God has arranged all the workings of the universe in circles, and appointed to each event its due season in which it is 'beautiful,' i.e., into which it fits. The circles are too great for man to trace them, but they negate all real progress, and explain how good things and bad come each in their turn. Thus all life is transitory (vain), is recurrent, and is incalculable. Judgment is the turning of the wheel, with its opposites, and the coming of each thing in its turn (3 17, 11 9). But still further to confuse the scheme of the world for man and thus keep him down, God has put something in his heart (3 11). What this is is obscure. One rendering is 'eternity,' another is the 'world'; a probable conjecture is 'toil.' Man has become like God, knowing good and evil, and to prevent him going further he is put under the curse of toil. So man can not help toiling, altho against his primary nature, and must puzzle himself over the problems of the world; such puzzling is in his blood.

God made men simple, but they have made for themselves many reckonings of life (7 20; cf. 25, 27). (III) The rule of God is non-moral. The circlings bring now good, now bad; each from God. Sin is a mistake in one's attitude toward God, by which He is angered; the good man is he who is good before God. Whence comes the absolute moral sense in man which revolts against this, the author does not state. The question had never apparently occurred to him just as it had not to the Poet of Job.

(IV) With this world life is over. This, too, is based on the early stories in Genesis. Man is dust out of the ground; God breathed into him the breath of life; at death the dust returns to the dust and the breath sinks back into God; all is over (12 7). There is no difference in this between man and the beasts (3 18 ff.). Yet in his time there evidently existed a doctrine of spiritual existence after death which he did not accept.

5. (b) Practical. (I) It is for man to accept the universe, including all this, as he finds it. He can not change it. Above all, he must fear God, who, if angered, may destroy him. His attitude should be that toward an absolute earthly monarch; compare 5 1 ff. and 8 1 ff. (II) It is for man to make the best of this—that is, to enjoy in a temperate, decent manner the good things which life offers, and, above all, to work and find pleasure in working; he will never have any in the results of working. Work, and joy in the working is his gospel; also not to worry over the government of things, over good and evil. That way lies madness, and the wise man must shut his eyes and take what God sends him, happy if God grants him with it the power to enjoy. Thus he may overcome the curse in a fashion, but he can never escape from his prison-house. (III) For all this wisdom is an advantage, if only that the wise man sees the path he treads and the end to which he goes. It teaches him to beware of excess and to meet each situation with the fitting action, good or evil. All life is of God, and the fearer of God will do his duty by all (7 13-18). But we have always to remember what he means by 'God' and what by 'the fear of God.'

6. The Man and His Book. He is intensely personal; the last product of the old Wisdom School; deeply impressed by the older wisdom writer who molded the stories of the Fall in Genesis. Only sympathetic reading will make him and his book intelligible. To some both will always be repellent. But probably no other book of the O T creates so friendly a relationship with those who care for it. For them he is a great-hearted gentleman who faced life steadily, even such a nightmare as was his theology, and who did his duty bravely by the elan vital of which he was equally sure. So we feel that this man is real; he is talking out himself. He has the gift, too, of charm in his style. He could not have written to publish. How that came about we can not tell. For all this Sir Thomas Browne is his nearest parallel. Very possibly 12 9-14 were added by his editor; they can not be by himself. Apart from this epilog the text is generally sound. In 3 17 read, 'for he hath appointed a time.' In 5 20 read, 'God busies him with.' In 6 3 read, 'even though he have a burial.' In 11 1 read margin; the reference is to prudent business enterprise. In 12 1 read 'remember thy well,' compare Pr 5 15-18 and 9 9. Throughout understand 'vain,' 'vanity,' as 'transitory,' 'transitoriness.'

LITERATURE: For exegesis the English reader will find most trustworthy the translation of Delitzsch's commentary. But through theological prepossession he completely misunderstood the author's broad position. That by Plumptre in the Cambridge Bible is a still unsurpassed treasury of literary and philosophical parallels. For the book as a whole and for further bibliography he should use Davidson's article in EB. Most English commentaries are unsatisfactory. The best is by Barton, ICC. (1908). D. B. M.

ECCLESIASTICUS: 1. Title. The Book of Ecclesiasticus, in some respects the most important of the O T Apoc, has been known by various names. In the Greek MSS. (A and B) it is entitled Wisdom of Jesus, Son of Sirach, in B Wisdom of Sirach. The Latin Church Fathers, beginning with Cyprian, referred to it as 'Ecclesiasticus,' i.e., the 'church book,' because of its frequent use in the churches for catechetical instruction. The Greek Church Fathers called it 'The All-Virtuous Wisdom' (Πανάρητος Σοφία). In the Talmudic period, the Jews spoke of it as the 'Book of Ben Sira.'

2. The Author. Near the close of the book (50 27) the author says of himself: 'Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem hath written in this book the instruction of understanding and knowledge.' Very little is known of this 'Ben Sira' as he is called in later Jewish writings. The opinions that he was a priest or that he was a physician have not been clearly established. Certainly he was a man of culture and wide experience. This we learn not only from the statements of the prolog, but from the book itself. From this latter source we know that he traveled quite extensively (34 11), and that he was exposed to danger (51 12). While faithful to the Law, he shows sympathy with some customs which he encountered in his travels, and reveals his contact with Hellenistic thought. He was a Jewish philosopher firmly convinced of the superiority and worth of his own faith, and yet liberal enough to recognize what was strong and worthy outside the bounds of Judaism (39 1-5).

3. Date. The two data used in determining the date of Ecclesiasticus are: (a) the reference to Simon, the high priest, the son of Onias (50 1), and (b) the statement in the prolog that the translation of the book arrived in Egypt 'in the eighth and thirtieth year when Euergetes was king.' The first datum has been the subject of much discussion, owing to the fact that there were two high priests—each of them 'Simon the son of Onias.' The first was Simon 'the Just,' who flourished c. 310-291 B.C.; the second was Simon II, son of Onias II, 219-199 B.C. The balance of evidence brought out in this discussion seems to favor Simon II. The second datum is much more definite. The Euergetes referred to in the Prolog was Ptolemy VII, Physcon, called Euergetes II. Ptolemy III (247-222 B.C.), who also bore the title of Euergetes, reigned only 25 years, while Physcon reigned 54 years in all, being coregent with his brother for 25 years (170-145 B.C.). In the thirty-eighth year of Physcon's reign (this seems the more natural application of the reckoning) the grandson went to Egypt, and shortly after made the translation of his grandfather's work, perhaps in c. 131 B.C. Two generations carry us back to the early part of the 2d cent. B.C. as the probable date of the book. Schürer fixes the time as 190-170 B.C.

4. Contents. The great theme of the book is Wisdom. It is therefore to be classified with the Wisdom literature, whose purpose was to give 'a universal moral-religious criticism of life.' The book may be divided into two great divisions. Part I, including chapters 1-43, is devoted to the consideration of Wisdom in both its doctrinal and practical aspects. Part II, including chapters 44-50, is given to the praise of famous men. There seems to be no special definite plan controlling the material. The writer seeks to set forth the bearing and value of Wisdom in every relation of life. The most convenient division of Part I is that suggested by Deane (Expos. 1883), in accordance with which chapters 1-22 form the first subdivision and the prayer in 23-36 brings it to a close. The second subdivision extends to 35-43 and also closes with a prayer, 36-43. The third ends with the hymn of praise on the works of creation, 42-43. The first verse of the book is virtually the text for the whole. 'All wisdom cometh from the Lord and is with him forever.' In the mind of the author Wisdom begins in the fear of the Lord and continues in the constant recognition of man's twofold relationship—to God and to man. No life can be wise that is not in accord with the Divine commandments. There is no earthly condition or relationship where Wisdom should not manifest itself, and so the author traverses in thought every human situation—sorrow, joy, fortune, misfortune, poverty, riches, sickness, health, the family, business, government—telling what Wisdom should be and accomplish in them all. It is in these particulars that we catch a view of the customs and culture of his time. He speaks as a man of his time who, with ripe culture and earnest spirit, seeks to lift the life about him. Nor is it alone on the human side that he considers this great reality, Wisdom. Wisdom is ever with God, the first-born of His creatures, the archetype for all the works of God. Wisdom is from the beginning and is immanent in God. Because God is Wisdom, man can not comprehend Him. Wisdom is the creative power of the world (24-3) and is eternal (1-1). As in the Book of Wisdom, so here Wisdom is personified and hypostatized. For man there could be no higher setting forth of this Wisdom than in the Law, hence man must be faithful to the Law. Thereby he can and will manifest the fruits of Wisdom. When it comes to the consideration of the problems made by the conception of Divine Wisdom, and the inequalities of life, little attempt is made at explanation. The writer is a predestinarian (16-26, 23-20, 33-10-13). He does not fail, however, to emphasize both the justice and mercy of God. He has nothing to say of the immortality of the soul nor of the resurrection of the body. While he accepts the facts of sin, he estimates its punishment as well as the rewards of righteousness chiefly in terms of this life (11-28, 21-4, 23-24-27). Forgiveness of sin is dependent chiefly on almsgiving and prayer (3-30, 17-25, 29-12). Despite what might be expected from the declaration that Wisdom begins in the fear of the Lord, there is in the book a certain external satisfaction of the demands of righteousness which does not accord with a truly wise life. Observances of rites, expectations of earthly gain, and personal comfort are considered at times apart from any real spiritual association. It may be justly said that with all its exalted teaching, the book lacks in spiritual tone. In this way it presents some striking contradictions. It extols purity, sympathy, truthfulness, and kindness, and yet note the author's aversion to women (9-2), his treatment of an enemy (12-10-11), and how he would punish a servant (42-5). These are but samples of the Wisdom which has not yet learned the deepest meaning of 'fearing the Lord.' Widely varying estimates have been made of the tone of the book, but it may with truth be said that the general tone 'is worthy of the first contact between the two great civilizations of the ancient world (Jewish and Hellenistic), and it breathes a spirit which an Isaiah would not have condemned nor a Sophocles or a Theophrastus have despised.'

5. The Text. Until a few years ago Ecclesiasticus was known only from the Greek and Syriac versions, and such translations as were made from them. The original was in Hebrew, as the translator in the Prolog declares. Jerome knew a Hebrew text and in rabbinic writings there are citations from the Hebrew. Until recently this original was lost. In 1896 came the good news that a fragment of it had been discovered among manuscripts brought by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, two English ladies, from the East. This discovery was followed by another of nine leaves from the same volume to which the Lewis fragment belonged. As these came from Cairo, means were taken to make further search and as a result to-day about two-thirds of Heb. text has been recovered. The textual value of this Heb. material is very great, in spite of the fact that it by no means always represents the actual original text. With the aid of this new material in many places where the Greek and other versions are obscure or incorrect we can now be sure of what the original Heb. was and an intelligible reading is secured.

6. Recognition of Ecclesiasticus. Altho never regarded as canonical by the Jews, Ecclesiasticus was held by them in high esteem. It is often cited in the Talmud, and in one passage (Bab. Talmud, Brakhot, 48a), with the formula 'it is written' applied elsewhere to acknowledged books. There are no citations from it in the N.T. Resemblances of thought are found between it and the Epistle of James, but direct quotation from it on the part of James can not be established. Direct quotations begin with Clement of Alexandria, who uses the formula ἡ γραφή λέγει. Origen uses the same. Augustine and Jerome both distinguish it from canonical books, but give it a high place for purposes of moral instruction.

From the end of the 2d cent. the book has been much used in the Church. By some its authorship was given to Solomon; by all it was cited with respect. The numerous versions of it testify to the honor in which it was held. In the MSS. of the Greek Bibles it was generally grouped with the other poetical works of the O. T. So in the Western Church it was at an early date grouped with Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom, and attributed to Solomon. The Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397) included it in the Hebrew canon. The Council of Trent (1546) declared it canonical. While in Protestantism it has been reckoned uncanonical, its worth has always had full recognition.

7. Its Real Value. Apart from the high moral instruction which it contains the book has an especial value for the following reasons: (a) It gives us a picture of manners, customs, and thinking in a time otherwise not much known. (b) It shows us how a broad-minded Jew looked upon the questions which a complex civilization brought. The book shows traces of Greek influence. Nestle speaks of the book as 'the chief monument of primitive Sadduceeism' (HDB IV, 549). (c) It contributes testimony to the formation of the Hebrew canon, especially in the arrangement of the 'Hymn of the Fathers.' Chs. 44-50.

LITERATURE: Commentaries: Cowley and Neubauer have published a translation of the Hebrew text, 3915-4911 (Clarendon Press, Oxford). R. Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach Text (Heb.), translation (German), Glossary and Commentary, 2 vols. (1906). W. O. E. Oesterley, Ecclesiastical, in Camb. Bible (1912), very good. ECSTASY. See TRANCE.

ED (עֵד, 'ēdh), 'witness' (Jos 22 34): The Hebrew text here is not in order. It reads literally, 'They called the altar 'it is a witness between us that J' is God.' The Syriac reads, 'and they made an altar of witness,' using the Aramaic expression we find in Gn 31 47. E. E. N.

EDAR, i'dār. See EDER.

EDEN, i'dn (עֵדֶן, 'ēden), 'delight': I. 1. The original residence of the first human pair (Gn 2 8, 15, 3 23, 24); called also 'the garden of God' (Ezk 28 13, 31 9), 'the garden of Jehovah' (Is 51 3), and in non-Biblical usage, Paradise. According to Gn 2 8 ff. J' Himself prepared it and it was abundantly irrigated, furnished with a luxuriance of vegetation, and made the home of all the animals created by J', which here recognized man as their lord. The location of E. has been the subject of many speculations, some of which have nothing but their antiquity to give them interest. Palestine, Syria, Armenia, Mongolia, Kashmir, Merv, Australia, Mesopotamia, and even the North Pole have all been suggested as the site. Of these Lower Mesopotamia and Armenia alone deserve consideration (cf. W. F. Warren, Paradise Found, 1886), and the former seems to correspond more nearly to the description in Gn 2 (cf. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies?, 1881). The description must, however, in any case be regarded as conceived more or less ideally. There is no spot on earth from which one vast river branches into four channels that encircle such tracts of land as are here named. The fact that the Gihon is said to compass the whole land of Cush may be taken as a reason for thinking that the Nile was meant, especially as the sources of the Nile were supposed by many to be located in Asia (cf. Pausanias, II, 5 2; and Strabo, XV, 1 25). The identity of the Pishon is involved with that of the land of Havilah, and as Havilah is said to yield the best quality of gold and precious stones, either India or Arabia could be taken for it. If it were the former, the Pishon must be the Indus; otherwise it is the sea around the Arabian peninsula, which was supposed to be a very wide river (cf. Worcester, Genesis in the Light of Modern Knowledge, 1901; A. R. Gordon, Early Traditions of Genesis, 1907; Driver or Skinner on Genesis, ad loc.; Albright, AJTh, Oct., 1922.). 2. An Aramean kingdom on the right bank of the Euphrates, SW. of Haran (II K 19 12; Is 37 12; Ezk 27 23; Am 1 5). It was conquered by Assurbanipal, King of Assyria (668-626 B.C.). A. C. Z.

II. A Levite in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 12, 31 15). E. E. N.

EDER, i'der (עֵדֶר, 'ēder), 'flock': I. 1. The head of a Levite family (I Ch 23 23). 2. A Benjamite family head (I Ch 8 15).

II. 1. An ancient town of Judah near the southwestern frontier (Jos 15 21). 2. Tower of Eder, or 'flock-tower' (Gn 35 21), lying between Bethlehem and Hebron. Its name indicates that it was used as a watch-tower to protect the flocks against robbers. I. M. P.

EDOM, i'dəm (עֲדָמָה, 'ēdhōm), 'red': The name given to the land SE. of Palestine (Jer 49 17; Ezk 25 12); also called Seir (Gn 32 3; Nu 24 18; Dt 1 44, etc.). The inhabitants were called Edomites (I S 21 7). Its boundaries are somewhat vaguely designated, but at the time of its greatest extension it reached from the Dead Sea S. to Elath and Ezion-geber, while on the E. the Arabian Desert and on the W. the River of Egypt furnished its natural limits. Its length from N. to S. was about 100 m. It is slightly higher at the central portion, sloping on one side toward the Dead Sea and on the other toward the Ælanitic branch of the Red Sea (Gulf of Akabah). At the highest point it rises to 600 ft. above sea-level. It derives its name from the color of the red sandstone of its precipitous hills.

With Israel Moab and Ammon, Edom formed a group of kindred peoples (see ETHNOLOGY and ETHNOGRAPHY, § 9). The knowledge of the kinship between the Israelites and Edomites persisted in tradition from the earliest days, as is shown by the story of their descent from twin brothers (Gn 25 23 ff.). Edom became organized as a kingdom in its own land before this took place with Israel (Gn 36 31-39).

The earliest known contact of E. with Israel is that mentioned in Nu 20 14 ff.; Jg 11 17, when the kings of the country refused the Israelites permission to go through their land, thus compelling them to take the circuitous route to Palestine through Moab. David reduced E. to a tributary of Israel (II S 8 14; Ps 60, title). After the division of the kingdom, Judah maintained its supremacy over E.: for the most part, however, through vassal kings of Edomite stock (II K 3 9; but cf. I K 22 47). Under Joram (849) E. obtained independence (II K 8 20 f.), but lost it again fifty years later when Amaziah routed an army of Edomites and captured their city, Sela (II K 14 7). In 775 Uziah extended his authority farther south, taking even the harbor city, Elath (II K 14 22). At this point the Biblical narrative fails us for a period. The cuneiform inscriptions, however, furnish data from which it appears that Tiglath-pileser III (734) subjugated its king, Kaushmalaka, and in 701 Sennacherib conquered Malikkrammu and annexed E. to the Assyrian empire. The making common cause with Judah against Nebuchadrezzar in 609 (Jer 27 3), the Edomites broke out in a new flame of hatred against their former allies, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (La 4 21; Ob ver. 8 ff.; Ezk 25 12 ff.; Is 34 5, 63 1 ff.). In the postexilic period the Edomites, probably due to the pressure of the Nabatæan Arabs moved into the Southern half of the old territory of Judah, including the region around Hebron. This old Judean territory and the adjacent district S. was now known as Idumæa. The old Edomite land was seized by the Nabatæans, with Petra as the capital. Idumæa was attacked by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 3) in 164 B.C. In 109 B.C. John Hyrcanus conquered it, and compelled its inhabitants to be circumcised (Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1; BJ I, 2 6). By this act the race of Esau was absorbed into that of Jacob. In the N T Idumæa is mentioned only in Mk 3 8; but it was noted as the native land of the Herodian dynasty. In Roman times it was accounted one of the eleven toparchies of Judea (Jos. BJ III, 3 5). See also ESAU.

EDREI, ed'ri-ai (עֲדְרֵי, 'edhre'): 1. One of the residences of Og, King of Bashan (Jos 12 4; Nu 21 33), now the large town of ed-Der'ât, between el-Mezzeirîb and Boşrah. Map I, H 5. Numerous ruins and inscriptions have been found at Edrei, besides a remarkable series of ancient subterranean dwellings, apparently excavated to serve as a refuge in time of siege (Schumacher, Across the Jordan, pp. 121-148; Baedeker, Palestine,<sup>4</sup> p. 152; G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 578). 2. A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 37, P), perhaps identical with 1. See DILLMANN on Dt 3 10. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

EDUCATION: 1. In the Earliest Times. In pre-Deuteronomic Israel, the training of the young appears to have been entirely in the hands of their parents, especially the fathers. No trace of any institution resembling the modern school is to be found; nor is there evidence of any help available to the parent in the form of a familiar method, model, or means of instruction. Both the subject and the method of education were absolutely at his discretion. But from the earliest days the instruction of the young included the inculcation, first of religious ideas, and second, of the traditions of the nation (chiefly the story of the Exodus); and its aim was preeminently to train character. The discipline of chastening inflicted by the parent is an image of that inflicted on Israel by J'' (Dt 8 5).

2. From Deuteronomy to the Exile. With the promulgation of Deuteronomy, a crystallized body of precepts could be put into the hands of the parent to pass over to his children, and a definite injunction was placed upon him to be faithful in this task (Dt 4 9, 6 7). The method of instruction was naturally oral, and the times and conditions, as well as the effectiveness with which the task was performed, depended on the circumstances of each case. It was a great gain, however, to have a definite substance of teaching to impart.

3. Under Ezra. This condition of things lasted with very little practical change until after the Exile. Reading and writing were during this period the accomplishment of the few (II K 5 7, 22 8 ff., 23 2). When Ezra undertook to render the Law (Torah) the organic principle of the national life, he gave the whole subject of education a new impulse. In order to accomplish his end, it was necessary very largely to extend the circle of those who could read the Law, and further to make provision for the circulation of copies of it among the people. Ezra himself was a 'ready scribe' (Ezr 7 6). The number of accredited teachers was greatly increased (Ezr 8 18).

4. The Wise Men as Teachers. Meantime, in the preexilic period, a class of men had appeared who under the name of 'the Wise' (Sages) cultivated a type of erudition with results that survive in the so called Wisdom Literature of the O. T. These, together with the copyists and expounders of the Torah (the Scribes), now became the teachers of Israel. While the substance of the teaching developed into three parts, i.e., the Law, the Traditions (History), and Wisdom, it was all generally under the direction of the same class of teachers. See WISDOM.

5. Proverbs and Its Light on the Subject. The Book of Proverbs, of which the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach is a later reflection, furnishes, under the name instruction, mûšâr (1 2, etc.), a mass of details of the educational ideas of this period. First of all, the instructors of the children were still in the main their parents (Pr 1 8, 4 1-4, 6 20, 13 1, 30 17). The chief substance of the teaching concerned religious matters. The fear of J'' is the beginning ('the chief part' RVmg.) of knowledge (Pr 1 7). Education is of the greatest importance. It means the expulsion of an innate folly (Pr 22 15, cf. 14 7, 18). It is, therefore, a source of great delight to have one's offspring come under its influence (Pr 10 1, 23 24). As a means of enforcing the lessons of life the rod may be used (13 24, 23 13), but with moderation (Pr 19 18 RV).

6. Postexilic Period. In the postexilic period professional teachers made their appearance, and also a place for the meeting of groups of children for instruction was found in the synagog (to-day called Schule in Yiddish, and Scola by the Portuguese Jews). But details as to the beginning of the system are scanty. It is probable that after the synagog-school was organized the children in it were made to memorize the precepts of the Torah verbatim. To this end resort must have been had, as in all primitive countries and in the Orient to-day, to mnemonic helps, such as acrostics and numerical proverbs (cf. Pr chs. 30 and 31).

7. School System Established. The fullest development of the educational system of Palestine, however, is to be found in the Roman period, i.e., from 75 B.C. to 70 A.D. It is a question as to whether Simon ben Shetah or Joshua ben Gamla (Gamaliel) deserves the credit of inaugurating the new system (Schürer stands for the latter, Kennedy [in HDB] and Box [in EB] for the former). Whoever introduced it, it was based upon compulsory attendance of all children. It is certain that under Gamaliel the age for attendance was fixed at from six to seven.

8. The System at Work. The school was held either in the synagog-room or in a separate building on the same premises (Berakh. 17a). The further expansion of the system involved the separation of the students of higher branches from high schools and colleges. Of the synagogues of Jerusalem it is said that each had a Beth Sepher and a Beth Talmud, i.e., a primary and a higher school for the more advanced scholars who might wish to become learned in the Law; a still higher institution (professional) was developed, known as the Beth hammidrash (Yalkut Jes. 257; Jos. Ant. XVIII, 10 5; BJ, I, 372). Similarly, teachers were classed in three groups, the highest grade being that of Sage (Hakima), the second that of Scribe (Saphir), and the third the Master (Hazzan). All together are evidently included in the N T terms doctor (Lk 2 46, teachers), or 'doctors of the law' (Ac 5 34). These were found in every village (Lk 5 17) and were called Rabbis (Jn 3 2). The method of procedure in such schools could not have been different from what may be witnessed in the great Moslem universities at the present day (cf. Ac 22 3). Here scholars seated on the ground in a circle face the teacher, who occupies a seat raised slightly above the pupils. From this position he imparts instruction which the pupil is required to repeat accurately over and over again until he is thoroughly familiar with it. Repetition was so thoroughly identified with this process that both teaching and learning came to be called Mishna, 'repetition.' That the home, however, continued a means of religious training is evident from expressions such as II Ti 3 14.

9. 'Schoolmaster' or 'Tutor.' The task of taking children to school primarily devolved on the parent (Kidd. 30a); but in certain communities the fear that on account of lukewarmness the parents might neglect this duty led to the choice of special officials to perform it (maphtir kenessith [Cholin 51a]). Among the Greeks the same duty devolved on a special servant who, from the infancy of the child, was called the 'child conductor' (Gal 2 24 tutor, schoolmaster AV).

10. Doctrine. The substance of instruction was from the earliest days viewed as something to be seized hold of (leqah, 'doctrine,' Dt 32 2; Job 11 4; Pr 4 2); also what is heard (sh'mū'ah, Is 28 9), but 'message' RV, 'report' RVmg. But in the N T the Gr. διδασκαλία and διδασκαλία, probably 'teaching,' are rendered by 'doctrine' in AV (also in RV in I Ti 5 17; Mt 7 28).

11. Non-Jewish Learning—The question of instruction in other than the Hebrew language, or in other subjects than the wisdom of the Fathers is not a simple one. Officially, nothing but the traditional system was recognized; and yet there are traces of the introduction of Hellenic methods and even of the existence of an institution in Jerusalem which was designed to convey and disseminate Greek philosophy and Greek ideals. In one of these Herod the Great was a student (Jos. Ant. XV, 10 5). At any rate, many Jews did certainly acquire a considerable amount of Greek learning. Some familiarity with it was a necessary qualification for membership in the Sanhedrin, and the Apostle Paul seems to have been versed in it. The distinctive feature of Greek education, which involved the appearance of the pupils in public gymnasia in nude form, was distasteful and offensive to the Jewish sense of modesty (I Mac 1 14 ff.; II Mac 4 10).

12. Education of Women. When education passed out of its household stage its development was almost exclusively with reference to the male members of society. The training of girls remained a task of the mother and had for its main object their preparation for ideal motherhood (Pr 31 27-29).

EGGS. See Food, § 10.

EGLAH, eg'la (עֵגְלָה, 'eghlāh), 'heifer': One of David's wives, mother of Ithream (II S 3 5; I Ch 3 3). The expression 'David's wife' in these passages awakens the suspicion that originally the name of a former husband was read, as in the case of Abigail, 'wife of Nabal' (II S 3 3). E. E. N.

EGLAIM, eg'la-im (עֵגְלַיִם, 'eghlāyim): A city of Moab (Is 15 8), not yet identified.

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH, eg'loth-shel'ī-shai'ya (עֵגְלַת שְׁלִישִׁיָּה, 'eghlath shēlishiyāh): A term used in Is 15 5; Jer 48 34, apparently as a place-name as in RV, altho 'the third Eglath' would be a very unusual form for a proper name. Many scholars suspect a corruption of the text. See Gray in ICC, ad loc. E. E. N.

EGLON, eg'lon (עֵגְלוֹן, 'eghlōn), 'circle': I. A king of Moab who formed an alliance with Ammon and Amalek against Israel in the period of the Judges, and held the Israelites in subjection for 18 years (Jg 3 12-14). When his tyranny became intolerable, Ehud, the left-handed Benjamite, upon the pretext of bringing him the annual tribute, secured a private interview and assassinated him (Jg 3 15-25). Cf. Moore in ICC.

II. A city of the Amorites in the Shephelah. Its king, Debir, joined the alliance of the five cities against Joshua (Jos 10 3). With the collapse of the allies, it fell into the hands of Joshua and was destroyed (Jos 10 16-27). The mod. Khīrbet 'Ajlān preserves the name, altho as to the identity with ancient city there is no certainty. See Map II, C 2.

EGYPT: I. INTRODUCTORY.—The word Egypt is from the Gr. ἡ Αἴγυπτος (whence the modern Copt, through the Arab. Kibt). In the OT it corresponds geographically to the Hebrew מִצְרַיִם (English, Mizraim as in Gn 10 6, etc.), which is the common Semitic word for E. with an old Hebrew locative ending.

1. The Territory. Each of the above names designates the region stretching northward from the first Cataract of the Nile at Assouan (Syene) to the Mediterranean coast-line, a distance of over 600 miles by the river. The division into Lower and Upper E. (the former including the Delta and the region of Memphis), which is known to have existed even in prehistoric days, is marked in Hebrew literature by the use of the name Pathros to designate the latter (Is 11 11; Jer 44 1, 15; Ezk 29 14, 30 14), the inhabitants being called Pathrusim (Gn 10 14). This name is Egyptian, meaning the 'Land of the South.' The breadth of the Nile valley which forms the real Egyptian country as marked off from the desert, varies from 3 to 10 m. S. of the Delta, which near the sea attains a breadth of 120 m. The soil of the valley is of great fertility. The dark-colored mud brought down by the Nile suggested the native Egyptian name of the country, Kemt, the 'black land,' as distinguished from the bright-colored soil of the desert.

2. The Inhabitants. It is now generally agreed that the ancient Egyptians had close Semitic affinities. The points of contact that are surest are the linguistic. The languages of both races have nearly the same set of pronominal suffixes, the same endings for genders, and also most of their numerals alike. They have besides in common the use of a construct state, as well as several analogies in verb-inflection. More fundamental still is the practical identity of the consonants, including the peculiar Semitic gutturals. The vocabularies, however, are disappointing, showing very few close resemblances. It is also very questionable whether the original ideographic systems of writing have a common origin. But grammatical analogies are the surest test of relationship, and they point here to a kinship radical even if very remote. But both the physiognomy of the monumental sculptures and the racial peculiarities betray the presence of an additional, non-Semitic element in the population, which is neither negro nor negroid. We are forced to the conclusion that the missing components are to be sought among some of the vanished races of Northern Africa, of which the Libyans NW. of E., and the Cushites to the S., may be regarded as representative. These are representatives of the widely extended Hamitic family, which produced no people so distinguished in ancient times as the Egyptians. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 7.

3. Chronology. On the very difficult subject of chronology the chief sources of information are the ancient lists of kings with more or less definite notations of time attached to them. The current division of historical time is that of Manetho, an Egyptian priest who wrote in Greek about 270 B.C., and whose work has been only partially preserved in summaries or references by Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius. He made out 31 dynasties of kings, with the length of each dynasty in years. A supplement is afforded by monumental lists in temples, in tombs, or on papyri. These do not give the regnal years. Annals of kings inscribed in temples or in tombs give important data. In spite of these helps, there is no agreement among scholars as to the lengths of the earlier dynasties. Consequently also the total length of Egyptian history is still a matter of conjecture. A table of 'minimal dates' compiled by Eduard Meyer makes the first dynasty to have begun in 3180 B.C. Petrie puts it at 4777 B.C. Perhaps the beginning of the history of E. as a unified state may be put a century or two after 4000 B.C. Back to the 16th cent. B.C. a reasonable degree of accuracy has been gained, and astronomical calculations have aided in fixing a few important epochs. Astronomical calculations often, however, prove disappointing and produce frequently doubt rather than certainty. Much more useful in many cases are the cross references to contemporaneous rulers in Babylonia or Assyria, altho even these require caution in the using.

II. HISTORY.—Two stages may be inferentially traced in the antecedents of the history proper. At first there was the formation of numerous small communities, each with its own tutelary deities. Then the natural division of the country (§ 1) favored for a time the existence of two dominant kingdoms.

4. The Old Empire. Ancient authorities agree unanimously that the first historic dynasty of united E. was that of King Menes (c. 3500 B.C.), whose tomb is thought to have been discovered just N. of Thebes in 1897. Already the political center was established at Memphis in Lower E. In the fourth dynasty the civilization of E. comes before us as a finished product. This is the dynasty of the great pyramid-builders, the largest pyramid being that of Cheops (Chufu) (c. 3000 B.C.), the second of the line. The fifth dynasty was little distinguished. The sixth has left written and artistic memorials all through E., with records of expeditions to Nubia and NW. Arabia. Of the dynasties from the seventh to the twelfth we know little directly. It is clear, however, that the rulers of Memphis were unable to hold that city as their capital, since they transferred their residence to Heracleopolis, S. of the Fayūm. Here they failed to maintain themselves against the princes of Thebes, to whom they at length gave their allegiance.

5. The Middle Empire (c. 2375-1580 B.C.). With the tenth dynasty the 'Old Kingdom' came to an end. The 'Middle Kingdom,' which lasted from the eleventh dynasty to the fourteenth, showed great vigor and enterprise in its earlier stages. The period is signalized by the predominance of Thebes. Of the twelfth dynasty monuments are found everywhere as far up the Nile as the Second Cataract. A complete conquest of Nubia was now effected, with a great increase of wealth in gold, slaves, and fighting men. The greatest glory of this dynasty is, however, to be found in its material and artistic achievements. No previous dynasty ever did so much for Egyptian human prosperity as this which built great works to save the overflow and destruction of cities by the Nile, which has issued in the splendid oasis of Fayoum, while in the artistic handicrafts, especially in gold, no later dynasty ever equalled it.

6. The Hyksos. In the thirteenth dynasty (c. 1800 B.C.) began that steady influx of the Asiatics which resulted finally in the rule of the Hyksos, as Manetho terms them. Their origin is not yet fully made out. The invaders were, it is certain, largely Semites from Palestine and Syria; but they possibly may have been impelled by non-Semites from Asia Minor. It was in the eastern part of the Delta that the strangers had their headquarters, whence at length they made their authority felt throughout E. proper. A marked result of their sway was the introduction of Semitic words into the language of the Egyptians and of Semitic gods into their worship. Upper E. was naturally least contented under the foreign rule, and long resistance on its part gradually changed into aggression, so that finally, under the leadership of Ahmose I, the first king of the eighteenth dynasty, the Hyksos were almost wholly expelled from the country.

7. New Empire. Eighteenth Dynasty. With this dynasty (c. 1580-1400 B.C.) begins the 'New Kingdom,' Thebes being again the capital. E. now attains to the summit of its power. It was found that the only sure means of excluding the troublesome Asiatics was to occupy their territory, and so campaigns in Western Asia became the order of the day. Two of the greatest conquerors of the time were Thothmes I, the third ruler of the dynasty, and Thothmes III, the sixth of the line. The latter extended his sway as far as the Euphrates. In the first 20 years of his rule he conducted fifteen campaigns in Asia; but the remainder of his long reign (1501-1447 B.C.) was mainly devoted to the arts of peace. He was the most powerful of all the Pharaohs. It was really a new E. that he ruled. Horses and chariots, imported from Asia, had changed the aspect of war and made it a new profession. Asiatic wives, customs, and gods became fashionable. The closest relations were maintained with all Western Asia. Wealth and luxury increased enormously. The official class grew at the expense of the tillers of the soil, and of that class the priesthood was the greatest gainer. At length, the fourth ruler after Thothmes III, Amenophis IV, (1375-1358 B.C.) 'the heretic king,' being tired of the priestly yoke, determined to found a new and more manageable religion—the sole worship of the sun's disk (Aten). To this end he chose a new capital on the site of the modern Tell el-Amarna, half-way between Thebes and the old capital Memphis. The attempt was unsuccessful, and soon after his reign ended Tut-ankh-aten ('the living image of Aten') changed his name to Tut-ankh-Amen and returned to Thebes to restore the ancient faith of Amen. The discovery of his tomb in our own day has roused the interest of the whole world. A few years later the dynasty itself came to an end with Thebes once more the seat of government (c. 1350 B.C.). A great discovery has made known to us the Asiatic relations of this dynasty. At El-Amarna were found in 1887 over 300 letters, on tablets bearing cuneiform characters, from Babylonia, Assyria, N. Mesopotamia (Mitani) Syria, and Palestine. From the two countries last named native governors, appointed by the Egyptians court, describe the precarious condition of their garrisons during the reigns of Amenophis III and

IV. Among the familiar localities from which letters were written were Tyre, Beirût, Accho, Gaza, Askalon, and Jerusalem.

8. Nineteenth Dynasty. The no less famous nineteenth dynasty had not only to set E. right internally but also to reestablish its power in Asia. The Hittites, now a strong confederacy, completely occupied Syria and were threatening Palestine. Seti I, the third king of the line, after much fighting, was fain to treat with the Hittite king. They agreed that the Egyptians might rule as far as Lebanon and the Hittites thence northward. Seti's successor, Rameses II (c. 1292-1225), spent the first 21 of the 67 years of his reign in desperate conflicts with the Hittites, which left him very nearly where he began. A treaty with the Hittites, a very elaborate affair, was then made, which was long faithfully kept on both sides. Rameses spent the most of his reign in beautifying and strengthening his kingdom. To carry out his designs he made use of the populations of the conquered tribes. Among others were the Hebrew people who had settled and prospered on the E. of the Delta. During the Asiatic invasions their lot was naturally grievous. Rameses in particular pressed them hard with his rigorous system of forced labor. Pithom (q.v.) and Raamses (q.v.) were two of the military stations which they helped to construct in order to make sure the hold of E. upon N. Arabia and Palestine. But the most dangerous enemies did not come from the old roving tribes of the eastern desert and its oases. Merneptah, the son of Rameses II, found his reckoning with the western Libyans the most serious business of his reign. With them were allied pirates and land robbers from various parts of the eastern and northern shores and islands of the Mediterranean, who had already wrought much destruction on the Syrian and Phœnician coast. The combination was defeated, and E. was saved for a time. In Palestine Merneptah had no very secure dominion. Among the peoples whom he claims to have subdued in that region Israel is given a place—the only mention of the name, so far as is yet known, upon the Egyptian monuments. It is probable that the Hebrew 'Exodus' had then (c. 1225 B.C.) taken place. The closing years of the dynasty were marked by confusion and anarchy.

9. Loss of Palestine. Something like order was effected by Rameses III (c. 1198-1167), the founder with his father of the twentieth dynasty. He had to repel renewed attacks from the Libyans; also a more formidable incursion of the maritime barbarians, who were defeated near the very border of E. Their devastations broke up the remnants of the Hittite empire in Syria and made Palestine more insecure than ever for the Egyptians.

10. The Libyan Régime (945-712 B.C.). The New Kingdom now gave place to foreign domination, which lasted from the twenty-second to the twenty-fifth dynasty. The founder of the new order was Sheshonk (Shishak, cf. I K 14 25 ff.) (945-c.924 B.C.), a Libyan who had been commander of the army. It was he who gave shelter to Jeroboam as a fugitive from King Solomon. But in the reigns of Jeroboam and Rehoboam he made a raid upon the two kingdoms of Israel. Altho Jerusalem was occupied and plundered, the Egyptians soon disappeared. Not long thereafter, the Ethiopians began the invasion which made them masters of the whole of E. The end of the Libyan régime found 20 independent princes in the Delta. These were subdued by Pianchi, the Ethiopian king, who wisely left to them their petty realms on condition of vassalage. Hence the twenty-third and twenty-fourth dynasties are named after Egyptian kings. But the twenty-fifth under Sabako, grandson of Pianchi, is titularly Ethiopian (712-663 B.C.).

11. Ethiopian Dynasty. The princes of the Delta accordingly followed the lead of the Ethiopians altho seeming often to act an independent part. Thus one of them, named Seve ('So,' II K 17 4) allied himself with the Philistines of Gaza and Hoshea of Israel against Assyria. As a result however, E. narrowly escaped invasion. When the Assyrian Sennacherib came against Palestine (701 B.C.) his first attempt resulted only in the destruction of outlying cities and villages, but failed to take Jerusalem. In what appears to have been a second attempt upon the city the Ethiopian Tirhaka q.v. (afterwards king 688-663 B.C.) marched to the relief of Hezekiah, King of Judah, and was defeated.

12. Assyrian Domination. But Tirhaka remained a constant obstacle to Assyria until Esarhaddon, son of Sennacherib, carried the war into Africa, and in 670 B.C. annexed the country as far as Thebes. A rebellion against his successor, Assurbanipal, was put down with great severity. Thebes was taken (661 B.C.) and met with a cruel fate at the hands of the Assyrians (cf. Nah 3 8 ff.). A final defeat in Nubia itself made an end of the Ethiopian dynasty. The Assyrian triumph was promoted by Necho I, a powerful prince of the Delta, who after the flight and death of Tirhaka went over to the conquerors. But the son of Necho, Psamtik (Psammetichus I), with the help of troops sent by Gyges, King of Lydia, rebelled against Assyria, and by 645 B.C. Assurbanipal had to relinquish E. where his people had been in control a quarter of a century.

13. Revival of Native Rule. Thus Psammetichus (663-609) became the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, under which the power of E. revived greatly. He and his successor, Necho II, (609-593) favored the immigration of Greek settlers and developed a great maritime commerce. The decline of Assyria encouraged the hope that E. might found a new Asiatic empire. Just after the fall of Nineveh (612 B.C.), Necho struck into Palestine and Syria (608 B.C.). Josiah of Judah, as a vassal of Assyria, intercepted his march and was slain at Megiddo. His kingdom came under Egyptian control. Syria was also soon subdued by Necho. But the whole country had to be given up after his defeat at Carchemish (604 B.C.) by Nebuchadrezzar, the Chaldean crown prince. Yet Egyptian intrigues in Asia were still continued. Jehoiakim of Judah, once an Egyptian vassal, and the last king, Zedekiah, were induced to revolt against Babylon. The promised help was precarious, and the two captivities of Judah were the result. Some time after the fall of Jerusalem, E. was overrun by Nebuchadrezzar (cf.

Jer 45 13 f.), but was not long occupied by him. Generally E. prospered until after the rise of Persia under Cyrus the Great. In his time Amasis (Ahmes II) was on the throne. To check the progress of Cyrus he made a futile league with Croesus, King of Lydia, and Nabonidus, the last native king of Babylon.

14. Persian Régime, Followed by Brief Native Rule. Cambyses, son of Cyrus, subdued E. and Ethiopia in 525. The Persian dominion thus established lasted for more than 100 years. The great statesman Darius Hystaspes (521-486) tried with success to administer E. on its old religious and, locally, on its old political lines. A few revolts at intervals failed; but an outbreak against Darius II in 414 made the country once more independent. It maintained itself under three nominal dynasties (twenty-eighth to thirtieth) till the vigorous Artaxerxes III of Persia (Ochus) subdued it after a desperate struggle (about 349 B.C.). The brief reigns of Ochus and Darius Codomannus are reckoned as the thirty-first dynasty.

15. Egypt Hellenized. Alexander of Macedon, after the final defeat of Darius (331), went over into E. With the founding of Alexandria he established also that Hellenic culture which tolerated and at length superseded the old Egyptian civilization. Hence when E. again became independent under the Ptolemies (323-31 B.C.) its ancient form and spirit were changed forever.

16. Religion of Egypt. The religion of E. is in its early stages very obscure. It is also mysterious all though the dynastic ages. The basis of the popular religion was, as elsewhere, partly animistic and partly mythological. The former element is relatively much stronger than in the purely Semitic religions. That is to say, the worship of spirits—in men and animals—had practically more sway than had the personification of objects of nature, as in myths of the sun-god, darkness, clouds, and rain, or in the deification of the hidden powers residing in trees or rivers and fountains or in haunted or uncanny neighborhoods. Thus the doctrine of immortality early took hold of the people and gave character to their religion everywhere. The polytheism of E.—originally to a great extent a polydemonism—arose from the combination of many local cults. This in its turn was due to the political alliance and ultimate union of the 'nomes' or the districts into which the country was very early divided (§ 4). Further back we see in each of the surviving divinities a tribal deity which was doubtless in many cases the totem of a family or clan. At the other extreme we see how Ptah, the deity of Memphis, became, with the rise of that city, a great national god; and a like honor was conferred later upon Amon as the god of Thebes ('No-amon,' Jer 46 25; cf. Nah 3 8). Again, the various leading deities are grouped about one or the other of the two imperial gods Ra and Osiris; the one giving and controlling life, the other ruling the world of the dead. Along with those four was Hapi, the god of the Nile. Other famous deities, not easily classified, were Horus, Hathor, Nest, Isis, and Set. The rampant animism of the religion is shown in the prevailing notions as to human existence. Besides the soul, the spirit, and the shadow of the man, there was the most important of all, his Ka, or 'double.' The counterpart of each individual was held to survive with him after death as long as the body remained incorrupt. Hence the need and practise of embalming the dead. The various divinities were worshiped, we may presume, partly as emblems, partly as survivals of primitive totem superstition, and partly because certain sacred objects, beneficent or maleficent, had to be propitiated. The religion of Egypt, like its language and political system, was too singular and unsympathetic to exercise any appreciable influence on the people of any other country or race.

LITERATURE: The most useful general works on Egypt are Erman, Aegypten u. ägyptisches Leben, 1885 (Eng. tr., Egyptian Life, 1894, a new ed. in German is now appearing in parts under the editorship of H. Ranke); and Baedeker's Handbook (7th ed., 1914). Excellent histories have been written by Ed. Meyer, 1887; Wiedemann, 1891 (valuable for O T study); Petrie, 1894, 1896; Breasted, A History of Egypt; also an abridged ed. under the title A History of the Ancient Egyptians (1908, new ed., 1922). Also see his Historical Records of Egypt, 5 vols., 1906-7; Budge, A Short History of the Egyptian People (1914); and for the earliest period, The Cambridge Ancient History, vols. Müller in EB are very valuable summaries. All these have much to say about the religion and art of Egypt. The latter is dealt with in the special work of Perrot and Chipiez, Histoire de l'Art, vol. I, 1882. J. F. McC.—R. W. R.

EGYPT, RIVER OF. See RIVER OF EGYPT.

EGYPTIAN, THE: The Egyptian Jew mentioned in Ac 21 38 is also mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XX 8 6, BJ II 13 6), who gives more details with some minor differences (e.g., 30,000 followers vs. 4,000 in Ac); but as Jos. is not altogether consistent with himself in his two accounts, the significance of the divergence between him and Ac should not be exaggerated. E. E. N.

EHI, i'hai (עִי, 'ehi): The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (Gn 46 21). But the text here is corrupt and should be changed according to Nu 26 38 f., so that for Ehi we should read Ahiram (q.v.). E. E. N.

EHUD, i'hud (עֲהֻד, 'ehūd), 'strong': 1. A great-grandson of Benjamin (I Ch 7 10, 8 6). 2. A son of Gera, a left-handed Benjamite leader of Israel, one of the earlier judges. He delivered Israel from the oppression of Eglon, the Moabite tyrant (Jg 3 15-4 1), by assassinating him.

EKRON, ek'rən (עֲקֵרֹן, 'eqrōn): A grandson of Joshua meel (I Ch 2 27).

EKRON, ek'rən (עֲקֵרֹן, 'eqrōn), gentile Ekronite (Jos 13 3): The northernmost of the five chief cities of the Philistines, Map III, C 5. In the division of the land under Joshua it was assigned to Judah (Jos 15 45), but also later to Dan (Jos 19 43), but it never was possessed by Israel. It was about 25 m. SW. of Jerusalem and 9 m. from the sea (mod. Akir). It had a shrine of Baalzebub (II K 1 2, 3, 6), where the Ark of J' was for a time held by the Philistines (I S 5 10, 6 16). The city is mentioned in the Egyptian records as a Canaanite town captured by Thotmes III (c. 1475 B.C.). In the Assyrian inscriptions, however, from Sennacherib and later (cf. Schrader, COT, II, 164), its kings are often named. A. C. Z.

EL, ELI: The Hebrew לֵא, 'el, means God, i.e., deity. It is frequently a part of compound proper names, in some instances prefixed, in others postfixed to the other element. It is often found in the form 'ēli, e.g., Eliab (see also ABI, names with) which may mean 'my God is father' or simply 'God is father'—the i being merely connective. These names express a great variety of relations. See Gray, Hebrew Proper Names, and the article Names in EB, 24-39. E. E. N.

ELA, i'la (אֵלָא, 'elā; Elah AV): The father of Shimei, one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 18).

ELADAH, el'a-da. See ELEADAH.

ELAH, i'la (אֵלָה, 'elāh): I. 1. The son and successor of Baasha, King of Israel (I K 16 6-14). After a reign of a little more than a year he was murdered while in a state of intoxication by Zimri, one of the officers of his army. 2. One of the chiefs ('dukes' AV) of Edom (Gn 36 41). 3. The father of Shimei (I K 4 18). 4. The father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (II K 15 30). 5. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (I Ch 4 15). 6. A Benjamite (I Ch 9 8).

II. A valley where David slew Goliath (I S 17 2), near Shocoh, Map II, D 1. A. C. Z.

ELAM, i'lām (אֶלָם, 'elām), Babyl. Elamtu, Gr. Ἐλαμίτις, Elymais: I. The Hebrew name of a region lying to the E. of Babylonia and extending, in the days of its greatest prosperity, well up into the lower ranges of the mountains of Media to the NE., and along the Persian Gulf to the borders of the ancient Persis in the S. The chief divisions were E. proper in the N., and Anzan or Anshan in the S., the latter at first being an independent kingdom, then long incorporated with E., and finally annexed by the rising power of Persia (about 600 B.C.; cf. Jer 49 34 f.), Cyrus the Great being hereditary 'Prince of Anshan.' The capital of E. was Susa (Shushan, q.v.). The Elamites were a non-Semitic people of uncertain racial affiliation. In Gn 10 22 they are called children of Shem, apparently on account of their close relations with the Babylonians (see Arpachshad, under ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13).

E. was normally a rival of Babylonia, and in 2280 B.C. under Kudur-Nanḫundi reduced the latter to subjection, occupied the country, and gained therewith the suzerainty of the western Semites (cf. Gn 14 1 f.). This dominion was subverted by a subject prince, the great Hammurabi (Amraphel Gn 14 1 ?), about 2120 B.C., and the Elamites never again became lords of all Babylonia. After the Assyrians began to subdue Babylonia E. was drawn into sympathy with the latter for self-preservation, and became for a time its steadfast ally. With the complete subversion of Babylonian autonomy by the Assyrian Ashurbanipal E. fell a prey to the conqueror (645 B.C.). Susa was taken, and many of the people deported to Samaria (Ezr 4 9 f.). Upon the breaking up of the Assyrian empire N. Elam fell to the Medes, and Anshan, as already mentioned, to the Persians. In Is 21 2 E. is made equivalent to the rising kingdom of Persia.

II. 1. A son of Shem (Gn 10 22; I Ch 1 17), ancestor of the Elamites (see 1, above). 2. A Benjamite

(I Ch 8 24). 3. A Korahite doorkeeper of the time of David (I Ch 26 3). 4. The name of a family, of which 1,254 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 7; Neh 7 12) and 71 with Ezra (Ezr 8 7). One of this family urged Ezra to put an end to mixed marriages (Ezr 10 2); as a result, six of the family put away their wives (Ezr 10 26). In Neh 10 14 a chief of the family, who sealed the covenant. 5. 'The other Elam' (Ezr 2 31; Neh 7 34), probably the same as 4. 6. A priest who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 42). C. S. T.

ELASAH, el'-a-sa. See ELEASAH.

ELATH, i'laṯh (עֲלָתַי, 'elath), also ELOTH: A town on the NE. arm of the Red Sea (cf. I K 9 26). The name, meaning 'palms' or 'oaks' (i.e., large sacred trees), probably indicates that it was a very ancient seat of worship. By El Paran (Gn 14 6) and Elah (Gn 36 41) perhaps the same place is meant. Its commercial importance, which lasted through the Roman period, is attested by the notices in I K 9 26; II K 14 22, 16 6 (where read 'Edomites' for 'Syrrians'). From the Greek names Αἰλῶν, Αἰλῶν, etc., due to the Aram. 'ilānā (=Heb. 'elath), comes the name of the Ælanitic Gulf. The modern name is 'Akabah. See Guthe, PRE<sup>3</sup>, vol. 5, pp. 285-287. E. E. N.

EL-BERITH, el'-bi'riṯh. See BAAL-BERITH.

EL-BETHEL, el-beth'el. See BETHEL.

ELDAAH, el-dē'a (אֵלְדָּאָה, 'eldā'ah): The ancestor of a Midianite tribe (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ELDAD, el'dad (אֵלְדָּאָד, 'eldād), 'God is a friend': One of the two elders who exercised the prophetic gifts thought to be the exclusive privilege of Moses (Nu 11 26 f.). While there doing so was an occasion of suspicion to others, Moses rejoiced in it.

ELDER: The unit of primitive Semitic society was the clan, or large family, whose eldest representatives constituted the ruling element of the clan. In primitive Israel the elders of the clans represented the nation as a whole. When Israel conquered Canaan and adopted the agricultural mode of life, it was an easy transition for the clan-elders to become the elders of the city or town communities, which were composed (at first) mainly of members of the same clan. It was this fundamental element of the ancient Hebrew society that formed the basis of the later extension of the significance of the term to indicate the chief men of a community, the wise men, the leading men of the synagog, or of the local church, the influential leaders of the Jewish nation, etc. See CHURCH, §§ 3, 8; CITY, § 5; FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 4, 8; ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, §§ 13, 26, 27, 31, 32; and LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, §§ 1 (1), 2 (1). E. E. N.

ELEAD, el'-i-ad (אֵלְעָד, 'el'ād), 'God has witnessed' or 'God is witness' (I Ch 7 20 f.): The passage is very interesting—a specimen of the fragments of ancient folk-lore which occur here and there in the genealogical lists of the O T. E. was evidently an Ephraimitic clan that was destroyed by the men of Gath—probably in the days of the Judges, its fate causing great sorrow in the tribe. E. E. N.

ELEADAH, el'-i-ē'da (אֵלְעָדָה, 'el'ādāh): The head of an Ephraimite family (I Ch 7 20; Eladah AV; cf. ELEAD).

ELEALEH, i'li-ē'le or ē'le-ā'le (אֵלְעָלֵי, 'el'ālēh): A town of Moab, near Heshbon. Map II, J 1. It became the possession of the Reubenites at the time of the Conquest (Nu 32 3, 37), but the Moabites afterward reoccupied it (Is 15 4, 16 9; Jer 48 34). E. E. N.

ELEASAH, el'-i-ē'sa (אֵלְעָסָה, 'el'āsāh). More correctly Elasah, 'God has made' or 'done': 1. An official under King Zedekiah, entrusted with a message to Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29 3). 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 2 39). 3. A descendant of Jonathán (I Ch 8 37, 9 43). 4. One of the 'sons of Pashhur' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 22).

ELEAZAR, el'-i-ē'zar (אֵלְעָזָר, 'el'āzār), 'God has helped': 1. The third son (Ex 3 23) and successor of Aaron in the high-priestly office (Nu 20 25 ff.) which he held under Moses and Joshua (Jos 24 33). 2. A son of Abinadab, appointed guardian of the Ark of the Covenant in the days of Samuel (I S 7 1 ff.). 3. A son of Dodai the Ahohite and one of David's three heroes (II S 23 9). 4. One of the sons of Merari of the tribe of Levi (I Ch 23 21). 5. A priest and musician in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 42). 6. A priest in Ezra's time (Ezr 8 33). 7. One of the 'sons of Parosh' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 25). 8. One of the ancestors of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1 15).

ELECT. See ELECTION; also PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF, §§ 2, 3.

ELECTION: The religion of revelation regards God as active from the beginning and throughout the whole course of history. The notion that man has been employed, on the religious side, in seeking out an otiose deity or that deity is a universal impersonal principle, to discover which is the acme of human effort, has no place in the whole course of history described by the Bible. There God is constantly presented as the One whose action is the cause of religious experiences, as truly as of the natural world itself. That human nature is active, too, goes without saying. But this human activity, the life of a free spiritual being, does not abolish, it merely determines the form of the Divine action. Hence the fully developed view of God in the later prophets of the O T looks upon Him as the actual Lord of all peoples. Egypt and Assyria no less than Israel and Judah, a Pharaoh (Gn 41 25-32; Ex 6 1, 7 3) and Cyrus (Is 44 28, 45 1) no less than Moses and David, are the servants of His will. But this universal authority and power of God are not characterized by mere sameness of interest and operation toward all. The Divine will defines its purpose with each race and with each man. This definiteness of God's will, this selective action, has appeared most clearly along one central line of history, viz., in His dealings with Israel and above all in the person and gospel of Jesus Christ. The will of God is set forth as the continuous working out of a purpose of grace, which at last is to include all nations within its sweep (Gn 12 3; Is 45 6, 49 1-7, 66 19; Mal 1 11; Acts 3 24 f.; Gal 3 8, etc.). But, as in the consummation God's grace must apprehend and perfect each man, so in its whole historical course it operates deliberately, selectively. It is God's will which directs all the steps toward that far-off goal.

1. In the O T. These steps appear, as to the O T, (1) in the choice of a people through whom the end is to be achieved (Dt 4 37, 7 6-8, 10 15, 14 2; I K 3 8; Is 41 1; Hag 2 4, 5). Hence Israel is even called 'my chosen' (Is 42 1, 45 4, 65 9, 22), and we speak of them as 'the Chosen People.' (2) In the choice within that people of individuals, etc., as the special organs of revelation or execution of the Divine purpose (as kings, I S 10 24, 12 13; II S 6 21; I K 8 16; I Ch 28 5, 29 1; prophets, I S 3 4 ff.; Is 6 8, 9; Jer 1 4 ff.; Ezk 2 1-3; Am 7 15; place of worship, Dt 12 11; etc.). (3) In the dealings of God with each soul, as to its own relations to Him. This aspect of experience is of course described with special fulness in the Psalter and in Jeremiah. There the sense of relationship with J<sup>h</sup> is always as of one who depends wholly upon the Divine righteousness, mercy, and encompassing wisdom and power.

The idea of the Divine initiative is expressed by the use of two words, bāḥar, 'to choose,' and qārā, 'to call'; the one looking at the matter from the side of God's will and the other from the side of that overt act in which His will becomes known to the human mind. But some of the references given above, especially as to the prophets, show that this Divine initiative is often most powerfully set forth, where neither word is used, but where the circumstances are stated through which the Divine will became manifest.

In the N T this aspect of God's relations to men is, if possible, made still more prominent. Again, two words are used to describe the fact in its two elements, of choice (ἐκλέγεσθαι, ἐκλογή, ἐκλεκτός) and call (καλεῖν, κλήσις, κλητός).

2. Teaching of Jesus. Of Jesus it is never said that He was 'called,' except in a quotation (Mt 2 15; cf. Hos 11 1). But He is said to have been chosen (Lk 9 35; cf. I Pet 2 4). Jesus again is said to have both chosen (Lk 6 13; Jn 6 70, 13 18, 15 16, 19) and called (Mt 4 21; Mk 1 20) His disciples. The famous saying 'Many are called [invited, Moffatt] but few chosen' (Mt 22 14) is so difficult because it seems to contrast the words in a manner quite unparalleled in Scripture. Our Lord says of Himself that He came to call sinners to repentance (Mt 9 13 and ||). In His parables He freely represents God as inviting (or calling) men into the kingdom, under the picture of a host inviting his guests (Mt 22 1-14; Lk 14 7-24). This call some accept and some even contemptuously reject. As a whole, the teaching of Jesus represents God as moving toward every human soul to whom salvation comes. There is no suggestion (unless we so interpret Lk 15 17) that the initiative is to be found in the human heart.

3. Pauline Usage. When we turn to the Epistles we find that the words under discussion have assumed an almost startling importance. For the apostolic consciousness two facts stand out above all others: that in Christ God has saved the world, and that every individual believer in Christ has been directly approached, and dealt with, by this deter-minate will and authoritative purpose of God. The idea of the Divine initiative reaches its climax here. The whole work of determining a man's salvation, in its method, inception, and outcome, is in the hands of the living God. No man can account for it, either as a universal gospel or a personal experience. It flows from the inexplicable nature of mercy. Hence, when speaking out of this new consciousness, the obvious words are that a man has been 'called' of God and, if called, he has beyond doubt been 'chosen.' The 'called' are those who have responded to the call; on calling there follows not only hearing but obedience, for from the point of view of experience 'calling,' like justification (Rom 8 30), is a presupposition of his Christian sonship which the believer can not but recognize as he looks back. The familiar and fluent terms begin to assume a technical character quite naturally and inevitably. Those who are in Christ are 'the called' (κλητοί, Ro 1 6, 7, 8 28; I Co 1 1, 2; Jude ver. 1; Rev 17 14), and 'elect' (ἐκλεκτοί, Ro 8 33, 16 13; Col 3 12; Tit 1 1; I P 1 1, 2 9; II Jn vs. 1, 13; Rev 17 14); and derivatives are used for the Divine act and the resulting human condition (ἐκλογή, Ac 9 15; Ro 9 11; II P 1 10; κλήσις, Ro 11 29; I Co 1 26; Eph 4 1, 4; He 3 1; II P 1 10). There is in the N T no attempt to discuss the metaphysics of this view of the relations of God and man. Once the idea of election is carried up into eternity (Eph 1 4), and thus for later minds the great and anxious problem was raised. It is taken for granted throughout the whole of Scripture that the call of God can be and is rejected by the choices of men. The election is conditioned by its material. Nowhere does this appear more clearly than in the Apostle's profound and passionate discussion of the position of Israel after the rejection of Christ (Ro chs. 9-11). Here alone, if anywhere in the N T—for 'reprobate' means simply 'incurably bad'—the idea of election to something other than life and blessing may possibly be found. The original election seems to have been frustrated, the Divine will overthrown. Not so, the Apostle affirms. The Divine will must reach its end, if not in one way, then in another. The material may be recalcitrant, but it can not finally defeat that eternal wisdom and power. Thus we are brought face to face with theological attempts to understand the fact of election in its relation to the fact of freedom. Compare the article PREDESTINATION.

EL - ELOHE - ISRAEL, el' - el'' o - hi - iz' ra - el (אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל), 'God, the God of Israel': The name of an altar near Shechem, whose erection was ascribed in Israel's tradition to the patriarch Jacob (Gn 33 20).

EL, ELYON. See MOST HIGH.

ELEMENT, ELEMENTS (στοιχεῖον, literally 'belonging to a row' [στοιχος], pl. στοιχεῖα, 'the letters of the alphabet,' the 'A B C' [elements] of anything): (1) In II P 3 10, 12, the reference is probably to the physical elements. Others, however, prefer here (3) below. (2) In He 5 12 the phrase τὰ στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς is translated by AV 'the first principles,' and by RV more literally, 'the rudiments of the first principles.' Since the reference is to 'the oracles of God,' these translations are practically correct, altho 'primary elements' would be simpler. (3) In Gal 4 3, 9 (elements AV rudiments RV), and Col 2 8, 20 (rudiments AV and RV), the sense is more doubtful. In recent years it has usually been explained as a reference to those elemental spirits which, according to conceptions found in a few late Jewish writings, animated everything, especially the heavenly bodies, according to whose movements the feasts and seasons of both Jew and Gentile were calculated. (See especially Deissmann in EB) This meaning of στοιχεῖον is favored by the fact that the word is used by Byzantine writers for 'genius,' 'talisman,' etc., and has survived in modern Greek with the sense 'ghost,' 'spook,' 'sprite,' 'fairy,' etc. But Burton in ICC, Galatians (pp. 510-518) holds that the phrase, 'the elements of the world' should be interpreted as 'the rudimentary religious teachings possessed by the race.' That is, the Jewish system which the Galatians are being urged to adopt is like the idol worship which they have given up, only fitted for the infancy of the race. But while it is true that no exact parallel for τὰ στοιχεῖα in the sense of deities or other like beings can be adduced from the literature of the first century, the whole atmosphere of the time and the general religious ideas of Paul make it likely that he would use the phrase in some such sense. His belief in a hierarchy of intermediate spiritual beings can be seen from Ro 8 38; I Co 2 6-8, 8 4-6, 10 20 ff., 15 24 ff., 40; Eph 1 21, 2 2, 3 10; Col 1 16, 2 15. In Gal 4 3, 9 Paul apparently refers to the bondage of the Jew to the Law and therefore to the angels by whom it was ordained (3 10), and of the Gentiles to their heathen divinities who 'by nature are no gods' (4 8), and in comparison with the true God are 'weak and beggarly' (ver. 9).

Similarly in Col 2 8, 20 the στοιχεῖα are angelic beings who are contrasted with Christ (the 'principalities and powers' of vs. 10 and 15) and whom perhaps the Colossians were in danger of mistakenly worshipping (ver. 18). S. D.—E. C. L.

ELEPH, ʾl'ef (אֵלֶף, 'eleph, with article): A town in Benjamin, mentioned just before Jerusalem (Jos 18 28). Probably the modern Lifta, about 2 m. NW. of Jerusalem. C. S. T.

ELEVEN. See APOSTLE.

ELHANAN, el-hē'nān (אֶלְחָנָן, 'elḥānān), 'God is gracious': 1. A son of Jair, a Bethlehemite, who slew Goliath the Gittite (II S 21 19). In I Ch 20 5 the text has been altered, apparently to avoid contradicting I S ch. 17. 2. Another Bethlehemite, also one of David's heroes, son of Dodo (II S 23 24; I Ch 11 26), perhaps the same as 1, since the reference of both to Bethlehem awakens suspicion. See also GOLIATH. E. E. N.

ELI, ʾl'ai (אֵלִי, 'ēlī), 'high': The priest of the important Sanctuary at Shiloh, in Samuel's childhood (I S chs. 1-4), reckoned in the late genealogies to the line of Ithamar (cf. I Ch 24 1-3). He combined with his priestly office that of judge. No facts of his earlier life are recorded. He appears in the composite narrative of chs. 1-4 (see SAMUEL, Books of, § 3) in different lights—favorable in chs. 1 and 4, less so in chs. 2 and 3. There were doubtless many priests at many different sanctuaries in Israel in Eli's day, and the story of the rejection of Eli's 'house' as it stands in chs. 2-3 is a late working up of fragments of early tradition to enforce the legitimacy of the priestly line of Zadok vs. that of Abiathar (Eli's heir).

ELIAB, i-lai'ab (אֱלִיָּאב, 'ēlī'ābh), 'God is father': 1. A son of Helon, a Zebulonite leader (Nu 1 9, 2 7, etc.). 2. A son of Pallu, and father of Dathan and Abiram, a Reubenite (Nu 16 1, 12). 3. The eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (I S 16 6). 4. A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 20). 5. A Gadite warrior in the reign of David (I Ch 12 9). 6. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet, son of Nathan the Kohathite, also called Eliel in I Ch 6 34, and Elihu in I S 1 1.

ELIADA, ELIADAH, i-lai'a-da, -da (אֱלִיָּאדָה, 'elyā-dā'), 'God knows': 1. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 8), called Beeliada in I Ch 14 7 (since Baal was used in the sense of God at one time in Israel, Baal-ada may have been the original form). 2. The father of Rezon of Zobah (I K 11 23). 3. A Benjamite chief captain in Jehoshaphat's time (II Ch 17 17).

ELIAKIM, i-lai'a-kim (אֱלִיאִקִּים, 'elyāqīm), 'God establishes': 1. A son of Hilkiah and steward of the palace under Hezekiah (II K 18 18; Is 36 3, 37 2). 2. A son of Josiah, whom Pharaoh Necho put on the throne of Judah after the death of Josiah, changing his name to Johoiakim (q.v., cf. II K 23 34). 3. A priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12 41). 4. An ancestor of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mt 1 13). 5. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30).

ELIAM, i-lai'am (אֱלִיָּאָם, 'ēlī'ām), 'God is kinsman': 1. The father of Bath-sheba (II S 11 3), the same as Ammiel (I Ch 3 5). 2. A son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and one of David's thirty heroes (II S 23 34); possibly the same as 1. This identity may explain the disloyalty of Ahithophel. C. S. T.

ELIAS, i-lai'as. See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH, i-lai'a-saf (אֱלִיאֶשָׁפ, 'elyāšāph), 'God adds': 1. One of the census-takers, representing the tribe of Gad (Nu 1 14, etc.). 2. The head of the Gershonite Levites (Nu 3 24).

stronger (II K 13 14-19). The last mention of his name relates to the case of a man brought for burial and cast hastily into the grave in which he had been buried whereupon the dead was restored to life (II K 13 20-21).

2. Sources of History. The narratives upon which knowledge of E.'s life and work is based are given in II K 2 1-25, 4 1-44, 5 1-6 32, 7 1-8 5, and 13 14-21. They bear marks of diversity of origin and of some chronological displacement. In view of the healing of Naaman's leprosy (II K ch. 5), it does not seem likely that the war between Israel and Syria mentioned in 6 8 ff. can be given in its true order. Gehazi too is represented (8 4) as familiarly conversing with the king, altho smitten with leprosy (5 26). These narratives were probably found in an early collection of incidents relating to the prophet. Their approximate date of origin may be set as later than the Elijah fragments, and possibly 700 B.C. See also KINGS, BOOKS OF, § 5.

3. Elisha's Work within Israel. In the main, E.'s work is that of the prophet as a patriot. To him the cause of Israel, e.g. vs. Syria was the cause of J' vs. Syria. While within Israel he did not by a hair's breadth abate the opposition to Baal worship preached by Elijah, he gave attention to the international relations of Israel. This was due partly, no doubt, to the fact that during the most of E.'s career Israel was engaged in a desperate struggle, in which its very existence was at stake, with Syria. Even Jehoram, the last of the dynasty of Ahab, was constrained to recognize his prophetic influence, and sent for him for advice in the campaign against Mesha of Moab (II K 3 12). But E. sternly declined to have personal dealings with Jehoram (II K 3 14), and it was in the overthrow of the dynasty which this king represented that his influence is most clearly seen. Sending one of the 'sons of the prophets' to Jehu, a restless and ambitious warrior, he symbolically intimated to him, through the act of anointing with oil, that he was called to wrest the scepter from the hands of the descendants of Jezebel (II K 9 1-10). The task was one committed to him by Elijah (I K 19 16), and its accomplishment proved the end of official Baal worship in Israel.

Through the reign of Jehoram, and more prominently in the reigns of the first three kings of the House of Jehu E. acted the patriot's part in all the wars of Israel with Moab and Syria. In the few incidents recorded of the campaign of Ben-hadad II against Samaria, he rendered indispensable aid to the cause of Israel (II K 6 8 ff.). His fame as a 'man of God' extended beyond Israel, and as a 'man of God' he appears to have been welcomed even in Damascus; and it was on the occasion of a visit thither that he fulfilled the commission originally given to Elijah, i.e., the changing of the ruling dynasty in Damascus by informing Hazael that he was to be the successor to Ben-hadad (cf. I K 19 15; II K 8 7 f.).

4. Elisha's Miracles. The miraculous element is quite prominent in the accounts of Elisha. He first healed with salt the waters of Jericho (II K 2 19 f.). Next he brought sudden punishment upon the 42 children who mocked him (II K 2 23-25).

During a famine he increased oil, saving a poor widow from distress (II K 4 1-7), cured some gourds of poisonous effects (II K 4 38-41), multiplied bread (4 42-44), and caused an ax head to 'swim' in water (6 1-7). He restored to life the child of the Shunamite woman (4 8-37) and cured the leprosy of Naaman (ch. 5). These miracles constitute a group, and altho differing from those of Elijah (I K 17 14, 17; II K 1 4), may be taken with them as making up an exceptional period in the history of prophecy.

5. Elisha and Elijah. E. not only inherited the task of Elijah, but he undertook to perform it in perfect loyalty to his master as shown in the parting scene between the two prophets. The chief difference between them was that the first, as a pioneer, showed greater originality. But to balance this E. was in nearer touch with the people, being accessible to them (cf. II K 4 23, ch 5) and in better position to have his influence diffused. See also ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, § 13. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

ELISHAH, 1-lai'sha. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ELISHAMA, 1-lish'a-ma (עֲלִישָׁמָא, 'ēlishāmā), 'God has heard': 1. One of the chiefs of Ephraim (Nu 1 10, etc.) 2. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 8, 14 7, confounded with Elishua in I Ch 3 6). 3. A Judahite, son of Jekamiah (I Ch 2 41). 4. A priest, teacher of the people in Jehoshaphat's time (II Ch 17 8). 5. A scribe of King Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12 ff.). 6. The grandfather of Ishmael the rival of Gedaliah (II K 25 25; Jer 41 1). E. E. N.

ELISHAPHAT, 1-lish'a-fat (עֲלִישָׁפָת, 'ēlishāphāt), 'God has judged': One of the captains assisting Jehoiada in deposing Athaliah (II Ch 23 1).

ELISHEBA, 1-lish'i-ba (עֲלִישֶׁבָּע, 'ēlishēbha'), 'God is an oath': The wife of Aaron (Ex 6 23).

ELISHUA, el'i-shū'a (עֲלִישׁוּעָ, 'ēlishūa'), 'God is help': A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 14 5; by mistake called Elishama in I Ch 3 6).

ELIUD, 1-lai'ud (ΕΛΙΟΥΔ=O T Elihud): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 14 f.).

ELIZAPHAN, el'i-zē'fan (עֲלִיזָפָן, 'ēlīzāphān), 'God hides' or 'protects': 1. The ancestral head of one of the main divisions of the Levites (Nu 3 30; I Ch 15 8; II Ch 29 13; also called Elzaphan, Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4). 2. A 'prince' of Zebulun (Nu 34 25).

ELIZUR, 1-lai'zūr (עֲלִיזֹר, 'ēlīzūr), 'God is a rock': 'Prince' of Reuben (Nu 1 5, etc.).

ELKANAH, el-kē'na (עֲלְקָנָה, 'elqānāh), 'God has possessed': 1-4. The name of four individuals in the Levi-genealogy of I Ch 6 16 ff.: (1). A grandson of Korah (I Ch 6 23; cf. Ex. 6 24). (2). A descendant of (1) and son of Joel (I Ch 6 25, 36). (3). A descendant of (2) (I Ch 6 26, 33). (4) A descendant of (3) and the father of Samuel (I Ch 6 27, 34; I S 1 1). 5. A doorkeeper of the tent in which David placed the Ark (I Ch 15 23). 6. A Levite, the grandfather of Berechiah (I Ch 9 16). 7. One of David's heroes (I Ch 12 6). 8. A high official under Ahaz, slain in Pekah's attack on Jerusalem (II Ch 28 7). E. E. N.

ELKOSHITE, el'kōsh-ait: The designation of Nahum (Nah 1 1). See NAHUM, BOOK OF.

ELLASAR, el-'lē[or-lā]'sār (עֲלָסָר, 'ellāsār) Babyl. La-ar-su(?). The city of which Arioch, one of the confederates of Chedorlaomer (Gn 14 1), was king. Larsa of the Babylonian inscriptions, the modern Senkera of lower Babylonia, of which Rim-Sin, a Semitic ruler, was king for sixty-one years (?).

I. M. P.

ELM: Properly an oak or terebinth (Hos 4 13 AV; cf. RV). See PALESTINE, § 21.

ELMADAM, el-mē'dam (Ελμαδάμ, Elmodam AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 28).

ELNAAM, el-nē'am (עֲנָאָם, 'elna'am), 'God is graciousness': One of David's warriors (I Ch 11 46).

ELNATHAN, el-nē'than (עֲנָתָן, 'elnāthān), 'God has given': 1. The father of Nehushta, mother of Jehoiachin (II K 24 8). 2. A prince of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim—possibly the same as 1 (Jer 26 22, 36 12, 25). 3-5. The name of three men sent by Ezra on a mission after Levites (Ezr 8 16). The text here may be corrupt, due to dittography.

E. E. N.

ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI, i-lō'ai, lā'ma sa-bac'tha-nai (ἐλωί, ἐλωί, λαμὰ σαββαθάναι): Jesus' cry on the cross, according to Mk 15 34. In Mt 27 46 the form is Eli, Eli, etc. The expression in Mk is altogether Aramaic. In Mt the first two words are Hebrew and not Aramaic. The Markan form is the Aramaic equivalent of the Hebrew of Ps 22 1, and shows incidentally how familiar Jesus was with the vernacular Aramaic version of the O T.

E. E. N.

ELON, i'lōn (עֵלֹן, 'elōn), 'terebinth': I. 1. A Zebulunite, one of the minor judges of Israel (Jg 12 11 f.). 2. A 'son' of Zebulun (Gn 46 14), head of the family of Elonites (Nu 26 26). 3. A Hittite, the father-in-law of Esau (Gn 26 34, 36 2). II. A town in the territory of Dan (Jos 19 43). See next title.

ELON-BETH-HANAN, -beth'hē'nān (עֵלֹן בֵּית חָנָן, 'elōn bēth hānān) (I K 4 9): Possibly two names, Elon and Beth-hanan, were the original reading. If one place was meant, it must have been the same as Elon (q.v.). No satisfactory identification has been proposed.

ELOTH, i'lōth. See ELATH.

ELPAAL, el-pē'al (עֲלְפָאָל, 'elpa'al), 'God has done': An ancestor of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 11 f., 18).

ELPARAN, el-pē'ran (עֲלְפָרָן, 'el pā'rān): A place in Edom (Gn 14 6). See ELATH and PARAN.

ELPELET, el-pī'let (עֲלְפֵלֶת, 'elpelet, Elpalet AV). See ELIPHELET.

EL SHADDAI. See God, § 1.

ELTEKEH, el'ti-ke (עֲלְתֵכֶה, 'eltēqē' and 'eltēqēh): A city of Dan, mentioned after Ekron (Jos 19 44) and a Levitical city (Jos 21 23). Near Eltekeh (Altaku) Sennacherib won a victory over the combined forces of Palestinians, Egyptians, and others (cf. II K 18 13 f., 19 8 f.) and afterward despoiled E. and its neighboring town Timnath (Prism inscrip. of Sen. Col II 69 f.). Consequently E. must have been situated near Timnath, probably between Timnath and Ekron. The identification Map III, E 5, is probably incorrect. E. E. N.

ELTEKON, el'ti-ken (עֲלְתֵקֹן, 'eltēqōn): A city in the highlands of Judah (Jos 15 59). Not yet identified.

ELTOLAD, el-tōl'lad (עֲלְתֹלָד, 'eltōlād): A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 30), also assigned to Simeon (Jos 19 4). Elsewhere called Tolad (I Ch 4 29). Not yet identified.

ELUL, i'lul: The sixth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

ELUZAI, i-lū'zai (עֲלֻזַּי, 'el'ūzay): 'God my refuge' (?): One of those who deserted Saul for David (I Ch 12 5).

ELYMAS, el'i-mās. See BAR JESUS.

ELYON, EL ELYON. See God, § 1; and Most High.

ELZABAD, el-zē'bad (עֲלִזָּבָד, 'elzābhādh), 'God has given': 1. A Gadite who attached himself to David (I Ch 12 12). 2. A doorkeeper of the Temple (I Ch 26 7).

ELZAPHAN, el-zē'fan (עֲלִזָּפָן, 'elsāphān), 'God protects,' also called Elizaphan: 1. A son of Uzziel, kinsman of Moses and Aaron, and servant in the Tabernacle (Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4; Nu 3 30). 2. See ELIZAPHAN, 1. 3. The head of a family of Levites (II Ch 29 13).

EMBROIDER, EMBROIDERY. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 14.

EMEKE-KEZIZ, i'mek-ke-ziz' (עֲמֵק כְּעִזִּיז, 'emeq q'ezils) (Valley of Keziz AV): A vale in the territory of Benjamin, near the Jordan Valley (Jos 18 21). Site unknown.

EMERALD. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

EMERODS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (2).

EMIM, i'mim (עֲמִימִ, 'ēmīm, Emim AV, 'terrible men.' The name given to the prehistoric race that once occupied the land E. of the Jordan. They were called also Rephaim. According to tradition they were of gigantic stature (Gn 14 5; Dt 2 10 f.).

E. E. N.

EMINENT PLACE: The Heb. gabh, rendered 'eminent place' (Ezk 16 24, 31, 39 AV; 'lofty' RV), is rendered 'high-place' (q.v.) in other passages. Here it indicates a place on which an altar for illicit worship was built. In Ezk 17 22, as the AV translation of another Hebrew word, tāhāl, it means 'lofty,' so RV.

C. S. T.

EMMANUEL, em-man'yu-el. See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS, em'a-us (Εμμοῦς): A village mentioned in Lk 24 13. According to the best reading (ABD) 60 stadia distant from Jerusalem. An Emmaus (Εμμοῦς, 60 stadia from Jerusalem) is mentioned by Josephus (BJ, VII, 6 6), who says that Titus had a colony of soldiers there. This suggests the modern Kulōnieh, which is approximately that distance from Jerusalem. Map II, E. 1.

E. has also been identified with Nicopolis (I Mac 3 40, 57, 4 3-25), the modern Amwās in the Shephelah, 160-180 stadia from Jerusalem, Map III, D 5, but this distance is too great. J. M. T.

EMMOR, em'or. See HAMOR.

EN- (עַן, 'ēn): The prefix 'En' in Hebrew proper names stands for the word meaning 'spring' or 'fountain,' in opposition to a well or cistern. Places with names compounded with 'En' were almost certainly located near a spring. E. E. N.

ENAIM, 1-nē'im (עֵנַיִם, 'ēnayim): 'A town of Judah (Jos 15 34, where it is spelled Enam). According to Gn 38 14 it was situated on the road to Timnah and was the scene of Judah's incest with Tamar. Driver locates it in the Shephelah; Conder identifies it with Kh. Wādy Alin. Map II, D 1. J. A. K.

ENAN, i'nan (עֲנָן, 'ēnān): The father of Ahira (Nu 1 15 etc.).

ENCAMP. See WARFARE, § 3.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA: A station on the Exodus route named after Marah and Elim (Nu 33 10), not to be confused with the place mentioned in Ex 14 2 ff. It lay on the E. shore of the sea.

ENCHANTER, ENCHANTMENT See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

ENDOR (עֵדֹר, 'ēn dōr), 'fountain of dor': A city in the territory of Manasseh, (Jos 17 11; Ps 83 10) 4 m. S. of Tabor, made famous as the residence of the witch to whom Saul resorted (I S 28 7). Its modern successor, Endūr, is built upon a rock full of caves (cf. Socin, in Baedeker, Palestine<sup>2</sup>, p. 460 f.). Map III, G 1. A. C. Z.

ENEAS, i-nī'as. See ÆNEAS.

EN-EGLAIM, en-eg'la-im (עֵן עֲגֵלַיִם, 'ēn 'eglayim), 'fount of the two calves' (Ezk 47 10): From the context it is likely that En-eglaim lay N. of En-gedi, near the mouth of the Jordan. It has not been identified. Some suspect an error for Beth-hoglah (q.v.). E. E. N.

EN-GANNIM, en-gan'im (עֵן גַּנִּימַיִם, 'ēn gannim), 'fountain of gardens': 1. A city of Judah (Jos 15 34). Map II, D 1. 2. A Levitical city of Issachar (Jos 19 21, 21 20), called Anem in I Ch 6 73. The modern town Jenin is characterized by numerous gardens watered by a spring near by. Map III, F 2. E. E. N.

ENGEDI, en-gī'dai (עֵן גֵּדִי, 'ēn gēdai), 'spring of the kid': The name of a fertile region on the Dead Sea located about the middle of its W. shore. Map II, G 3. It was so called from a warm spring which issues out of the cliffs at this point. The earlier name of the spot was Hazazon-tamar (II Ch 20 2). The modern Ain Jubb is the Arabic equivalent of the Biblical term. It was famous as the place where David took refuge when fleeing from Saul, and also for its natural beauty and fertility (I S 23 29; Song 1 14; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 269 ff.; Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, p. 40). A. C. Z.

ENGINE OF WAR: A general term to designate the heavier implements used in siege-work, both offensive (Ezk 26 9) and defensive (II Ch 26 15).

ENGRAFTED: Only in Ja 1 21 AV. The Greek ἐμμορτός means usually 'inborn,' 'innate.' The RV 'implanted' is better. The 'word,' like seed (Mt 13 3-23), 'roots' itself in the heart and life (cf. Mt 15 13; I Co 3 6). S. D.—E. E. N.

ENGRAVE, ENGRAVER, ENGRAVING. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 3.

EN-HADDAH (עֵן חֲדָדָה, 'ēn haddāh): A place in Issachar (Jos 19 21). Perhaps the modern Kefr Adān. Map III, F 2.

EN-HAKKORE, en-hak'o-ri (עֵן חַקְקוֹרֵי, 'ēn haqqōrē'), 'spring of the partridge.' The context, however, gives the meaning 'spring of him who called': The name of a spring in Lehi, from which Samson quenched his thirst after slaying the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. Location unknown (Jg 15 19). C. S. T.

EN-HAZOR, en-hē'zer (עֵן חֲצֹר, 'ēn hātsōr), 'spring of Hazor': A town in Naphtali (Jos 19 37). The site is not certain, but may be the same as the modern Kh. Hazireh (Map IV, D 5). E. E. N.

EN-MISHPAT, en-mish'pat. See KADESH.

ENOCH, i'nek (עֲנוֹךְ, hānōkh, Henoch AV, I Ch 1 3). The name would suggest, if it did not mean, 'initiation,' or 'dedication': I. 1. The eldest son of Cain, (Gn 4 17 f.) the builder of a city which he called after himself. This points to a place that bore the name, which can not now be identified. 2. Son of Jared and father of Methuselah, descendant of Seth (Gn 5 18-24). The substitution in v. 24 of 'And he was not because God took him,' for the usual formula 'And he died' gave occasion to a great number of speculations and comments in later times (cf. Shürer, HJP, II, i. 342, iii. 70). Most of these are given in the apocalyptic books bearing his name. The translation of Enoch is paralleled in Babylonian mythology by the translation of Ut-Napishtim). II. A city (cf. 1, above). A. C. Z.

ENŌCH, BOOKS OF: Enoch is the seer and hero of two apocalyptic books, called respectively from the languages in which they are extant the Ethiopic and the Slavonic Enoch (more recently called by Charles 1st and 2d Enoch).

I. THE ETHIOPIC ENOCH. 1. History of the Modern Editions. This book first became known in modern times through copies brought from Abyssinia in 1773 by J. Bruce, the traveler. It was known to the Fathers from Jude 14 f. that certain prophetic utterances were attributed to Enoch (cf. also Ep. Barn. 4 3, 16 f.), but all traces of books bearing his name had disappeared until the date above named. It was not until 1821, however, that the Ethiopic text of Enoch was translated by Bishop Lawrence into English; and not till Dillmann's studies and translation into German (1851-53) that its nature, contents, and significance for Bible study were realized. In 1886-87 a portion of the Greek text of the book was made public by H. B. Swete.

2. Literary Analysis. This book contains 107 chapters, but is not a unit. It consists of at least three primary works, worked over and combined by a redactor: (1) The original Book of Enoch, embedded in chs. 1-36 and 72-105; (2) The Book of Similitudes, comprising chs. 37-71, and (3) The Apocalypse of Noah, or, more correctly, certain fragments of a book which probably existed as a whole under some title ascribed to Noah. These fragments are inserted within the other two parts of Enoch, and are to be found in chs. 54-55, 2, 60, 65, 1-69, 25, and chs. 106-107.

3. Contents of the Original Enoch. The original Book of Enoch has its starting-point in Gn 6 2 f. First it recounts the punishment of the sinning angels. In the course of giving information about the places of this punishment, Enoch narrates his extensive travels throughout the universe (1-36). A second section is called The Book of the Luminaries of Heaven, and consists of chs. 78-82, treating of geographical and cosmological matters such as the course of the sun and the stars, of the winds and the four quarters of heaven, and the changes which are destined to come over these things in the last days. A third section, consisting of chs. 83-90, narrates two visions of Enoch, both prophetic in form, but together known as the historical part of the book, because they portray in a general way the history as it transpired and is recorded in the O.T. The first vision is a picture of the Deluge; the second covers the whole course of Israel's career under the symbolical form of a warfare of the clean animals (sheep, lambs, and goats = Israel) with unclean animals (dogs, swine, foxes, and birds of prey = Israel's enemies). From the fact that Israel was put under the care of 70 angels, this portion of the work has been also called the Vision of the Seventy Shepherds. At the close of the section the Messiah appears born in the form of a white bull. The last section (chs. 91-105) is called the Book of Exhortations and seems to bring the story to a practical conclusion. Enoch commits matters into the hands of his son Methuselah preparatory to his ascension. Another special section occurs toward the beginning of this part and is called the Ten Weeks (91-12-17, 93).

4. Book of Similitudes. The Book of Similitudes (chs. 37-71) is Messianic or Christological. It takes its name from the fact that it consists of three parables (similitudes): (1) Chs. 37-44; (2) 45-54, and (3) 55-71. All these are vividly apocalyptic and eschatological. It is in this section that the Messiah is pictured (chs. 46, 47) under the name 'the Son of Man,' standing beside the 'Head of Days,' and that his character and task as the conqueror of the heathen are plainly set forth.

5. Noachic Fragments. In the Noachic fragments, the subject of the flood is pictured as an event in the future (from the view-point of Enoch, of course), including accounts of Leviathan, Behemoth, and various nature-elements which come into play in the great catastrophe. To this is added a revelation to Noah of the punishment of the fallen angels and of the judgment of men by the Son of Man. The last of these fragments (chs. 106, 107) contains an account of the marvels which should accompany the birth of Noah himself, and is made as a revelation to Enoch.

6. Dates of the Several Sections. That the first of these three documents of which the Ethiopic

Enoch consists was composed during the period 200-175 B.C. is not generally disputed. As to the third, its fragmentary character gives very little ground for a successful investigation of the circumstances and date of its origin. The Book of Similitudes has naturally furnished a bone of contention for critics. Its undoubted relation to the N.T. and its importance from this point of view have called forth careful study; but no definite consensus has yet been reached. It is contended on one side that it must have been written in the Maccabean Age (Ewald). Others date it from 95 B.C. (Dillmann, Charles); others from the days of Herod (Baldensperger, Beer); still others from the 2d cent. A.D., and others, finally, claim that it may have been published as a Jewish apocalypse before the Christian Era, but that it was revised by a Christian who interpolated into it the Son of Man passages. The truth probably lies nearer the view which makes it a pre-Christian writing. The occurrence in it of the phrase 'Son of Man' does not interfere with this conclusion, as this phrase is not altogether a distinctively Christian expression and should not be regarded as the sign of a Christian author or redactor (cf. Baldensperger, Selbstbewusstsein Jesu<sup>2</sup>, p. 90; Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 234 f.). The best edition, with introduction and notes for English readers, is by Charles Book of Enoch, 2d Ed. (1912), also The Apoc. and Pseudepigr. of the O.T. (1913) Vol. II.

II. THE SLAVONIC ENOCH. 1. Recovery in Modern Times. Under this name has come to be known a book first made accessible in modern times in 1896 by Professor Charles and Mr. Morfill. Its existence in a Slavonic text was hinted at by Russian scholars and seized upon as a subject of investigation with the result that the book was fully recovered.

2. Contents. The Slavonic Enoch is divided into 68 chapters, which may be grouped under three large sections as follows: (1) Chs. 1-38. This section gives an account of the ascension of Enoch into the seven heavens and his travels and experiences there. (2) Chs. 39-56 describe Enoch's return to earth and give his admonitions and instructions to his children. (3) Chs. 57-68 contain a rehearsal of some additional instructions, closing with the account of a solemn scene in which before an assembly of 2,000 people Enoch is taken up into heaven (Gn 5 24). But just before this took place, a thick darkness fell upon the earth, so that the manner of his assumption was accomplished unwitnessed by mortal eye (ch. 67).

3. Origin. The original language of the Slavonic Enoch was undoubtedly Greek. This is clear from the explanation of the name Adam given in it, which depends altogether upon the Greek spelling of the name.<sup>1</sup> The date of the composition can not be earlier than that of the Ethiopic Enoch (Book of Similitudes), or later than 70 A.D. The former date is established by the evident references to the Ethiopic Enoch, the latter by the fact that the Temple was still standing when this book was written. There are also evidences that the author was an Alexandrian Jew. Further than this, little is known of its origin or history.

4. The Seven Heavens. The most interesting feature of the book is the explicit form in which there is presented in it the doctrine of a plurality of heavens (in Slav. En seven in number). This doctrine not only became a fixed article of faith in later medieval lore, but is implied in some forms of N T expression, and has left its traces even in the thought of the Apostle Paul (II Co 12 2). The best edition of the book is that by Charles and Morfill The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, (1896) see also Apoc. and Pseud. of the O T (1913) Vol. II). A. C. Z.

ENOSH, i'nesh (עֲנוֹשׁ, 'ēnōsh, Enos, Lk 3 38 AV), 'man': The son of Seth (Gn 4 26, etc.).

ENQUIRE. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3; and REVELATION, § 7.

EN-RIMMON, en-rim'an (עֵן רִמּוֹן, 'ēn rim-mōn), 'spring of pomegranates': A town in Judah (Neh 11 29), probably the Rimmon of Zech 14 10. 'Ain and Rimmon' in Judah (Jos 15 32) and 'Ain, Rimmon' in Simeon's territory (Jos 19 7; I Ch 4 32) should probably be read En-Rimmon. Called 'Ain' in Jos 21 16 and 'Ashan' in I Ch 6 59 [44]. It is nine miles N.E. of Beer-sheba. Map II, D 3.

C. S. T.

EN-ROGEL, en-rō'gel. See JERUSALEM, § 10.

ENROLMENT (ἀπογραφή), taxing AV, literally 'registering' for any purpose, hence a census: The Romans made such censuses for the purpose of taxation periodically (Lk 2 2; Ac 5 37; cf. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 1898). See also CHRONOLOGY OF THE N T.

EN-SHEMESH, en-shi'mesh (עֵן שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'ēn she-mesh), 'fountain of the Sun': A place on the border of Judah between En-rogel (near Jerusalem) and Adummim (Jos 15 7, 18 17). The usual identification (Map II, F 1) is far from certain.

ENSIGN. See BANNER; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

ENSUE: In I P 3 11 AV. The correct rendering is 'pursue,' as in RV.

EN-TAPPUAH, en-tap'yu-a (עֵן תַּפּוּאָה, 'ēn tappuah), 'fountain of Tappuah.' See TAPPUACH.

ENTERING IN: In AV (1) the approaches to a town (cf. Is 3 2; Am 6 14 'entrances' RV); (2) the gate of any enclosed place (cf. Ex 35 15, 'door' RV); or (3) by Paul of his initial experiences at Thessalonica (I Th 1 9).

EPĀNETUS, i-pī-ni-tus (Ἐπαίνετος, Epenetus AV), 'approved,' 'praised': A Christian brother mentioned by Paul in Ro 16 5 as 'my beloved, who is the first-fruit of Asia unto Christ,' probably, therefore, one of the first converts of Paul at Ephesus.

EPAPHRAS, ep'a-fras (Ἐπαφράς): An early Christian active in Colossae and neighboring cities, possibly commissioned by Paul to the work of evangelization in those regions (ὡς τὸν ἑμῶν διάκονον Col 1 7). He was perhaps one of Paul's own converts, and also a faithful friend and possibly a fellow-prisoner of the apostle (Phm ver. 23). J. M. T.

EPAPHRODITUS, ep-af''ro-dai'tus (Ἐπαφρόδιτος): A messenger of the Philippian Church by whom their gifts were delivered to Paul (Ph 4 18). He fell sick in Rome (Ph 2 25-30) and upon recovery was sent back with the Philippian Epistle.

J. M. T.

EPHAH, i'fā (עֶפָה, 'ēphāh): 1. A concubine of Caleb (I Ch 2 46). 2. A 'son' of Jahdai (I Ch 2 47). 3. A 'son' of Midian (Gn 25 4, etc.). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 4. (עֶפָה 'ēphāh) A measure. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

C. S. T.

EPHAI, i'fai (עֶפַי, 'ēphay): A Netophathite (Jer 40 8).

EPHER, i'fār (עֶפֶר, 'ēpher), 'young deer' or 'fawn': 1. The ancestral head of a Midianite clan or tribe (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 2. The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 17). 3. The head of a family of Manasseh (I Ch 5 24).

EPHES-DAMMIM, i'fez-dam'im (עֶפְרַת דַּמִּיִּם, 'ephez dammim): The place where the Philistines encamped in the Valley of Elah, between Socoh and Azekah (I S 17 1), Map II, D 1. The name is given as Pas-Dammim in I Ch 11 13. The exact site is uncertain.

EPHESIANS: One of Paul's disputed letters written in connection with the Epistle to the Colossians during his first Roman imprisonment between 59 and 61 A.D. The theory that Col., Eph and Phm were written during Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea is frequently revived but never receives wide acceptance. The recent suggestion that they were written during an imprisonment at Ephesus (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East) has been given interested attention.

1. Introductory. From the time of the Reformation (Erasmus, 1516) Ephesians has attracted attention because of its peculiarities of diction and its unusualness of thought, from a Pauline point of view. In fact, it was definitely rejected as the work of the Apostle (De Wette, 1826) even before the advent of the Tübingen School (1835), whose critical presupposition that all the N T writings which lacked the note of controversy attributed to the Apostolic Age must have been produced in the 2d cent. made the Epistle's characteristics presumption of the idea of church unity an easy mark for attack. In spite of the failure of this school to maintain its views, this Epistle is still quite generally disowned as Paul's, altho scholars like Jülicher (N T Introd.) balance in an opinion for and against, while Harnack (History of Dogma) considers the weight of external evidence in its favor sufficient to offset the unfavorable evidence from the letter itself.

2. Contents. Few letters of the N T consequently demand a more careful study of their contents.

After a brief greeting (1 1-5) the Apostle begins his main thought (1 5-19) with a long and involved doxological passage (1 3-6) embodying a thanksgiving for the spiritual blessings of the plan of salvation. At the head of this plan is the great fact of our election and redemption by the death of Christ (1 4-9) and through it is revealed the mystery of His will (1 9), the consummation of which is the establishment of the Headship of Christ (1<sup>10</sup>), in whom God's people are secured in their inheritance through faith—the Gentile equally with the Jew (1<sup>11-14</sup>).

In view of all this, as it applies to the readers, Paul gives thanks for their Christian life and prays for their progress in spiritual knowledge (1<sup>15-19</sup>)—especially in the knowledge of the Divine Power exercised toward them in spiritual things, the greatness of which is illustrated in the results accomplished by it in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ (1<sup>19-23</sup>), and the actuality of which is recognized in their experience of their own former spiritual death (2<sup>1-4</sup>) and their present spiritual life with Christ (2<sup>4-10</sup>).

He reminds them, accordingly, of their former and present spiritual relations to the Covenant People of God (2<sup>11-18</sup>), the change involved in which had been secured by the work of Christ (2<sup>11-19</sup>), and of the fact that this change should lead them up to a fuller appreciation of the ideal unity within the membership of the Church (2<sup>19-22</sup>).

In order to the realization of such unity he prays for the readers' growth in spiritual grace and in the knowledge and the love of Christ (3<sup>13-19</sup>), prefacing it with a fuller statement of the mystery of the Gospel and his own relation to it as an Apostle (3<sup>1-12</sup>) (in order to remove the prejudice which might arise in their minds from the fact that it was the preaching of his Gospel that had brought him into his imprisonment—showing that his chains were not the fault of his Gospel, but of the Jews' failure to grasp his Gospel's truth), and following it with a doxology (3<sup>20-21</sup>).

After a sustained plea that they should walk worthy of their calling (4<sup>1-14</sup>) and perform the duties of their new life by conquering their old sin (4<sup>17-24</sup>), and special exhortations within the field of the social and the domestic life (4<sup>25-6</sup>), the message closes with an urgent call to watchfulness and strength in their spiritual struggle (6<sup>10-18</sup>), while a brief personal conclusion (6<sup>19-24</sup>) brings the letter to its end.

3. Peculiarities of the Epistle. It is perfectly evident from these contents that this Epistle displays peculiarities unusual in Paul's letter-writing. (1) Particularly is there noticeable a lack of local color, a trait characteristic of Paul's letters and especially to be looked for in a letter to a church with which he had been in active service for the greater part of three years (Ac 19 8-10). He must have made many friends in Ephesus during this time, but no salutations of any sort are given in the letter (cf. in contrast Col 4 10 ff.). He had with him in Rome workers who were known to the Ephesians (e.g., Timothy), but no one is associated with him in the letter's opening address (1 1 f.; cf. in contrast Col 1 1, 7 f.; Phm ver. 1). (2) Equally marked is the absence of personal tone, a habit of the Apostle's correspondence and one to be confidently expected in a message to such a well-known church. With the trivial exception of the request for prayer and the reference to Tychicus' commission to acquaint the readers with his affairs—all confined to four verses in the conclusion (6 19-22)—the entire letter is general in its references, even where the personal pronoun is used (cf. 1 15 ff., 3 1 ff., 14 ff., 4 1 ff., 17 ff., in contrast with Col 1 24 ff., 2 1 ff.). (3) There is also this particular emphasis upon Christian unity within the Church—already referred to. It appears in the opening doxology (1 12-14), in the passage explanatory of the Apostle's commission (3 5 f.), in the exhortation to their Christian living (4 3-5, 13-16), and is specially evident in the passage where the Epistle's theme comes to its expression (2 11-22). There is no such unfolding of this thought in any other of the Apostle's letters—not even in the Pastorals, which have so much to do with the organized life of the Church. (4) At the same time a detailed study of the vocabulary and phraseology of the Epistle makes evident that, with all these differences, it stands in specific literary affinity with the Epistle to the Colossians.

Paul manifestly not only wrote these two letters at the same time, but in very much the same train of thinking, reproducing in Ephesians what he had already written in Colossians, in spite of the altered setting in which he placed it in the latter Epistle.

4. Relation to Paul's Work. Obviously these peculiarities call for explanation, and just as obviously the only explanation which will satisfy the conditions is one that comes from something more than the literary habits of the Apostle. In proportion as these peculiarities go beyond word and phrase their reason must be sought for in the Apostle's life and work.

It is consequently worth while to call to mind the effect produced upon Paul by the situation to which he addressed his Roman Epistle (q.v.). It gave him his first realization of the significance of the racial dualism (the Jew vs. the Gentile) in the Church and the importance which attached to the harmony and fellowship between the two elements which constituted it. From Ph 1 12-20 it is evident that this was confirmed to him by his personal experience after reaching Rome (see ROMANS, § 6). It should not be surprising, therefore, if his desire to see such unity consummated grew upon him during his imprisonment and voiced itself increasingly in the letters he wrote. Especially should it not seem strange if this great theme came to the emphatic presentation given it in our Epistle, when we remember that the absence of local color and personal tone in this letter is due to the fact that it was not addressed exclusively to any one community, but formed in all likelihood an encyclical letter to the churches of the region which to a large measure was only indirectly ministered to by Paul during his three years' stay in Ephesus. A letter so addressed to a sisterhood of churches would specially invite such a fellowship theme, while the general character of its recipients would render unlikely a specific personalness of address, or locality of reference.

Finally, when we remember that Colossians, addressed as it is to a local church troubled with the speculative errors that tended to subordinate Christianity, gathers its thought around the theme of Christ's supremacy, the fact that Ephesians, addressed to a circle of churches troubled more or less with the same errors, simply advances its thought upon that of Colossians, and discloses as its theme the unity of the Church in Christ supreme—this fact shows how natural it was that Ephesians should be so similar to Colossians and yet at the same time so different and distinct.

Ephesians stands thus as an almost necessary letter for Paul, in view of the lines along which his thought was developing and the increasingly significant problems presented by his work. It is consequently interesting to note how he presents the moral and spiritual needs which confront the readers in the situation. There is the need (1) of an intelligent appreciation of his message (1 9 f., 17 ff., 3 2-4, 18 f., 4 17 f., 20 f., 5 17); (2) of a realizing sense of the moral mission of their religion against the unspeakable things of the pagan world around them—distinctively of that truthfulness, peaceableness, honesty and purity of speech and act, which must not merely characterize their living in contrast to this evil life, but be their protest against and conquest of it (4:17-29, 5:3-10); (3) of an application of the principles of Christian brotherhood to the larger unity of the Church (chs. 2-6). This last point would have added significance in proportion as the readers were influenced by the exclusive tendencies which threatened the unity of the local church at Colossæ. (See COLOSSIANS, § 3).

5. Recipients of Letter. The question as to the specific group of churches to which the Epistle was addressed and the further question as to the mention of a specific locality (ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, 1:1) in the address of a letter intended for a general group of churches are more or less complicated, altho they do not affect the position above assumed. The details of the discussion may be found in the Introduction of Zahn (§ 28), the Biblical Essays of Lightfoot (X), and the introductory portions of the Comm. of Abbott, Ewald, and Salmond.

LITERATURE: Among the English Introductions to the N T, Julicher (Eng. trans. 1904) presents the most balanced views regarding the Ep; while Zahn (Eng. trans. 1917) gives the most thorough study of its problems. In their N T Introductions Bacon (1900) supports its Paulinity; Peake, (1910); holds its spuriousness unproven; Moffatt (1911) favors an un-Pauline source. See critical summary in Jones' N T in 20th Century (1914). Consult also the Comm. of Abbott (ICC 1897), Salmond (Expos. Grk. Test., 1903), Robinson (1903), Westcott (Posth., 1906), Murray (Camb. Grk. Test. for Schools and Colleges, 1914). For detailed discussion of the Ep's problems consult Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser und Kolosserbriefe (1872), Lightfoot, Biblical Essays (Posth., 1893), especially Hort, Prolegomena to St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians (1895, 1896). EPHESUS. 1. History Prior to 11th Cent. B.C. Ephesus (Ἐφεσός), originally situated at the mouth of the Cayster, is now 6 m. inland. The name (of Asiatic origin) referred originally to the sanctuary of the Asiatic Mother-goddess, wrongly identified later by the Greeks with Artemis. This sanctuary, probably founded by the Hittites (Kara Bel), was a mere tabernacle in a grove on the shore of the sea with a spacious harbor. The cult was the same as that of all anterior Asia. Its territory was inviolable and had the right of asylum. It was situated at the junction of natural trade-routes—advantages which induced settlers (Carians, Leleges, Lydians) to flock thither in prehistoric times. They dwelt on a hill (originally the island Syria) overlooking the sanctuary, afterward called the Artemisium, which long before the Greek immigration had an organized hierarchy of eunuch priests and virgin priestesses, the chief priest later having the Persian title of Megabyzus (Longimanus, 'Mighty One'), the priestesses were called Melissæ ('bees'), and the sacrificial priests Essenes ('king [=our queen] bees'). The armed guards of male and particularly female hierodouloi gave rise to a tradition that E. was founded by Amazons.

2. From Ionian Settlement to Cession to Persia. Such was E. in times prior to 1087 B.C., when Ionian adventurers under the leadership of Androclus came from Athens, settled the eastern foot of Mt. Coressus, and gave the name of Samorna (Smyrna) to the settlement. They conquered the earlier inhabitants and made a treaty with the priests of the Artemisium. The Artemisium was burned by the Cimmerians 678 or 669 B.C., but the town defied them. This aristocratic republic was overthrown in the 7th cent. by the tyrant Pythagoras, who, to atone for excesses, was instructed by the Delphic oracle to build a temple on the site of the tabernacle. This temple was the so called 'columnless temple,' with three courts. In the center stood the shrine of green stone which, because of its sanctity, formed the center of all successive temples. Cræsus of Lydia attacked E. in 568 B.C., but its ruler Pindarus bound the city to the Artemisium by a rope (a mile long), thus dedicating the city to the goddess. Cræsus is said to have withdrawn out of respect for the goddess, but really he effected his purpose. Pindarus was banished, and the Greeks forced to abandon their town on Coressus, to settle in the plain about the Artemisium, and pay tribute to Cræsus, while the tyranny gave place to a democracy. Cræsus tried to make amends by favoring the priests, and by contributing to the first great temple—then under construction on the site of the 'columnless temple'—some sculptured columns and golden bulls. This colossal dipteral temple, planned by Chersiphron, a Cretan, was 120 years in building; indeed, before completion it was remodeled—practically rebuilt—by Pæonius and Demetrius. Fragments of Cræsus' columns are now in the British Museum, one containing a dedicatory inscription and the name of Cræsus. In 546 B.C. E. became subject to Persia. The Artemisium was burned in 356 by Herostratus.

3. From Freedom from Persia to Establishment of Christianity. E. was freed from Persia by the battle on the Grancius in 334 and given a democratic constitution by Alexander, who assigned the Persian tribute to the Artemisium and fixed the limit of the right of asylum at one stadium. His offer, however, to rebuild the temple then under construction at his own expense was rejected. Ladies contributed their jewelry to the temple. Its architect was Chirocrates. The pavement was 1.5 meters above that of the burned temple. It was four times as large as the Parthenon, and was one of the seven wonders of the world. E. came under the control of the Romans with their conquest of Antiochus III of Syria (192-189 B.C.).

In 190 B.C. the Romans gave it to Eumenes of Pergamon. Attalus II (Philadelphus), in an attempt to improve the harbor, ruined it by building a mole. In 133 E. was incorporated into the Provincia Asia. In 88 it sided with Mithridates. In 86 it fought against Rome and in 84 was sacked by Sulla. In 73 Lucullus, in 51 Cicero, and in 48 Cæsar governed it. In 44 it aided Brutus and Cassius. It became the capital of Provincia Asia in 6 B.C. Augustus built the Augusteum (Sebasteum) for the worship of Rome and Augustus and for meetings of the provincial assembly (Κοινὸν Ἀσφάκ). In 29 A.D. E. was destroyed by an earthquake, and restored by Tiberius. In 53-55 Christianity was planted there by Paul (Ac 18:19-21), whose later stay of three years (Ac 19:1-22) was brought to a sudden end through the riot caused by the goldsmith Demetrius (Ac 19:23-20:1). Ephesus was a stronghold of Magic. Some magical formulæ were called 'Ephesian letters,' which perhaps illustrates Ac 19 19.

4. Its Christian History. E. had now become the third city of Christianity (after Jerusalem and Antioch). It was next to Alexandria (300,000) the most populous city of the East (225,000). In 92 A.D. a great library was constructed by Celsus. In 120 A.D. Hadrian visited E., embellished the city, cleared the harbor, built a commercial hall on the quay, changed the bed of the Caÿster, built the Olympieum, and instituted the games 'Ἀθροίμενα. Later (from the 3d cent. onward) E., as the metropolis of the churches of Asia, became a shrine to which Christians made pilgrimages because of its association with Paul, Timothy, as its first bishop, and John (Apostle or Presbyter), who, according to early tradition, made E. the headquarters of Christianity and died there (100 A.D.). According to popular tradition John was followed thither by the Virgin Mary (who died and was buried there), Mary Magdalene, Andrew, and Philip.

5. Language, People, Government, and Life. The language of the Ephesians was nominally Ionic Greek, but from earliest times the population was very mixed; so that the Hellenism was not pure, and the Greek blood was further adulterated by the worship of the Asiatic goddess with its attendant religious prostitution; for people who came as pilgrims to the sanctuary, as caravaneers from the Orient, as refugees enjoying right of asylum, as merchants engaged in commerce and slave trade, as financiers on business with the Bank of the Artemisium, begat children by the female devotees at the shrine, without loss of reputation to mother or child. The money belonging to the goddess was stored in the Artemisium. This resulted in the establishment of the Bank of the Artemisium, which lent money and received deposits from cities, kings, and private persons. The Megabyzus was president of the Bank, whose books were audited by the γραμματεὺς (Clerk) of the βουλὴ (Council). In Roman times the members of the Council numbered 450; they met in the theater; the president was entitled 'Boularch,' next after whom ranked the 'Town Clerk' (cf. Ac 19 35) and the Council Clerk. The civil magistrates were entitled στρατηγοί (see SERJEANT), while generals were entitled ἡγεμόνες. The Ἀγοράνομοι administered the commercial affairs. The chief of police was called εἰρηνάρχης.

In early times E. was a home of literature; Heraclitus and Callinus were Ephesians. It had famous works of art by Rhœcus, Endœus, Myron, Phidias, Cresilas, Phradmon, Polyclitus, Timanthes, Zeuxis, Parrhasius, Dædalus, Scopas, Praxiteles, Apelles, Timaretes, Thrason, Menestratus, and others. Its theater seated 24,500. There were two διαζώματα and 60 rows of seats, with a portico above the top row. It dated from Lysimachus, was remodeled in the 1st cent. A.D., and often renovated down to the 4th cent. A.D. The present theater, therefore, is not absolutely identical with that of Paul's day. Ruins of many Christian churches are still extant.

EPHLAL, ef'lal (ἑφλάλ, 'eph'lal): A Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 37).

EPHOD<sup>2</sup> (ἑφῶδ): In connection with worship, the word ephod appears to have designated two quite different things. (1) An article of priestly apparel (see PRIESTHOOD, § 10 (b)).

(2) Something else, the exact nature of which is not easy to determine, the references to it being found in the old narratives in Judges and Samuel. The plainest statements are in I S 23 69 and 30 7, where we read of Abiathar the priest being in David's camp with the ephod 'in his hand,' 'carrying it' and being told by David to 'bring it' for purposes of oracle-consultation. It is clear that here the ephod is not a garment but something that was carried about by the priest and used by him in obtaining answers from deity. This sense is also suitable in I S 2 28, 14 3 (where 'wearing' should be 'bearing') and 18 (where we should read 'ephod' with the LXX. instead of 'Ark'). We are left in entire ignorance of the form of this object, and of what it was made. It may well have been made of costly material and possibly was a box (some would say bag) of some sort containing the sacred stones (see URIM AND THUMMIM). If it was usually hung up in the sanctuary, we have a suitable explanation of I S 21 9.

In Jg 8 27 Gideon is said to have made an ephod of gold, which he put (no special emphasis need be laid on this verb; cf. the usage of the same word in 6 37) in his town Ophrah, where it became a center of worship. In Jg 17 5, 18 14 ff. Micah the Ephraimite is said to have made for his sanctuary an ephod, teraphim, and a graven (and a molten?) image. That in these passages in Judges ephod is to be understood as an image is a widely held opinion—but there is no direct proof of this, and the expressions in 18 14, 18, 20, seem to make a distinction between ephod and image. The ephod both of Micah and Gideon may have been instruments of divination similar to those spoken of in I Samuel.

EPHPHATHA, ef'a-tha (ἐφφαθά) (Mk 7 34): The transliteration of an Aramaic word spoken by Jesus. The Greek here may not perfectly represent the original form, which, may have been marked by some dialectic peculiarity. (Cf. Dalman, Aram. Gram.<sup>3</sup> p. 278; and Kautzsch, Gr. d. bibl. Aram. p. 10). E. E. N.

EPHRAIM, i'fra-im (עִפְרַיִם, 'ephrayim): I. The youngest son of Joseph. See TRIBES, §§ 3, 4. II. The term is frequently used, especially in the Prophets, to designate the Northern Kingdom of Israel, since the tribe of Ephraim was the most powerful element in that kingdom. III. A city of Judea mentioned only in Jn 11 54 as the place to which Jesus retired after raising Lazarus. The town near which Absalom had his sheep range (II S 13 23) and the Ἀφαρμα of I Mac 11 34 are possibly to be identified with the same place; also called Ophrah (Jos 18 23, etc.) and Ephron (II Ch 13 19). Map III, F 5. See also PALESTINE, § 7 (5). E. E. N.

EPHRAIM, i'frā-im, FOREST OF (עֲפְרַיִם יַעַר, ya'ar 'ephraim, wood of Ephraim AV): The scene of the decisive battle between the forces of David and those of his rebellious son Absalom (II S 18 6). From the account in II S chs. 17 and 18, the place was E. of the Jordan. Possibly it was so named from a colony of Ephraimites, E. of the Jordan (cf. Jos 17 14-18), to which there may be a reference in Jg 12 4. C. S. T.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF See JERUSALEM, § 32.

EPHRAIN, i'frā-in. See EPHRON, II.

EPHRATH, ef'raṭh (עֲפְרַתָּה, 'ephraṭh), or EPH-RATHAH (עֲפְרַתָּה, 'ephraṭhāh): The second wife of Caleb, son of Hezron (I Ch 2 19), and the mother of Hur (I Ch 2 50, 4 4), the ancestor of Beth-lehem, Kiriath-jearim, and Beth-Gader. Perhaps this means that Beth-lehem was one town of a district Ephraṭhah. Ephraṭhah (Ephraṭah AV) and Beth-lehem are parallel (Ru 4 11), and we read also of Beth-lehem Ephraṭhah (Mic 5 2). Jesse is called an Ephraṭhite of Beth-lehem-judah (I S 17 12). Naomi's sons are Ephraṭhites of Beth-lehem-judah (Ru 1 2). Ephraṭhah (Ps 132 6) probably means Beth-lehem or the surrounding district. Perhaps in Ps 132 6b we should read 'field of Jaar,' i.e., Kiriath-jearim (so RVmg.). In Jg 12 5, I S 11, and I K 11 26, the Heb. 'Ephraṭhite' should be read 'Ephraimite,' as in RV. Ephraṭh (Gn 35 16, 19, 48 7), the place where Rachel was buried, near Bethel, in the border of Benjamin (I S 10 2), was probably not the same as Bethlehem ('the same is Beth-lehem' is a later addition). See BETHLEHEM. C. S. T.

EPHRON, i'frōn (עֲפְרֹן, 'ephron): I. A Hittite, the son of Zohar of Hebron, from whom Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23 ff., 25 9, etc.). II. 1. A city which with others King Abijah wrested from Jeroboam (II Ch 13 19). (Ephraim AV and RVmg., the same as EPHRAIM, III [q.v.]). 2. A mountainous ridge, forming the northern boundary of Judah between Nephtoah and Kiriath-jearim (Jos 15 9).

EPICUREANS, 'Επικουρόι (Ac 17 18): The followers of Epicurus (341-270 B.C.), whose tenets opposed those of the Stoics. He started from hedonism and the atomistic theory, and contended that happiness consists in pleasure by which man arrives at virtue through absence of pain. Epicurus encouraged friendship and discouraged engaging in business and politics, which disturb serenity of mind. He placed the doctrine of the swerving of atoms in the forefront of his doctrine of the genesis of the world and of cognition and therefore exalted Chance to supreme power. There are either no gods, or else they do not care for man. The Epicureans were very dogmatic, and claimed infallibility for their doctrines. They bound their adherents to defend certain fundamental principles. They held that ethics and morals are of more importance than knowledge, which should be sought mainly to banish the disturbing elements of fear and superstition. Epicureanism reflected the elegance and freedom of Athens, and was therefore regarded by the early Christians as embodying the essence of paganism. See H. Sidgwick, History of Ethics V, s.v. 'Epicureans'. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

EPILEPTIC. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, III.

EPISTLE: The literary form of the greater portion of the N T writings. In their main construction the N T Epistles correspond generally to what was customary in the age in which they were written—consisting of an opening greeting, a body containing the message, and a closing salutation. In the construction of these several parts, however, they differ largely from the classical form, being more elaborate in both greeting and salutation, while the message is cast usually in a discursive form. The Epistles differ considerably also among themselves. Taking the letter of the Council, Ac 15 23-29, as a sample of classical form (see also letter of Claudius Lysias to Felix 23 26-30) the Epistle of James approximates most closely to literary usage in its employment of χαίρειν in its greeting, altho it has no salutation; while III John resembles this classical usage in the brevity of its greeting, altho it is of the usual N T type in its salutation. On the other hand, Hebrews and I John have no greeting, and the latter has no formal salutation. The remaining Epistles are of a peculiar Semitic form of greeting, in their wishing to the readers grace, mercy, and peace from the Divine source, I and II P Jude, and II Jn introducing the verbal form (I, II P, Jude, πληθυνθείη; II Jn, ἔσται), which is lacking in Paul's letters. The form of the closing salutation varies greatly, altho in several (I P, Ro, I and II Co, I Th) appears the idea of the holy kiss, which was a common form of salutation among the Hebrews, and in many (Ro, I and II Co, Gal, Ph, Col, I and II Th, He, II Ti, Tit, Phm, I P, III Jn) there is added, or substituted (Eph, I Ti), a renewal of the benedictory wish of grace, or peace from above; while in some (Ro, I Co, Col, I Th, II Ti, He, I P, III Jn) there are added or substituted (Phm, II Jn), personal remembrances or requests from the writer himself, or salutations from his companions, or the Christians of the place or the region from which he is writing. A few (Ja, II P, I Jn, Jude) can not be said to have any farewell salutation.

The messages of the N T Epistles are naturally determined as to their contents by the peculiar religious and spiritual condition of their readers. The usual form which the message assumes is that given characteristically by Paul—a discussion of the reader's situation from a doctrinal point of view, followed by a series of exhortations based upon the previous discussion and applied to the various phases presented by the situation. The best illustrations of this form are given by Ro, Gal, Eph, and Col. In Ph this form is modified somewhat by the personal cast of its contents, which is seen most distinctively in Phm. In I Co the form is constrained by the seriatim discussion of questions raised in the correspondence between the church and the Apostle, and of information given to the Apostle by members of the church. The composite character of II Co (q.v.) makes any classification of its message form difficult, while I and II Th are so peculiarly pastoral, and are determined so largely by the religiously undeveloped character of their readers as to lack formality of discussion. This informality is seen in its extreme form in the personal letters to Timothy and Titus.

Outside of Paul's letters, the variety is more marked. I P and He are the only ones which can be said to reproduce the general Pauline form, and in Hebrews the homiletic quality of the discussion so dominates it as to reduce to a minimum its resemblance to that form. II P and Jude resemble each other, but only feebly suggest the Pauline cast. Ja is a homily, after the style of the O T wisdom writings; while the peculiar literary relation of I John to the Fourth Gospel makes it practically throughout a spiritual application of the Gospel's narrated facts, and the specifically personal character of II and III Jn places them in the category of Phm.

To the character of their contents is due the designation of I and II Ti and Tit as the 'Pastoral Epistles.' The name 'Catholic,' however, as applied to Ja, I and II P, I, II, and III Jn, and Jude, while originating in the conception of them as circular or encyclical letters, was applied at the first only to certain of the group and came later to have the more ecclesiastical sense of 'generally accepted' (see CATHOLIC EPISTLES and PASTORAL EPISTLES).

In general, it is clear that these N T writings took their epistolary form in the way of natural correspondence and not as pure literary productions. They were written for their respective readers, with no thought of a general literary public; so that Deissmann's contention that they are letters rather than Epistles is justified (ET, Dec., 1906).

Besides the formal epistolary writings of the N T there are to be found in the O T and the N T references to individual letters, with more or less reproduction of their contents, such as (O T) the letter of David to Joab (II S 11 14 f.), Jezebel to the elders of Naboth's city (I K 21 8 f.), Jehu to the rulers of Jezreel (II K 10 1-7), Ben-hadad to the king of Israel (II K 5 5-7), Sennacherib to Hezekiah (II K 20 12; Is 39), Hiram to Solomon (II Ch 2 11), Jeremiah to the Exiles in Babylon (Jer 29 [Shemaiah to the rulers of Jerusalem, vs. 25, 31]), Elijah to Jehoram (II Ch 21 12-15). Hezekiah to the remnants of the Northern Kingdom (II Ch 30 1, 6), between officials at the Restoration (Ezr 4 7 ff., 5 5 ff.; Neh 2 7-9, cf. 6 5-7, 17, 19), Ahasuerus to the royal provinces (Est 3 12 f.), Mordecai to the Jews (Est 8 9-14, 9 20-22) Esther and Mordecai to the Jews (Est 9 29), and (N T) the letter of the High Priest to the Synagog of Damascus (Ac 9 2 [cf. 22 5], 28 21), the Council to the Gentile Converts of Syria and Cilicia (Ac 15 22-29), Claudius Lysias to Felix (Ac 23 26-30). Notice also reference to letters of introduction in II Co 3 1; Ac 18 27; I Co 16 3 (cf. Ro 16 1 f.), and to letters from the churches to the apostle (I Co 7 1); while the Book of Revelation, apocalyptic tho it is in its contents, is cast in the form of a letter from the Seer 'to the seven churches which are in Asia' (I 4; cf. 2 1, 8, 12, 18, 3 1, 7, 14).

M. W. J.

ER, or (עַר, 'ēr): 1. A son of Judah by the Canaanitess Shua (Gn 38 3 ff., etc.). Er married Tamar, but was slain by J' for his wickedness. The whole story in Gn ch. 38 probably represents tribal (or clan) rather than individual experiences. Er was thus a small clan that was lost (by conquest or absorption) in the larger clan of Tamar or Shelah. See Skinner's comment in ICC. 2. 'Son' of Shelah (I Ch 4 21). 3. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 28). E. E. N.

ERAN, ʾĕran (עֲרָן, 'ērān): The ancestral head of the Ephraimite clan of Eranites (Nu 26 36, cf. I Ch 7 20).

ERASTUS, 1-ras'tus (ΕΡΑΣΤΟΣ): 1. One of those ministering (οἰδιακονοῦντας) to Paul (Ac 19 22) who was sent on in advance from Ephesus to Macedonia. 2. The 'treasurer of the city' (οἰκονόμος), probably Corinth (Ro 16 23), especially if this Erastus is identical with the companion of Paul mentioned in II Ti 4 20 who remained in Corinth, presumably because it was his home. J. M. T.

ERECH, ʾĕrek (עֲרֶךְ, 'erekh): A city of S. Babylonia to the E. of the lower Euphrates, the modern Warka, the inscriptional Uruk and Arku, whose immense ruins indicate the site of a large city with a very long history. It is mentioned in Gn 10 10 as one of the four cities founded by Nimrod. Its antiquity is attested by its having been the center for S. Babylonia of the worship of the goddess Ishtar (cf. ASHTORETH), the Semitic Venus. It was also the principal scene of the Bab. Gilgamesh Epic. See BABYLONIA, § 7. Archevites are named in Ezr 4 9 f. as among the peoples settled in Samaria by Osnapper (Ashurbanipal). According to the usual explanation inhabitants of the territory of Erech are meant. J. F. McC.—L. B. P.

ERI, ʾĕrai (עֲרִי, 'ērī): The ancestral head of the Erites, a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 16).

ESAIAS, 1-zē'yās. See ISAIAH.

ESARHADDON, ʾĕsār-had'an (עֲשָׂרְחַדְדָּן, 'ēšar ḥaddōn = Assy. Ašur-aḥ-iddin [a]), 'Assur has given a brother': A son and successor of King Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) on the throne of Assyria, 681-668 B.C. He came to his throne after a revolution in which his father was slain (cf. Is 37 38; II K 19 37). As soon as he was established he rebuilt Babylon, which his father had ruthlessly destroyed (689 B.C.). He restored Eshargubanna, the holy place of Nanā in the temple of Eanna in Erech. His most notable and far-reaching campaign was that in which he invaded Egypt, 674 B.C. In 673 he repeated the attack and in 670 his army victoriously reached Memphis, captured it, and Egypt became a vassal to Assyria. While on the way to put down revolt in Egypt in 668, Esarhaddon died. I. M. P.

ESAU, ʾĕsāw (עֵשָׂו, 'ēsāw), 'hairy,' according to the popular etymology of Gn 25 25, which, however, is pronounced unsatisfactory by Buhl and others: The name of the first-born of the twin sons of Rebekah and Isaac (Gn 25 21 ff.). The story of E. in Gn is made up of several strands (J, E [?], and P. See GENESIS, § 4). The notice in 25 25 seems to be composite, as in it emphasis is laid upon his ruddy color, whence his name Edom, and upon his skin being like a 'hairy' (sē'ār) garment, a play upon the name Seir, with which the name E. is connected without explanation. But the origin of his name Edom is given later (25 29-34, as 'red,' in connection with the red pottage). Seir is used often interchangeably with Edom for the country inhabited by Esau's descendants, and the descendants of Seir are given in the genealogy of Esau-Edom, probably as a parallel table (Gn 36 20-30). In JE the interest centres about the relations between Esau and Jacob. In these old stories Jacob is represented as gaining the advantage over E. in connection with the question of inheritance (the birthright, 25 29-34 E [?], the blessing, ch. 27 E (?) and J. But on his return from Aram, Jacob is constrained to sue for favor from E., who is represented as meeting him graciously and forgiving all past offenses (chs. 32, 33 mainly J). In P the interest is mainly in Esau's marriages to Hittite (26 34 f.) and Ishmaelite (28 8 f.) wives, which is the reason for sending Jacob to Paddan-Aram (28 1-7).

In JE the stories are told with remarkable impartial objectivity. While E. is a 'hunter,' 'a man of the field,' and therefore a contrast to the 'quiet,' businesslike, crafty Jacob, little is said that shows that the writers condemn him. If Jacob well represents Israel's national traits, E. may also represent those of Edom. For, after all, it is the story of two peoples, the elder of which (Esau-Edom) was at last compelled to give way to the younger (Israel), that gives these stories their real historical significance, as is plainly indicated in the oracle in 25 23; cf. Skinner's careful comments in ICC. See also Edom. E. E. N.

1. Definition. Eschatology (from ἔσχατα, 'last things') is strictly the systematic presentation of ideas regarding the ultimate condition of the world and of mankind. Broadly, it includes also ideas regarding events leading to the end. Further, it includes not only the absolutely last things but also all that relatively to the present may be regarded as last, i.e., all that follows the present life of the individual and all that attends and follows the present dispensation, as far as the world is concerned. In a religious system its importance is even greater than that of the systematic presentation of origins (Cosmogony).
2. Development. Biblical eschatology, at least as much as any other department of the Biblical system of thought, shows signs of gradual development, and may, therefore, be properly subdivided into the eschatology, I, of the O T; II, of the intertestamental period, and III, of the N T. These three sections represent three periods of unequal duration. The first covers more than 1,000 years and ends with the 2d cent. B.C. The second lasts for approximately 200 years, and the third for somewhat less than one century.

I. OLD TESTAMENT ESCHATOLOGY.

3. General Features of O T Eschatology. The central subject in the O T is the Chosen People. In eschatology, therefore, the destiny of Israel furnishes the starting-point of the development of thought. And in the portraiture of the future of the Chosen People two things are distinguished: a final future glory reserved for it and an intervening period of judgment, called 'the Day of Jehovah.' Both of these are comprehended under the eschatological phrase latter days (last days, also 'end of days,' Is 2 2; Ezk 38 16).

4. The Day of Jehovah. The 'Day of Jehovah' ('Day of the Lord' AV), as a phrase, was first used in the 8th cent. and is represented as a consummation to which the people were eagerly looking forward (Am 5 18-20). Before it became a popular expression, however, the phrase must have been used by the prophets in oral encouragements and warnings. At any rate, in its first appearance it had already attained a misleading content, and Amos aims to correct the misconception. To the expectant people the Day of J'' conveyed the meaning of a time of indefinite duration (cf. DAY) when J'' would show His favor to His people by delivering them either from foreign oppression or from social irregularities and injustices. This conception takes its name, no doubt, from J''s special manifestation at the time, just as 'day of Midian,' 'day of Temptation,' etc., are times distinguished by these features. It is, however, often spoken of also as 'that day' (Is 17 7, 30 23; Mic 4 6; Zec 9 16, etc.).

5. A Day of Righteous Judgment. The prophets of the preexilic period, true to their character as ethical teachers, develop the idea by calling attention to the fact that, if Jehovah reveals Himself at any time, it must be as the God of righteousness, in order to visit punishment upon sin. With the preaching of this idea the Day of Jehovah became the Day of God's appearance to judge the nations of the earth for their unrighteousness (Zeph 1 7; Is 13 6, 9; Jl 3 14 [spectacular judgment in the Valley of Jehoshaphat]). But God's justice is from the nature of the case set against unrighteousness in all places with equal rigidity. Israel is no exception, and, therefore, both branches of the Chosen People must submit to the visitation of justice. The thought is enunciated with considerable emphasis by Amos (5 18). But the idea of judgment upon all nations opposed to the will of Jehovah is not bound up in the single phrase 'Day of Jehovah.' It appears independently as the constant refrain of the prophetic discourses; it is given eschatological distinctiveness only through its association with the Day. The usage of the exilic and postexilic period is best understood upon the basis of this free application of the term (Ezk 13 5, 30 3; Jl 1 15, 2 1, 11, 31; Ob ver. 15).

6. Precursors of the Day.—The specific character of such a period is more distinctly emphasized by placing between it and what precedes it certain events of exceptional or preternatural aspect. These were conceived as affecting not only the inner social and moral life of nations, but also the world of physical nature. They included portentous convulsions and changes in the order and movements of the heavenly bodies as well as in the earth itself (Is 24 1; Jl 2 2, 10).

7. A Day of Israel's Glory. But behind the Day of Judgment the eschatological prospect of the Israelite beheld a day of glory. This too was rooted in the character of J'', as a God exercising mercy and keeping faith with His covenant people. At this point eschatology coalesces with the vaguer forms of the Messianic hope (see MESSIAH). Trito-Isaiah portrays the prospect of the renovation and restoration of the nation (Is ch. 60). It is an age of perfection which needs no further change and undergoes none. The characteristics of it are the gathering together of all Israelites from all parts of the world (Is 43 6), the bestowment of all earthly blessings upon them (Am 9 11-15), the passing away of sorrow and sighing (Is 35 10, 65 19), and the change of all into righteous servants of J'' who glory in Him (Is 45 25).

8. Supremacy of Israel. The other nations are in this prospect brought into subjection to Israel either by conquest as a consequence of the warfare which they themselves have brought on by their attack on God's people (Ezk 38 18; Jl 2 20; Zec ch. 14 [passim]; Ob ver. 18), or by the voluntary adoption of the God of Israel as a God, because they shall recognize Him as the righteous King of the whole earth (Is 2 2-4). To this they will be led either by the manifestation of His great and fearful power (Zeph 3 8, 9; Is 16 8 f.), or by the teaching of Israel, especially by the Servant of J'' (Is 42 6, 49 6, 50 5 f., 51 4 f., 60 3). This, however, means that Israel is to rule over them and not merely take a primacy among them, as the first among equals (Dn 7 27).

9. Ezekiel's Ideal Israel. Of this ideal condition Ezekiel draws a general picture, as far as it concerns the internal conditions and arrangement of the land together with its laws and the ritual provisions that should prevail in the restored Israel (chs. 40-48).

10. National Resurrection. This is the restitution and resurrection of Israel. It is the new era ushered in by a new covenant under which all the imperfections of the old pass away. To use a term derived from pagan lore, it is the 'Golden Age.' In this renovation even the material creation and the animal kingdom will have a share. The earth shall increase her fruitfulness (Is 29 17, 30 26; 32 15). Prosperity will extend through all the departments of life (Jer 31 18; Jl 3 18; Am 9 13). Noxious beasts and birds of prey will change their natures; so that man shall no longer fear them (Is 11 6-8, 65 26), or else they will be exterminated (Ezk 34 25, 28). The age of man will be prolonged, and none shall die in youth (Is 65 20). Physical infirmities will be removed, as will also disease (Is 29 18). The light of the moon will be equal to that of the sun, and that of the sun will be sevenfold greater (Is 30 26), or J'' Himself will take the place of both sun and moon (Is 60 19). In fact, this will be a new world with new heavens and a new earth (Is 65 17, 66 22).

11. Literal and Figurative Blended. All these representations could not have been meant literally; but that some of them were so meant there can be little doubt. Yet, however meant and however understood, they are in themselves evidences of an expectation of a deeper and more essential transformation affecting the character of the people, which is grounded in God's love for and work in His Chosen People.

12. The Remnant. As to the method of the realization of this ideal, it was understood that it would be by the separation of a nucleus of righteous membership in the nation. How large this nucleus should be at the outset is not clear. Isaiah believed that it would include the main body of the state, or at least as much of it as could control the whole body. More frequently, however, the name 'remnant,' applied to it, carries with it the conception of a small beginning (see REMNANT, and cf. Is 37 4; Zeph 3 13; Zec 8 12).

13. Transition to Individualism. The moral line of distinction between the sound and unsound parts of the Chosen People is the link of connection between the collectivism and individualism of the O T. For the Remnant is after all constituted of persons who sustain independent relations with J'', not shared in by the general body. Their course is not determined by the whole body, else they must be of the same character and under the same condemnation.

14. Individualism in Jer and Ezk. In this transition to the individualistic view of religion Jeremiah served as a pioneer. Every one shall die for his own iniquity is his dictum (31 29 f.). The collapse of the national life with the Captivity no doubt helped to bring into view the importance of a change of basis. At any rate, Ezekiel closely follows Jeremiah's individualism (Ezk 18 4). All souls stand in direct relation to God ('the soul that sinneth, it shall die'). Therefore one may raise himself out of the evil into which he is born and in which he lives (Ezk 18 21-24) and enter a new community.

2. The Individual.

15. Death. To the individual the fact of primary importance in eschatology is death. The thought of death was from the very beginning present to the mind of the Hebrew, as it was not among some other races. As to the nature of death itself, however, there is no discussion or explanation of it as a physiological or physical reality. It is certain that it is viewed not as the end of all existence but simply as an end of earthly life. Death is caused by the escape of the soul from the body; and soul and life are practically synonymous. As the life is in the blood (Lv 17 11; Gn 9 4 f.; Dt 12 23), the shedding of the blood is the liberation of the soul. If unjustly forced out of the body, the life could cry out to God for vengeance (Gn 4 10).

16. Immortality. Thus expelled or left to escape from the body, life does not become extinct nor lose its personal continuity. Personal continuity and life in the body are not identical. The spirit of life is indeed necessary for existence on earth; but the person may continue to exist in another form after it has left the body. This doctrine, however, is quite different from the idea of inherent immortality in the Greek sense, which involves the indestructibility of the essential being of man. The Hebrew notion involves simply the belief that death does not end all for the individual. The prohibition of necromancy, the sharp distinction between man and other animals, and belief in resurrection, altho distinctly enunciated only in the latest times (Dn 12 2), put this conclusion beyond doubt.

17. State After Death. Just what becomes of the person at death is a question answered variously. According to the popular conception he is 'gathered to his fathers' (Jg 2 10; II K 22 20, or 'his people,' Dt 32 50). But this is very vague. A more developed answer is found in the doctrine of Sheol.

18. Sheol (Hell AV). The O T Sheol<sup>1</sup> (Hell AV) and the N T Hades must be distinguished from the grave. Abraham, Moses, Jacob, and Aaron are buried in graves far from the sepulchers of their ancestors, and yet they are gathered to their fathers, or pass into Sheol. Sheol is then a distinct place in the depths of the earth (Pr 15 24; Ps 88 13). It is a region of darkness (La 3 6; Ps 143 3). It is the land where light is as midnight (Job 10 22). It is a vast place, for it receives all and is never full (Pr 27 20; Ezk 32 21). It is known also by other names, such as the pit (Ps 28 1, 30 3; Ezk 32 18); Abaddon, i.e., 'destruction' (Job 26 6, 28 22; Pr 15 11; Ps 88 11); 'the lower parts of the earth' (Is 44 23; Eph 4 9); also poetically a 'place of silence' (Ps 94 17, 115 17), 'the land of forgetfulness' (Ps 88 12); and in a still more imaginative description it is compared to a huge monster with wide-open mouth swallowing those who come near (Is 5 14).

19. Mode of Existence in Sheol. The mode of existence in Sheol is certainly inferior to that upon earth. It is shadowy and dim, owing to the absence of the spirit of life. But it is not a mere disembodied soul or spirit existence. The terms soul and spirit are not used of those who dwell in Sheol. The only exception is Job 14 22, and here the person in Sheol is conceived of as being there in soul and body. More frequently those in Sheol are called 'stiff' or 'weary' ones (Rephaim, 'weak,' Is 14 9 f., so also in the Phœnician inscription of Eshmunazzar, who are, however, not to be confused with the Rephaim named as primitive giants in Gn 14 5, 15 20). Hence their state is one of privation. They have done with all activity and feel neither pain nor the thrill of excitement (Job 3 13-19); and yet in Is 14 10 they are poetically said to be roused up to meet the king of Babylon who is about to join them. In any case, they lack all comfort and joy (Job 17 16).

20. Consciousness in Sheol. To what extent even consciousness was believed to continue in the state after death is uncertain. That some degree of mental activity must exist in any condition in which the distinctiveness of man is preserved goes without saying; but it is possible both to exaggerate the amount of feeling implied and to minimize it. It is not safe to infer from the use of the term 'knowing ones' (Lv 19 31; Is 19 3, 'familiar spirits' RV) that the dead appealed to in necromancy were regarded as more than usually gifted in knowledge (I S ch. 28) or that there is an earlier and a later doctrine on the subject. The more legitimate inference is that the thought of the superior wisdom of the departed was entertained among the heathen, but that in Israel it was especially repudiated as contrary to the principles of Jehovah worship. Nevertheless it is true that the later thought of the O T is more consistent on this point to the effect, namely, that the departed pass a dreamlike incoherent semiconscious existence (Job 10 22).

21. Separation from J' in Sheol. The most important aspect of existence in Sheol to the Israelite was its separation from J'. This caused him great regret (Ps 6 5, 88 10-12; Is 38 18); therefore the dead are mourned (II S 1 17), and the prospect of future reunion with them affords no comfort (II S 12 23). Whatever differences between dwellers in Sheol may exist, they are based not on moral grounds but on racial distinctions. The idea of translation to heaven, as in the case of Enoch and Elijah, does not seem to have formed an appreciable factor in the religious thought of the Hebrews.

22. Individual Resurrection. That the dead should be raised from the grave, re clothed in bodily life, and rewarded or subjected to punishment is a conception which appears only in the latest generations of the O T period, and plays an important part in ministering comfort to the surviving comrades and kinsfolk of martyrs (Dn 12 2). The question of the return from Sheol is, however, suggested with a decided negative bias by Job (14 14). In 19 25-29 of the same book (a most obscure passage, 'in my flesh' AV, 'from my flesh' ERV, 'without my flesh' ARV), the testimony for a belief in a bodily resurrection is quite doubtful.

23. The Eschatology of Ecclesiastes. The type of thought in Ecclesiastes (q.v.) does not allow itself to be fused with that of the other O T books. That in this book there are two inconsistent systems is very clear. Whatever the occasion and cause may be, the pessimistic system is more nearly allied to the materialistic view of man's nature and future. Evidently, however, this was felt to be incompatible with the spirit of the Israelite. Either the author himself, or some one else for him, explains the eschatological correlatives (cf. 12 13 f.). See also ECCLESIASTES, § 4 (iv).

II. THE INTERTESTAMENTAL PERIOD.

(ESCHATOLOGY OF JUDAISM.)

24. Formative Influences. In the interval between the close of the O T and the opening of the N T, eschatology assumed very great prominence. This was due to (1) the distressing circumstances of the period, in which, however, the conviction that all was well, and should ultimately issue in an auspicious consummation, never failed or faded; (2) fresh and great interest in the individual and the contemplation of the problems of religion from that view-point; and (3) contact with the Greek-world with its doctrine of immortality, which was carefully wrought out upon philosophical grounds. The three branches of eschatology (the world, the nation, and the individual) are, however, still held in view.

25. Literary Sources: Apocrypha. Of the three classes of writings of the period (the Apocrypha, the works of Josephus and Philo, and the apocalyptic literature) the first furnishes nothing distinctive. In II Maccabees the latest development of O T eschatology (especially the idea of the bodily resurrection of the faithful) is acutely presented; but the other Apocrypha contain either no eschatological data or only such as are duplicated in the canonical O T.

26. Philo and Josephus. Jewish eschatology, as far as reflected in Philo and Josephus, shows the development of a difference between Palestinian and Alexandrian types of thought; but essentially its general outline and fundamental position are the same in both. The Messiah and the Messianic restoration of prosperity are quite prominent (Philo De Exec. 8-9; De Præm. et Pæn. 15-20; Jos. Ant. IV, 6 f.; X, 11 f.). Philo believed in a final state for the individual at death without subsequent judgment and resurrection, but with everlasting rewards and punishments; and in a special place of punishment (Tartarus, as among the Greeks, De Exec. 6). Josephus, on the other hand, held to the very safe idea of an intermediate condition for both righteous and wicked and a resurrection for the righteous only (Ant. XVIII, 8 14; BJ, II, 1 3).

27. Apocalyptic Literature. The most prolific source of eschatological notions for this period is the apocalyptic literature. So large a place is given to the last things in these writings that some use the terms 'apocalyptic' and 'eschatological' as interchangeable. It is the chief feature of this literature that it divides the whole history of the world into two sections called eons, or ages, separated by a sharp line. All that precedes the moment of separation is the 'present age' (ἡ αἰὼν οὗτος) all that follows is the 'age to come' (ἡ αἰὼν ἡ ἐρχόμενη). They differ from each other in moral character and also in outward conditions. The present age is controlled by brute forces; it is the world-kingdom, symbolized under the figures of beasts. The future is the age of the Divine king, presented under a human aspect (Dn 7 27). The duration of the evil age is absolutely fixed, and altho reckoned differently (Eth. En. 16 1, 18 16, 10,000 years; Assump. Mos. 5,000 years) it is near its end, and the question with those living is whether they shall continue through it and witness the advent of a new eon.

28. Messianism in Apocalyptic Literature. The future age is naturally characterized by the setting up of the Messianic kingdom and the coming of the Messiah. In both these matters, the thought is rooted in the O T, but developed into a diversity of form not always capable of reduction into a systematic unity. But for the most part these developments are subsequent to the beginning of the N T and influenced by it. More emphasis, however, is laid in the Apocalypses upon the dolores Messie, i.e., the disturbances which are to precede and introduce the Messianic Age, and on the appearance of an anti-Messianic personality representing all enmity against God (Antichrist, cf. Sib. Or. 3 63).

29. Expansion of Ideas. The individual eschatology of the Apocalypses carries out the O T conception on the various phases of the subject to their fuller outline, especially those which cluster about judgment, resurrection, and retribution. On all these subjects, ideas were more clearly outlined. Belief in the resurrection took into its scope the re-embodiment of all men with a view to their being judged either individually or in a great and common assize and being assigned to their respective destinies of reward or penalty. Sheol was also developed into the conception of a place subdivided into two caverns, separated by a wall or chasm (gulf, Lk 16 26), one occupied by the departed just and the other by the unjust.

30. Gehenna. Furthermore, the growing use of the Valley of Hinnom (gē-hinnōm) as the figure of everything suggestive of disgust and abhorrence furnished a ready mold for the thought of a place of punishment for the wicked. Gehenna (and in a simpler form, 'the Valley,' Jer 2 23, 31 40) is clearly identified with Sheol in Assump. Mos. 10 10 (cf. also Eth. En. 99 11, 103 7 f.).<sup>2</sup>

31. Paradise. A counterpart of Gehenna, a place for the righteous after death, was found in the idea of Paradise (a Persian word meaning 'park,' 'garden'). But the location of Paradise is uncertain. By some it was thought to be a portion of Sheol separated by a chasm from the abode of the wicked, by others it was made a place in the presence of God Himself (Heaven, so the Pharisees, Jos. Ant. XVIII, 1 3; BJ, II 8 14; Wis 3 14, 4 10, 5 5, 7). Finally the Essenes regarded it as a place on the renovated earth in the future. In the Apocalypses, so far as the subject is touched upon, Paradise is located on the earth (Eth. En. 32 8-23; Jub. 3 9 f.; but cf. IV Esd 6 51-70).

III. NEW TESTAMENT ESCHATOLOGY.

32. General Aspects. True to its essential characteristics, N T thought completely eliminates from eschatology the national phase and distributes the interest on the individual and universal aspects of the subject. The problem of the destiny of a special community, however, is not totally left out of consideration. The Christian brotherhood clustering around Jesus Christ assumes a place among the subjects of thought. The struggles and the final victory of the Church are very largely in the foreground; and yet they come into view as features of a world dispensation rather than as experiences of a limited circle of human beings.

1. Eschatology of Jesus.

33. Eschatology in the Teaching of Jesus. All N T teaching naturally begins with the words of Jesus. And in this realm the establishment and growth of the Kingdom of God upon earth forms the starting-point. There can be no doubt that in speaking of the Kingdom of God Jesus used the phraseology current in his day. Neither can there be any doubt that He was far more vitally interested in the Kingdom of God as an inner spiritual reality. Just how His language and His thought harmonize has been the subject of much difference of view. On the one hand, it is stoutly contended that by the Kingdom, He could only mean a visible organization, which would be divinely established for Him by a sudden manifestation of power (Bousset, Die Predigt Jesu in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum; Shailer Mathews, The Mess. Hope in N T, 1905). On the other hand, there is abundant ground for the position that Jesus viewed the Kingdom as already established while He was teaching His disciples, and that He expected it, while starting with small beginnings, to attain through natural processes unto a world wide diffusion and growth.

34. The Kingdom of God in the Future. The Parousia. Whichever of these two antagonistic views may be correct, it remains true that for the disciples of Jesus the essential portion of the foundation and organization of the Kingdom lay in the future. Only when His earthly work should be ended and Jesus should return again to earth as the glorified Messiah would the Kingdom be in full manifestation. Hence the promise of His second coming (παρουσία, Mt 24:3, 27, 39) of which the time is concealed from all, even from the Son (Mk 13:32), but of which He gives certain signs that they may recognize it. This thenceforth is the central factor in all N T eschatology.

35. Sources of the Material in the Parousia Discourse. The parousia, however, is in the eschatological discourse of Jesus (Mt chs. 24, 25; Mk ch. 13) associated with the end of the world, and with the collapse of the Jewish community, and it has been impossible to extricate the matter from the obscurity which has surrounded it on this account. The assumption that there is a double coming spoken of, or that a Jewish Apocalypse has been adopted into the teaching of Jesus and given as a discourse of His, and other assumptions of the same kind are arbitrary and improbable. But there is, on the other hand, a considerable amount of vagueness in the evangelic reports of what Jesus said, indicating that perhaps from the very nature of the case the reporters of the discourse were not able to grasp His thought with clearness.

36. Parousia and Judgment. Closely associated with the declaration of the parousia is the other declaration that its object would be the Judgment. This is clearly an indication of the whole setting and trend of the discourses in Mt chs. 24 and 25. A judgment is more explicitly foretold also in other connections (Mt 10:15, 11:22, 24). In this Judgment Christ Himself is the Judge; those who are judged are all classes of men, including peoples of the past ages, such as the Queen of Sheba, Sodom and Gomorrah (Mt 11:20, 24), and Nineveh; hence also the Gentiles, the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19:28), and His own adherents. The rule of Judgment is the ethical one of the exercise of love (Mt 25:31 f.).

37. Immortality and Resurrection. The question of resurrection comes into view as a point of controversy between the Sadducees and the Pharisees, on which His teaching is sought. And Jesus unhesitatingly places Himself on record (Mt 22:23 f.; Mk 12:18 f.; Lk 20:27; cf. also Mt 8:11; Lk 13:28) in favor of the essential truth of the belief. The difficulties of the Sadducees upon the subject have no existence for Him, because it belongs to a different order of reality from those of common experience. But to the same order belongs also immortality. In fact, the latter is in the conception of Jesus based upon the former, and both are rooted in man's relation to God as the object of God's paternal love. Jesus appeals to the fact that J<sup>c</sup> calls Himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Mt 22:32). This was the ground for believing that the patriarchs were not dead. For whom God attaches to Himself in the relation implied in such an utterance, the experience of death can not be the end of all. This is an explicit assertion of the immortality only of some men; but it does not exclude the doctrine of the immortality of all. Further, to the Jewish mind at least, the fact that the patriarchs were living carried with it the implication that they must some time be raised out of their graves. For in mere bodiless existence they could not be ideally perfect.

38. Intermediate State: Hades. The question, then, what becomes of men at death, was never asked of Jesus or taken up by Him independently. Belief in an intermediate state, however, connecting the present dispensation with that which shall be at His second coming (and the Judgment) underlies as an assumption and unifies the two parts of His teaching. And as a substructure for this idea the belief in an underworld ('Sheol,' 'Hades') appears in a transformed and spiritualized aspect. Hades is no longer a place distinctly and per se, but the figure of a place, or a place as the figure of a moral reality. This is undoubtedly true also of such other terms as were designed to give a notion of the hereafter. Abraham's bosom (Lk 16:22) can not be regarded as anything more than the name of a fellowship with the righteous and faithful (cf. Paradise, above, § 31). Similarly, the statement that a gulf is fixed between those who are in Abraham's bosom and those in torment (ver. 26), altho perhaps reflecting the intertestamental notion that a chasm (gulf) separates the two compartments of Sheol, can be given here only a figurative significance.

39. Rewards and Penalties Hereafter. The rewards and punishments of moral conduct in this life are measured out at the Judgment and become permanent. The wicked are cast down into Gehenna (Mt 5:20 f., 10:28; Mk 9:43). Sometimes, however, the place of punishment is called outer darkness (Mt 8:12), or a place where there are wailing and gnashing of teeth (Mt 22:13, 24:51), a place of torment (Lk 16:23) and of unquenchable fire. (Mk 9:43, 45). Of the duration of this punishment, all that may be said is that it is eternal (eonan, or age-long), just as its counterpart is eternal life for the righteous (Mt 25:46, everlasting AV). There is, however, an intimation of the modulation of penalty according to the amount of knowledge of the sinner (Lk 12:46, 48). The righteous enter into the joy of their father; they inherit the kingdom, they possess treasures in heaven; they live like the angels in a state above need and care (Mt 25:31-40).

2. Eschatology of the Apostles.

The apostolic treatment of these subjects combines adherence to current Jewish views with an unfolding of the germs given in the thought of Jesus. In general, it may be included under the four types (the Early, the Pauline, the Deutero-Pauline, and the Johannine).

40. Early Apostolic Eschatology. The first phase of apostolic eschatology (that of James, Peter, and the Acts) revolves about the conception of the Parousia. It forecasts some trials and persecutions but also an impending restoration (ἀποκατάστασις, Ac 3 21, restitution AV). The belief in the underworld, with its corollary the intermediate state, also comes to the surface (I P 3 19-21, 4 6); but the interpretation of the passages in which it is expressed is beset with great difficulty. The 'spirits in prison' alluded to in them may be either men in Hades or the fallen angels of II P 2 4 and Jude 6; and, so long as it is impossible to say what they are, nothing definite can be built on these expressions.

41. Pauline Eschatology. The Pauline eschatology is presented in a variety of forms which do not blend into an altogether perfect unity. Especially is this true of the necessary inferences that may be drawn from them. An important place in it is occupied by the establishment of God's kingdom through the second coming of Jesus (described as 'the day of the Lord Jesus Christ,' 'his revelation,' I Co 1 7, 'his coming,' 'presence,' I Th 2 19, RVmg.). This coming, however, has for its end the judgment of men by Christ Himself. It is to introduce a universal crisis which would include in its scope the heathen as well as the Jews, and to consist in the revelation of the depths of men's moral character (it is a day of the manifestation of God's wrath, Ro 2 5; II Co 5 10). But it is to be characterized also by the manifestation of the Antichrist as a single person (II Th 2 8). (See ANTICHRIST).

42. Pauline Idea of Resurrection. But the eschatological idea most fully elaborated by Paul is that of the resurrection. His relation with Greek thought, and his desire to conquer it for Christ led him to consider the prejudice against the conception as it ruled the Greek mind, and to make a synthesis of it with the Platonic doctrine of immortality. Paul thus stands as the connecting-link between the Jew to whom immortality in any sense worth considering was, apart from the body, unthinkable and the Greek to whom the resurrection of the body was a grotesque Oriental superstition.

43. The Spiritual Body. In working out the problem of this synthesis, Paul found the conception of a spiritual body a great help, but not much more than a help; for he does not exactly define what the spiritual body is, i.e., whether it is made of a third substance partaking of the qualities of matter and of spirit, yet free from those characteristics of either which offer difficulties to the idea of resurrection, or whether it is a symbol or picture of a reality not otherwise to be appreciated. The analogy by which he brings it to the mind (I Co 15 36 f.) is after all only an analogy.

44. The Resurrection of Jesus. In any case, Paul's belief in the resurrection is intimately connected with the historic fact of the resurrection of Jesus. The fact indicates the existence of a law of resurrection whose operation at the last day will be universal (I Co 15 20). The application of this law, however, must be limited by his view that it is through the implanting of a Divine life in them that Christ secures the resurrection of those who belong to Him (cf. Ro 8 11). But if so, a resurrection for unbelievers, if it take place at all, must be secured in some other way; and just what this way is the Apostle does not say. Hence it has been said, but not convincingly, that his idea does not include the resurrection of unbelievers (Kabisch, Eschatol. d. Paulus, 1893, p. 267 ff.).

45. The Consummation. Another cardinal point in the Pauline eschatology is the doctrine of the consummation. Here Paul passes into the realm of the cosmic application of Biblical ideas. The Gospel which originates with the creation of man bears also upon the destiny of man, to the uttermost end. But if it does this for man, it can not stop there; it must have its sweep through the whole sphere of intelligent beings; hence the Apostle looks forward to the time when all things shall be headed and ruled by the Creator alone (I Co 15 24).

46. Deutero-Pauline Eschatology. The Deutero-Pauline eschatology, as given in the Epistle to the Hebrews, altho not so explicit as that of the Pauline writings, moves along the same lines. The single feature of it which may be said to introduce a strikingly new form is the summing up of all the portents and convulsions foreshadowed in the old prophets under the figure of a shaking of all things (He 12 26, 'make to tremble').

47. The Johannine Eschatology. The Johannine eschatology includes the two forms given in the Gospel and Epistles on the one side, and in the Apocalypse on the other. Altho differing in form, these two are in substance the same. The difference in form is the result of the use of such diverse methods of presentation as the direct and the apocalyptic. The first of these (in the Gospels and Epistles) shows the parousia at the center. Judgment, resurrection, rewards, and punishments are grouped about that main conception. The Apocalyptic, taking the author's times as a basis, views the experience of the Christian community as one of struggle, culminating in a final crisis, out of which the Church emerges victorious, purified, and renewed. Its view of the Messianic Kingdom, of the resurrection and judgment, and of all other points of interest, is determined by this thought (cf. also REVELATION, BOOK OF).

48. Eschatology of the Apocalypse. The Millennium. The salient points of its forecast are: (1) The second coming of Christ for judgment; (2) a first resurrection, with the establishment of a millennium of peace under Messianic rule; (3) a second or general resurrection; (4) the final overthrow of Satan and punishment of the wicked; and (5) the reconstitution of the world with new heavens and a new earth and a heavenly Jerusalem. The Millennium (a period symbolically limited to a thousand years) is to be ushered in by the casting of Satan into the abyss (q.v., 20 1, bottomless pit AV), and to be characterized by the prevalence of ideal righteousness, peace, and prosperity. It is to end with the release of Satan, and the renewal of the struggle and its final stage. The general resurrection issues in the judgment of the wicked and their being cast into the lake of fire together with Hades and Death. This is the Second Death (20 14, 21 8).

49. Summary. The essentials of Biblical eschatology, as they appear when all that was formal and temporary in the process of their gradual revelation is laid aside, include the following:

(1) A continuity of conscious existence for the individual (personal immortality). This, however, viewed as life, is so much richer and fuller for those who are identified with Christ that comparatively speaking they only may be said to be immortal. (2) An intermediate state of pure psychical existence, whose nature must necessarily be incapable of explanation. (3) Bodily resurrection for all. But neither is the reassumption of the material of the body necessary to the conception of such resurrection, nor is any mode of revivification included in the doctrine. (4) A new world dispensation, or order of being, ushered in by a remanifestation of the Incarnate and Risen Savior. (5) The judgment of all men by the Risen Christ, issuing in the separation upon spiritual and moral principles of those who are in living fellowship with God through Christ from those who are not. (6) The award of eternal blessedness to the former and of eternal loss to the latter (perdition), because of persistence in alienation from God.

ESDRAELON. See PALESTINE, § 9.

ESDRAS, ez'dras, BOOKS OF: 1. Name. The books that bear the name of Ezra (Gr. form, Esdras, 'Εσδρας) are found variously numbered in the ancient codices. The Vatican MS. of the LXX. gives three books under two titles, i.e., Esdras A (the apocryphon) and Esdras B (embracing the canonical books Ezr and Neh). The Vulgate separates Ezr and Neh and gives them the titles of I Es and II Es respectively, thus placing Es A of LXX. as III Es and another book (the Apocalypse of Es) as IV Es. Of the English translations the Genevan initiated the usage according to which the canonical books are called Ezra and Nehemiah and the apocryphal I Esdras and II Esdras respectively. Other names given to the apocryphal books are the Priest (ὁ ἱερεὺς) and the Greek Esdras for I Es and the Apocalypse of Ezra (Westcott) and the Prophet (ὁ προφήτης, Hilgenfeld) for II Es. Common usage predominantly favors I Es and IV Ezra (II Es) for these books. In the English Revision of 1894 they are called I and II Esdras.

I ESDRAS

2. Contents of I Es. The contents of I Es are parallel, with the exception of one section, to certain sections of the canonical books II Ch, Ezr, and Neh, as may be seen by the table following:

I Es 1 1-58 = II Ch. ch. 35 and 36 1-21 (Josiah's Passover and the fall of Jerusalem).

I Es 2 1-15 = Ezr 1 (Cyrus' decree and the preparations for the Return. The Temple treasures delivered to Sheshbazzar the leader of the Return).

I Es 2 16-30 = Ezr 4 7 (6 omitted) (The decree of Artaxerxes forbidding the building of the walls and city of Jerusalem).

I Es 3 1-5 6 (no parallel in Ezr-Neh. The story of the contest of the Three Pages and Darius' award to the victor, the Jew Zerubbabel, by a decree authorizing the building of Jerusalem and the Temple).

I Es 5 7-73 = Ezr 2 1-4 5 (The list of those who returned, the resumption of worship at the altar at Jerusalem, the laying of the foundation of the Temple, the opposition of enemies and the cessation of the work [for two yrs. in I Es] until the 2d year of Darius).

I Es chs. 6-7 = Ezr chs. 5-6 (Resumption of work on the Temple, Opposition, the Appeal to Darius and the favorable reply, the completion and dedication of the Temple).

I Es 8 1-9 30 = Ezr chs. 7-10 (Ezra's visit to Jerusalem and the trouble over the mixed marriages.)

I Es 9 31-55 = Neh 7 12-8 12 (The public reading of the Law.)

3. The Relation of I Es to the Canonical Ezr-Neh.

This remarkable identity of so much of I Es with sections of II Ch-Ezr-Neh naturally calls for explanation, but on investigation proves to be one of the most perplexing problems of O T criticism. The problem is a twofold one: (1) that of the text of I Es in comparison with the text of the canonical sections, and (2) that of the sequence of events.

The text of I Es exhibits many divergences from the Heb. text (as we now have it) of the parallels in II Ch-Ezr-Neh. The simplest solution would seem to be that, where these divergences are not due merely to the fancy or taste of the Greek translator of the canonical material, they may be due to his having had a slightly different, and at points better, Heb. text of our canonical books before him. But a number of modern scholars feel compelled to go much further than this and say that 'I Es is not a translation of the present MT (Massoretic [Heb.] Text)' but of a Heb-Aramaic original of which our present MT is another but divergent form. That is to say, back of both the Greek text of I Es and the present Heb. text of the canonical parallels is an earlier text of which these two are independent and divergent representatives.

And essentially the same conclusion is reached as to the order and contents of the two divergent stories: namely, that the original story of Ezra was not told in the form we now find it in either I Es or Ezr-Neh, but that both of these represent the results of different editorial revision and re-working of the same original material. The particular theory in which these conclusions as to the text and contents of I Es are embodied is presented differently by different scholars, who are, however, at one in their main contention. For the numerous details of this very complicated problem the reader must be referred to the literature noted below.

4. The Reliability of I Es. It is generally agreed that our canonical Ezr-Neh gives in places a confused and even mistaken account of the event which it relates. It is impossible e.g. to make Ezr ch. 3 agree with the more primary evidence we have in Hag and Zech. Also Ezr 4 6-23 is evidently out of place where it is and many also hold that Neh chs. 8-10 should follow immediately on Ezr ch. 10. Does I Es give a better, a more historical account of the same period and is it therefore to be followed rather than the canonical account? Certainly not as its text now stands. It also puts the section Ezr 4 7-23 in a wrong, historically impossible, place, altho a different one from that in which the canonical Ezr places it. And its story—peculiar to itself, altho probably drawn from an Aramean source, of the Three Pages, hardly commends itself as reliable. Yet a very respectable number of modern scholars hold that I Es must be seriously taken into account along with Ezr-Neh in any attempt to reconstruct the actual history of the very obscure and yet very important period of reconstruction after the Exile. On the whole it seems necessary to consider I Es on the one hand and Ezr-Neh on the other as originally two independent attempts at writing, on the basis of fragmentary information, some of it written and some merely oral tradition, the history of the period. Each of the accounts became subject to later editorial alteration so that we have neither of them in their original form. The one we know as I Es was translated into Greek first and was therefore the version used by Josephus. The Greek version of Ezr-Neh was made later, possibly not until the 2d cent. A.D.

I Es should then be considered a parallel witness with Ezr-Neh to original sources no longer extant. The divergences should in each case be tested on their own merits irrespective of theories as to the books as a whole in their present form. Both contain many inaccuracies and only the most careful sifting and testing can yield satisfactory results.

5. Original Form. The present text of I Es breaks off rather abruptly leaving the impression that the latter portion may have been lost. The text Josephus had before him was not the text in its present form and the evidence seems to show that the present text has been made to conform more nearly with that of the canonical Ezr-Neh. It is possible if not probable, that the original book, as Josephus had it, may have been longer than the present one, containing extracts from Nehemiah's memoirs (as our Ezr-Neh does). In this case the original I Es was more similar to our Ezr-Neh in scope and content than its present form would indicate. The main differences between the original I Es and our Ezr-Neh were (1) the place of the section Ezr 4 7-23 and (2) the inclusion in I Es of the story of the Three Pages and its immediate consequences.

6. Date. From the considerations just noted it is evident that the date of the original I Es (i.e. the Heb. or Aramaic original) can only be conjectured. The book was translated into Greek before Josephus used it and perhaps before the beginning of the Christian era. More than this can not be said with certainty.

7. History of I Es. While I Es was used by Josephus in preference to its canonical parallels, and the Christian writers of the first three centuries quote from it freely (cf. Clem. Alex. Strom., I. 392; Origen, in Jos., hom. ix. 10; Eus. Com. in Ps. 76 19; Tertull. De coron. milit. 9; Cyp. Ep. 74 9; Athan. Contr. Arian., 11 20), Jerome (Praef. in Ezr.) clearly and decidedly rejected the book (together with II Es) as apocryphal, and declined to translate it. This is probably the ground for the exclusion of both of these books from the Roman Catholic Canon by the Council of Trent (1546). The book is found in the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. of the LXX.; also in two ancient Latin translations (but not in the Vulg.), and in the Syro-Hexaplar of the early part of the 7th cent. (but not in the Peshitta). The best editions in English are those by Bissell (in Lange's Com., 1880), Lupton (in the Speaker's Com., Apoc. I, 1888); in German the one by Guthe (in Kautzsch's Die Apoc. des A. T., 1900).

II ESDRAS (IV Ezra).

8. Contents of II Es. II Es is an apocalypse in form, containing, however, an introduction (chs. 1 and 2), and an appendix (chs. 15 and 16), which are not by the same hand. The introduction is manifestly a Christian writing, and justifies the rejection of the Jews and the substitution of the Gentiles in the Divine favor. The Apocalypse (chs. 3-14) consists of seven visions vouchsafed to Ezra in the Babylonian exile. In the first of these Ezra is represented as suffering great distress of mind on account of his failure to understand the meaning of sin and suffering in the world. An angel reminds him that God's ways are inscrutable, and that a new age (eon) is about to begin, in which all wrongs shall be righted (3 1-5 19). The second vision is intended to quiet the disturbing thought that God had given over His Chosen People into the hands of the heathen. Here, too, the ground of the reassurance is the imminence of the new age (5 20-6 34). The third vision finds Ezra speculating as to why Israel is not in possession of the land which God had given it. The answer is long and indirect; but it culminates in the assurance that the end of the world is nigh (6 35-9 25). The fourth vision presents in a symbolic figure the sorrow of Zion followed by her glory (9 26-10 53). The fifth depicts the fourth world-empire (Rome) under the figure of an eagle coming out of the sea (10 60-12 51). The sixth, the 'Son of Man' vision, portrays the Messiah under the form of a man who comes out of the stormy sea, is attacked by a countless multitude of enemies, whom, however, he overcomes, and gains a great number of followers (13 1-38). The seventh vision consists of the familiar legend of Ezra's restoring the lost Scriptures. Ezra prays for the privilege of rewriting the sacred books, lost before his day. His prayer is answered. He makes arrangements for the writing down of what he shall dictate, and is given a liquid which when drunk by him imparts the power of reproducing the contents of the lost writings. These together with seventy other books he dictates, but publishes only those at present contained in the O T Canon (14 1-50). The last portion of the book (chs. 15 and 16) contains a long and tedious arraignment of sinners, together with predictions of wars and calamities, similar to those foretold by Jeremiah.

9. V Ezr. Chs. 1, 2, 15, 16 of II Es are not included in the Latin versions, which serve as the basis of the chapter divisions in the book, and also of the text in the English editions by C. J. Ball (Variorum Apocrypha) and Lupton (Wace's Holy Bible). These four chapters are evidently later additions. The other versions do not contain them. They have been detached and published together as V Ezr by Fritzsche (Lib. Apoc. Vet. Test., Liber Esdrae Quintus, pp. 640-653). But if the separate origin of these chapters is to serve as the ground of their being put forth as numerically a different book, the same reasoning would require that instead of V Ezr they should be made into V and VI Ezr, inasmuch as these four chapters are not a unit but fall into two groups (1 and 2 and 15 and 16 respectively). It seems best, upon the whole, to adhere to the custom of attaching the chapters to the Apocalypse as simpler and less confusing.

10. Date, Author, and Design. The problem of the unity of the Apocalypse of Ezra (chs. 3-14) is a difficult one. There are many indications of different points of view and other divergencies between different parts. Is the work that of one author drawing freely from traditional sources, but weaving the whole into what may be considered his own product; or is the work a compilation by an editor or redactor from several distinct literary sources? The latter theory is worked out in great detail by Box. The author was a devout Jew who lived not earlier than the fall of Jerusalem; for he distinctly refers to that event (3 2, 10 48, 12 48). He knows also of the death of Titus (11 35). Conclusions as to the date of II Es largely depend upon the interpretation of the Eagle-Vision (chs. 11-12), and of 3 1 and 29. On the whole a date not much earlier than 100 A.D. seems necessary. A final revision may have been made some years later. The author's purpose was manifestly to infuse courage into the hearts of the faithful by holding up to them the dawn of the coming age as the end of all their misfortunes. The history of the reception of the book and of its translation and publication is the same as that of I Es (see § 6, above). For a separate treatment of the religious content see Schieffer, Die religiösen und ethischen Anschauungen des IV Ezra-buches (1901). The best English edition is that of G. H. Box, The Ezra-Apocalypse (1912), reproduced in the main in Charles, The Apoc. and Pseudigrapha of the O.T. (1913). For the text see Violet, Die Ezra-Apokalypse (1910). A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

ESEK, ʾēsek (עֶסֶק, 'ēseq). 'strife': A well near Gerar (Gn 26 20). Site unknown.

ESHAN, ʾēshan (עִשְׁאן, 'eshān, Eshean AV): A city of Judah (Jos 15 52), probably in the neighborhood of Hebron.

ESH-BAAL, ešh'-bā'al. See ISHBOSHETH.

ESHBAN, ešh'ban (עִשְׁבָּן, 'eshbān): The head of a Horite family or clan (Gn 36 26; I Ch 1 41).

ESHCOL, ešh'kol (עִשְׁכּוֹל, 'eshkōl), 'cluster' (of grapes, etc.): I. The 'brother' of Mamre (Gn 14 13, 24). II. The Valley of Eshcol, noted for its grapes, mentioned in the story of the spies (Nu 13 23 f., 32 9; Dt 1 24). It was, apparently, not far from Hebron, but this is not certain. The personification of Mamre and Eshcol in Gn 14 13 is puzzling, put apparently tells against the early date of the composition of Gn 14 (see Skinner in ICC). Was there a clan 'Eshcol,' the name being borrowed from this place of habitation, the Valley of Eshcol?

ESHEAN, ešh'ī-ān or ʾēshī-ān. See ESHAN.

ESHEK, ʾēshek (עֶשֶׁק, 'esheq): One of Saul's descendants (I Ch 8 39).

ESHKALONITES, ešh'ka-len-aits. See ASHKELON.

ESHTAOL, ešh'tē-ol (עִשְׁתָּאֵל, 'eshtā'el): A town assigned to Judah in Jos 15 33, but to Dan in 19 41. That it was occupied by Danites is certain from the old stories in Jg (13 25, 16 31, 18 2 ff.). A later occupation by Judah is indicated by the notice in I Ch 2 53 of the Eshtaolites (Eshtaulites AV) as Calebites. See Map II, E 1.

ESHTEMOA, ešh'tī-mō'a (עִשְׁתֵּמֹא, 'eshtēmōa'), and ESHTEMOH, ešh'tī-mō (עִשְׁתֵּמֹחַ, 'eshtēmōh'): A town in the Judean hill-country (Jos 15 50; I S 30 28) assigned to the Levites (Jos 21 14). See Map II, E 3. The statements in I Ch 4 17, 19, must be interpreted as relating to places (indicative of origin, dependency, etc.), not individuals.

ESPOUSE, ESPOUSAL. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 2.

ESROM, ez'rem. See HEZRON.

ESSENES, es'sēnz: An important Jewish religious sect at the beginning of the Christian era. Both Philo (Quid Omnis Probus Iudeus, XII, XIII, and Apologia, quoted in Eusebius, Prep. Ev. VIII, 11) and Josephus (especially in Ant. XVIII 1 5 and B J II 8 2-13) have left us extended descriptions of their beliefs and customs. They were a semi-monastic organization, with distinctly communistic and pacifistic principles. They lived in communities, were celibates, and were subject to quite rigid rules. Women did not belong to the Order. They worked with other men at various trades or occupations, but after working hours they withdrew to their own communal abodes. Their ethical principles were pure and noble. They were strict Sabbatarians and vegetarians. They appear to have revered the Scriptures and given themselves much to their study; but nevertheless they rejected the Scripture teaching as to animal sacrifices and hence they were not allowed to participate in the Temple-worship. Yet they sent gifts to the Temple. With their Jewish beliefs they mingled others of a mystical character and some, possibly, of pagan origin. They believed firmly in the immortality of the soul.

They numbered about four thousand members and they lived for the most part in the region of the Dead Sea. They appear to have been highly respected. Whether they were confined to Palestine is a question. A somewhat similar order having its home in Egypt is described by Philo in his De Vita

Contemplativa. Philo does not say expressly, however, that these were Jews. Much has been said conjecturally as to the possibility of John the Baptist and Jesus having had some connection with the Essenes, but of this nothing is definitely known. See Lightfoot's Dissertation in his Epistle to the Colossians (1890) pp. 347-417, and Schürer, GVI. (4th ed., 1909) Vol. II pp. 651-680. E. E. N.

ESTHER (Person and Book): 1. Contents. The Book of Esther, according to 1:1, is an episode from the reign of Ahasuerus. Since Grotefend's decipherment of the proper names in the Persepolis inscriptions it has been generally recognized that this monarch is Xerxes. The Hebrew form Ahashwērōsh corresponds to the Babylonian and Aramaic spelling of the Persian Khsayārshā, Xerxes. The common recension of the Gr. version reads Artaxerxes, and this text is followed by Josephus and by most Roman Catholic commentators. J. Hoschander (1923) adopts it, and identifies the king with Artaxerxes II; but the Gr. text is notoriously corrupt in comparison with the Hebrew, and the Lucianic recension reads Assueros or Xerxes, so that there is no reason to prefer Artaxerxes as a better reading than Ahasuerus.

The book narrates how Esther, a Jewish maiden, became Xerxes' queen; how she delivered her people from the destruction planned by Haman, the king's favorite; and how, in commemoration of this deliverance, the feast of Purim was instituted.

2. Text. MSS. of the Hebrew E. are more numerous than of any other portion of the O. T. All are descendants of a single standard codex that was adopted by the Scribes about 100 A. D. From this codex are descended also a larger number of targums and midrashim than are attached to any other Biblical book (see JE, article, Esther). These are too late to be of any text-critical value. Their additions to the Massoretic text rest upon no documentary authority, but only upon legendary oral tradition.

For the restoration of the pre-Massoretic text our most important aid is the Greek version (1st cent. B. C.). This has come down in five main recensions: that of the Uncials, of Origen, of Hesychius, of Lucian, and of the old Latin. All agree in presenting a text that differs from the Massoretic text more widely than any other book in the LXX. Many verses have long additions, and there are 107 new verses not found in the Hebrew. Jerome, in the Vulgate, translated the longer additions, but removed them from the body of the book and placed them at the end. This senseless arrangement is perpetuated in the English Apocrypha. In Swete's edition of the LXX. they are given their proper place, and are designated by the letters A, B, etc. The attempt has been made at various times to show that these additions have been translated from a Hebrew or Aramaic original that stood in a larger recension of E; but modern critical authorities are agreed that there is no trace of them in Hebrew or Aramaic literature, and that they are not translated from a Semitic language, but are interpolated to correct the lack of religion in the Hebrew book in its original form.

3. Unity. In regard to the unity of the book in general no doubt can be felt. Only the section 9:20-10:3 presents difficulties which have suggested to a number of critics that it comes from a different hand. Possibly it is a quotation by the author of E. from the book mentioned in 10:2.

4. Date. The book makes no claim of age or authorship for itself. The statement of 9:20, 'Mordecai wrote these things,' does not refer to the foregoing book but to the letter that follows. The 'book' mentioned in 9:32 is not E., but the letter mentioned in 9:29. E. is never quoted by any pre-Christian writer. The earliest literary evidence of its existence is the LXX. version. Purim is first mentioned in II Mac 15:36. The external evidence, accordingly, does not demand an earlier date than the 1st cent. B. C.

The internal evidence leads to a similar conclusion. In 1:1, 13:1, 4:11, 8:8, the author speaks of the times of Xerxes as long passed. In 3:8 the Diaspora of the Greek period is known. The conversion of multitudes to Judaism (8:17, 9:27) was not true of the Persian period, but was characteristic of the proselyting zeal of the Greco-Roman period (cf. Mt 23:15).

The intellectual standpoint of the book also indicates a date in the late Greek period. There is no trace of the Messianic hope that characterized the early days of the return from captivity. The bitter hatred of the Gentiles, and the longing for their destruction that this book discloses, were first induced by Antiochus' determination either to Hellenize or to exterminate the Jews. Mordecai's refusal to bow before Haman (3:2) is not in accord with old Hebrew usage, but shows a Greek spirit of independence. The prominence given to financial considerations (3:9) is also indicative of a commercialism that developed in the Greek period. The national pride, bereft of religious enthusiasm, indicates that the book was not written at the time of the Maccabean struggle, but in the period of worldliness and self-complacency that followed the attainment of independence in 142 B. C.

With this conclusion the language of the book is in accord. The Hebrew is as late as any in the O. T. There are a number of words that are found elsewhere only in the Mishna and other Rabbinical writings. Aramaic influence is conspicuous in diction and construction.

5. Historical Character. In regard to the historical character of the book the following facts may be noted: (1) Ahasuerus is a historical personage, and the picture of his character in E. corresponds with that of Xerxes given by Herod., vii. ix; Æsch. Pers. 467 ff.; Juv. x. 174-187. The incidents of E. can be fitted into the life of Xerxes without great difficulty. Apart from this there are no coincidences with the Greek account of Xerxes.

(2) The chief personages of the book, Vashti, Haman, E., and Mordecai, are unknown to history. Ezra, Nehemiah, the later Psalms, Sirach in his list of Hebrew worthies (Sir chs. 44-49), say nothing of the Jewish queen who saved her nation, or of the mighty Jewish chancellor. Greek writers show us that during the period between the 7th and the 12th years (2:16, 3:7) Xerxes' queen was not E. but Amestris, the daughter of a Persian general (Herod. xvii. 114; ix 112).

(3) The Book of E. gives many proper names e.g., 1 10, 14, 2 3, 5, 8, 14 f., 21, 3 1, 4 5, 5 10, 7 9 9 7-9, 29. Not one of these persons appears in the Greek account of Xerxes' reign, and their names can not even be shown to have been in use in the time of Xerxes. A number are certainly Persian, but it is not clear that they are old Persian. Some are probably of Babylonian, Aramaic, or even Hebrew origin. They might all have been picked up in the Greek period by an author who knew something about Persia.

(4) Some of the statements in regard to Persia and Persian customs are confirmed by classical historians, e.g., 1 6-8, 14, 3 2, 7, 13, 4 2, 5 14, 6 8, 8 10. All that this proves is that the author had some familiarity with Persian life which he used for local color. It is offset by statements which show that the had no first-hand knowledge of the Achaemenian Empire, e.g., 127 satrapies (1 1, 8 9; cf. Herod. iii. 98), the veiling of women (1 9-12; cf. Herod. x. 110 f.), the unchangeability of the laws of the Medes and Persians (1 10, 8 8), the idea that no person could approach the king without summons on pain of death (4 11).

(5) There are a number of incidents in E. which altho they can not be shown to be unhistorical, are yet so contrary to Persian law and custom as to be improbable. Thus 2 2, 4, 8, 10, 17, are contrary to the law of the Avesta and the testimony of Herod. iii. 34 that the queen might be selected only from seven of the noblest Persian families. Mordecai's free access to E. (2 11, 4 2-17) is contrary to the custom of Oriental harems. The appointment of two foreigners, Haman the Agagite (cf. Nu 24 7; I S 15 8) and Mordecai the Jew, as prime ministers (3 1, 10 3) is not consistent with Persian national pride. The issuing of decrees in the languages of all the provinces (1 22, 3 12) was not the usual practise of the Persian Empire.

(6) The book contains a number of inconsistencies with itself. In 2 6 Mordecai is one of the captives carried away with Jehoiachin in 596 B.C., but in 3 7, 8 2, he becomes prime minister in the 12th year of Xerxes, 474 B.C. In 3 2, 4, 4 1, Mordecai parades the fact that he is a Jew, but in 2 10 he forbids E. to make her kindred known. E. successfully conceals the fact that she is a Jewess from the king, Haman and everybody else (2 10, 7 3 f.), and yet Mordecai, who is well known to be a Jew, is her cousin, and comes to the palace every day to inquire after her (2 11), and all the Jews in Susa fast for her before she ventures to go to the king (4 16). Haman obtains an edict to destroy all the Jews because Mordecai the Jew will not do obeisance to him (3 6), but Haman's friends and family are ignorant as to Mordecai's race (6 13). Xerxes delivers the Jews to destruction (3 11), yet heaps honors upon Mordecai the Jew (6 10 f.). Haman is still the royal favorite, but he is given the menial task of conducting Mordecai through the streets (6 10 f.). Xerxes authorizes the act of Haman (3 11), yet he is much surprised at the information that E. gives him of Haman's plot (7 5 f.).

(7) The book contains a number of details which can not be proved to be untrue, but which are so intrinsically improbable that one has difficulty in believing that they are historical, e.g., 1 1-5, 12, 13-15, 16-22, 2 1-4, 12, 16, 3 1 (cf. Ex 17 8; Nu 24 7; I S 15 8), 2 5 (cf. I S ch. 15), 2 23, 3 6-9 (cf. II Targ. 3 9, 4 1), 3 8-15, 5 4, 7, 14, 6 1, 4, 7 5, 8, 8 11, 9 2 f., 13 f.

(8) The account of the origin of Purim given by this book is historically improbable. It represents it as instituted by E. and Mordecai, and as adopted by the Jews in commemoration of their deliverance; but Purim is not a Hebrew word, and it is unnatural that a Jewish commemoration should be called by a foreign name. In 3 7, 9 26, it is said that the feast is so called because 'Haman cast Pur, that is, the lot'; but it is unlikely that the trivial circumstance of the way in which Haman determined the day of destruction should give its name to the day of deliverance. Moreover, there is no Persian word pur with the meaning 'lot.' If Purim had originated in the time of Xerxes, as E. represents, and had been enjoined upon all the Jews in all provinces of the empire (9 20), and had been accepted by the Jews for themselves and for their posterity (9 27), there is no reason why it should not have been included in the Priestly Code as promulgated by Ezra.

In view of these facts the conclusion seems to be inevitable that the Book of E. is not historical, and that it is doubtful whether even a historical kernel underlies its narratives.

J. Hoschander, The Book of Esther (1923), attempts to solve all these difficulties by following the Gr. text Artaxerxes instead of the Heb. text Ahasuerus, and identifies this king with Artaxerxes II, Mnemon. He maintains that the incidents of the Book of E. will fit into the life of Artaxerxes II as they do not into the life of Xerxes, that Artaxerxes tried to establish the worship of the goddess Anahita throughout the empire, that Jewish opposition to this measure led to Haman's attempted massacre, and that the historical deliverance of the Jews was the origin of the feast of Purim. In reply to this it may be said, that text-critically there is no support for the Gr. reading Artaxerxes, that according to 2 6 Mordecai was carried away with Jehoiachin in 596 B.C., and if he became prime minister in the 12th year of Artaxerxes II (393 B.C.) he was at least 203 years old at this time, that there is no trace in the Book of E. of religious persecution or religious victory, and that it is questionable whether the incidents of E. really fit any better in the reign of Artaxerxes II than they do in the reign of Xerxes.

6. Origin of Purim. All the objections urged above against the historicity of the account of Purim in the Book of E. apply with equal force to any theory that assigns it a Hebrew origin. A feast that the Jews had invented would not be called by a foreign name for which no rational explanation can be given. Purim must be a holiday adopted by the Jews from their neighbors, just as Independence Day and Thanksgiving Day have been adopted by them in America. The only question is: From which nation was this feast borrowed?

A Persian origin is naturally suggested by the facts that the scene of the book is laid in Persia, and that it has a strong Persian color (so Hitzig, Meier, Fürst, Zunz). Lagarde (Purim, 1887) pointed out that in the Lucianic Greek recension Purim appears as Phourdaia, which he conjectured was the same as the Persian Farwardīgān, a sort of All Saints' Day. This theory has found wide acceptance, but labors under the difficulties that Farwardīgān does not fall on the 14th of Adar, and that the Greek form Phourdaia is less likely to be correct than the Hebrew Purim.

Of late the theory of Babylonian origin has become dominant. In WZKM, vi (1892), p. 70 ff., Jensen shows that Esther is the regular Syrian form of the name of Ishtar, the Babylonian goddess. Her other name Hadassah, is the Babylonian hadashatu, 'bride,' used as a title of goddesses. Mordecai (Gr., Μαρδοχαίος) is the same as Marduk (Merodach), the chief male divinity of Babylon. He is the cousin of E. as Marduk is of Ishtar. Haman, the adversary of Mordecai, is the same as Hamman, or Humman, the chief divinity of the Elamites, in whose capital, Susa, the action of this book takes place. Vashti is an Elamite deity, probably feminine. Zeresh (in some Gr. MSS. Geresh), the wife of Haman, may be the same as Kirisha, another Elamite goddess, apparently the consort of Humman. The conflict of E. and Mordecai against Haman, Vashti, and Zeresh is the conflict of the gods of Babylonia against the gods of Elam, which is a reflex of the 1,000 years struggle for supremacy between Babylonia and Elam, ending with the victory of Babylonia. Jensen, Winckler (AOF, ii 274 f.), and Zimmern (KAT<sup>3</sup>, 514 f.) point out other mythical parallels, and create a strong suspicion that the story of E. is a euhemeristic Jewish version of Babylonian legends learned at the time of the Captivity. This view has found the approval of Nöldeke, Wildeboer, Smend, Cornill, and most recent writers. If the story of E. is Babylonian, then the feast which it aims to explain must be Babylonian also, but thus far it has not been identified with certainty. Zimmern (ZATW, 1891, pp. 157-169) suggests that Purim=puhru, 'assembly,' a name of Zagmuk, or the New Year Feast of Marduk. Jensen identifies it with the Ishtar feast, in the month Ab. It is more likely that with Johns (EB, 3979) we are to connect Purim with the Babylonian observances in the month Adar. The 13th of this month is known to have been unlucky, and the 14th and 15th lucky. The eponyms entered upon their office on the first of Nisan, and they must have been chosen during the preceding month. The word puru, or buru, means 'stone,' then 'lot,' 'inheritance,' and 'eponymate,' and may easily have been applied to the day in Adar on which the officials for the new year were selected. On this theory Purim was the Babylonian Election Day, a time of feasting and sending of presents, that the Jews adopted from their neighbors during the Exile and continued to observe long after they had forgotten its real origin. The decision of this interesting question depends upon the publication of further Babylonian material in regard to the religious observances of the month Adar.

7. Religious Value. Canonicity. The Alexandrian Jews were so conscious of the religious deficiencies of E. that they tried to remedy them with the apocryphal additions noted above (§ 2). This free treatment shows that no sacred character was yet attached to the book. In Palestine there was long opposition before it was admitted to the Canon. It is never quoted by Christ, nor by any of the N T writers. The early Christian Church made no use of it, and no Church Father attempted an exposition of it. Melito (c. 170 A.D.) omits it from his Canon, and Origen (c. 225) does not include it among the historical books. The Syrian Christians regarded it as apocryphal, and the Nestorians never had it in their O T.

In significant contrast to this attitude of early Judaism and early Christianity stands the high esteem of this book in later Judaism. The Synod of Jamnia in the 1st cent. decreed it to be canonical. Later writers sought to explain away the opposition of their predecessors, and praised the book in most extravagant terms. Rabbi Simeon b. Lakish (c. 300 A.D.) ranked it next to the Law. Maimonides declared that altho the Prophets and the Writings should pass away when the Messiah came, yet this book and the Law should remain. This is the attitude of orthodox Judaism. Esther is inserted with the Law in the synagog rolls and is treated with the highest reverence. More targums and midrashes are based upon it than upon any other portion of the O T.

With this verdict of late Judaism modern Christians can not agree. The book is so conspicuously lacking in religion that it should never have been included in the Canon of the O T, but should have been left with Judith and Tobit among the apocryphal writings. God is never once mentioned in the book. The author doubtless believes that there is a God (cf. 4 14, 16, 9 31 f.), but he has no consciousness of His nearness. He alone of all the writers in the O T and Apoc ascribes deliverance to men. Fasting is the only religious rite that he names. He has not one noble character in his book. Xerxes is a sensual despot. E., for the chance of winning wealth and power, takes her place in the herd of maidens who become concubines of the king. She wins her victories not by skill or by character, but by her beauty. She conceals her origin, is relentless toward a fallen enemy (7 8-10), secures not merely that the Jews escape from danger, but that they fall upon their enemies, slay their wives and children, and plunder their property (8 11, 9 2-10). Not satisfied with this slaughter, she asks that Haman's ten sons may be hanged, and that the Jews may be allowed another day for killing their enemies in Susa (9 13-15). The only redeeming traits in her character are her loyalty to her people, and her bravery in attempting to save them (4 16). Mordecai sacrifices his cousin to advance his interests, advises her to conceal her religion, displays wanton insolence in his refusal to bow to Haman, and helps E. in carrying out her schemes of vengeance. All this the author narrates with interest and approval. He gloats over the wealth and the triumph of his heroes, and is oblivious to their moral shortcomings. Religiously E. falls far below the general level of the O T and even of the Apoc. Its lesson of hatred toward one's enemies and of bloody vengeance upon them is irreconcilable with the teaching of Christ. The verdict of Luther is not too severe: 'I am so hostile to this book that I wish it did not exist, for it Judaizes too much, and has too much heathen naughtiness.'

ETHAM, i'tham (עֲתָם, 'ēṭām): A station on the Exodus route, reached after leaving Succoth, in the W. edge of the wilderness (Ex 13 20; Nu 33 6 f.), called 'the wilderness of Shur' (Ex 15 22), and 'the wilderness of Etham' (Nu 33 8). It lay on the E. border of Egypt, perhaps N. of Lake Timsah. Cf. the Egyptian word hetem, the name of a fortress on the E. boundary of Egypt.

ETHAN, i'ṭhan (יֵתָן, 'ēṭān): 1. A wise man, 'the Ezrahite' (I K 4 31), designated as the author of Ps 89 (title). According to I Ch 2 6, 8, a son of Zerah (=Ezrahite?). 2. An ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 42), called Joah in ver. 21. 3. A 'son of Kishi, like Heman and Asaph, the eponymous ancestor of a guild of temple-singers (I Ch 6 44, 15 17, 19). Identified with Jeduthun (cf. I Ch 16 41, 25 1 6; II Ch 5 12, 35 15).

ETHANIM, eth'a-nim: The old name of the seventh month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

ETH-BAAL, eth-ba'al (עֵתְבַּאֵל, 'ēṭḥba'al), 'man of Baal': A king of Sidon, father of Jezebel (I K 16 31). Eth-baal (or Ithobaal) was priest of Astarte in Sidon. He murdered Pheltes, King of Sidon, and usurped the throne c. 887 B.C. (Winckler); cf. Jos Contra Ap., I, 18. See CHRONOLOGY OF O T (Table).

ETHER, i'ther (אֶתֶר, 'ēṭer): A town of Judah near Libnah (Jos 15 42), assigned to Simeon in 19 7. Site unknown.

ETHIOPIA, i'ṭhi-ō'pī-a: 1. Name and Boundaries. In the EV of the O T this term represents directly the N T Gr. word Αἰθίοψ, which in the LXX. is the equivalent of the Hebrew Cush (q.v.).

The Gr. word originally meant 'dark-skinned,' and was employed both of the population to the south of Egypt and of dark-hued southern peoples generally. The equivalent Cush in the EV is used only of one of the sons of Ham (Gn 10 6-8 = I Ch 1 8-10), except in Is 11 11, where it appears in place of the usual 'Ethiopia.' Cush is the common Semitic name of the Ethiopian country and people, being borrowed from the Egyptian, in which Kosh is their regular designation. Cush, as a country, corresponds roughly to the modern Nubia, and the Cushites appear to have been the principal ancestors of the Nubians. Their extreme northern boundary was the first cataract of the Nile at Assuan; but, as Cush was normally subject or tributary to Egypt, no definite limit was regularly maintained. The southern boundary was still more indefinite, depending on the extent of the Egyptian conquests and trade at different periods. The people were not of the negro type, but essentially Hamitic (cf. Gn 10 6). The Egyptians themselves, however, seem to have classed them with the negroes, as the Greeks and Romans did the Ethiopians. Their dark-brown color, due to their southern habitat, is referred to in Jer 13 23.

2. History. In the reign of the 12th dynasty (c. 2000 B.C.) northern Ethiopia became independent, but was again subdued along with much southern territory in the 16th cent. B.C. The new province, extending at length to the third cataract of the Nile, was made thoroughly Egyptian in manners and religion. Under the 22d or Libyan dynasty, native rulers threw off the yoke of Egypt, and about 711 B.C. the new Ethiopian kingdom gained control of Egypt itself, altho the princes of the Delta retained their autonomy and some freedom of action. This situation explains the alliance of Tirhakah, 'King of Ethiopia,' with Hezekiah of Judah (II K 19 9). The Ethiopians were still in control when Egypt was subdued by the Assyrians (668 B.C.). After the subjugation of Ethiopia itself in its final struggle the country ceased to exercise any influence abroad. Royal authority, however, was frequently wielded by powerful native chiefs, and at the beginning of the Christian era Meroe, in southern Nubia, was the seat of a kingdom whose rulers held their title through the female line. Hence the queen-mother, who seems to have borne officially the name Candace (q.v.), was often the virtual ruler. The chamberlain of one of these quasi-queens is mentioned in Ac 8 27 ff.

3. The Arabian Cush. Some of the references to the southern 'Cush' in the O T can hardly be explained of the African Ethiopia, and it has been conjectured that, as the Assyrians seem to have understood Cush as including southern Arabia as well, the Hebrews may have had a similar usage. Upon this hypothesis the invasion of Judah by 'Zerah the Ethiopian' in the time of Asa (II Ch 14 9-15) is explained; since at this date the Ethiopians were confined to their own proper territory, while the South-Arabian kingdom of Ma'in was flourishing and aggressive. The 'Cushites' of II Ch 21 16 may also be plausibly referred to the same region. Cf. Winckler in *KAT*³, p. 143 ff. See also CUSH.

ETH-KAZIN, eth'kē'zin (אֶתְחָזִין, 'ittāh qāts'in, Ittah-Kazin AV): A town on the E. border of Zebulun (Jos 19 13). Site unknown.

ETHNAN, eth'nān (אֶתְנַן, 'ethnān): The head of a Judahite family (I Ch 4 7).

ETHNARCH, eth'nārk. See ARETAS.

ETHNI, eth'nai (אֶתְנִי, 'ethnā): An ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 41).

ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY. 1. Treatment of the Subject. In this article the racial stocks and races that are prominent in the Bible will first be considered systematically; and the peoples mentioned in Scripture will then be taken up in alphabetical order, and referred to their places in this system.

2. Geographical Limits. The geographical sphere of chief interest in the O T was the region extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the Mountains of Persia, and from the southern mountain boundaries of Asia Minor and Armenia to the First Cataract of the Nile on the SW. and to the estuary of the Euphrates and Tigris on the SE. These limits include the lowlands of Western Asia along with Egypt Proper. Beyond this region many countries were known to the O T writers and mentioned by them, but their inhabitants were to the Hebrews strange and remote, at least until the Persian supremacy. Within this region, from remotest times down to the present, the dominant race has been the Semitic; but the lowlands of Western Asia have been repeatedly invaded by Aryans and Turanians; and Egypt has always been predominantly Hamitic.

The Semites have their current name from Shem, the eldest son of Noah. Their chief Biblical significance is that the Hebrews, the people of Revelation, belonged to that race. The Hebrews did not, however, form one of its principal divisions. They were, in fact, a very composite people, that came into existence late in the history of the Semites.

3. Classification. No satisfactory basis for the classification of races and peoples has been discovered. The most convenient one, language, rests upon cultural and political facts which do not always correspond with biological ones; and the biological or physical bases which have been proposed have not led to definite results. But, since language is the best basis which we have, and since cultural relationships are more important than merely physical ones, the linguistic classification remains still the one most employed. The psychological classification of races rests upon a very insecure foundation, but may some day become very important.

4. The White, Yellow, and Black Races. The Western Hemisphere having been peopled from NE. Asia, we have to look for racial origins in the Eastern. Here, in very remote times, there arose three well-differentiated human strains, corresponding to the three great continental areas: a white race in Europe, a yellow race in Asia, and a black race in Africa. Within historical times, however, these strains have always been blended in an infinite variety of combination. By Europe we mean Eurafica, or Europe plus the NW. corner of Africa; and by Africa we mean Austafica, or central and southern Africa plus Madagascar and lands far to the east of the Indian Ocean.

5. The Indo-Europeans and the Hamito-Semites. In very remote times the white race of Eurafica came to be differentiated into several groups. One of these, located somewhere in eastern Russia, spoke a type of language only very remotely, if at all, related to the languages spoken by the group which occupied SW. Europe and NW. Africa. The first of these was Indo-European; the second was Hamitic. Other groups are represented by the Caucasian and Basque. The Indo-Europeans migrated in all directions, beginning about 3000 B.C. The Hamites made their way gradually through continental Africa—which had meanwhile become a unit, and separated from Europe—blending with the races which they met and conquered. They also crossed over into Arabia, where, after great lapse of time, a differentiated type of speech arose which we know as Semitic. Within Arabia itself—the cradle of all the Semitic peoples—there must have been two separate and well-defined centers, where the North Semitic type and the South Semitic type of speech developed. From the northern center Semitic nomads are known to have migrated into Assyria and Babylonia at about 3500 B.C., probably via Palestine, Syria, and the Euphrates valley; and again at about 2500 B.C., into the same countries by the same route, settling in Palestine and Syria as they went, and also invading Egypt; and into all the countries around the Syrian Desert, simultaneously, at about 1500 B.C. From the southern center a movement took place at about 500 B.C. which reached only the eastern frontier of Palestine and Syria, and, via Bab-el-Mandeb, the Hamitic land of Abyssinia. Lastly, at about 500 A.D. began the great movement of Arabs which carried their language and their new religion clear across north Africa and over all the Near East. These migrations of prolific nomads, occurring roughly every thousand years, out of the inhospitable steppes of Arabia, are similar to the migrations of Indo-Europeans from the steppes of Russia, and of the Turanians from the steppes of northern Asia, and were due to the same causes.

The Indo-European race, corresponding to the descendants of Japhet, is comparatively of little Biblical significance. Its various races were of interest mainly to the later prophets, and that by reason of their influence, direct or indirect, upon the fortunes of Israel, or because they became involved in one way or another with peoples that were the subject of prophetic discourse. The Indo-Europeans that are thus distinguished are the Medes and Persians (q.v.), various branches of the Scythian race (e.g., Ashkenaz, Gomer) and of the Hellenes (Javan) (see § 11, below). The N T has naturally much more to say of Indo-European peoples. These are usually referred to however, not as races but according to the political and geographical divisions in vogue under the Roman Empire. Outside the great races already mentioned the Bible writers rarely step. Elam, for example, is neither Semitic nor Indo-European, but it is assigned to the family of Shem in Gn ch. 10.

The Hamites and Semites have very strongly marked characteristics—linguistic and social, if not physical—which justify grouping them in this manner. Both Hamitic and Semitic languages have consonantal roots—the former predominantly biliteral and quadriliteral, the latter trilateral—and certain peculiar laryngeal and velar sounds; and show indubitable agreement in inflection, if not in vocabulary. Many obscure phenomena in Semitic languages, such as the odd uses of the feminine, the reversal of gender with certain numerals, and the so called broken plurals, are easily explained from Hamitic. Circumcision is a persistent characteristic of Hamites and Semites, and, to a less extent, the tabu against pork.

6. The Persians and the Greeks. The Persians first appear north of the Persian Gulf, vassals of their kinsmen, the Medes. In 612 they assisted the Chaldeans to overthrow Assyria and establish the Neo-Babylonian Empire; and in 539 B.C. they destroyed the same, and set up the Persian Empire in its stead. Cambyses conquered Egypt in 525. The Persian Empire then included Persia, Media, Babylonia, Assyria, Armenia, Asia Minor, Thrace, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, from Assuan to the Mediterranean, and Cyrene. The Persians took over much from old Babylonian civilization, and gave this to their successors, together with many ideas and institutions of their own. They are curiously associated throughout with Semitic languages: in the oldest period borrowing the idea of cuneiform writing; in the next, employing the Aramean language and alphabet; in the last, adopting the Arabic alphabet and the religion of Islam.

The Greeks took possession of their peninsula and of the Aegean world between 2000 and 1000 B.C., displacing an older population of which the Philistines were a fleeing remnant of unknown origin, which reached Palestine about 1200 B.C. Alexander the Great took possession of the Persian Empire in 333 B.C., and by 325 had restored it to its former maximum. He realized his dream of extending Greek civilization and speech over the then known world. Even after the appearance of Rome, the Greek language—in the Koine διάλεκτος, the common dialect—continued to spread; and it remained the common tongue of the Roman Empire until the 4th cent. A.D.

The Romans and their Byzantine successors carried the period of Indo-European supremacy in the Near East, down to the Arab conquests in the 7th cent. A.D. But the Romans themselves exerted little influence upon race, language, and religion, in the Near East.

7. The Egyptians and the Lybians. The Egyptians, inhabiting the valley and the delta of the Nile, were a mixture of Cushitic-Hamitic stock from Nubia, and Lybian-Hamitic stock from the delta. The latter were the more purely Hamitic of the two, and the greater civilizing force. Beginning about 3000 B.C., the Pyramid Age lasted about five hundred years, the Feudal Age about one thousand, and the Imperial Age about four hundred years. The Archaic Period was brief, and the age of greatest engineering skill lies immediately after it. Two centuries and a half before the erection of the great pyramid of Cheops only sun-dried brick were used; and later times show nothing to equal it. The world's first alphabet was invented by the Egyptians before 3000 B.C. With active minds and skilful hands, they nevertheless lacked the power to interpret and apply what they knew, and the courage to depart from trodden paths. They were not eager to travel, colonize, or wage wars of conquest. In religion, the Lybian element may perhaps be seen in the spiritual conceptions of sin, rewards and punishments, and immortality; the African element in the veneration of animals. The monotheism of Amenophis IV (1375-1358 B.C.) is supposed to have been an intrusion from Asia.

The Lybians are found in Egyptian inscriptions and pictures from earliest times, and especially after 1600 B.C. They are called Themheu, later Phaiat and Thehnu. A subdivision, the Rabu or Luby, perhaps furnished the common name of Lybians. They are mentioned in inscriptions of the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties. Cf. the Lūbhīm of Nah. 3:9; Dan 11:43; II Chron 12:3, 16:8; Lhābhīm in Gen 10:13; I Chron 1:11. The Greeks used the name Libouē for all the country west of Egypt. Lybians are pictured upon the tombs of Beni Hassan as tall and beautiful, with light complexion, blue eyes, and blond hair. They invaded the western frontier of Egypt in the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties (1350-1090 B.C.). After 1100 B.C. they appear as mercenaries, reaching generalship and finally the throne in the twenty-second, twenty-fourth and twenty-sixth dynasties.

8. The Babylonians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans. The Babylonians and Assyrians were closely related in race, language and culture. They entered the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates probably from the north. The Babylonians settled in the alluvial plain between the lower courses of these rivers, uniting with an older, highly civilized Sumerian population, probably Turanian-Caucasian. The Assyrians remained farther north on the Tigris, and were less mixed with the Sumerians, altho dominated by their institutions. About 2750 B.C. Sargon the Great, a leader of Semitic tribesmen, conquered the Sumerians and set up an empire. About 2200 B.C. the Semitic Amorites came from Palestine and Syria and founded the famous dynasty of Hammurabi. In 1200 B.C. the Assyrians took Babylon, and in 1100 B.C. reached the Mediterranean. The Assyrian general who took Samaria in 722 B.C. declared himself king, under the name of Sargon (II), and founded the Assyrian empire. This gave place to the Chaldean in 612 B.C., little more than a new Semitic dynasty, which lasted till 539 B.C.

The Babylonian-Assyrian-Chaldean civilization and language are strongly Sumerian. Their religious ideas were essentially polydemonistic and magical. Their writing, and perhaps their speech, show profound influence from a population which could not pronounce Semitic sounds.

9. The Canaanites, Phenicians, and Hebrews. Canaan, like most other racial terms, was originally a local name, the designation of a district and community in Phenicia, so that, roughly speaking, the Canaanites originally were practically equivalent to the Phenicians, who, down to the end of their history, called themselves by this synonym. They had kindred in the highlands of Palestine, of whom the several smaller local tribes, Perizzites, Hivites, Jebusites, and Girgashites, were doubtless subdivisions. It is quite possible that the Canaanites were originally a branch of the Amorites, the Canaanites tending at first to the seacoast, while the Amorites were attracted to Anti-Lebanon and its eastern slopes, whence they spread southward, E. of the Jordan. There is some reason to suppose that the Canaanites (and Amorites) were preceded in Palestine by non-Semitic peoples, who are perhaps represented indistinctly by the more or less legendary Anakim, Rephaim, Emim, and Zamzummim of Dt, chs. 2 and 3.

The Hebraic division comprised, besides the Hebrews, the peoples lying nearest to them to the S. and E.: the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites. The chief evidence for the relationship is found in the personifying genealogical traditions of the Hebrew literature, according to which Edom was the brother of Israel, and Moab and Ammon were his second cousins. Language gives but little help here, for altho the Moabites spoke Hebrew, this was learned from the Canaanites by both peoples alike. (Is 19 18). The Hebrews and their kindred were, in fact, the most composite of all the ancient Semitic families. The two names Hebrew and Israel are themselves indicative of a dual origin. Israel was proximately Aramean (cf. Dt 26 5), and there is reason to suppose that the Hebrews are identical with the Chabirē, a small aggressive tribe in S. Palestine in the 15th cent. B.C. A remote Babylonian derivation seems also to be claimed in Gn 11 28, 31, tho their ancestors in the district of Ur on the lower Euphrates may have been nomadic Arameans. Like the Edomites, tho to a less degree, the Hebrews received an Arabian admixture, not merely in the old tribal days (Kenites, Kenizzites, etc.) but all through the period of their abode in Canaan.

10. The Arameans. The Arameans were more widely extended in their permanent settlement than any other branch of the Northern Semites. They were found on both sides of the lower Tigris and Euphrates, in Lower and Upper Mesopotamia, and through the whole of Syria, not merely as shepherds and traveling merchants, but as the controlling inhabitants of large cities, such as Charran (Haran), Aleppo, and Damascus. The Euphrates was the most important dividing-line between them, yet they did not migrate to the W. of that river in any numbers till the 13th cent. B.C. Later they became dominant there until, long before the Christian era, their language was spoken by most of the inhabitants of Syria, where it continued to prevail until after the Mohammedan conquest. We, therefore, make a very general division upon these lines into E. and W. Arameans. The ubiquity of this branch of the Semites, as well as their inability to consolidate into large communities, is illustrated by the fact that more ancient dialects of Aramaic have survived than of any other Semitic language.

Arameans are still found in considerable numbers in the region of ancient Assyria, in Kurdistan, and in Urumiah in Persia. The Aramaic dialect employed by these survivors, the modern 'Syriac,' is not derived from the ancient classical Syriac; and the latter is itself an incorrect designation, since it was properly the language of a people in Mesopotamia proper, divided from Syria by the Euphrates and is, therefore, a dialect not of W. but E. Aramaic. Again, the Aramaic portions of the O T, which are written in a dialect of W. Aramaic, are still often improperly called 'Chaldee,' tho the Chaldeans did not speak Aramaic at all, but Babylonian or 'Assyrian' (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE).

11. The South Arabians and Arabs. The Bible has little interest in the Southern Semites. Hence a formal classification is of minor consequence here; but a few words of explanation are necessary to prevent confusion. In one sense all the S. Semites are 'Arabian,' all having had their origin and earliest home in the great peninsula, for Sabean (from the Gr. form of the Biblical Sheba) is a term roughly including the peoples of S. and SW. Arabia, and the ancestors of the ancient Abyssinians crossed over the Red Sea from the same region. On the other hand, the term Arabia has immensely enlarged its signification since early Bible times. The Arabs of the O T were merely the most important tribe of north-central Arabia and are to be coordinated with Ishmael, Midian, Kedar, and the other desert tribes extending from Palestine and the peninsula of Sinai to the borders of lower Babylonia. Another remark must be made as to the character of the tribal aggregations. They were very numerous, and many of them wealthy and powerful, some of them being ruled by kings, or oftener by queens. Their habitat was much more fertile than at present, the oases being more numerous and extensive. It was from their population that the more settled communities to the W., N., and E. were constantly replenished.

The oldest South Arabian power was Ma'ān, with its base in the extreme SW. corner of the peninsula; and its trade route via Mecca, al-Medina, al-Oela, and another Ma'ān in the N., to the Mediterranean port of Gaza. It flourished about the time of Saul and David, or about 1000 B.C. Under the name of Ma'ān or Ma'ōn (Meunim, Maonites, EV) it is mentioned in I Chron 4 41, II Chron 20 1 (LXX), 26 7, Judg 10 12. The ordinary form, Minæans, is derived from the Greek through the Latin.

The Minæans were succeeded in the seventh century B.C. by the people of Sheba (English, Sabeans, from the Greek), whose kingdom seems to have controlled the same territory. Their northern vassals, who alone were in contact with Israel, were the Midianites; and contemporary writers use that name instead of the name of the older people of Ma'ān (Ma'in, Ma'ōn). The Sabeans themselves were a remote and legendary folk, a 'nation afar off' (Joel 3 8), as distant as Tarsish and the Isles of the Sea (Ps 72 10), whose wealth was proverbial (Ps 72 15). The mythical Queen of Sheba (I Kings 10 1-10) is a figure of the popular imagination, three centuries after Solomon, in whose day there were no Sabeans.

After the days of the Sabeans and Midianites we hear of Kedar and Nebaioth, wild tribes which plundered Judah, Edom, Moab, and Ammon, in the latter days of the Southern Kingdom, and after its fall. These tribes represent the fourth of the great Semitic emigrations from Arabia (vid. supra). They pushed the Edomites out of their old lands and into S Judah; and brought in the stock which eventually occupied the entire E. Jordan land, from their great city of Petra, in the S., to that even greater city, Palmyra, in the N. The Shalem (not Solomon, Song of Songs 1 5) and the Nabataeans (I Macc 5 25) are a part of this people. Nabataean kings are known, from the first, Aretas I (169 B.C.) to the last, Rabil II (70-95 A.D.). A great many of the kings of Ma'ān are known, and to some extent their succession; but their dates are still entirely unknown. Cf. many names in § 13.

12. The Ethnological Lists. The genealogical tables of Gn ch. 10 (and the summary in I Ch ch. 1) make a composite document drawn from the two sources J and P. The framework (vs. 1a, 2-7, 20, 22, 23, 31, 32) was taken from P by a redactor, the remainder being excerpted by him from J. These component parts are accordingly of different ages as regards their first compilation: but this does not affect their general character. The lists of names are often not directly those of races, but of persons, of countries, and even of cities. This is due to the fact (1) that both social and political communities were regarded by the early Semites as the direct descendants of individuals, (2) that a race and its dwelling-place were identified in ordinary speech, and (3) that the city was the ultimate political unit, not easily separated in thought from the founder, who himself was the quasi-head or 'father' of his community. Thus the cities Tarshish, Kittim, and Sidon appear explicitly as persons and implicitly as tribes or races. A good illustration of the general principle is afforded by Gn 25 12-16, where the 'sons of Ishmael' are expressly said to be named 'by their villages' (cf. Is 42 ii) and their encampments' (cf. also Gn 36 40-43).

Another important feature of the tables is that their compilers did not take account of the inhabited world as a whole, of which they were profoundly ignorant, but only of the peoples of their own acquaintance. These were, primarily, their own Semitic kindred and neighbors and, secondarily, the peoples of which they learned, directly or indirectly, through political association, trade, or migration: i.e., the Egyptians and Cushites, the Persians, Medes, and Elamites, the most noted islands and coast-lands of the Mediterranean, and the best known peoples of Asia Minor. The widening of the outlook was due mainly to the extension of the Assyrio-Babylonian régime and the ubiquitous traffic of the Phœnicians. The most significant step taken beyond the primitive style of genealogies was the remarkable attempt to group the families, cited according to genetic principles, in comprehensive and exhaustive divisions. The tables are thus 'a first essay in ethnography . . . made at the point where the narrators close the history of early mankind and turn to that of the ancestors of Israel. They are prompted by the scientific impulse to declare something as to the origin of the peoples of the world, by the artistic motive to round off completely the primitive history, and especially by the desire to make it clear how Israel was divinely chosen from out of the general mass of humanity' (Gunkel, Genesis, 2d ed., p. 76 f.).

Criticisms of the lists in Gn ch. 10 on the score of accuracy are not a necessary part of this article. Certain inconsistencies will be noted below under the individual names. A general remark must be made, however, as to the degree in which the classification is in agreement with the well-established modern racial divisions. The 'sons of Japheth' (vs. 2-5) are, as far as we can identify them, wholly Indo-European, and the compiler (P) uses in their case the most recent knowledge of his time (5th cent. B.C.). But the same writer is strangely in error as to the 'sons of Ham.' Ham is really an old name of Egypt, and the Hamites were doubtless at first intended to include by synecdoche all North-Africans (cf. § 5, above). But either political and religious antagonism or some fanciful association led him, as well as J, to place among the Hamites many who were of pure Semitic stock. Cush, properly meaning Ethiopia (q.v.), is rightly a 'son of Ham' (ver. 6). But he is made, for reasons not yet quite clear, to include several of the Arabian tribes, as well as the great Semitic race of Babylonians and Assyrians (vs. 8-12, J). More striking still is the assignment of the Canaanites to the race of Ham (cf. Gn 9 18, 25-27, J), apparently on account of the long and bitter struggle for the possession of the 'land of Canaan.' Of course, consistency throughout the lists was impossible; and we find, for example, that while P assigns Sheba and Havilah to Ham, J correctly includes them (ver. 29) among the descendants of Shem. On the other hand, Shem is made by P the ancestor of the Elamites, altho these were non-Semitic, probably on account of their close relations with Babylonia; and for some obscure reason, of the Lydians also.

13. Minor Ethnological Terms. The following names of minor importance occur in the genealogical lists of the early historians: Abida, a 'son' of Midian, i.e., a tribe of Midianites (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33). Otherwise unknown. Abimael, a S. Arabian people descended from Joktan (Gn 10 28; I Ch 1 23). Otherwise unknown. Adbeel, a 'son' or tribe of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 20), is mentioned also in the inscription of Tiglath-pileser III under the form Idibi'il as one of the tribes 'among the western countries whose dwelling place is remote.' He names also a chief of the same region, Idibi'il. In the LXX. of Gn 25 3 he appears in the form 'Nabdeel,' as an additional son of Dedan. Almodad, a 'son' or tribe of Joktan in S. Arabia near Haqramaut (Gn 10 26; I Ch 1 20). Exact location not known. Amorites. See § 9, above. Ananim, a people descended from Mizraim (Gn 10 13; I Ch 1 11), located somewhere near Egypt, but the precise region is not known. Arkite, descendants ('sons') of Canaan, the singular with Gentile names being generally used in Hebrew for the plural (Gn 10 17; I Ch 1 16), were the inhabitants of Arka, a town and district of Phœnicia about 12 m. N. of Tripolis, probably referred to in the Amarna Letters under the name Irkata, and taken by Tiglath-pileser in 738 B.C. Arpachshad, the third son of Shem and the second in line of descent from Shem to Abraham (Gn 10 22, 11 10). This word-form is a monstrosity, and has defied all attempts at identification with any known people. Occurring with Asshur and Aram, it is natural to think of the people of Babylonia. Since the second half of the name is the singular form of Chasdim (Kasdim), or Chaldees, it almost certainly forms here a separate word with that significance. The remainder of the word still awaits a satisfactory explanation. Arvad, Arvadite. The Phœnician city of Arvad, the mod.

Rudd, was the most important of the northern coast settlements. It was built on an island 70 m. N. of Beirut with another town on the opposite mainland. In trade and general enterprise it ranked after Tyre and Sidon. In Ezk 27<sup>8</sup>, it appears as contributing oarsmen and warriors for the service and defense of Tyre. Ashkenaz, the eldest son of Gomer (Gn 10<sup>3</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>6</sup>). This implies that the name represents a people akin to the Kimmerians, who appeared in force in and about Armenia in the 7th cent. B.C., and who, followed by the Scythians, helped to put an end to Assyrian domination in the N. Jer 51<sup>27</sup> associates A. with Ararat and Minni. The old comparison with the Homeric Aescanios, a Phrygian hero, must be given up. Probably the traditional form of the word arose through a misreading for Ashkūz (cf. the Ashgūz of the Assyrian inscriptions), allies of the Kimmerians, who gave trouble to the latest kings of Assyria. It has been further suggested that the Skuthoi (Scythians) represent the same famous people. The medieval and some modern Jews have made the word equivalent to the Teutonic race. Asshurim, the eldest son of Dedan (Gn 25<sup>1</sup>). In the parallel I Ch 1<sup>22</sup>, the sons of Dedan are entirely lacking. The exact location of none of them is known. See Dedan, below. In Gn 25<sup>18</sup> and Ps 83<sup>6</sup> read the singular form 'Asshur,' instead of 'Assyria' (EV), but not in Nu 24<sup>24</sup>, where the reference is to the Assyrian Empire, or rather to its surviving elements. We should perhaps read instead 'Ashur' and 'Ashurim.' Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, according to P (Gn 10<sup>6</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>5</sup>), whose name is substituted by J for Ham in Gn 9<sup>21</sup>, probably also in ver. 22, where the words 'Ham the father of' are apparently repeated from ver. 23. The list of Canaan's descendants (Gn 10<sup>15-20</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>11-16</sup>) is from J and the Redactor. See §§ 9 and 12, above. Caphtor, Caphtorim, children of Mizraim (Egypt), son of Cush (Gn 10<sup>14</sup>). Am 9<sup>7</sup> and Jer 47<sup>4</sup> declare that the Philistines came from Caphtor, which in the latter passage is called a maritime country, and Dt 2<sup>23</sup> informs us that the C. expelled the Avvim as far as Gaza. Of the many attempts made to locate this original home of the Philistines, is that which identifies it with Kēfō or Kafō, which in the Egyptian inscriptions stands for the S. coast of Asia Minor. Among the invaders of Syria and Palestine from the N. in the time of Rameses III (c. 1200 B.C.) were the Puru-sai, the Egyptian form of the Hebrew Pṭištī, Philistine. Much more likely is the identification with those Cretans who fled before the invading Greeks between 2000 and 1000 B.C. (vid. supra § 6), especially in the light of I Sam 30<sup>14</sup>, Ezk 25<sup>16</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>5</sup>, where קרתי krēthi seems to be a synonym for Philistine. Casluhim, a people of unknown location named in Gn 10<sup>14</sup> as descendants of Mizraim, and, therefore, related to the Egyptians. The words which follow in the traditional text, 'Whence went forth the Philistines,' should properly come after 'Caphtorim' in the same verse. Dedan was a somewhat widely spread Arabian people assigned in Gn 10<sup>7</sup> to the race of Cush (see § 12, above), while in Gn 25<sup>3</sup> and I Ch 1<sup>22</sup> he appears as a son of Jokshan (son of Keturah), and a brother of Sheba. He is grouped with Sheba (q.v.) and Tarshish in Ezk 38<sup>13</sup> as a wealthy trading people, indicative of his rank among the tribes of Arabia. In Ezk 27<sup>20</sup> he is one of the chief customers of Tyre in similar company. In Ezk 25<sup>13</sup> he is said to extend to the borders of Edom. With this agrees Jer 49<sup>8</sup>, while Is 21<sup>18</sup> associates him with Tema (q.v.). We, therefore, infer that D. occupied a large region SE. of Edom, stretching into central Arabia. The combination in Gn 25<sup>3</sup> with Sheba does not necessarily imply a S. Arabian origin, but merely illustrates the fact that Sheba had trading settlements in the N. In Ezk 27<sup>15</sup> read 'Rodan' for 'Dedan.' Diklah (Gn 10<sup>27</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>21</sup>), one of the 'sons' of Joktan, and, therefore, a S. Arabian tribe. Location unknown. Dodanim, a son of Javan (Gn 10<sup>4</sup>; 'Rodanim' in I Ch 1<sup>7</sup>, and also in Gn 10<sup>4</sup>, LXX.). For a similar interchange of letters in Ezk 27<sup>15</sup> see Dedan, above. See also RODANIM. Dumah, a son of Ishmael (Gn 25<sup>11</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>20</sup>). Probably the region in N. Arabia, formerly called Dumat el Jendel, and now known as el Jof, is referred to. It is a large oasis on the way from Damascus to Medina. See Map of Ancient Semitic World. The 'Dumah' of Is 21<sup>11</sup> is a misreading for 'Edom' (so LXX.). Eber, 'son' of Shelah and great-grandson of Shem. He was counted the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrew race (Gn 10<sup>24</sup>, 11<sup>14</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>18</sup>). The name coincides in form with the word 'ēbher, 'the other side,' and it has been assumed that it is the same word, alluding to the fact that the Hebrews came from the other side of the Jordan. But the fact is that E. is derived from 'ēbhri, 'Hebrew,' not vice versa, and the origin of 'Hebrew' is as yet uncertain. The Hebrews were probably the same as the Chabiri of the Amarna Letters, a small warlike tribe in S. Palestine, whose earlier history is obscure. E. was considered the ancestor not only of the Hebrews, but of a vast number of eastern and southern Arabians (Gn 10<sup>23-30</sup>), whose relations with the Hebrew peoples are unknown. Eldaah, a 'son,' or tribe, of Midian (Gn 25<sup>4</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>23</sup>). Otherwise unknown. Elishah, a 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10<sup>4</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>7</sup>). The people, or region, meant is not certain. Perhaps the combination with Eliasa, or Elisa, the traditional foundress of Carthage, is the most probable, as this name was also used for Carthaginian territory by Roman writers. The statement in Ezk 27<sup>7</sup> that Tyre imported 'blue and purple from the sea-lands of Elishah' is in harmony with this view. Equally so is an identification with Sicily and lower Italy, which is indicated by the Targum; but the similarity of the names may be urged in favor of the N. African locality. Ephah, a 'son' of Midian (Gn 25<sup>4</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>23</sup>), and, therefore, the name of a people of NW. Arabia. In Is 60<sup>6</sup> it appears as being engaged in the caravan trade, bringing gold and incense from Sheba. Apparently the Chayāpa mentioned in cuneiform inscriptions of the 8th cent. B.C. is the same name, being really phonetically equivalent to the original Hebrew form. Ephraim, 'brother' of the foregoing, not yet identified with any known people or region. Perhaps the word is merely an erroneous repetition of Ephah. Gether, a 'son,' i.e., tribe, of Aram (Gn 10<sup>23</sup>). In I Ch 1<sup>17</sup> wrongly given as a 'son' of Shem. Otherwise unknown. Girgashite, See Canaan, § 9, above. Gomer, the eldest 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10<sup>2</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>5</sup>). The name, originally Gomer (so LXX.), is the same as the Assyrian Gimirrai (the Kimmerians of the Greeks), who in the 7th cent. B.C. came from N. of the Black Sea, settled in Asia Minor in large swarms ('hordes,' Ezk 38<sup>9</sup>), and, followed and reinforced by the Scythians, did much to hasten the downfall of the Assyrian Empire. As preceding the Scythians, G. is called the 'father' of Ashkenaz (q.v.). Gamir, the Armenian name of Cappadocia, is probably a memorial of the Kimmerian invasion. Hadad, the eighth 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25<sup>15</sup>, Hadar AV; I Ch 1<sup>20</sup>, 'Hadar' AVmg.). Otherwise this N. Arabian tribe is unknown. Hadoram, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10<sup>27</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>20</sup>). Otherwise this S. Arabian tribe is unknown. Ham, see § 12, above. Hamath, Hamathite. H. was the most important city of central Syria, on the great bend of the Orontes, and the chief emporium of the trade between the middle Euphrates and Damascus. The modern name is Hamāh. It had close relations with the N. Phoenician cities. For this reason, perhaps, the Hamathites are named among the descendants of Canaan (Gn 10<sup>15</sup>). The center of a powerful state, its capture by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria in 738 B.C. was long regarded as a notable achievement (Is 10<sup>9</sup>; II K 18<sup>34</sup>, 19<sup>13</sup>). Some of its inhabitants were deported to Samaria after the fall of N. Israel. In Am 6<sup>2</sup> it is called 'Hamath the great,' in distinction from Hamath on the border of Palestine. See also ARAM. Hanoch, the third 'son' of Midian (Gn 25<sup>4</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>23</sup>). Hanākia, three days' journey N. of Medina, may represent the tribe and region. Havilah, a region of Arabia somewhat difficult to locate. According to P (Gn 10<sup>7</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>5</sup>), H. was a son of Cush and, therefore, of African origin, while in J (Gn 10<sup>26</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>23</sup>) he is a son of Joktan of the line of Shem. In Gn 2<sup>11</sup> H. is encompassed by Pishon, one of the four rivers of the country of Eden, which favors a NE. situation. Gn 25<sup>18</sup> also places H. on the E. border of the Ishmaelites. Yet the descendants of Joktan were, as far as we can locate them, dwellers in SE. and S. Arabia. The probable explanation of the apparent contradiction is that, like Sheba and Dedan (q.v.), H. was properly not the name of a well-defined territory, but of a tribe or people, whose settlements stretched over a wide range of country, both in the N. and in the S. of the peninsula. The mention of H. in Is 15<sup>7</sup> is probably merely an echo of Gn 25<sup>18</sup>. Hazarmaveth, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10<sup>26</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>23</sup>), the modern Hadramaut or Hadramūt, an extensive region east of Yemen in S. Arabia, running parallel to the Indian Ocean. In ancient times when its productiveness was maintained by the people and its rulers, it was prosperous and populous, a fact attested by the abundant ruins of its former civilization, which have been explored and described by modern travelers. Its inhabitants are called Charamitote by Strabo, who gives the name Sabata to their capital city. See Sabtah, below. Heth, the name of the Hittite patronymic, given as a 'son' of Canaan (Gn 10<sup>15</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>15</sup>) along with Sidon, the Phoenicians, the Jebusites, and other Canaanite tribes. See HITTITES. Hivite, a collective term for Hivites, named as a 'son' of Canaan (Gn 10<sup>17</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>15</sup>) along with other tribes inhabiting Palestine. The name occurs also in most of the frequent enumerations of these Canaanite communities (Ex 3<sup>6, 17</sup>, etc.). A comparison of Jos 9<sup>7</sup> with II S 21<sup>2</sup> shows that the silver, iron, tin, and lead (see also I K 10<sup>22</sup>, 22<sup>43</sup>; Ps 48<sup>7</sup>, 72<sup>10</sup>, Is 23<sup>6</sup>, 10, 66<sup>19</sup>; Jon 1<sup>3</sup>, etc.). Tiras, a 'son' of Japheth (Gn 10<sup>3</sup>), perhaps the Tarshynoi, a piratical sea-folk of the Aegean Sea, mentioned in Egyptian inscriptions of the 13th cent. B.C. Togarmah, a 'son' of Gomer (Gn 10<sup>3</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>9</sup>), located (Ezk 38<sup>5</sup>) in the extreme N., and spoken of in Ezk 27<sup>14</sup> as a place whence horses and mules were procured by Tyrian merchants. Probably the same as the Assyrian Tilgarimmu, N. of the Taurus Mts. and near the river Halys. Tubal (Gn 10<sup>2</sup>). See Meshech, above. Uzal, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10<sup>27</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>21</sup>). Probably a S. Arabian district. Its commerce was famed, as its exports of steel and spices are mentioned in Ezk 27<sup>19</sup> RVmg. (the correct reading). It is perhaps to be identified with Son'a, the capital of Yemen, whose old name was Azal, according to Arabian tradition. Zemarite, a 'son' of Canaan (Gn 10<sup>15</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>16</sup>). The people of Simirra of the Assyrian inscriptions, the same as the Sumur of the Amarna letters, a place S. of Arka, between it and Gebal. Zimran, a 'son' of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25<sup>2</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>32</sup>) and therefore a tribe, or district, of Arabia. Perhaps the region of Zabram, an Arabian city W. of Mecca, on the Red Sea.

Hivites were of the ancient Amorite stock. They lived, according to Jos 9, in central Palestine (see GIBEON). In Jos 11<sup>3</sup>, which apparently places them farther N., the words 'Hittite' and 'Hivite' have exchanged places in the Massoretic text. The LXX. gives the right order. II S 24<sup>7</sup> throws no light on the question of the northern location. Hul, a 'son' of Aram (Gn 10<sup>23</sup>; in I Ch 1<sup>17</sup> erroneously a son of Shem). A desert people not yet identified. Ishbak, a 'son' of Abraham and Keturah (Gn 25<sup>2</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>42</sup>). An identification with Yasbuk, a district of N. Syria mentioned by Shalmaneser III, is very improbable, since the descendants of Keturah seem to have lived wholly to the S. or SE. of Palestine. Japheth, the third 'son' of Noah, according to the regular order of enumeration both in P and J (Gn 5<sup>22</sup>, 6<sup>10</sup>, 10<sup>1</sup>, 9<sup>19</sup>), but perhaps originally regarded as the second (cf. Gn 9<sup>24</sup> and 10<sup>21</sup>). He was the reputed ancestor of the peoples on the northern highlands of W. Asia, and of the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean mostly of the Indo-European stock. See § 9, above. Javan, the fourth son' of Japheth (Gn 10<sup>2</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>5</sup>), and the ancestor of 'the isles of the nations,' that is, the peoples inhabiting the coastlands and islands of the Mediterranean Sea (Gn 10<sup>4</sup> 1). The word (H), yāwān is identical with Iōn (originally Iawōn), the eponym of the Ionian Hellenes. 'The sons of Javan,' however, were scattered far beyond the limits of the Hellenic race; see Elishah, above, and Tarshish, Kittim, Rodanim, below. Apparently, J. has this place in the lists of P because of the importance of the Ionians in the trade and navigation of the Mediterranean, in which they competed with the Phoenicians, and because of their close relations with the Persian Empire in the 5th cent. B.C., during which time this portion of Gn ch. 10 was written. In no Biblical text it is clear that a distinction is made between the Ionians proper and the Greek peoples as a whole, altho as it appears from Assyrian inscriptions of Sargon II and Sennacherib, Ionian pirates and sailors were busily employed on the Phoenician coast as early as the 8th cent. B.C., before any other Greeks came upon the scene. In Ezk 27<sup>13</sup> J. appears as furnishing slaves and copper to the markets of Tyre. A similar reciprocal trade is alluded to in Jl 3<sup>6</sup>. In Is 66<sup>19</sup>, another late passage, setting forth the subjection of the world to Zion, the citation of names is probably a gloss. Zec 9<sup>12</sup> predicts the successful insurrection of the Jews against the Hellenized empire of the Seleucids in the 2d cent. B.C., and the same general situation is implied in Dn 8<sup>21</sup>, 10<sup>20</sup>. In Ezk 27<sup>13</sup> 'Javan' is clearly out of place and a false reading. Jebusite, a 'son' of of Canaan (q.v.) (Gn 10<sup>16</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>14</sup>). The Jebusites were the ancient inhabitants of Jerusalem and the neighborhood, and are named usually last in the lists of the early peoples inhabiting Palestine (Gn 15<sup>21</sup>, etc.). Jerah, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10<sup>22</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>30</sup>), was a tribe or district, probably in SE. Arabia, as yet unidentified. Jetur, a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25<sup>13</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>34</sup>). According to I Ch 5<sup>19</sup> war was waged against J. by Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. His territory, therefore, lay to the E. of Jordan, and it may very well have been the same as Iturea (q.v.). Jobab, a 'son' of Joktan (Gn 10<sup>26</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>35</sup>), a tribe, or region, of S. or SE. Arabia. Locality unknown. Jokshan, a 'son' of Abraham and Keturah, and father of the two Arabian peoples Sheba and Dedan (Gn 25<sup>2</sup> 4). Apparently an ancient people of central Arabia, that can not be certainly identified. Joktan, one of the two 'sons' of Eber and the father of thirteen tribes, or peoples, in J's list of the descendants of Shem (Gn 10<sup>25-30</sup>). The 'sons' of Joktan seem to be wholly S. Arabian, as those of Abraham by Keturah and Hagar (Gn ch. 20) are N. Arabian. The exact limits of the Joktanites can not be ascertained, since we do not know the location of the boundary districts given in Gn 10<sup>30</sup>. Kadmonite, named along with Kenite and Kenizite in the most comprehensive list left to us of the early inhabitants of Palestine (Gn 15<sup>19-21</sup>). The last two are from the Sinaitic peninsula, and the Kadmonites are naturally to be grouped with them. All three contributed to the growth of the people of Israel through their settlement in S. Canaan. The word signifies ancients or dwellers in the east, and the latter sense suggests the general meaning 'wild nomads on the eastern frontier of Palestine.' Cf. infra KEDMAH. Kedar, a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25<sup>13</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>30</sup>). An important nomadic tribe of the Syro-Arabian desert, probably lying to the E. of Nebaioth and N. of Dedan (q.v.). The people of K. were noted for their wealth in flocks and herds (Is 60<sup>7</sup>; Ezk 27<sup>29</sup>), and are a favorite type of tent-dwellers (Jer 2<sup>10</sup>, 49<sup>28</sup> 1; Song 1<sup>5</sup>), of seminomadic life (Is 42<sup>11</sup>), and of the love of war which marked the Arabian tribes (Ps 120<sup>5</sup>). (Vid. supra § 11). Kedmah, a 'son' of Ishmael, i.e., a N. Arabian tribe (Gn 25<sup>13</sup>; I Ch 1<sup>31</sup>). Perhaps equivalent to Kadmonite

EUBULUS, yu-biū'lus (Εὐβούλος): A Roman Christian from whom greetings are sent in II Ti 4 21. Nothing more is known of him. J. M. T.

EUCCHARIST. See LORD'S SUPPER.

EUNICE, yū'nīs (Εὐνίκη): The mother of Timothy (II Ti 1 5). According to Ac 16 1 she was a Jewess, whose home was in Derbe or Lystra, and who had probably been converted to Christianity as a result of Paul's first missionary journey. J. M. T.

EUNUCH (Εὐνοῦχος, εὐνοῦχος, Ac 8 27): An emasculated person. Such were commonly employed in Oriental courts as a measure of safety against possible intrigues with inmates of harems. There is no clear evidence, however, that such persons were used by the kings of Israel. The term ḡārîṣ seems to have a double derivation and significance ('officer,' Gn 37 36 AVmg. 'word doth signify also chamberlain'). Pharaoh's eunuch was married (39 1). One of the meanings of the word is associated with the Assyrian ḡarîl (cf. Rab-saris, II K 18 17). But if there is doubt about the eunuchs of II K 9 32, etc., being mutilated men, there is no doubt as to the employment of such men by the Herods in their palace (Jos. Ant. XV, 7 4, 16 8). Mt 19 12, altho based on the practise of self-emasculation at the time, points to the principle of renouncing the married state for the sake of service, and is not directly concerned with the physical feature of the case. A. C. Z.

EUODIA, yu-ō'di-ə (Εὐδοία): A Christian woman in Philippi whom Paul urges to live in harmony with Syntyche (Ph 4 2), both of whom labored with Paul in the Gospel (Ph 4 3) presumably at the time when the church in Philippi was being established, or possibly during a second visit of the Apostle in Macedonia. See Zahn, Int. to N T, § 30, N. 1. J. M. T..

EUPHRATES, yu-frē'tiz (עֻפְרַת, p'rāth), Assy. Pu-rat-tu (=Sum. Bura-nunu = 'great water vessel'): It is mentioned as early as 2450 B.C. by Gudea (Cyl. B 10 20). The largest river of Southwestern Asia, and one of the two arterial streams of Babylonia. It has two main sources in two valleys of the highlands of Armenia, 6,000 to 6,500 ft. above sea-level. One rises in the Anti-Taurus, and the other near the SW. slopes of Mount Ararat. They meet near Keban Maden, at an elevation of about 2,000 ft. and jointly flow toward the Syrian plain. Thence, instead of emptying into the Mediterranean Sea, which at places is no more than 50 m. away, it flows southeastward, falling 1,000 ft. in the 700 miles to the Persian Gulf. Its entire length is about 1,780 m., of which about 1,200 are navigable for small boats. It is named as one of the rivers of Eden (Gn 2 14), and is variously designated as 'the river,' 'the great river,' and was viewed as the ideal but not actual NE. boundary of Israel. By irrigating canals it supplied the greater part of lower Babylonia with its fertility. It has been a highway for maritime commerce from times immemorial. In primitive days it emptied its water into the Persian Gulf by its own mouth, but the deposit of silt from the Armenian mountains has so filled in the head of the gulf that the Euphrates and Tigris now join waters far above their common mouth. See Map under Babylonia. I. M. P.

EURAQUILO, yu-rā'kwi-lō (Εὐρακύλων, from Gr. Εἶρος, 'east wind,' and Lat. Aquilo, 'northeast wind'). The popular name of the wind that beat down upon the ship on which Paul was making his voyage to Rome (Ac 27 13 f.). It showed itself in a sudden change from the mild south wind under which the ship had been sailing, taking the form of a typhonic squall (ἀνεμος τυφονικός, ver. 14) from the mountainous heights of the island, the precursor of a long-continued NE. gale. The AV Euroclydon (found in H, L, B<sup>3</sup>) is one of the many variants which arose from the fact that the name was not in common use and thus lent itself easily to corruption. M. W. J.

EUTYCHUS, yū'ti-kus (Εὐτυχός): A lad in Troas, otherwise unknown, the name, however, not being uncommon. While asleep, seated in a window of the room where Paul was preaching at some length he fell from the third story and was taken up for dead. Paul stretching himself upon him declared 'his life is in him' (Ac 20 7-12). R. A. F.—E. E. N.

EVANGELIST. See CHURCH, § 6.

EVE (חַוָּה, ḥawwāh): Adam's wife (Gn 3 20, 4 1; II Co 11 3; I Ti 2 13). The popular etymology in Gn 3 20 is doubtful. A possible meaning of ḥawwāh is 'serpent,' and we may have here an instance of the primitive cult association of women and serpents (Proc. Amer. Philosoph. Soc. 50, 5, 11). But cf. Skinner's note on Gn 3 20 in ICC. The story of the Fall indicates a stage of culture wherein woman was already subordinate, hence it is probably subsequent to the hypothetical matriarchate period. A.S.C.*—O.R.S.

EVEN, EVENING, EVENTIDE. See TIME, § 1.

EVER, EVERLASTING, EVERMORE, FOREVER: In the O T these words usually render one of the following Heb. terms: (1) netsah—with the idea of 'abiding,' 'enduring.' (2) ōlām—i.e., 'age,' 'age-long' (the most common term). (3) adh—i.e., 'continuous,' 'continuity.' (4) Another term of more limited meaning is tāmīdh, 'continually' (Ps 25 15, 51 3, 105 4). In two instances the Hebrew means 'for length of days' (Ps 23 6, 93 5). On Lv 25 23, 30 cf. RV. In Pr 8 23, Hab 1 12, the Hebrew means 'from beforetime' in reference to the past. In Ps 77 8 it means 'from generation to generation.'

In the N T, with a few exceptions, the Greek term is αἰών, 'age' (often in such expressions as 'to the age' or 'to the ages of the ages'), or the adjective αἰώνιος, 'age-long,' derived from αἰών. In He 10 12, 14, the original means 'continuous' or 'perpetual,' i.e., the sacrifice has perpetual validity. In Jude ver. 6, the Greek means literally 'everlasting.' See also ESCHATOLOGY, § 39. E. E. N.

EVI, i'vai (יְוִי, 'ēwī): A Midianite chieftain (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21).

EVIL-MERODACH, i'vil-mī-rō'dak (מֶרֶדַּח בֶּן-בִּלְזַן, 'ēvīl mērōdhakh), Babyl. Amēl-Marduk. 'Man of Marduk': The son and successor of the great Nebuchadnezzar (II) on the throne of Babylon, 562 B.C. He reigned two years and in the first one is said to have promoted Jehoiachin (II K 25 27-30), the captive king (of 597 B.C.), of Judah to special favors in his court. So unrestrained was he by law and decency that the priestly party induced his own brother-in-law, Neriglissar (Nergalsharezer), to rebel against and to slay him, and to seize the throne in 560 B.C. I. M. P.

EVIL ONE, THE. See SATAN.

EVIL SPIRIT. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, § 3 ff.

EVIL THING: The term is used (1) of material conditions, involving destitution and suffering, as in the case of Lazarus (Lk 16 25). (2) Of utterances, as expressions of evil thoughts and passions (ra', Pr 15 28; πονηρός, Mt 12 35; Mk 7 23, also φαῦλος, Tit 2 8). (3) Of moral purposes and aims (Ro 1 30; I Co 10 6). A. C. Z.

ewe. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 8.

EXACTOR (Is 60 17 cf. Zech 9 8, 10 4; Dn 11 20, raiser of taxes AV). The same Hebrew word is also rendered 'oppressor' (Is 3 12) or 'taskmaster' (Ex 5 6 etc.). In Dn 11 20 we probably have a veiled reference to Heliodorus, the agent of Seleucus IV, who tried to get possession of the Temple treasure (II Mac ch. 3). A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

EXALT: In this term the general idea of raising or being raised above the ordinary level predominates—(1) Metaphorically, 'to exalt the gate' (Pr 17 19 gābhah) is to claim superiority, or arrogate to oneself prerogatives above the ordinary (also nāsā' Hos 13 1). This sense is expressed by the reflexive (Ob ver. 4 cf. RV; Ezk 31 14). (2) To esteem highly (rūm), especially in the phrase 'exalt J'' (Ex 15 2; Ps 99 5, 9). (3) To raise morally or socially (I K 16 2; Ps 89 19; also sāgabh, Job 36 22 cf. RV). In the N T all these shades of meaning are included in the comprehensive ὁφούν (Mt 11 23, 23 12; Ac 2 33).

EXAMINE, EXAMINATION. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

EXCAVATION AND EXPLORATION. During the past century exploration has been carried on in all the lands of the Near East, and a number of ancient sites have been excavated. These investigations have resulted in the discovery of an immense number of objects which throw light upon the Bible. The purpose of this article is to give a survey of the chief archeological discoveries, and of the historical results that they have yielded.

I. THE SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

1. Egyptian Discoveries.

1. Early Exploration. A large number of Egyptian monuments have remained above ground; and, owing to the dryness of the climate, have been remarkably preserved. These have attracted the attention of European travelers in all ages. In the 17th cent. Egyptian antiquities began to be brought back by Europeans, and deposited in museums and private collections. R. Pococke (1704-1765), F. L. Norden (1704-1742), and J. Bruce (1730-1794) identified a number of ancient sites, and described the ruins. In 1798 Napoleon invaded Egypt, and took with him nearly one hundred archeologists and artists to study the monuments. The results of this expedition were published between the years 1809 and 1822 in seven sumptuous folio volumes, containing introduction, texts, and plates, entitled Description de l'Égypte.

2. Decipherment of the Inscriptions. Among the antiquities discovered by Napoleon's expedition was the 'Rosetta Stone,' so called from its discovery at Rosetta (Ar-Rāshid), near Alexandria. This contained an inscription in honor of Ptolemy V in Hieroglyphic Egyptian, Demotic (a later cursive development out of the ancient picture-writing), and Greek. From this in 1822 J. F. Champollion, by a comparison of the Greek text with the Coptic, a descendant of ancient Egyptian, succeeded in determining the phonetic values of the Hieroglyphic and Demotic signs.

3. Later Scientific Excavations. The enthusiasm aroused by the decipherment of Egyptian led to a systematic exploration of the country, and search for texts by all the nations of Europe. Champollion and Rosellini (1828), Perring and Vyse (1837), Lepsius, Erbkam, the Weidenbachs, Mariette (since 1850) gathered a rich harvest of antiquities, and published important editions of texts. The British Egypt Exploration Fund was founded in 1883, and has carried on excavations under the leadership of Naville, Gardner, Griffith, and Petrie. France has been represented by Gautier and Jequier (1894-95), Amélineau, Schäfer, and De Morgan (since 1850), and the Mission archéologique française. In 1896 W. M. Flinders Petrie organized the Research Account, which since 1905 has been called the British School of Archaeology in Egypt. The German Orient Gesellschaft began work in 1901. Breasted and Reisner also have conducted expeditions for several American museums. Numerous individuals have secured concessions from the Egyptian government, and have carried on private excavations which have frequently yielded remarkable results.

2. Elamite and Persian Discoveries.

4. Early Exploration. The ruins of Persepolis, the capital of the ancient Persian kings, were visited by the monk Odoric in 1320, and by a number of later travelers who brought back copies of the strange inscriptions in three kinds of cuneiform, or wedge-writing, that were to be seen on the walls of the palace. In 1765 the Danish explorer Carsten Niebuhr made careful copies of a large number of these inscriptions.

5. Decipherment of the Persian Inscriptions. In 1802 G. F. Grotefend, a German mathematician, with extraordinary genius succeeded in deciphering one of these inscriptions, and reading the names of Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes. His work was carried forward by E. Burnouf, C. Lassen, I. Löwenstern, and E. Hincks. About 1835 Sir Henry Rawlinson, a young British officer in Persia, copied at the risk of his life the great trilingual rock-inscription of Behistān. Independently of Grotefend, he hit upon the decipherment of the Persian portion of the inscription, and read the name Darius. In 1846 he was able to publish a complete translation of this inscription. The language turned out to be Old Persian, an Aryan dialect similar to the language of the Avesta, the sacred book of the Parsees, and to the language of the later alphabetic inscriptions of the Sassanian kings (see PERSIA).

6. Later Excavations. The earlier discoveries concerned only the Achemenian Persian kings from Darius onward (521 B.C.). Nothing was known of the ancient kingdom of Elam, which was contemporary with the earliest Babylonian and Egyptian kingdoms, and which was conquered by the Persians in the 6th cent. B.C. (Jer 49 34-39; see ELAM). In 1890 a French expedition under the leadership of J. de Morgan excavated Susa, the Biblical Shushan, the capital of ancient Elam (see SHUSHAN). Here a complete record of the early civilization was unearthed, and along with it a number of early Babylonian monuments that had been plundered by the Elamites, among these a long inscription of Manishtusu (c. 2770 B.C.) and the famous code of Hammurabi (c. 2120 B.C.) (see BABYLONIA, § 16; J. de Morgan, Délégation en Perse, 9 vols., 1899-1906).

7. Decipherment of the Elamite Inscriptions. The excavations at Susa revealed numerous inscriptions in a complicated variety of cuneiform that was identical with the second column of the trilingual inscriptions of Persepolis. The decipherment of these Elamite inscriptions has presented peculiar difficulties, because the language belongs to no known group; but a beginning was made by Westergaard and Norris, and considerable progress has been made during the last few years by F. H. Weissbach, G. Hüsing, and F. Bork.

3. Babylonian and Assyrian Discoveries.

8. Early Exploration. About 1160 a Jewish traveler, Benjamin of Tudela, visited and described the ruins of Nineveh and of Babylon. Between the sixteenth and the eighteenth centuries, a number of travelers brought back reports of the ruins that they had seen, and of the peculiar wedge-writing on bricks. In 1801 a case of inscribed bricks and tablets arrived in London, and was deposited in the East India House. C. J. Rich (1787-1820) surveyed several of the largest mounds, and collected numerous inscriptions. Further information was gathered by J. S. Buckingham (1816), R. K. Porter (1818), R. Mignan (1837), G. B. Fraser (1834), F. R. Chesney (1835-37), and J. F. Jones (1846-55).

The first excavations were those of the French vice-consul at Mosul, P. E. Botta, and of his successor V. Place (1842-55) at Nineveh; which resulted in the discovery of the palace of the Assyrian king Sargon in the mound of Khorsabad, and of the reliefs and inscriptions now in the Louvre at Paris. A. H. Layard discovered (1845-49) the palaces of Ashurnasirpal, Sargon, and Shalmaneser at Nimrud (the Biblical Calah, see CALAH), and the palace of Sennacherib at Kouyunjik, and discovered priceless treasures of sculptures, reliefs and inscriptions, which are now to be seen in the British Museum (see A. H. Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, 2 vols., 1851-52). W. K. Loftus (1854) excavated at Warka (Erech, see ERECH), J. E. Taylor (1855) excavated at al-Muqayyar (Ur, see UR), and H. Rassam (1854) had the rare good fortune to unearth for the British Museum the library of Ashurbanipal, containing thousands of Assyrian documents of all periods, and transcripts of numerous ancient Babylonian records.

9. Decipherment of the Babylonian-Assyrian Inscriptions. The key to the problem was furnished by the trilingual inscriptions of Persepolis and Behistān. The third column in these inscriptions was written in the same characters that were found in tablets from Babylonia. By 1851, H. Rawlinson, the decipherer of the Persian portion of the Behistān inscription, was able to translate the Babylonian duplicate. Since that time, through the labors of E. Hincks, H. Rawlinson, E. Norris, G. Smith, E. Schrader, F. Delitzsch, and many later students, the Babylonian-Assyrian language has been thoroughly mastered. This language is Semitic, and is closely allied to Aramaic and Hebrew. In 1860 Rawlinson began the publication of the great corpus, Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, 5 vols.; and this has been followed by numerous volumes of Cuneiform Texts of the British Museum. Many other editions of texts have appeared, and the body of Babylonian-Assyrian literature that has been published is quite as voluminous as the O T (see O. Weber, Die Literatur der Babylonier und Assyrier, 1907).

The earliest inscriptions from Babylonia are written in Sumerian, a different language from the later Semitic Babylonian. The decipherment of these inscriptions has been possible through the fact that the later Babylonians and Assyrians preserved the ancient language in religious liturgies, and prepared word-lists and interlinear translations for its study. Through these bilingual texts the Sumerian language has at last been deciphered.

10. Later Excavations. After the decipherment of Babylonian-Assyrian, the work of excavation began again with new ardor. G. Smith (1873-76) and H. Rassam (1877) dug at Nineveh; E. de Sarzec (1877-1901) at Telloh, in southern Babylonia, where he found numerous remains and inscriptions of the primitive Sumerian civilization; J. P. Peters, W. H. Ward, J. H. Haynes, and H. V. Hilprecht (1884-1900) excavated Nippur, and found many monuments and inscriptions of the earliest period, and a large temple-archive of tablets; R. Koldewey (1899-1914) worked at Babylon; W. Andrae (1902-14) at Ashur, where many tablets of the early Assyrian period were discovered; E. J. Banks (1903-04) at Adab, one of the oldest cities of Babylonia; H. de Genouillac (1914) at Kish. All work was interrupted by the great war, but has been begun again by R. C. Thompson (1918) at Eridu; H. R. Hall (1919) in Mesopotamia; C. L. Wooley (1922-25) at Ur.

4. Palestinian Discoveries.

11. Early Exploration. The spread of Christianity in the Greco-Roman world created great interest in the Holy Land, and led multitudes of pilgrims thither in all ages. The reports of these travelers have little scientific value, but the Onomasticon of Eusebius of Cæsarea (died c. 349 A.D.) is still important for the identification of ancient sites. Early modern exploration was limited to the study of objects that remained above ground. The American professor E. Robinson (1838-52) succeeded in identifying many modern Palestinian villages and ruins with ancient towns. (See E. Robinson, Biblical Researches<sup>2</sup>, 1856). These topographical researches were continued by T. Tobler, V. Guérin and E. Renan. In 1865 the British Palestine Exploration Fund was organized. Its first undertaking was the excavation of the eastern hill of Jerusalem by C. Warren (see C. Warren, Jerusalem, 1889). The next undertaking was the survey of Western Palestine by C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener. This resulted in the publication in 1880 of the Great Map of Palestine, on the scale of one inch to the mile, on which all modern Arabic names of localities are recorded with the utmost detail. This map is of inestimable value for the identification of ancient sites. It was accompanied with seven volumes of explanatory memoirs. In 1881 C. R. Conder surveyed the region east of the Jordan, and in 1882 published his results in The Survey of Eastern Palestine. The explorations of C. S. Clermont-Ganneau in Southern Palestine during the years 1873-74 were published in Archæological Researches in Palestine, 2 vols. (1896, 1899).

12. Decipherment of the Inscriptions. The earlier explorations in Palestine resulted in the copying of a large number of inscriptions in Hebrew, Phœnician, Aramaic, Greek, and Latin. The decipherment of these offered no such difficulties as the Egyptian or the Babylonian inscriptions, since all were in known languages. Only Phœnician departed sufficiently from Hebrew to present a number of problems. These were successfully solved by W. Gesenius, Scripturæ linguæque Phœnicia monumenta (1837); M. A. Levy, Phœnizische Studien (1856-64); Phœ-nizisches Wörterbuch (1864); P. Schröder, Die phönizische Sprache (1869). The Phœnician and other old Palestinian inscriptions were collected and published by the French Academy in Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, I (1881). Modern editions of the more important inscriptions with translations and commentaries have been published by M. Lidzbarski, Handbuch der nordsemitischen Epigraphik (1898); and by G. A. Cooke, A Textbook of North-Semitic Inscriptions (1903).

13. Modern Excavations. In 1890 there began a systematic excavation of the mounds of Palestine that has been uninterrupted down to the present time. In this year W. M. Flinders Petrie made an exploratory survey of the mound of Tell el-Hesi, the Biblical Lachish (Tell el-Hesi, 1891). Between 1891 and 1893 F. J. Bliss excavated about one quarter of this mound (A Mound of Many Cities, 1894). From 1894 to 1897 F. J. Bliss carried on excavations at Jerusalem (Excavations at Jerusalem, 1898). In 1898 F. J. Bliss and R. A. S. Macalister ran exploratory trenches into the mounds of Tell Zakariya (Azekah?), Tell es-Sāfi (Gath?), Tell ej-Judeideh, and Tell Sandahanna (Excavations in Palestine, 1902). From 1902 to 1909 R. A. S. Macalister excavated in a very thorough fashion the great mound of Tell ej-Jezer, the Biblical Gezer (The Excavation of Gezer, 3 vols., 1912). This is our best source of information in regard to the pre-Hebrew civilization of Canaan. In 1902-03 E. Sellin excavated Tell Ta'anek, the Biblical Taanach (Tell Ta'anek, 1904). In 1903-05 G. Schumacher excavated Tell el-Mutesellim, the biblical Megiddo (Tell el-Mutesellim, 1908). In 1907-09 E. Sellin excavated Jericho (Ergebnisse der Ausgrabungen zu Jericho, 1913). In 1908-10 G. A. Reisner excavated Samaria (Harvard Excavations at Samaria, 2 vols., 1924). In 1909-11 M. Parker made some private and unscientific excavations on the temple-hill in Jerusalem which, however, yielded certain archeological results (see Revue Biblique, 1912, pp. 86-116; Biblical World, 1912, pp. 295-306). In 1911-12 D. Mackenzie and F. E. Newton excavated 'Ain Shems, the Biblical Beth Shemesh (Excavations at 'Ain Shems, 1913). In 1913-14 R. Weil made some excavations on the temple-hill in Jerusalem (La Cité de David, 1920). In 1920-21 J. Garstang undertook the excavation of Askalon (see Palestine Exploration Fund, Quarterly Statement, 1921-23). In 1921 C. S. Fisher began work at Beisān, the Biblical Beth-Shan (see Univ. of Penna., Museum Journal, 1921 sq.). In 1922 W. F. Albright excavated at Tell el-Fūl, Gibeah (see Bulletin of American School at Jerusalem, 1922 sq.). Finally, in 1923, R. A. S. Macalister and J. G. Duncan began excavations on the temple-hill in Jerusalem which have continued down to the time of writing (1925).

II. RESULTS OF EXCAVATION AND EXPLORATION.

1. Chronology.

14. Babylonian. An accurate chronology is the first need of scientific historical research but prior to 1884 no such chronology of the ancient Orient existed. The only bases for calculations were the Ptolemaic Canon, a list of kings of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, with the years of their reigns from Nabonassar (747 B.C.) to Antoninus Pius (137 A.D.); and the figures in the O.T. Since the decipherment of the Babylonian-Assyrian records a wealth of new material has come to light which gives us an accurate chronology from 3000 B.C. onward.

The Babylonian List of Kings, discovered by G. Smith, and first published by T. G. Pinches (PSBA, May, 1884), contains the names of the kings of Babylon and the years of their reigns from Sumuabum, the first king of the first dynasty of Babylon, down to the fall of Babylon.. This overlaps the Ptolemaic Canon from Nabonassar onward, and agrees with its figures. By means of these two documents it is possible to fix the beginning of Sumuabum's reign in 2225 B.C., and this date is confirmed by astronomical observations recorded in the reign of Hammurabi, 2123 B.C.

The Assyrian Eponym Canon was discovered by G. Smith at Nineveh in 1875. It is a list of dignitaries of the Assyrian Empire who were chosen to give their names to a series of 227 consecutive years. This list overlaps both the Babylon List and the Ptolemaic Canon, so that the precise date of each year can be determined. For the year which, according to these calculations, should be 763 B.C. the Canon adds the remark, 'In the month Sivan the sun was eclipsed.' Modern astronomy calculates that on June 15, 763 B.C. an eclipse of the sun occurred at Nineveh. Thus the strict historical accuracy both of the Ptolemaic Canon and of the Eponym Canon is demonstrated, and it becomes possible to date exactly all the events of Assyrian history from 889 B.C. onward. This puts the chronology of the contemporary Hebrew kings and prophets on a sure footing.

Within the last few years lists of twenty dynasties of Babylonian kings and their reigns before the first dynasty of Babylon have been discovered, and the dates of these kings have been determined approximately back to 3000 B.C. (see A. T. Clay, JAOS, xli, pp. 244 ff.; A Hebrew Deluge Story in Cuneiform 1922, p. 84).

15. Egyptian. Until recent times the only source for Egyptian Chronology was Manetho's list of kings preserved in the quotations of Julius Africanus and Eusebius. Since the decipherment of Egyptian a number of ancient lists similar to Manetho's have been discovered, and also astronomical observations which make it possible to determine the dates of the kings with great precision from the Twelfth Dynasty onward. These results are confirmed by the fact that we learn from the Tell el-Amarna letters that Amenhotep IV, king of Egypt, was contemporary with Burnaburiash, king of Babylon, and Ashuruballit, king of Assyria. As in Babylonia, so also in Egypt we now have a reliable chronology from 3000 B.C. onward.

2. Historical Results of Discoveries.

As a result of all the archeological discoveries it is now possible to reconstruct the history of the ancient Orient for several millenia before the beginning of the Hebrew history in the O.T.

A. Stone Age.

16. Eolithic Period. The earliest human remains are eoliths, or natural stones that were used as implements by primitive man in the Tertiary age before 500,000 B.C. These have been found in northern Europe, but have not yet been discovered in the Near East. It is highly probable, however, that the Paleolithic period, which is known to have existed in the Orient, was preceded by an Eolithic period.

17. Paleolithic Period (500,000 B.C. to 10,000 B.C.). In this period men chipped flints to produce implements of any desired shape. Remains of this period have been found at many sites in Egypt and in Palestine (see R. A. S. Macalister, PEF, Quart. Stat., 1912, pp. 44 ff., 82 ff.; P. Karge, Rephaim, 1917). Paleolithic man had fire, but no metals or pottery, textile fabrics, or domestic animals. He lived by hunting and fishing, and had considerable artistic skill both in modeling and in sketching. He believed in the continued existence of the spirit after death, and kept up a cult of the dead, and probably of other spirits also (see M. Blanckenhorn, Die Steinzeit Palästina-Syriens und Nordafrikas, 1921).

18. Neolithic Period (10,000 B.C. to 5000 B.C.). In this period men polished their stone implements, and fitted them with handles. Remains of this period are abundant both in Egypt and in Palestine. The lowest strata in the mound of Gezer and other mounds of Palestine consist of caves hewn in the soft limestone rock. The remains found in these caves show that the inhabitants possessed polished stone implements, baskets, hand-molded pottery, textile fabrics, and that they cultivated cereals of various sorts, and bred cattle, goats, and swine. They cremated their dead, and maintained a cult of the dead. They erected megalithic monuments, and excavated 'cup-marks' on their monuments and around their dwellings. They modeled figures in clay, and executed drawings of animals on the walls of their caves. Their diminutive stature, and the fact that they burned their dead, show that they were not Semites.

B. Bronze Age.

19. Sumerian Period (5000 to 3500 B.C.). About 5000 B.C. a race appeared in Babylonia that is called Sumerian from Sumer, the ancient name of South Babylonia. In their statues and reliefs they represent themselves with smoothly shaved heads and faces, and features very different from those of the later Semitic conquerors of the land. They used bronze implements, cultivated grain, bred domestic animals, lived in houses of unbaked clay bricks, and wore a short kilt of fleeces of wool. They invented the cuneiform writing, and developed an extensive literature of prayers, psalms, magical texts, omens, liturgies, laws, astronomical observations, and historical traditions, which were preserved by the later Semites as a sacred literature. The cosmogony and astronomy of the later Hebrews, their traditions of the creation, Garden of Eden, fall, antediluvian patriarchs, and flood, the types of their religious poetry, and the fundamental principles of their religious and social legislation, are now known to have come from the ancient Sumerians by way of the later Semitic Babylonians and the Canaanites (see COSMOGONY, EDEN, FALL, FLOOD, PATRIARCHS).

Contemporary with the Sumerian period in Babylonia was the predynastic period in Egypt, in which hieroglyphic writing was developed, and the beginning of the first Sothic cycle of 1460 years was fixed in 4240 B.C. Beautiful works of art in bronze, stone, wood, and ivory were already executed in this period (see Breasted, History of Egypt, Chap. III).

20. Akkadian Period. (3500 B.C. to 2500 B.C.) As early as 3500 B.C. a Semitic people, speaking a language closely akin to Hebrew and Aramaic, pushed out of Arabia into Akkad, or North Babylonia, and gradually dispossessed or absorbed the older Sumerian population, altho the Sumerians still maintained themselves for a thousand years in the south at Lagash (Tellôh). The inscriptions of the kings of this period found at Nippur and Tellôh have been published and translated by Thureau-Dangin (Die sumerischen und akkadischen Königsinschriften, 1907).

From these inscriptions the astonishing fact has been made clear that Palestine was ruled by South Babylonia between 3500 and 2500 B.C. and that active trade was kept up between Babylonia and Syria all through this period. Ur-Nina, who, on the minimum calculation, lived c. 3000 B.C., brought cedar-wood for his temples and palaces from Mount Amanus and Mount Lebanon. Lugalzaggisi, who reigned c. 2870 B.C., has recorded that he subdued all the lands from the Sea of the Rising Sun to the Sea of the Setting Sun, and that he set up his statue on the shores of the Mediterranean as a symbol of his sovereignty. Sargon, king of Agade, who reigned about 2840 B.C., not only subdued Syria, but even crossed the sea in ships and established his authority in Cyprus. Gudea, king of Lagash, about 2575 B.C., brought cedars from Mount Amanus, building stone and alabaster from Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, copper from Mount Hermon, and gold from Arabia to adorn the temple of the god of his capital city.

Contemporary with the Akkadian period in Babylonia was the Old Kingdom (dynasties I-VI) in Egypt. The kings of this period were the pyramid-builders and worked the copper-mines at the traditional Mount Sinai, where they have left numerous inscriptions (see W. M. Flinders Petrie, Researches in Sinai, 1906). Under Pepi I of the VIth dynasty a certain Uni led an Egyptian military force into Palestine, and inscribed the record of this campaign on his tomb. This is the earliest historical document we possess in regard to Palestine (see Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, i, pp. 142-144; Paton, Egyptian Records of Travel, i, table III).

During both the Sumerian and the Akkadian periods Palestine still remained in the Neolithic stage of civilization.

21. Amorite Period (2500 B.C. to 1700 B.C.). About 2,500 B.C. a second wave of Semitic migration overflowed Babylonia, Palestine, and Egypt. These people called themselves Amorites. In Babylonia they put new dynasties on the thrones of Ur, Nisin, Larsa, and Babylon. The famous Hammurabi, the sixth king of the Amorite first dynasty of Babylon (2123 B.C.) united all Babylonia under his rule, and extended his conquests as far as the shores of the Mediterranean. His law-code in 282 sections was discovered by de Morgan at Susa. It contains many remarkable parallels to the Hebrew Legislation. By many Hammurabi is identified with Amraphel of Gn 14 1 (see AMRAPHEL; BABYLONIA, §16; LAW, §1). Under the kings of the first and of the second dynasty Palestine was a Babylonian province, and was penetrated by Babylonian civilization. Cuneiform became the script of the country, and lasted down to the time of the Tell el-Amarna letters in 1400 B.C. (see below, § 22). Along with writing came knowledge of the Babylonian literature and religion. The Babylonian elements in the O T (see above, § 19) are probably due to the fact that during this period these elements were absorbed by the Amorites, and by them were passed on to the Hebrews after the conquest of Canaan. In the Amorite level at Gezer a zodiacal tablet of Babylonian type was found (Excavation of Gezer, ii. pp. 347 sq.), and at Taanach a seal-cylinder of native workmanship was discovered with a cuneiform inscription in honor of the Babylonian god Nergal (Sellin, Tell Ta'aneh, p. 105). In tablets of the first dynasty the names Abram, Jacob, and perhaps Joseph appear (Barton, Archæology and the Bible, pp. 290-298).

In Egypt the Amorites overthrew the Old Kingdom, and caused a period of anarchy from the VIIth to the Xth dynasty. Then, contemporaneously with the first dynasty of Babylon, arose the brilliant Middle Kingdom of dynasties XI-XII. From this period comes the Tale of Sinuhe, which narrates how a certain Sinuhe fled from Egypt in the reign of Sesostri I and traveled in Palestine. This gives an extraordinarily interesting account of the conditions that then prevailed in that country (see Breasted, Ancient Records, i, pp. 237 ff.; Barton, Archæology and the Bible, 307 ff.). From the same period come the Tale of the Eloquent Peasant and the Admonitions of Ipuwer, which show remarkable resemblances to the Hebrew Wisdom Literature (see Barton, Archæology and the Bible, pp. 419-422).

Amorite remains in Palestine are found in the mounds just above the caves of the Neolithic inhabitants. Their skeletons show that they belonged to the Semitic race. They cultivated the soil, and bred sheep, goats, and camels. They dwelt in houses of mud or of undressed stones. They used bronze as well as stone implements, and fashioned vessels on the potter's wheel. They lived in towns surrounded with walls of dressed stone. They buried their dead, instead of burning them, as was the earlier pre-Semitic practise, using as tombs the caves of their Neolithic predecessors; and with the dead they deposited implements, ornaments, food, and drink. Their chief divinity was the primitive Semitic mother-goddess Ashtart (Astarte) (see ASHTORETH), since hundreds of clay plaques depicting her naked figure have been found in the first Semitic level. They worshiped in open air high places, surrounded with a wall, and provided with matstsēbhōth, or sacred stones, and with 'āshērīm, or sacred posts (see HIGH PLACE, PILLAR, ASHERA). A very remarkable high place with ten standing stones was discovered at Gezer (see Macalister, Excavation of Gezer, ii, p. 381 sq.). Under the floors of the high places many large earthenware jars were discovered containing the bones of new-born infants. These were unquestionably offered as sacrifices to the mother-goddess (cf. Ex 22 29; I K 16 34). Foundation-sacrifices, and other human sacrifices were common. Sacrifice of animals, of course, was universal. A remarkable engineering enterprise of this period was the excavation at Gezer of a tunnel through the solid rock to a spring, in order to secure an abundant supply of water in time of seige (see Macalister, Excavation of Gezer, i, 156 sq.). Similar tunnels have been found at Jerusalem and at Gibeah.

22. The Aramean Period (1760 B.C. to 1200 B.C.). About 1760 B.C. the Kassites appeared in Babylonia and overthrew the Amorite dynasty. Gandash, their leader, founded the IIIrd, or Kassite dynasty, which ruled Babylonia from 1760 to 1183 B.C. This was a period of incessant wars with Assyria, in which Assyria gradually gained the supremacy. Contemporary with these great changes in Asia was the rule of the Hyksos, or 'Shepherd Kings,' in Egypt, which brought the Middle Kingdom to an end. Under Ahmose (1580 B.C.), the founder of the famous XVIIIth dynasty, the expulsion of the Hyksos was effected, and Egypt of the New Empire began a career of conquest in Syria and Palestine which lasted for over three centuries. This was the period of the Thutmoses and Amenhoteps of the XVIIIth dynasty, and of Seti, Ramses and Merneptah of the XIXth. During this period the great Aramean-Semitic migration out of Arabia occurred, and menaced Babylonia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Palestine, and Egypt. To this migration the forefathers of Israel belonged (Gn 22 24, 25 20; Dt 26 5; see ARAMEANS).

The chief sources for this period are the inscriptions of the Egyptian kings of the XVIIIth, XIXth, and XXth dynasties, which they have carved on the walls of their temples. They are published in accurate English translation in Vol. II-IV in Breasted's Ancient Records of Egypt, 1906.

In 1888 there were discovered at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt about 350 inscribed clay tablets. These proved to be chiefly letters from Syrian and Palestinian 'kings' to the Egyptian monarchs Amenhotep III and Amenhotep IV (c. 1400 B.C.). If these letters had been written in Egyptian, it would not have been remarkable, since Syria and Palestine stood at this time under the rule of the Pharaohs; instead of this, however, they were written in Babylonian. The use of Babylonian in these letters is explicable only as a survival of an earlier state of affairs, when Egyptian influence in Palestine counted for nothing, and when Babylonian influence was supreme. These letters speak of the Habhiru, or Hebrews, as menacing Canaan; and give a marvelously complete picture of that land before the Hebrew conquest (see Winckler, The Tell el-Amarna Letters; Barton, Archæology, pp. 344-351).

The Babylonian and Assyrian records are scanty during this period in comparison with the previous period, still they yield some information in regard to the conditions in Babylonia, Assyria, and Mesopotamia. They are published in German translation in Schrader's Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, Vols. I and III.

The Hittite Inscriptions are written in a character that has not yet been deciphered, but in the archives at Boghazköi, the Hittite capital in Asia Minor, numerous records in Babylonian cuneiform that can be read were discovered by Winckler.

In Ex 111 (J) we read that the Hebrews built for the Pharaoh the store-cities of Pithom and Raamses. In 1883, in excavating the mound of Tell el-Mas-khuta, in the land of Goshen, E. Naville found the name of the place Pi-Tum and the cartouche of Ramses II. This, together with Raamses, the name of the other store-city, seems to indicate that Ramses II (1292-1225 B.C.) was the Pharaoh of the oppression of Israel in Egypt, and this conclusion is confirmed by an inscription of Ramses II, recently discovered by C. S. Fisher at Beisān in Palestine which states: 'I have collected the Semites that they might build for me my city of Ramses.'

The famous stele of Merneptah (1225-1215 B.C.), discovered by Petrie at Thebes in 1896, contains the first and only mention of Israel found as yet in the Egyptian records: 'Wasted is Lybia, the Hittites are pacified. Canaan is plundered with every evil, Askalon is carried off, Gezer is seized, Yenoam is made nonexistent, Israel is desolated, his seed is not; Palestine has become a widow for Egypt.' This seems to indicate that some Israelites at least were settled in Canaan as early as the reign of Merneptah, but whether the exodus had yet occurred is uncertain (see Breasted, Ancient Records, iii, p. 264; Barton, Archæology, p. 311).

The Egyptian records of this period have also shed much light upon the Biblical story of Joseph. The Tale of the Two Brothers has close analogies with the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, and other features of the story of Joseph have Egyptian parallels (see Barton, Archæology, pp. 300-306).

The picture of Palestine about 1400 B.C. that we gain from the inscriptions of the Egyptian kings of the XVIIIth dynasty and from the Tell el-Amarna letters is supplemented by the discoveries made in Palestine itself. In the second Semitic level the people lived in better houses than in the preceding period, and protected their cities with strong stone walls. They imported from Crete choice pottery of the type known as Minoan. Egyptian scarabs, amulets, and images were frequent. Gold and silver ornaments of beautiful workmanship and engraved gems were also found. The Tell el-Amarna letters have been discovered at Lachish and at Taanach, and show that the alphabet had not yet entered Canaan. The high place cult continued as in the previous period, but lamp and bowl deposits began to take the place of the infant jar-burials.

C. Iron Age.

23. Hebrew Period (1200 to 1000 B.C.). This was the period of the decline of Babylon under dynasties IV-VIII, and of the decline of Egypt under dynasties XX-XXII; but the rise of Assyria to the position of the leading power in W. Asia. About 1200 B.C. Canaan was invaded simultaneously by the Philistines from the west, and by the Israelites under Joshua from the east. Ramses III narrates in his inscriptions how he fought with the Philistines and their kinsmen the Zakkala. The Papyrus Golenischeff (c. 1100 B.C.) gives a most interesting account of the visit of Wen-Amon, an Egyptian ambassador, to Dor, a city of the Zakkala (see Breasted, Ancient Records, iv, pp. 278 ff.; Barton, Archæology, pp. 352 ff.). The Philistines were Aryans from the island of Crete. They first brought iron into Palestine (cf. I S 13 19-23). They also probably introduced the alphabet, which is not found in the mounds of Palestine before 1000 B.C. It was probably developed out of one of the linear scripts of Crete. The Philistines also were responsible for the introduction of 'Late Minoan' art into Canaan. Five shaft-graves at Gezer show kinship with the shaft-graves at Knossos and Mycenæ, and are probably Philistine. The objects that they contained are far in advance of ordinary Canaanite or Hebrew art. It is noteworthy also that the only temples mentioned in the O T prior to Solomon's temple are Philistine edifices. Such a temple was excavated by Macalister at Gezer.

The Hebrew remains of this period show the adoption and debasement of Canaanite civilization. Houses, pottery and implements are similar, but inferior to those of their predecessors. The numerous statements of the O T that Israel served the bā'ālim are abundantly confirmed by archeology. Plaques and statuettes of Ashtart and images of other gods are numerous. The high places of the Canaanites continued to be used by the Hebrews, and infant-sacrifice was still kept up. The Hebrew tombs of this period show the continuance of the custom of placing offerings with the dead and of sacrificing to them.

24. Period of the Hebrew Monarchy (1000 B.C. to 626 B.C.). About 1000 B.C. alphabetic writing first makes its appearance in the mounds of Palestine. Jar-handles, seals, and weights with brief inscriptions in the so called Phœnician alphabet are found. The oldest known Phœnician inscription is one found in Cyprus which mentions Hiram, king of Tyre, the contemporary of David and Solomon. The oldest Hebrew inscription of any length is the so called Calendar Inscription from Gezer (see Excavation of Gezer, ii, 24 ff.). This is followed by the Inscription of Mesha (q.v.), king of Moab, (c. 850 B.C.), and by the inscription of the time of Hezekiah in the Siloam tunnel at Jerusalem (see Excavation of Jerusalem, § 24).

Jerusalem was captured by David and was made the capital of the Hebrew monarchy. Remains of the Jebusite wall of the citadel on the eastern hill and of David's and Solomon's new fortifications have been discovered by the expedition of the Palestine Exploration Fund that is now working in Jerusalem (see JERUSALEM, §§ 15-20). The line of Solomon's wall that enclosed the western hill has also been determined archeologically (see JERUSALEM, § 31). The site of the altar of burnt offering in Solomon's temple may still be seen in the Sakhra, or sacred rock, that stands under the dome of the Mosque of Omar.

From Ashurnasirpal III (885 B.C.) down to the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., the annals of the Assyrian kings found at Nineveh furnish us with a precise history of the period. Ashurnasirpal marched as far as the shores of the Mediterranean, and erected a monument at the Dog River near Beirût which still remains. His son, Shalmaneser III, mentions Benhadad I, Benhadad II, and Hazael, kings of Damascus, who are named so often in the Books of Kings. Shalmaneser records that he fought with Ahab, king of Israel, in 854 B.C., and that he received the tribute of Jehu in 842. These dates are of the utmost importance for reconstructing the chronology of the Hebrew kings. The excavations of the Harvard expedition at Samaria have disclosed in the lowest level of the mound the remains of the palace of Omri and Ahab. (See SAMARIA). In this a number of potsherds were found on which were written in black ink the business accounts of the king's household. The proper names in these inscriptions are of the familiar O T type. Some are compounded with initial Jeho- or with final -iah. Others are compounded with ba'al. A beautiful seal was found by Schumacher at Megiddo, bearing the inscription 'to Shama servant of Jeroboam.' This was doubtless Jeroboam II (784-744 B.C.). The spirited lion engraved on it is a unique specimen of early Hebrew art.

The inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser IV, Sargon, and Sennacherib are contemporary with the prophets Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah. They make possible the chronological rearrangement of the sermons of these prophets, and throw a flood of light upon their meaning. Assyrian tablets of the time of Esarhaddon were found at Gezer, and show that that place was occupied by an Assyrian garrison (see Excavation of Gezer, i, 22-29). A newly discovered tablet fixes the date of the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C. (see C. J. Gadd, The Fall of Nineveh, 1923), and helps to determine the chronology of Nahum and of some of the prophecies of Jeremiah.

25. New Babylonian Period (626 B.C. to 539 B.C.). In 626 B.C. Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, threw off the yoke of Assyria; and his son Nebuchadrezzar conquered all the provinces of the Assyrian empire. His inscriptions throw light upon the Books of Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel. The inscriptions of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, have an important bearing on the historical character of the Book of Daniel (see DANIEL).

26. Persian Period (539 B.C. to 333 B.C.). In this period the O T is supplemented by the inscriptions of Cyrus, Darius, and the other Achaemenian kings. The line of Nehemiah's wall at Jerusalem has been established by excavation (see JERUSALEM, § 37). The most interesting archeological discovery of this period was numerous records of a Jewish colony at Elephantine (Assuan, See SEVENEH) at the First Cataract of the Nile. These show that they had a temple, where they worshiped J' along with two goddesses. One papyrus mentions Sanballat, the Samaritan contemporary of Nehemiah, and thus proves that Nehemiah lived under Artaxerxes I and not Artaxerxes II (see Cowley, Aramaic Papyri of the Fifth Century B.C., 1923). Coins were first struck in the Persian period. From this time onward they are numerous in Palestine, and are an important aid for the dating of archeological levels and for the reconstruction of history. The Phœnician sarcophagi and inscriptions of the dynasty of Eshmunazar belong to this period.

27. Greek Period (333 B.C. to 60 B.C.). Palestine was conquered by Alexander in 332 B.C., and stood under the rule either of the Greek Seleucids of Antioch, or of the Greek Ptolemies of Alexandria, until its conquest by Pompey in 63 B.C. During this period flourishing Greek colonies were established along the shore of the Mediterranean, in the Decapolis east of the Jordan, and at several points in the interior of the land. Splendid temples, theaters and baths still remain at Philadelphia (Ammān) and at Gerasa (Jerash) in the old land of Ammon, and excavations in many places have revealed works of Greek art. Among the most notable are the Alexander Sarcophagus and Sarcophagus of the Mourners discovered at Sidon. On remains of the Greek period in Jerusalem, see JERUSALEM, § 39. Throughout the whole of Palestine Greek civilization exerted a profound impression upon pottery, furniture, implements, and domestic arts of all sorts. The characteristic tombs of the Greek period are kōkīm, or niches cut into the rock vertical to the walls of the tomb-chambers. Into these the bodies were shoved head-first. The doors of the tomb-chambers were frequently closed with rolling stones. Many such tombs, some of them highly ornamented, are still to be seen in all parts of Palestine. In such a tomb doubtless the body of Jesus was laid.

28. Roman Period. The chief archeological remains of the Roman Period are the temples and palaces erected by Herod the Great. His temple at Samaria has been discovered by the Harvard expedition, and his temple and basilica at Askalon, by the recent excavations of the Palestine Exploration Fund. On his constructions in Jerusalem, see JERUSALEM, § 39. Other important Roman remains in Palestine are the paved military roads with their mile-stones, which aid in determining the location of ancient cities. Numerous Latin inscriptions also have been found in all parts of the land. The Egyptian papyri of the Roman period throw much light upon the language of the N T and upon the history of N T times, and among these papyri was found a collection of sayings of Jesus (see C. M. Coburn, The New Archeological Discoveries, 7th ed. 1924).

EXCEL, EXCELLENT, EXCELLENCY: The original Hebrew and Greek terms translated (more often in AV than in RV) by these words represent the following general ideas: (1) Of elevation, exaltation, in Ex 15:7; Dt 33:28, 29; Job 13:11, 20:6, 37:4, 40:10; Ps 47:4, 62:4, 68:34, 148:13; Pr 8:6, 31:29; Is 4:2, 12:5, 13:19, 60:15; Ezk 24:21; Dn 2:31, 4:36, 5:12, 14:6, 3; Am 6:8, 8:7; Nah 2:2. (2) Of excess or abundance, Gn 49:3; Job 4:21; Pr 17:7; Ec 2:13, 7:12; I Co 2:1, 12:31; Ph 3:8. (3) Of greatness or largeness, I K 4:30; Job 37:23; Ps 81:9, 16:3, 76:4, 150:2; Is 28:29; He 11:4. (4) Of beauty, Est 1:4; Is 35:2. (5) Of difference, Ro 2:18; Ph 1:10; He 1:4, 8:6. (6) Choice or selected, Song 5:15. In Lk 1:3; Ac 23:28, 24:3, 26:25, it is an honorary title. In the following passages the RV gives the more correct rendering—Gn 49:4 (AmRV); Ps 36:7, 103:20, 141:5; Pr 12:26, 17:27, 22:20 (mg.); Ezk 16:7 (mg.); Ro 2:18 (mg.); I Co 14:12; II Co 3:10, 4:7; II P 1:17 (AmRV). In I Ch 15:21 (AV) the text is obscure.

EXCHANGER. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

EXECUTE, EXECUTION, EXECUTIONER: 'Execute' in EV is the rendering of words meaning simply 'to do,' except in Jer 21:12; Zec 7:9, 8:16, where the Hebrew means 'judge.' For 'executioner' AV (Mk 6:27) cf. RV, which gives the correct rendering.

EXERCISE: (noun and verb): The translation of several different Hebrew and Greek terms (1) of physical training in the gymnasium (I Ti 4:8); (2) of the verb γυμνάζω, meaning literally 'to strip naked' (for physical exercise), then 'to exert oneself vigorously' or seriously (I Ti 4:7; He 5:14, 12:11; II P 2:14); (3) of 'ānāh (III'), 'to toil' or 'work hard' (Ec 1:13, 3:10); (4) of hālakh, 'to walk' (Ps 131:1); (5) of 'āsāh and ποιεῖν, 'to do' or 'make' (Jer 9:24; Rev 13:12); (6) of ἀσχεῖν, i. e., 'to train' or 'discipline' [oneself] Acts 24:16). In other cases 'exercise' is added (in the EV) to express more clearly the main idea (e. g. Ezk 22:29; Mt 20:25; I Cor 9:25).

EXODUS. 1. Name. Exodus, the second book of the Bible, was so named by the Alexandrian Jews, because the first part narrates the exodus (ἐξοδος, 'going out') of Israel from Egypt. In the Hebrew Bible the book is called שְׁמוֹת וְאֵלֶּה שְׁמוֹת ('now these are the names'), or simply שְׁמוֹת, sh'mōth ('names'), from its opening words.

2. Contents. Exodus is but a part of the larger history known as the Hexateuch (q.v.). It begins with the story of the oppression of Israel in Egypt and ends with the account of the setting up of the Tabernacle at Sinai. A brief outline may be given as follows:

I. The deliverance of Israel from Egypt through Moses, chs. 1-18.

1. The changed status of Israel in Egypt (ch. 1).
  - (1) The great increase of the Israelites (1:1-7).
  - (2) The measures taken by the king of Egypt to oppress and diminish them (1:8-22).
2. Moses commissioned to be the leader of Israel (2:7-7).
3. Jehovah's deliverance of His people (7:8-15:21).
4. From the Red Sea to Sinai (bitter water, manna, war with Amalek, etc.) (15:22-17:16).
5. Visit of Jethro (ch. 18).

II. The organization of Israel at Sinai (chs. 19-40).

1. The announcement of the Covenant (19:1-23:33).
  - (1) The great Theophany, with the Ten Commandments (19:1-20:17).
  - (2) A code of civil and religious law (20:18-23:33).
  - (3) Promise and warning (23:20-33).
2. The ratification of the Covenant (24:1-11).
3. Moses receives the tables of stone and the commands concerning the Tabernacle (24:12-31:18).
4. The apostasy and reorganization (32:1-34:28).
5. The construction of the Tabernacle (34:29-39:43).
6. The Tabernacle set up (ch. 40).

3. Complex Character of the Narrative. As in the other books of the Hexateuch, so in Exodus there are many evidences that the narrative at present consists of several threads (J, E, P) with editorial additions of various kinds (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 5, 10-15, etc.). Of these J and E were very similar in the main. The account of P, on the other hand, was quite different. The result of the combination of P with JE, in which P was taken as furnishing the main outline, was that not only a much more lengthy, but a very confused narrative was produced.

4. The Narrative of P was as follows:

- (1) An introductory genealogical statement (a) of the heads of the tribes in Egypt (1:1-5) and (b) of the lineage of Moses and Aaron (6:14-27 perhaps a later insertion.)
- (2) A brief account of the oppression (1:11-15), introducing the intervention of God (2:24-25).
- (3) God reveals Himself in Egypt to Moses as Jehovah, and commissions him and Aaron to demand Israel's release (6:2-7:7).
- (4) The wonders done by Aaron fail to convince Pharaoh (7:8-13).
- (5) The plagues, mostly worked by Aaron (blood, frogs, lice, boils, 7:19-20a, 21b, 22, 8:5-7, 15b-19, 9a-19), all fail to persuade Pharaoh (11:1-15).
- (6) The Passover instituted; its time, its ritual, its law, also that of the unleavened bread and the firstlings (12:1-20, 24, 28, 40:51, 13:1-2, 20).
- (7) Notes of the itinerary from Egypt to the sea and the wonderful passage of the sea (14:1-4, 8, 9b, 15b, 15b-18, 21a, 21c-23, 25-27a, 28a, 29).
- (8) Notes of the itinerary from the sea to Sinai. The manna and its law (16:1-3, 6-36, 17:1a, 19:1-3).
- (9) Moses ascends Mt. Sinai to meet God (24:15-18a).
- (10) Moses given directions regarding a Sanctuary (25:1-31:17); also the two tables of the testimony (31:18a).

- (11) Moses descends the Mount with the tables (34 29-30) and proceeds to the construction of the Sanctuary (chs. 35-39).
(12) The Sanctuary completed and set up on the first day of the second year (ch. 40).

In P's narrative special emphasis is laid (a) on the name Jehovah (Jahweh or Yahweh), as unknown to the patriarchs (6 2 f.); (b) on Aaron, as playing an important part in the transactions of the Exodus; (c) on the cultus-significance of the Passover, unleavened bread and firstlings, of the Sabbath, and of the manna; (d) on the Tabernacle, as the main subject of the revelation to Moses on the Mount; (e) on the miraculous character of the whole series of events.

5. The Narratives of J and E. The narratives of J and E are woven together quite closely in Exodus and in many places a sure analysis is very difficult, if not impossible. The following table presents in the main the consensus of critical studies, but in many cases the results are tentative rather than certain. In one or two instances the writer has ventured to set down his own independent judgment.

- | J.  | E.   |
|---|--|
| 1 6 Death of Joseph.  | 1 15-20a, 21 Command to the midwives to slay the male children.  |
| 1 6-19, 14a, 20b, 22 Oppression of Israel.  | 2 1-10 Moses, his birth and preservation.  |
| 2 11-14 Moses kills an Egyptian.  | 3 1-3 Theophany at the bush (also in J).   |
| 2 15-22 M. flees to Midian and marries the daughter of a priest-chief.                                  | 3 4b, 6, 9b-15, 10-22 God commissions M. and reveals Himself as Jehovah.   |
| 2 23a The death of the king of Egypt.   | 4 17 f. M. given a rod. Says farewell to Jethro.   |
| 3 1-3 Theophany at the bush (also in E).  | 4 20b-23 M. takes the rod of God and returns to Egypt (vs. 21-23 out of place? Perhaps originally in J at 10 24-29?) |
| 3 4a, 6, 7-9a, 10-18 Jehovah commissions M. to deliver Israel.  | 5 1-2, 4 M. demands the release of Israel. Pharaoh refuses.  |
| 4 1-16 The objections of M. are overcome. Aaron appointed his spokesman. (vs. 13-16 a later insertion?) | 7 15, 17b, 20b, 23 The river turned to blood.  |
| 4 19-20a M. commanded to return to Egypt.   | 9 22-23a, 24a, 25a, 31 f., 35 Hail, thunder, and fire.   |
| 4 24-26 An incident on the way.   | 10 12, 13a, 14a, 15b, 20 Locusts.  |
| 4 27 f. A. meets M. [E?]  | 10 21-23, 27 Darkness.   |
| 4 29-31 M. and A. do the wonders and are accepted as leaders.   | 11 1-3 M. informed of the final visitation on Egypt.   |
| 5 3, 4, 6 The demand made on Pharaoh refused and the bondage made worse.                                | 12 35-38 Israel asks and receives presents from the Egyptians.   |
| 7 14, 16, 17a, 18, 21a, 24, 25 The river made foul.   | 13 17-19 The route. Joseph's bones taken.  |
| 8 1-4, 8-16a Frogs.   |  |
| 8 20-31 Flies.  |  |
| 9 1-7 Murrain on cattle.  |  |
| 9 13-21, 23b, 24b, 25b-30, 33 f. Hail.  |  |
| 10 1-11, 13b, 14b, 15a, 19 Locusts.   |  |
| 10 24-26, 11 4-6, 10 28 f. Final interview of M. with Pharaoh.  |  |
| 12 21-23, 25-27 The command to slay the Passover.   |  |
| 12 29-34 The death of the first-born of Egypt. Hasty departure of Israel.                               |  |
| 12 37-39 The route. Unleavened bread made.  |  |
| 13 3-10 Law of unleavened bread.  |  |

- | J.  | E.   |

| 13 11-16 Law of firstborn and firstlings.   | 14 7, 9a, 10b, 15a, 16a, 20a, 24b, 31 The passage of the Red Sea. (The angel of God overthrows the Egyptians.)                     |
| 13 21 f. The pillar of cloud and fire.  | 15 1-21 The Song of Triumph. 15 26b-28, 16 4 [and other verses?] Fragments of E's manna story.                                     |
| 14 5 f., 10a, 11-14, 19b, 20b, 21b, 24a, 25, 27b, 28b, 30 The passage of the Red Sea. (The sea driven back by wind. Cf. the account in P.)  | 17 1b-7 Water at Meribah (cf. Nu 11 4 ff.). Partly J.  |
| 15 22-25a, 27 Marah and Elim.   | 17 8-16 War with Amalek.   |
| 17 1b-7 Water at Massah (cf. Nu 11 4 ff.). Partly E.  | 18 1-11 M. visited by Jethro.  |
| [18 1-11 Visit of M.'s father-in-law.]  | 18 12-27 Appointment of assistant judges (cf. Dt 19 13).   |
| 19 2-9 (JE) 12-13a, 20-21a The great theophany on Mt. Sinai. J' speaks. M. alone near J'.   | 19 8-9 (JE) 10-11, 15b-19 The great theophany. M. leads the people out to meet God, God speaks.                                    |
| [Possibly a version of the Decalog stood here in J. Also the Covenant terms now found in 34 10-27 may have stood here originally in J's account. If so, 19 21b-23 are due to the compiler, who also transferred J's covenant terms from here to their present place in ch. 34; if so, then 34 2-3 would belong here as introducing 34 10-27.] | 20 1-17 The Ten Commandments spoken by God.  |
| 19 24-25, 24 1-2, 9-11 Ratifications of the Covenant by M. and A. and elders of Israel at a covenant-meal with God on the Mount.  | 20 18-21 The people are afraid and ask M. to go and receive the rest of God's message.   |
| 32 7-14 [based on J] J' tells M. that the people have apostatized ( mutinied in J originally?) and declares that He will destroy them. M. intercedes.  | 20 2-22 Religious laws.  |
| 32 25-29 M. comes to the camp. Calls for loyal volunteers. Levites respond and are rewarded with the priesthood.  | 21 1-23 A code of 'judgments.'   |
| 33 1, 3, 5bd J' promises to send His angel to guide them.   | 23 10-19 Religious laws.   |
| 33 12-17 M. pleads for J's own presence to go with them.  | 23 20-38 Promises and warnings.  |
| 33 18-23 M. now pleads for a fuller revelation to himself.  | 24 3-8 Ratification of the Covenant by the people at a sacrifice.  |
| 34 1-9 The great revelation in the name of J' and the reconciliation of J' to His people. See opposite column.  | 24 12-14, 15b M. with Joshua goes up again to the Mount to receive the tables. Stays 40 days and nights.                           |
| For vs. 2-3 and 10-28 see above.  | 31 18a M. receives the tables.   |
|   | 32 1-6 The people make a calf and worship it.  |
|   | 32 1-62a M. with Joshua, on the way down hears the singing, etc., is very angry, breaks the tables, and grinds the calf to powder. |
|   | 32 30-35 On the morrow M. pleads with J' to forgive the sin.   |
|   | 33 2 J' promises to send His angel.  |
|   | 33 6ac, 8-11 The people told to take off their ornaments. The tent with Joshua as its minister.                                    |

6. Differences Between E and J. The main differences (in Exodus) between these two ancient histories relate to these points: (1) In J the name Jehovah is used without explanation (continuing the use in J in Genesis), emphasis being laid on J's action rather than on the significance of the name, which, however, is interpreted later in the wonderful passage 34 5-9. In E the name is revealed to Moses and its significance indicated at the bush. (ch. 3). (2) In J Aaron plays an important part as Moses' spokesman to Israel (cf. P). In E Aaron is not given any special prominence, and on one occasion is severely rebuked (32 21). (3) In J the Israelites are conceived of as dwelling mainly in Goshen. In E they seem to be living in the midst of the Egyptians. (4) In J the plagues and wonders are wrought by J' either immediately or by the use of nature forces (such as the wind). In E Moses' rod plays an important part in these matters (cf. P). (5) In J, at the great theophany on Mount Sinai, Moses alone draws near to J' to hear His words and later the Covenant is ratified on the Mount by a few chosen individuals representing the people. In E both Moses and the people draw near the Mount to meet God and only later is Moses asked by the people (who are afraid) to go and receive the message alone. The Covenant in E is ratified by the people as a whole after its terms were written in a book. (6) In J the apostasy is more like a mutiny, to be put down in blood, and the loyal Levites receive the priesthood as their reward. Moses is forewarned of the trouble before he descends, and acts at once as soon as he reaches the gate of the camp. In E the trouble is idolatry and Moses is ignorant of it until he draws near the camp. (7) In J the promise of an angel to guide them does not satisfy Moses, who wants the presence of J' Himself. In E the angel is considered the same as J' Himself.

7. Changes in the Order of Events. The editor who combined J with E, or some later editor, often thought it necessary to alter the order of the original documents, so that the combined narrative might read satisfactorily. Minor instances of this are 4 19, which seems out of place; 4 22 f., which seems to belong with 10 26-11 8; 17 2-7, which in part, may have been transferred from Nu 11 4 f.; 18 1-11, which, in part, may have belonged to an account of a visit of Hobab, presupposed in Nu 10 29 f.; and possibly 18 12-27, which in Dt 1 9-18 comes after the giving of the law. But the most important transposition affected J's account of the Covenant. It is evident that at 19 21a there is a break (for vs. 21b-23 are in the main only an editor's repetition of vs. 12-13) and the continuation is not apparent in the immediate context. What did J' speak to Moses when he went up to Him to the top of the Mount? According to E, God spoke the Ten Commandments and also certain fundamental principles as the basis of a covenant (20 1-17, 22-26, 23 10-33). Now, it is remarkable that in J (in 34 10-27) exactly the same ground is covered, and partly in the same words, as in E in 20 22-26, 23 10-33. But in the present arrangement this material is placed after the apostasy while in E is comes before it. It is likely, therefore, that in J after 19 21a there followed something similar (10 'words,' possibly, and especially certain covenant terms) to what we have in E; i.e., the editor simply used E here and transposed the material in J to a later place. If this reconstruction of J is correct, it furnishes an additional proof of the fundamental unity of Israel's tradition of the Mosaic Age.

8. Comparison of J and E with P. As compared with P the narratives of J and E are marked by a closer touch with the real progress and development of events. In P the interest centers mainly about the cultus, as the most important aspect of Israel's life. Consequently, the emphasis is placed on Aaron, the Passover ritual, the Sabbath in connection with the manna, and, above all, upon the Tabernacle, as the main thing revealed to Moses at Sinai. In both J and E there is a recognition of the cultus elements of Israel's ancient religion, but all is of a more simple, undeveloped character. It is also likely that in the original form of J or E more was said about the Ark, the Tent of Meeting, and the Levitical priesthood than now appears. The final editor preferred P's account of these things and left only mere fragments of the older accounts. But in both J and E the emphasis was placed on the spiritual and moral aspects of the Covenant rather than on the merely formal.

9. The Importance of Exodus. The history contained in Exodus is of the highest importance. In J and E we have the oldest and fullest accounts of the Mosaic constitution we possess. Altho these differ in details, they are fundamentally at one in representing this as due to a great spiritual awakening in the soul of one man, who had a vision of God and who was enabled to translate that vision into terms of actual life; who gave the tribes of Israel a principle of unity of unique and far-reaching significance; who brought about the existence of a religion of moral and spiritual import and tendency among men. It is in the basis of fact in the Exodus narrative that we find the explanation of Israel and of Israel's subsequent history. Criticism, by analyzing this narrative into its component parts, has only enabled us to get closer to the facts, firmly recorded in Israel's national traditions, which lay at the basis of the account.

EYE: The eye is regarded in the Bible from the point of view of its importance as the chief organ of perception. It is of priceless value (Ps 17 8); but it is the avenue through which allurements reach the soul and sensation is born (Ezk 6 9; I Jn 2 16; II P 2 14). Hence, too, it often denotes the whole man. It is the eye that spares or withholds pity (Is 13 18; Ezk 16 5); mocks (Pr 30 17); is satisfied or not (Pr 27 20). It is the light of the body (Mt 6 22). The expression 'evil eye' is used in a superstitious sense in the modern Orient; but it is questionable whether it is so to be taken in Pr 23 6 or Mt 20 15. A. C. Z.

EYE-PAINT: It was, and still is, the custom of Oriental women to stain their eyebrows and eyelashes with a dark paint (pūkh, II K 9 30; Jer 4 30; kāhal, Ezk 23 40) usually composed of oil mixed with powder of antimony, which was thought to add to their luster and beauty, especially by making them appear larger. The ointment was kept in small horn-like vases (cf. 'Keren-happuch,' 'horn (i.e., 'flask') of eyepaint,' the name of one of Job's daughters, Job 42 14). E. E. N.

EZBAI, ez'bai (עֲבַי, 'ezbay): Father of Naari (I Ch 11 37; cf. II S 23 35).

EZBON, ez'ben (עֲבֹן, 'etsbōn): 1. A 'son' of Gad, ancestor of a Gadite family (Gn 46 16) called Ozni (and the family Oznites in Nu 26 16). 2. The head of a family of the clan of Bela in Benjamin (I Ch 7 7).

EZEKIAS, ez'1-kai'as. See HEZEKIAH.

EZEKIEL, 1-zī'ki-el (עֶזְקִיֵּאל, yehzqē'el), 'God strengthens': Ezekiel, the son of Buzi, known through his prophetic writings as one of the leading Israelites of the early exilic period.

1. Life Before Prophetic Call. Altho there is considerable obscurity as to his birth and early life, the following facts are beyond question: He was of priestly descent, for he calls himself 'the priest.' He belonged to the priestly family of Zadok, serving at Jerusalem, for he limits the priesthood to the sons of Zadok (40 46, 43 19). He was born during the reign of Josiah, but the exact year is left in doubt. If the words, 'in the 30th year,' with which he introduces the record of his work (1 1) refer to his age, the year of his birth was 627 B.C. But this is by no means fixed. He was married, and his wife died at the beginning of the year 587 B.C. It has been conjectured upon the basis of certain affinities of thought that E. was at one time a pupil of Jeremiah's. In the circumstances this is highly probable.

2. Prophetic Ministry. The familiar portion of E.'s life begins with his call to the prophetic work, which took place in the 5th year of King Jehoiachin's captivity, 592 B.C. (1 2). At this time E. was living in one of the Jewish colonies of exiles established at Tel-Abib (probably the Til-abu, 'hill of deluge,' of Assyrian inscriptions), on a canal in Babylon called the Chebar (the Nar-kabari, of Babylonian tablets, probably the present Shatt en-Nil; Peters, Nippur II, pp. 106-192). Here he had a house (8 1, 24 1, 18) and was apparently held in high esteem by his fellow Israelites. Their elders were accustomed to visit him for purposes of consultation (14 1, 20 1). He frequently uttered public prophetic discourses which were listened to by large and eager crowds (33 30-32). The Babylonian authorities were evidently not very rigid in their treatment of the exiles; for both prophet and people enjoyed a reasonable measure of freedom. How long the ministry of E. lasted is not known. It could not, however, have been less than 22 years. The latest date he mentions is the 27th year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, 570 B.C. (29 17). A late unverifiable tradition has it that he was put to death by a Jewish prince whom he reproved for idolatry.

3. The Book in General. The Book of E. is from the literary and critical view-point in a fair state of preservation. The text is, indeed, full of corruptions; but its general smoothness and intelligibility are not seriously impaired, except in a few and unimportant places. The prophet's dominant idea is that the hope of Israel for the future rests with the exiles. The religious life of Jerusalem after the deportation under Jehoiachin seems to have been reduced to a very low state. From this E. looked for a restoration, first through a speedy return of the captives, and afterwards through a reorganization of Israel upon an ideal basis (chs. 40-48). The book may be divided into four parts. I. Chs. 1-24. II. Chs. 25-32. III. Chs. 33-39. IV. Chs. 40-48.

4. Prophecies Against Judah. Prophecies delivered before the siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (chs. 1-24). The portraiture of the inaugural vision, with which the whole book opens is more than usually elaborate and also highly symbolical (1 4-28, repeated in 3 23, 8 4, 10 20). Upon the whole, it gives the impression of an apocalyptic rather than an ecstatic experience. Its symbolism is designed to present God in all His power. The flashing fires evidently stand for the forces of nature, while the rainbow represents the hope of help, and the living creatures, various forms of life, all of which are God's creatures and ministers. The wings and wheels signify omnipresence and the many eyes omniscience. The blaze of light in which the whole is framed is the glory of God. (See also GLORY, § 3). Like the visions of Moses and Isaiah, it is intended to assure the prophet that his ministry is to have the approval and support of J'. The elaborateness of the vision furnished the rabbinical interpreters a favorite subject for speculation, and was put on a par with the story of the Creation, both serving as bases for cabalistic and theosophical mythologizing (Zunz, Die Gottes-Dienstl. Vortr. d. Juden, p. 162). The remainder of this portion of the book foreshadows impending ruin over Judah and Jerusalem, and justifies this by the exposure of the idolatry and sin of the people (chs. 2-24). Whence E. derived the imagery of his visions is a secondary question; and yet it is not difficult to see that both in the Cherubim of the Temple and in the winged bulls of Babylonia he had the materials for the construction of the symbolical chariot of ch. 1.

5. Prophecies Against Heathen Nations. Chs. 25-32. As the prediction of disasters to God's people might be construed as a vindication of the heathen, these are next shown to be under condemnation for their transgressions. Taken in their order, the prophecies against foreign nations are those against: (1) Ammon (25 1-7); (2) Moab (25 8-11); (3) Edom (25 12-14); (4) the Philistines (25 15-17); Tyre (26 1-28 19); (6) Sidon (28 20-26); and (7) Egypt (chs. 29-32). The prophecy against Egypt includes six separate discourses and a funeral dirge, making the sacred number 7.

6. Prophecies of Restoration. Chs. 33-39. Here

the prophet rises out of the contemplation of distress and ruin to a vision of a glorious future. But he first vindicates and characterizes the office of the prophet so clearly brought into view in the fulfillment of the foreshadowing of doom for Jerusalem (ch. 33). He then points to the devastation of the flock of Israel because of false shepherds, and predicts the coming of the good shepherd whom he calls David (cf. ch. 34). He foretells doom for Edom (ch. 35) and blessing and renewal for Israel, both plainly (ch. 36) and in the symbolic vision of the Valley of Dry Bones (ch. 37) and closes with a denunciation of the enemies of God under the names of Gog and Magog (chs. 38-39).

7. Vision of Ideal Israel. The ideally restored Israel (chs. 40-48). This opens with a vision of the ideal temple (chs. 40-43), which is followed by the vision of an ideal priesthood and sacrifice (chs. 44-46), and an ideal legislation for the land (chs. 47, 48). To this, however, is prefixed a vision of the river of life (48 1-12). In this section E. propounds the doctrine of the separateness of the civil from the ecclesiastical power or, at any rate, the independence of the latter, and also gives to his ritual code distinctive features, which place it between Deuteronomy and the Holiness Code (Lv chs. 17-26).

8. Style. The style of E. is marked by love of elaboration. He makes frequent use of vivid imagery and is fond of pursuing a thought to its detailed application. His diction, however, is never obscure, altho it lacks the spontaneity of the earlier prophets, and is more like the style of the literary man than that of the fervent orator, and yet there is neither the coldness of the mere thinker's method of expression nor the prosaic formality of the professional writer, but rather the fervor and poetic glow of an aggressive, earnest soul.

9. Significance and Permanent Value. Ezekiel's distinctive contribution to the growth of Israel's thought is in no respect less than that of his great predecessors. The conditions under which he labored did not call for a creative spirit like that of Isaiah. Nor did they call for the voice of vehement protest uttered by Jeremiah. They required the conservation of the inner values already in possession and the reconstruction of the Chosen People into a new community. And E. was the prophet who in this period of transition helped more than any other to guide Israel. He has been called an 'epoch maker,' 'the father of Judaism,' and 'the prophet of reconstruction.' He deserves all these characterizations because he brought into the foreground the love of God, the necessity of holiness, and the preeminence of the spiritual over the political aspect of communal life for the people of God. EZEL, i'zel (עֶזֶל, hā'āzel): The name of a stone according to the ordinary text in I S 20 19. The name is unintelligible. The LXX. reads here and in ver. 41 'this Ergab,' and as Ergab (or Argob) may mean 'cairn' or 'heap of earth,' this reading is accepted by many scholars, altho not entirely free from difficulty. E. E. N.

EZEM, i'zem (עֶזֶם, 'etsem, Azem AV): A town in Simeon (Jos 19 3; I Ch 4 29), assigned to Judah in Jos 15 29. Site unknown.

EZER, i'zer (עֶזֶר, 'ēlser): A son of Seir (Gn 36 21 ff.; I Ch 1 38 ff., Ezar AV).

EZER, i'zer, (עֶזֶר, 'ēzer), 'help': 1. An Ephraimite (I Ch 7 21). 2. A Judahite, the father of Hushah (I Ch 4 4). 3. A Gadite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 9). 4. A son of Jeshua, and one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 19). 5. A musician who assisted at the ceremony of dedicating the wall of Jerusalem. (Neh 12 42)

EZION-GEHER, i'zi-on-gi'bar (עִזְיוֹן גִּבְעֵה, 'etsyōn gebher, E-gaber AV): A station of the wilderness journey mentioned before Kadesh (Nu 33 35 f.), but reached after Kadesh (Dt 2 8). It was in the Arabah, near Elath (Eloth), the port of Edom, at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, where Solomon and Jehoshaphat built ships for the gold trade with Ophir (I K 9 26, 22 48; II Ch 8 17, 20 36). EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, I. THE POSTEXILIC PERIOD.—1. The Historical Events of the Period. The Babylonian exile marks a new era in the life of the Jews. We have no exact statistics as to the number of the people, but we know that a great many of the best of them were taken to Babylon and that, of the miserable remnant left in Judea, a number fled to Egypt. Henceforward, until the wider dispersion of later times, the Jews were increasingly active in these three regions. At the beginning of the Persian period (538 B.C.) the Jews were free to return to their own land, and the tradition is that there was an important exodus of Babylonian exiles in the reign of Cyrus (538-529 B.C.). In 520 B.C. we find Haggai and Zechariah preaching in Jerusalem, encouraging the people to build the Temple, which is supposed to have been completed some fifteen years later. The Persian rule lasted until 332 B.C., when it was overthrown by Alexander the Great. During the two centuries of Persian domination the Jewish community with its center at Jerusalem, in spite of varied hindrances, gained new life. The Jewish Church was founded, the Law codified, the Temple-worship more fully organized, and the work of collecting and arranging the sacred books well begun. According to the chronology accepted until recent times, under the long reign of Artaxerxes I (Longimanus, 465-424 B.C.), the two important events with which we are concerned took place: viz., the mission of Ezra and 'second return of the Jews' (458 B.C.), and Nehemiah's two visits to Jerusalem (445 and 432 B.C.). The book Ezra-Nehemiah begins with the story of the first return (c. 536 B.C.) and closes with Nehemiah's account of the work that he had attempted to do.

2. The Problems of the Period. In a small but careful commentary which shows an independent spirit and discriminating criticism, we read these words: 'During the last half century more discussions have arisen and more books have been written about Ezra and Nehemiah than about any other equal portion of the Old Testament, and we seem as far as ever from finality in the matter. To these discussions British scholars have contributed but little, altho the writings of Sayce, Ryle, Sir Henry Howorth and Cheyne bearing on the subject are worthy of praise. America is represented by the radical and destructive criticism of Torrey, who has found followers in his fellow-countrymen H. P. Smith, C. F. Kent, and perhaps L. W. Batten. The books and articles by Dutch (Kuenen Kusters, etc.), French (van Hoonacker), and especially by German (Bertheau-Ryssel, Sellin, etc) scholars are legion.' (The New Cent. B.) From L. W. Batten's elaborate commentary (ICC) it appears that, after years of careful study of the text, altho he believes that the work of Ezra followed that of Nehemiah, he does not accept fully Torrey's radical criticism. 'Torrey's arguments have failed to convince those who have been diligent students of the story of Ezra, and with all regard to his undoubted scholarship and industry, I find myself among the number of those who must still take the Ezra story seriously.' (p. 18).

At the beginning of the Persian period we find in Babylon a considerable number of active, intelligent, patriotic Jews, others are in the homeland, and also refugees have found shelter in Egypt. There is no temple in Jerusalem, no walls around the city, very little commercial activity and ecclesiastical organization. Two hundred and fifty years later the Jewish communities in all these three centers have become more prosperous and vigorous. The Temple of Jerusalem is restored, the city fortified, the Jewish Church placed on a secure foundation. There are priests who minister in the temple and scribes who study and teach the Law. In the criticism of the records that grew out of this movement there is danger of losing the feeling for the facts that really lie behind the stories and are of great significance in the history of the world. The discussions turn largely round the following points.

3. The Return from Babylon (Ezr chs. 1 and 7). The attempts to deny any real return and to show that Judaism grew up again on its native soil has done good in provoking discussion and leading to a re-examination of all the traditions and stimulating research for all available information. But it has not been able to destroy the living connection between Judah and Babylon. If the statistical and genealogical information offered can not claim scientific accuracy still it is the Oriental way of expressing real facts, and even the exaggerations express the feeling that there is something of great significance. 'From the land of exile must come those who would arouse the sluggish spirits of the native Judeans, Sheshbazzar, Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, Nehemiah and Ezra, and probably Haggai and Zechariah, were the products of Jewish blood and Babylonian enterprise, and their presence in Jerusalem counted for more than 40,000 ordinary men, who may, indeed, have returned from exile, but in the course of the two centuries of Persian rule, not in one great company' (Batten, p. 37).

4. The Relation of the Work of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr chs. 7-10; Neh. chs. 2 ff., 13). The older view, before the records had passed through such severe criticism, was that Ezra came first (458 B.C., ch. 7 ff.) and sought to carry out a religious reform; he was distressed at the ignorance of the law that he found and the laxity of life especially as to mixed marriages. (The account of this work closes abruptly in Ezr 10 44 and is resumed in Neh 7 73-10.) Then from various causes, which can only be conjectured, the city fell into distress, and the walls were destroyed. It was then that Nehemiah came as governor, restored the walls and brought back the city to a state of comparative peace and prosperity. Ezra, who has no official position, takes part in religious reform, but not until twelve years later was he able to instruct the people in the requirements of the law. A slightly different view was that he had to leave the city before his work was complete. There was a reaction and the work had to be done over again by Nehemiah, Ezra returning to take part in the Dedication of the walls, etc. It is evident that the uncertainty results from the scantiness of the records and from the imperfect, and in some cases, contradictory chronology. Naturally, here, as elsewhere in the Old Testament documents, when modern criticism in its most drastic forms was first applied, it tended to be extremely negative and later a more reasonable criticism began to prevail. Even if old traditions can not be literally defended painful research may find in them much that is of value. We must concede that without Nehemiah's strong, courageous action the religious reforms could not have gained a firm foundation in the life of the community. The final conclusion may be that the scribe and the statesman both played their part.

5. The Samaritan Separation. One important thing that happened in this period, and as a result to some extent of the work of Ezra and Nehemiah, was the institution of a separate religious community in Samaria and the building of a temple on Mt. Gerizim. In NT times we find the Jews and Samaritans bitterly opposed to each other and controversies as to the merits of rival mountains (Jn ch. 4). In Ezr 4 1-3 we read that 'the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin' who were evidently inhabitants of the district known as Samaria wished to assist in the building of the Temple at Jerusalem, but they were rejected by 'the children of the captivity' and told that they could have no part in this work (cf. 3 3, 4 4). It is questioned whether the hostility of the Samaritans was shown in any marked degree in the earliest days of the return when the Jewish effort was devoted to the building of the Temple. But there is clear evidence that the hostility of the Samaritans increased during the reign of Artaxerxes (465-425 B.C.), and that it was at first political in its nature; they feared that the building of the walls would give security and dominance to Jerusalem (Ezr 4 7-24; Neh 2 19-20). They were aided by disaffection in the city (Neh 6 17, 13 28); at first they succeeded but later the influence of Nehemiah with his pure patriotism and strong will was too much for them. It became clear to the Jews that political strength and religious purity must go together; as the growing influence of the Law welded together the members of the Jewish Church the separation from the Samaritan sect was the inevitable result. The temple on Mt. Gerizim, according to Josephus, was built in the time of Alexander the Great, but it is probable that this is a century too late, and that 432 B.C., in connection with the events recorded in Neh 13 28, is the correct date. It is thought that the Jews took their revenge and destroyed this temple in the time of the Maccabean ascendancy.

II. THE HISTORICAL LITERATURE.

If the views of modern scholars are accepted, this period can not said to be barren in literary enterprise. There is still power to write the beautiful stories, as may be seen from Jonah and possibly Ruth, poetry reaches some of its noblest flights in Job, powerful sermons (Is chs. 56 ff.) and apocalyptic visions (Is chs. 24-27) were not lacking, but the historical literature can not compare with the productions of the preexilic age.

6. I and II Chronicles. The Books of Chronicles are a historical sketch from Adam to the Babylonian Exile. The first chapters consist of long lists of names, and when the author begins actual history, he makes free use of the earlier books, and while possibly using sources that have been lost he presents the material according to the ideas of his own time, when the Priestly Code was beginning to dominate the situation. It was history with a purpose, the purpose being to teach the supreme importance of the Temple worship. There has been much discussion concerning the closing paragraph of this book (II Ch 36 22-23; Ezr 1 1-3; I Esd 1 1-5a). 'They are not the proper close of a history, but the introduction; hence their true place is in Ezra, I and II Chronicles originally formed with Ezra one work, and in the separation this paragraph was allowed to remain either by chance, or as an evidence that the two writings were originally one, or, with less probability, it may have been appended to II Chronicles to give a more hopeful close to the book (even as II Kings closes with the notice of the release of Jehoiachim).' (Curtiss, in ICC., Chronicles). It is very generally accepted that these books which appear as three in the English Bible, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, formed one large work, altho we have no evidence of their existence as one book. Their compilation must have been a complicated process. There is, however, sufficient evidence that Ezra-Nehemiah was in ancient times treated as one book. This book has many affinities with Chronicles, but students should consider carefully the differences which are sometimes ignored. (See Davies in New Cent. Bible.)

7. The Ezra Literature. Students beginning to study these books are in danger of being confused by the varying notation. In addition to the later legends that gathered round the name of the great scribe, there are two books outside the Canon that have borne his name. Now we usually refer to the four books as Ezra, Nehemiah, I Esdras (the Latin form of the name), and II Esdras, but sometimes the last two are cited as III and IV Esdras. To understand this we must remember that formerly our two books were classed as Ezra (Esdras) I and II, just as Chronicles was divided into I and II, and afterwards the name Nehemiah was applied to Ezra II. Thus the series ran, using the names with which we are most familiar, Ezra I, Ezra II (Nehemiah), Ezra III (Esdras I), Ezra IV (Esdras II). The detailed history of the MSS. is more complicated, but this simple arrangement will suit our present purpose. I Esdras, the third of the above series, 'The Greek Ezra,' is really another version of Ezra-Nehemiah with additions from Chronicles and other sources (See ESDRAS, BOOKS OF). Esdras II (or Ezra IV) is an apocalyptic book, probably composite, not earlier than 100 A.D.

8. Ezra-Nehemiah (formerly Ezra I and II). The following analysis is given for the purpose of indicating the evidences of compilation and the problems that emerge; the discussion of such problems, many of them insoluble, can not be attempted in a brief statement.

The First Part of the Book.

Ezr 1 1-5 (I Es 2 1-5, the decree of Cyrus giving to Jews in Babylon permission to return to Jerusalem. Ezr 1 6-11 (I Es 2 6-15), the gifts for the temple. Sheshbazzar (vs. 8, 11) is probably an earlier governor and not to be identified with Zerubbabel. Ezr 2 1-70 = Neh 7 7 ff. (I Es 5 7 ff.), list of those who returned in 538 B.C. The number of people, when the classes are added, varies in these three lists, but that is often the case in ancient documents. Ezr ch. 3 (I Es 5 47 ff.), the religious life of the nation resumed; the altar built and the foundation of the temple laid. Ezr 4 1-5 (I Es 5 66-73), the Samaritans' offer of assistance in the building of the Temple is refused (see above).

Ezr 4 6-23 (I Es 2 15-25), story of the opposition to the building of the city walls. This section is in Aramaic, and may have been extracted from records in that language. It is out of its proper place as it deals with the building of the walls. A better position would be between Ezr ch. 10 and Neh ch. 1 (Batten treats it in that place). It may refer to the period just before or at the beginning of Nehemiah's governorship. Ezr. 4 24-6 22 (I Es 2 30b, and chs. 6 and 7). This section also (to 6 18) is in the Aramaic dialect. It continues the history, interrupted by 4 6-23, and shows how the rebuilding of the Temple proceeded with the help of the King of Persia.

The Second Part of the Book.

Ezra's arrival at Jerusalem and his work there; based upon Ezra's own memoirs in chs. 7-10. Some place this section after Neh 13, and then cause it to be followed by Neh chs. 8, 9, and 10. Between Ezra chs. 6 and 7 there is a gap of about 60 years for which we have no Biblical records. There may have been such that have been lost, but certainly hard work must have gone on which manifested its results later in the life of the Jewish Church. Ezr 7 12-28 is in the Aramaic dialect. Ezr 7 1-10 (I Es 8 1-7), introduction to the decree of Artaxerxes. Ezr 7 11-26 (I Es 8 8-24), the decree. Ezr 8 1-14 (I Es 8 28-40), list of those who returned with Ezra. Ezr 8 15-36 (I Es 8 41-67), the assembling of the party at the River Ahava, the journey and the arrival at Jerusalem. Ezr ch. 9 (I Es 8 68-90), Ezra's vexation at the mixed marriages and his attempts to put an end to the same. Ezr ch. 10 (I Es 8 91-9 36), the repentance of the people and judgment upon the offenders, closing with the list of those who had married 'strange women.'

Neh 7 73b-10 39 (I Es 9 37-55), the religious Reform of Ezra continuing the history of Ezr ch. 10, and based upon Ezra's memoirs. Neh 11-7 5, in the main Nehemiah's own vivid picturesque description of his first journey from Persia to Jerusalem. Neh 7 6-73a, list of Jews who returned from Babylon, based on Ezr ch. 2. Neh 11 1-12 26, list of laymen, priests, Levites, etc. Neh 12 27-47, dedication of the walls, and organization of the Levites. Neh 13 1-3, attempt to separate from Israel 'the mixed multitude.' Neh 13 4-29, Nehemiah's second administration, expulsion of Tobiah, care for the sanctity of the Temple, the support of the Levites, observance of the Sabbath and energetic protest against mixed marriages. Neh 13 30-31, his brief summary of the work he had attempted to accomplish.

9. The Question of Historicity. This can not be discussed in any detail. The amount of learning, skill and ingenuity that had been expended upon it during the past generation is enormous. It is one of the most difficult regions of Hebrew history. A brief statement of the contents of the books shows that they bristle with intricate problems, historical, literary, and textual. We can simply record our conviction that a review of the recent work of modern scholars leaves the impression that, while the traditional interpretation can not be completely maintained, the extreme radical criticism has had to be modified. Oriental views of history and their methods of treating it were different from our own, their sources were scanty, it did not appeal to them as their duty to check carefully their own sympathies. The Chronicler and the men of his time are clear examples of the fact that the mission of the historian was to use his material to teach his own creed and glorify the religious institutions of his own age. If there are gaps in the history, difficulties, even contradictions, in the chronology, exaggeration in the numbers, we must nevertheless be thankful that 'the Chronicler' and others have given us a picture of the struggle by which Jerusalem was restored and Judaism established, tho it is not as clear and harmonious as we would desire. It was through the self-denying efforts of men, to whom patriotism and religion were supreme, that the continuity and purity of the Church was secured. Those who now claim to possess a knowledge of 'historical perspective' should judge soberly the zeal and 'intolerance' of men who were fighting for their lives.

III. THE MEN AND THEIR WORK.

10. Ezra was a type of the scribe, a class of men to whom Judaism owed its very existence, and they, rather than the priests saved the books and the religion in the great crises. Even if he were a creation of the Chronicler, the tendencies that he is supposed to represent are features of the historical movement of the time. But it is probable that we have the memoirs of a real Jewish scholar and teacher of the Law. Passages such as Ezr 3 11-13, 8 21, 22 have both poetic feeling and spiritual power; they show the faith and emotion that are common to all great religious movements.

11. Nehemiah. With regard to Nehemiah there are no such doubts; he speaks for himself, he impresses his personality upon the reader; we might almost say that his words are the beginning of real autobiography. His sorrow for the home land, his night visit to the broken walls, the courage with which he faced the enemy and controlled internal discussions, his refusal to seek safety in the hour of danger, his appeal to God and his proud claim that he has done his duty,—these are bright bits of life and literature, coming as part of a chronicle that often seems dry and formal. Such things the world will not willingly allow to die for only by such faith and courage can great victories be won.

EZRAHITE, ez'ra-hait (עֲזָרָהִי, 'ezrahî): Ethan in I K 4 31 and Herman in the titles to Pss 88 and 89 are called 'Ezrahites.' The word is probably derived from Zerah (cf. I Ch 2 6), meaning 'a descendant of Zerah,' who figured as ancestral head of one of the divisions or clans of Judah. E. E. N.

EZRI, ez'rai (עֲזָרִי, 'ezri), 'my help': One of David's superintendents (I Ch 27 26).

F

FABLE. In the O T there is one conspicuous example of the fable, Jg 9 8-15 but it is not so designated. This one example would indicate however some acquaintance with the fable in ancient Israel. Fables is found in the N T as the rendering of the plural of the Gr. μῦθος 'myth' in I Ti 1 4, 4 7; II Ti 4 4; Ti 1 4; II P 1 16. In all these passages such 'fables' are severely condemned, altho some belief in or regard to them was being urged by propagandists upon the faith and conduct of Christians. The reference may be to Jewish legendary expansion of Biblical material such as we have in abundance in some of the Apocryphal and Apocalyptic literature (e.g., the Book of Jubilees or the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs) and in the later Jewish literature. Or the reference may be to certain types of essentially Gnostic speculations (see GNOSTICISM). Cf. Locke in ICC on The Pastoral Epistles (1924).

FAIR HAVENS: A harbor on the S. coast of the island of Crete, E. of Cape Lithinos, and a few m. W. of Leben, the seaport of Gortyna. The harbor is formed by a bay, open to the E., and sheltered on the SW. by two small islands. During summer this bay gives mariners safe anchorage (Ac 27 8 ff.), and therefore was called Καλὸν Λιμένος, a name which persists in the modern Límenes Kali.

FAIRS: In reality, the commodities ('wares' RV) bartered in the Oriental bazaars and markets (Ezk 27 12-27 AV). See in general TRADE AND COMMERCE.

FAITH. This word must be studied in connection with its great allies, 'belief' ('believe'), and 'trust.' All three are used in Scripture to describe a fundamental act or attitude of personal beings toward one another, without which fellowship, either within human relations or between the human and the Divine, would be impossible.

1. In the O T. Altho the true nature of faith is first fully discovered in the N T, we find that in the O T the complete fact is prepared for through important stages of experience. It is not a doctrine of faith that we encounter, but examples of it. The three principal Heb. verbs āman, (hiph'āl) 'to believe', bāṭah, 'to trust', and hāsāh, 'to take refuge', occur oftener than the corresponding nouns. (1) It may be said, as we look back from our Christian vantage-ground, that faith as a conscious religious act was born when the Israelite first began to discover his relations with a personal and moral being, as his God. Apart from the great passage in Gn 15 6, none of these words occurs in any really significant way until we reach the story of Moses and the Exodus. But as soon as the prophet appears to speak for the invisible and living God, the subject of belief or trust appears. At first the question is whether the hearers will believe the prophet (Ex 4 1-9, 31, 19 9; cf. Is 53 1; II Ch 20 20). But then to believe the word of the prophet is to believe J', who speaks through him; and that deeper act becomes a believing in Him (Ex 14 31; Dt 1 32; II K 17 14). (2) Thus we pass on to the still deeper fact that God becomes the constant object of the people's trust, especially in the face of public danger. Then they are said to 'take refuge' in Him (hāsāh, II S 22 3, 31; cf. Dt 32 37; Jg 9 15). (3) It is in the devotional literature, however, and in the great prophets that this act of direct trust in God is most often expressed, and it is there that the ground of that act is found in the faithfulness of God. The three words occur abundantly in the Psalms (27 13, 40 3, 4, 78 22, 89 24, 119 90; 22 4, 25 2, 37 3, 5, 52 8, 84 12; 2 12, 34 8, 40 4, 71 1, 141 8), and there they often utter the sense of absolute dependence and joyous confidence in God. We meet them less often in the prophets; but in Jer and Is the circumstances called for a new emphasis on the character as well as on the power of J'; and that evoked the demand for the act of faith. When Judah's earthly resources seemed shrunken before the might of a great empire, the question of trust in the Divine Deliverer became supreme (Is 7 9, 28 16, 12 2, 26 1-7, 36 15 [II K 18 30]; Jer 7 1-15 [folly of misplaced trust], 17 5-7, 39 18). In the O T, then, this act of faith has not yet become a direct object of thought (cf. Is 28 16; Hab 2 4). Its vast spiritual significance could appear only when the revelation of the Divine grace on which it is directed had itself been consummated in a spiritual manner.

2. In the Synoptic Teaching of Jesus. When we open the N T we find ourselves in a world where faith has become king among all human acts and experiences. Like other great words—Spirit, grace, love, righteousness, life, etc.—this word 'faith' becomes illumined and expanded beyond all its past uses and meanings. The process begins with Christ Himself in His explicit teaching, and His practical demands. (1) He, first of all teachers, made men think directly of faith, as an act of supreme power. Thus He connects His own works of healing on several occasions with the faith of the patient (Mt 8 13, 9 2, 22, 29; Mk 5 36, 9 23, 24; Lk 17 19). He avows that He has been seeking faith 'in Israel' (Mt 8 10; Mk 9 19). The extraordinary power of faith is set forth in one saying or set of sayings which appears in different connections and forms, as if the idea were central in His mind and found various outlets (Mt 17 20; Lk 17 5, 6; Mt 21 21; Mk 11 22-24). He rebukes His disciples for lack of faith (Mt 14 27, 31; Mk 4 40, 8 17-21). (2) The demand of Jesus for faith underlies His whole teaching concerning God and concerning His own relation to the kingdom of God. For the injunction that we must approach God as Father (Mt 6 4, 6-15; Mk 11 22-25), that we must repent and seek forgiveness (Mk 1 15, 11 23-25; Lk 7 47-50, 8 12-15, 15 17-19), as the primary condition of right relation with Him, that we must meet all ills and the chances of life as His children (Mt 6 25-32), makes the act of trust the supreme thing. The whole work of Jesus with His disciples, as even the passages above referred to indicate, aimed at creating in them a profound and complete trust in Himself, the Messiah, the head of the kingdom of God and Savior of men. The faith which won healing was first of all faith in His own power and grace (Mk 5 36, 9 22-24).

3. In the Fourth Gospel. It is one of the most remarkable facts of the Fourth Gospel that the verb πιστεύειν occurs in it not less than 95 times, while the noun πίστις does not occur even once. Moreover, in I Jn the noun is used only once, in the great saying of 5 4, while the verb occurs nine times. The act of faith is represented in this Gospel as occupying a very prominent place in the discussions of Jesus. It is viewed as the characteristic of the new way and is spoken of absolutely (1 7, 4 48, 53, 6 47, 64, 11 15, 14 29, 20 8). Of course in most cases an object is named, but this freely and variously. Thus, it is God as the Sender of the Christ (5 24, 12 44; cf. 14 1, 10, 11, 17 8), i.e., the faith in Christ carries with it and in it faith in God. They are inseparable objects of one act and not objects of two acts in different directions. But, again, Christ Himself is usually described as the object of faith. It may be His name (1 12, 2 23), or His spoken word (2 22, 3 12, 4 21, 50, 5 47, 8 45), or His works (10 38), or the fact that He is the Christ (11 27, 6 69, 8 24, 13 19, 20 31), the one 'sent' of God (5 38, 11 42, 16 27-30, 17 8, 21). But most generally it is Christ Himself in the fulness of His Divine authority and power and grace on whom faith is directed (2 11, 3 16, 18, 4 39, 7 5, 31, 38, 9 35-38, 12 42, 14 1). The results of faith are usually summed up in the words 'eternal life' (3 16, 5 24, 6 40, 47, 20 31), but other descriptions occur (1 12, 3 18, 6 35, 12 36, 46). It can not be said that there is any doctrine of faith in this Gospel which is not implicit in the Synoptics. The fuller emphasis is found (a) in the prolog and chapter 20; (b) in the historian's statements regarding the relations of men to Jesus (2 11, 23, 4 39, 41, 7 5, 11 48, 12 11, 42, 20 8); (c) in the various discussions between Jesus and the educated Jews who opposed Him; (d) in the last conversations with the disciples. There is even here no formal examination of faith in a theological manner. It is not compared with other principles, as in the Epistles. But the abundant use of the verb shows that the author recognizes this as the crucial point in the relation of Christianity to Judaism; i.e., on the human side. Faith is a real knowledge, but it is opposed to sight and to speculation; and the present possession of the boons received in faith is stated emphatically. What Christ is to temple, sacrifice, legal enactment, that faith is to the corresponding human acts which those institutions evoke. This the author seems clearly to see, but he buries it in the substance of his story, without formal defense.

4. In the Pauline Epistles. The words 'faith' (πίστις) and 'believe' (πιστεύειν) occur almost 200 times in the thirteen Pauline Epistles. The verb does not occur in Col or Phm. In contrast with the O T and with Jn the noun occurs nearly three times oftener than the verb. The great fact has been at last fully identified, and, altho nowhere defined, is capable of direct comparison with other ethical or spiritual principles. (1) The object of faith is variously expressed. It may be a rumor (I Co 11 18), a historical fact (I Th 4 14; Ro 10 9; cf. Ro 4 17), testimony to a fact (I Co 15 2 ff.; I Th 2 13; II Th 1 10; cf. II Th 2 15), the truth (II Th 2 13), the gospel (Ph 1 27), Christ in the propitiatory power of His blood (Ro 3 25). God is the object of faith simply (Ro 4 3, 17; Gal 3 6; I Th 1 8; Tit 3 8), or as He acts (Ro 4 5, 24; cf. 10 9, Col 2 12). Christ is named as the object eighteen times, twice with the verb (I Ti 1 16, 3 16), but sixteen times with the noun (Ro 3 22; Gal 2 20; Eph 1 15; Ph 1 29, etc.). Pfeleiderer says truly that we nowhere read of πιστεύειν Χριστῶ as we do of πιστεύειν Θεῶ; it is equally true, and even more significant, that we do not read of πίστις Θεοῦ, as we do of πίστις Χριστοῦ. Faith in God is faith in Him as the Father of Jesus Christ, and in His redeeming mercy through Christ. Faith in Christ is faith in Him as the complete Redeemer and the absolute Lord of human souls. The cross, the atoning act of God in Christ (Ro 3 24, 25, 8 3, 32; II Co 5 19 ff.), so conditions the relations of God and man that henceforth we can neither conceive of God except as the redeeming God, nor of the cross as a mere past event, but as an act through which God so related Himself with sin and righteousness in human nature that righteousness (justification, forgiveness) became available to mankind. This faith is neither faith in a mere theory of salvation, nor is it faith in a God who is not a savior in some definite manner. The Pauline faith is fixed on God, who sent His Son as an offering for sin, and on the living Christ, who offered Himself. The Eternal God, the Creator and Lord of all, is henceforth so conditioned for man's apprehension and faith. To trust in Him is to trust in the power of that cross; to trust in Christ whose blood covers sin (Ro 3 25) is to trust in God. (2) The effect of faith is the justification (cf. JUSTIFICATION) of the believer (Ro 1 17, 3 24-27, 4 1-25, 5 1; Gal 2 16, 3 1-29; Eph 2 8; Ph 3 9). This is the gateway to all else, union with Christ (Gal. 2 20), the indwelling Spirit (Eph 3 16, 17), peace (Ro 5 1), sonship (Gal 3 26), etc. This is the heart of Paul's Gospel, in which the real implications of Christ's person and teaching and atoning work come to light. As the faith of Abraham was reckoned to him for righteousness, when as yet the legal system was not established, and the promise of God alone stood before him, so in Christ the legal system is surpassed, and the promise of a universal grace confronts the world. He who puts his faith in God-in-Christ as the offerer of mercy is thereby at once in right relations (righteousness) toward God. God henceforth treats him as righteous in holy and loving mercy. This faith is the basis of all further fellowship between the believer and God. St. Paul contrasts faith chiefly with legal obedience; in its world nothing statutory has a place. He thus repudiates the fancied religious superiority of the Jew. Faith, the opposite of merit, is the new way, announced in Christ, whereby men become right with God. (3) It is natural that faith so potent and significant should gradually become a term equivalent to the gospel or the Christian religion. It contains an intellectual element. Because through faith man is justified, all that a man apprehends concerning God, Christ, humanity, becomes supremely important. These various elements coalesce more or less definitely into a system of facts, historical and spiritual, which are naturally called his 'faith' (I Co 2 5, 15 1-4, 16 13; II Co 1 24; Eph 4 5; Ph 1 27; Col 1 23; I Ti 3 9, 5 8; Tit 1 13). From this element in the act of faith theology takes its rise. (4) Finally, the Pauline view of faith includes its nature and power as a creative ethical force which finds a channel in love and hope, joy and peace. It is no mere technicality of an abstract religion. It describes the attitude of person to person, and hence implies both an emotional and a volitional element. It, therefore, determines conduct (Ro 6 14-23; 14 1, 2, 22, 23; Gal 2 20, etc.), and the moral quality of that conduct is itself derived from Him who is the object of faith. He, and not a series of legal prescriptions, molds the ideal, and guides the steps of the Christian man (Ro 7, 8, 14 22, 23; I Co 6 11, 19; Gal 5 6). All Pauline moral exhortations rest on this conception.

5. In the Other Epistles, In the other N T writings we find no such deep grasp of the new principle as in Paul, altho there is nothing inconsistent with his doctrine of faith. Yet there are characteristic differences of emphasis. The Ep. of James, in the famous passage 2 14-26, seems to correct a false deduction from the Pauline doctrine. James does not deny the latter; but he insists that the principle of faith is not antinomian, since a living faith, as that of Abraham, must issue in works, and so be 'made perfect,' or reach its end. And this, in other words, Paul says abundantly. The Ep. to the Hebrews describes faith at length—stressing its moral quality as a Christian virtue—in 11 1-12 6: (1) Faith is defined as that which deals with the future (promised) and the invisible (God, Christ), and this is illustrated. (2) It is proved that faith is the real substance of O T history and also a new thing, not created by but consummated in Christianity. (3) But we are commanded to live by faith, not by legal observances, because Jesus has appeared as its 'author and perfecter.' As such He has become its object (12 2). Thus it appears that on all sides the N T reveals Christ as the Person who has so appeared from God and acted for God that all other religious instruments fall away; and faith, issuing in obedience, including an eager but patient expectation, becomes the great and unifying principle, filling the present with the power of the future, binding man to God.

FAMILIAR FRIEND: In Job 19 14 this expression means 'acquaintances.' In Ps 41 9; Jer 20 10 it is a good rendering of 'ēnōsh sh'lōmā, 'man of my peace.'

FAMILIAR SPIRIT: The Heb. אֹבֵד, 'ōbh, was used generally for 'the spirit of the departed,' but the etymology and exact meaning of the word is not known. As certain persons professed or were supposed to harbor, or be in communion with, such spirits, there were said 'to have familiar spirits' (Lv 19 31, etc.). See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, 1. Terms Denoting Family. The term 'family,' as it occurs in the Eng. Bible, is nearly always the translation of the Heb. word מִשְׁפָּחָה, mishpāhāh, which properly means 'clan,' altho it is often used in the narrower sense of 'family.' In a few instances בַּיִת, bayith, 'house,' is rendered 'family,' and in a large proportion of cases in which 'house' is retained the reference is to the household or family. Other terms, such as seed, flesh, etc., are often used figuratively for family. Family relationships, especially the more remote ones, as those of uncle, 'cousin,' nephew, etc., are often expressed only generally rather than exactly, the word brother, e.g., being frequently used to cover such relations (cf. Gn 14 14, 24 48; Lv 25 25, etc.).

2. The Significance of the Family in Heb. Society. The words 'family,' 'house,' 'household,' as used in the O T, do not represent exactly the same ideas as these same terms do with us. In Heb. society the mishpāhāh was the fundamental social unit. It might be composed of a number of 'families,' in our more restricted sense of the word. It was the foundation of the clan, often equivalent to it, and as such the main constituent element of the tribe. In the more primitive conditions that lay behind Heb. society, as we find it in the O T, doubtless the 'family' was relatively less important than the clan or tribe. But with the development of a more complex type of life in Canaan, tribal and clan relations receded and the family attained to the position of prime importance. See ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, §§ 11 and 26. The Heb. family was made up of several groups, or units, at whose head stood one 'father,' or master. There might be several wives, each with her own set of children, also, concubines with children. There might also be a larger or smaller number of servants, male and female. Some of the servants might be married and have children. It was also possible that one or more of the sons of the father might be married and living on the paternal estate still under the father's care and authority, with wife or wives under the control of the husband's mother. Within this complex it is impossible to draw the line between the family, in our sense of the term, and the mishpāhāh or bayith of the O T. It is true that our O T evidence relates mainly to the more independent, well-to-do property-owners. Doubtless, there were many small families (husband, one wife, and children) in Israel, but the larger 'house' corresponded more nearly with the ideal of the majority, especially in the earlier pre-exilic days.

3. Marriage. The basis of the family was, of course, marriage. We are here concerned only with the facts regarding marriage as we actually find them in the O T. For theories as to the nature of the marriage relation among the primitive Semites see MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. In the O T marriage is viewed as a relation in which the husband is master, lord, owner. There may be some traces of a more primitive condition when the wife was more independent (matriarchate) or when polyandry was practised. But these lie beyond the horizon of O T history. See ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, § 11.

In the O T there is no specific word for marriage. The expressions are always concrete and relate to the actual condition. The man is the ba'al, 'master,' 'owner,' of his 'woman'; he 'takes' a woman; the wife is b'e'ulāh, i.e., 'under the dominion of a ba'al'; or she is 'the woman' of her 'man' (cf. Hos. 2 16).

The marriage contract was between the husband (or his father) and the family of the bride, rather than between the two as individuals. The bride was practically purchased, the mōhar, dowry, 'purchase-money,' being paid to the father of the bride. This fact placed a restriction on polygamy. A man could only have as many wives as he could afford to pay for with a mōhar sufficient to satisfy the family of each wife. No disgrace was attached to polygamy, or to the concubinage that might exist between a master and his female slaves. Notwithstanding this commercial aspect of marriage, there is abundant evidence in the O T that the love of the young people for each other often played an important part in the preliminaries of a marriage (cf. Jacob and Rachel, Gn ch. 29; David and Michal, I S 18 20; and in general, Song of Solomon). Ancient Heb. society gave more liberty to its women than is the case in the Mohammedan East of to-day. The Law forbade the marriage of two (probably full) sisters to the same man (Lv 18 18); but the story of Jacob seems to show that actual practise was often different (or did Rachel and Leah have different mothers?). Marriage between half-brothers and sisters was allowable (Gn 20 12; II S 13 13). For further particulars on this point see MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

4. The House-father. The head of a Heb. household was the chief personage of what was a religious as well as a social institution. The family in primitive Heb. society had a religious significance. Through it the cult of the tribal and family deities was practised and perpetuated. (On the cult of the dead, even in Israel, see Paton, Spiritism in Antiquity, pp. 208 ff. and 248 ff.). The house-father may well be viewed as the priest of the group of which he was the family-head. He was responsible for the religious life of his family and he was also the chief religious functionary. It was he who offered the sacrifices to the family deities, or, as later was the case, to Jehovah the national deity, on behalf of his family and their interests (cf. the cases of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job, etc.). This will explain such passages as Gn 31 53, 32 9, and, in part, also the reverence paid to the family sepulcher, for the family with its ancestors constituted a cult-unit. For an example of such family sacrificial observances see I S 20 6.

To the house-father was thus due a reverence that bordered closely on the reverence due to deity (cf. the place in the Decalog of the 5th Commandment). To dishonor a parent was a crime worthy of death (Ex 21 15, 17). Within his own domain the master's authority was well-nigh absolute. His wife, or wives, looked up to him as their lord (cf. Gn 18 12). He was the chief, the elder, the father. Even to extreme old age he retained, nominally at least, this authority (cf. the story of Jacob). These house-fathers constituted the elders of the Heb. communities, the ancient men, whose counsel and means were the basis of tribal administration and who maintained their importance long after the tribes had become little more than a convenient fiction. On the father rested the responsibility of training and instructing his household in the traditions of the family, tribe, or nation (Gn 18 19; Ex 12 26, 13 8; Dt 6 7) and to him the sons looked for their education after coming out from under the tutelage of the mother (Pr I 8, 3 12, 4 1, 13 1, etc.). While Heb. law and custom gave such large power to the house-father, the O T is full of evidence that the Heb. families were no strangers to kindness and affection. The fathers loved their children and were loved by them (cf. the stories of Jacob and Joseph, of Jephthah, of David, etc.). Naturally, the polygamy that was probably the rule rather than the exception was the source of much discord and of many evils. But in spite of this, the Heb. family was a nursery of virtue, and often a home of a faith and piety that were a genuine anticipation of the higher ideal realized later in the Christian home.

5. The Wife and Mother. While the wife was really bought and paid for and was thus legally the property of the husband (see § 3 above, and cf. the old form of the 10th Commandment, Ex 20 17, where the wife is a part of the 'house'), the actual position of a Heb. wife was, at least in many cases, far from that of a mere slave or chattel. Her family, for instance, generally stood ready to avenge any undue ill treatment from her husband. Women of spirit and ability appear to have found no difficulty in maintaining a fairly independent position (e.g., Sarah, Rebekah, Abigail, etc.). In families where there were two or more wives, 'one beloved and the other hated,' the lot of the latter was doubtless hard. The Law forbade unjust discrimination against the son of the 'hated' wife, if it was the first-born (Dt 21 15), but contained no provision for alleviating the lot of such a woman herself. That was a case belonging to the inner sphere where the husband was supreme. If the husband's mother was alive, the wife, or wives, were to a certain extent under her dominion even in the royal harem. She was the gbbh'rāh, 'queen-mother,' often mentioned in the notices of the Books of Kings and elsewhere (I K 15 13; II K 10 13, etc.). On the wife rested a large responsibility. Much of the manual labor was performed by the Heb. women. Grinding the meal, baking, weaving the cloth, churning, etc., all fell to the women to do. Hence the representation of the ideal wife as we find it in Pr 31 10 ff. The restrictions upon the participation by Heb. women in the social life of their times were not so many, or so severe, as in the case in Syria to-day; the women did not mingle with men as freely as is allowed in modern Western society.

To become a wife and mother was the fond desire of every Heb. woman. Not to be married was a disgrace, and to become a childless wife was equally mortifying. On the other hand, to be a mother—especially of a son—was the crowning joy of life (cf. the story of Hannah, I S 1 f., or of Rachel; Gn ch. 30). In primitive society, the greater the number of sons the greater the number of spears. The standing of a family depended upon the number of its valiant men. Thus early was fostered the desire for sons, and it continued to exist among the Hebrews until the latest times. The high position and honor accorded to the Heb. mother is one of the brighter characteristics of the O T. The mother, as well as the father, was to be honored according to the Law (Ex 20 12, 21 15). The children, both boys and girls, were almost entirely under the tutelage of the mother during their earlier years, and the daughters remained so until their marriage (cf. Pr 1 8, etc.). See also MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

6. Children. As with other peoples of comparatively simple life, childbirth among the Hebrews does not appear to have been viewed as particularly dangerous, tho of course not free from pain (cf. Gn 3 16; Ex 1 19). The employment of midwives (q.v.) was common. The term rendered 'birth-stool' (Ex 1 19) is no longer clearly understood (but see also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 8). This is also the case with the expression to bear 'upon the knees' (Gn 30 3, 50 23) of another. As soon as the babe was born, the navel cord was cut; then the child was washed, rubbed with salt (as is still done in Syria), and wrapped in swaddling-clothes (Ezk 16 4). The mother was considered ceremonially unclean for seven days after the birth of a boy, and for fourteen after that of a girl. She was also 'to continue in the blood of her purifying' thirty-three additional days after the birth of a boy, and sixty-six after that of a girl (Lv 12 1-5). Names were given, generally at birth, either by the mother (Gn 4 1, 25, 29 32, etc.), or by the father (Gn 5 29, 16 15; Ex 2 22, etc., see NAMES, § 1). The legitimacy of a child was derived from the father, not from the mother, and in case a wife was childless she welcomed the child of her husband by one of her maid-servants as if it were her own (Gn 30 1-12), and gave it its name. In later times the name appears to have been given a boy on the occasion of his circumcision (Lk 1 59, 2 21), which took place on the eighth day after birth (Gn 17 11 ff.; Lv 12 3. See CIRCUMCISION). Heb. children were generally nursed by their mothers, and were kept at the breast a long period (probably as much as two or even three years, as is the case in Syria to-day). Mother-love among the Hebrews was strong, and altho girls were far less welcome than boys, we hear nothing of the practise of exposure of female infants (except its condemnation as pagan, Ezk 16 5). The weaning of a child, especially the first-born or heir, was the occasion of festivities (Gn 21 8). The first-born boy was considered sacred to J' and could be redeemed from being devoted to Him only by a redemption sacrifice (Ex 13 11 ff., 22 29, 34 19 f.). This may have had its roots in a primitive Semitic or Canaanite custom of actually sacrificing all first-born sons to deity. All the children, both boys and girls, were under the tutelage of the women of the house until the boys gradually came to be attached more closely to the men and were taught by them the knowledge of the profession from which the family gained its livelihood (different in different ages, localities, and special circumstances). The father and mother were the chief fountains of knowledge and authority (cf. Pr 1 8, etc.). In well-to-do families nurses (cf. II S 4 4) and instructors, or tutors (II K 10 1, 5), were not uncommon (cf. also the case of Nathan and Solomon, II S 12 25). Schools, as such, are not mentioned in the O T. But some means of obtaining 'higher' education must have existed. Elementary instruction was imparted largely within the family circle (see EDUCATION). Ancient Heb. law seems not to have recognized any period when a boy became 'of age.' So long as the father was alive and vigorous the sons were supposed to be subject to him, altho a son who had set up an independent home would not be so completely under the father's rule as one who remained on the paternal estate. A daughter was the property of the father until she was married (Ex 21 7 ff.; cf. 22 16 f.; Lv 19 29). A widow or divorced woman might return to her father's house and again become his property (cf. Gn 38 11).

The early code of E (Ex 22 22) and especially Dt (10 18, 16 11, 24 17, 27 19, etc.) enjoined just and kind treatment for the fatherless, both to protect them in their legal rights (of inheritance) and to lay upon the well-to-do the responsibility of caring for such unfortunates. But the prophetic pleas in behalf of the widow and fatherless (Is 1 17, 23, 9 17, 10 2; Jer 5 28, 7 6, etc.) show that there was a widespread failure in carrying out the injunctions of the Codes. Apparently there was no definite provision compelling obedience to the Code.

7. Servants and Dependents. The servants and other dependents of a Heb. house formed no unimportant element. The servants were the property of the master or his wife (or wives), whose authority over them was nearly absolute. Female servants might be the individual property of one of the wives (e.g., Hagar, Sarah's maid, Gn 16 1 ff., or Zilpah and Bilhah, Gn 29 24, 29), who had independent authority over them (Gn 16 6, 21 8 ff.). Certain restrictions were placed upon a too severe exercise of this authority. Six years was the limit of the service of a Heb. slave, unless he chose to become a life-servant (Ex 21 2-5). If married before his term of service, his wife came in and went out free with him; but if his master had given him his wife, she and her children remained the master's (Ex 21 2-5). Similar provision was made for the rights of the woman who had been sold into slavery (Ex 21 7-11). The Law sought also to protect servants from extreme injury at the hands of the master (Ex 21 20 f., 26 f.). Furthermore, they were not to be sent away empty-handed (Dt 15 12-14, 18) and in case a servant ran away and made good his escape, he was not to be returned (Dt 23 15). Heb. servants shared in the family sacrifices and festivals (Dt 16 11, etc.). The lot of non-Heb. slaves (acquired by capture, purchase from foreigners, etc.) was less fortunate. These were more completely under the power of their owners and the Law was not so careful to protect them against abuse. They were servants for life and, as property, could be passed on as a part of the family inheritance (Lv 25 44 ff.). They were obliged to observe the requirements of Israel's religion. It was expected that male foreign slaves would be circumcised, and thus made capable of eating the Passover (Ex 12 44 f.). Toward a female captive the Law took a humane and kindly attitude (Dt 21 10-14). Besides bond-servants, a Heb. householder was likely to have a number of hired servants (see Dt 24 14), and also 'strangers'—that is, foreigners who, for one reason or another, put themselves under his protection. Toward the latter the Law took a friendly attitude, seeking to guard them from undue oppression (cf. Ex 20 10, 22 21 ff.; Dt 1 16, 10 18, 14 21, etc.), tho making a distinction between them and Israelites (Dt 15 1-6, 23 19). See further under SLAVERY.

8. Family Property. That property belonged to the family rather than to the individual appears to have been a fundamental principle of Heb. society, tho the master had undisputed control so long as he lived. The distribution of property after his death was also, at least in early times, made according to his directions. While the Law directed that the first-born should always possess the birthright, i.e., the right to a double portion of the property, even tho he were the son of the 'hated' wife (Dt 21 15-17), it is likely that in actual practise there were many exceptions to this rule (cf. Ishmael and Isaac, Jacob and Esau, Solomon as David's chief heir, etc.). One son could not inherit to the exclusion of all the others. All sons of the same father were 'brothers,' even tho some of the sons may have been born of harlots (cf. the case of Jephthah, Jg 11 1 ff., where might, not right, drove J. away). A special provision for the inheritance of daughters is given in Nu 27 1-11, 36 1-12. Widows, as a rule, appear to have had no special inheritance, but could, if childless, claim the right of marriage to the husband's brother (Dt 25 5-10).

The family estate or patrimony (Dt 18 8) was considered a sacred possession given by J' of old and as such was to be retained as long as possible as the possession of the same family. To the nearest heirs (kinsmen) belonged the right of redemption (cf. Ru 4 1-12; Jer 32 6 ff.). Even a king could not override this ancient principle (cf. I K 21 3 f.). The year of jubilee was designed to restore all landed property to the families that originally owned it (Lv 25 8 ff.). It is not likely that all the provisions of this law were ever actually carried out. It was due to this strong feeling regarding the family rights and the hereditary privileges of the family that the Jews took such care to preserve the family genealogies, of which we have so many examples, especially in the later literature (Priests' Code, and Ch, Ezr, Neh).

9. The Family in the N T. No comprehensive attempt is made in the N T to regulate family life. The Jews possessed the highest and purest type of family life known in antiquity. The N T specifications seek only to bring it all more completely under the supreme principle of Christian love. FAMINE. See PALESTINE, § 20.

FAN, FANNER: The Heb. word (zārāh) rendered 'to fan' (Is 41 16, etc.) means literally 'to scatter.' The grain was fanned by throwing it up with the winnowing shovel and allowing the wind to blow away the chaff. The reading 'fanner' in Jer 51 2 (AV) is somewhat doubtful, but the AV is to be preferred, cf. RVmg. See also AGRICULTURE, § 7.

FAR: In the expressions 'far from thee,' 'far from me,' 'far be it,' the word 'far' represents: (1) The Heb. hālilāh which expresses the idea of religious abhorrence, i.e., it would be considered a profanation to do so and so. In many cases the AV translated the same Heb. expression by 'God forbid,' which the RV has changed (cf. Gn 44 7, 17; Jos 22 20, 24 16; I S 12 23, 14 45, 20 2; Job 27 5). (2) The Gr. ὑπερβαίνω (Mt 16 22), 'propitious' or 'merciful to thee,' i.e., 'God be merciful to thee and avert it.' See also FORBID. E. E. N.

FARE. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 1.

FARE, FAREWELL. See EPISTLE.

FARTHING. See MONEY, II.

FASHION: Behind the occurrences of the word in the EV stands a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms. In some cases the rendering 'fashion,' while not always literally exact, well represents the sense of the original term and needs no comment. In the following instances the rendering calls for some explanation: In Ex 26 30, I K 6 38, Ezk 42 11 the idea is that of a 'plan' (lit., 'judgment'). In Lk 9 29 it is the 'appearance' that is meant. The word in Ja 1 11 means literally 'face'; in Mk 2 12 it is simply the adv. 'thus.' In I Co 7 31, Ph 2 8 the Gr. σχημα is comprehensive; 'fashion' only imperfectly expresses its meaning, which is 'the whole external arrangement,' 'the scheme.' The same word in verbal form occurs in II Co 11 13, 14, 15, where the RV renders 'fashion,' and in I P 1 14. The RV rendering is to be preferred in I K 5 18; Job 10 9; Ps 139 16; Is 22 11, 44 10; Ac 7 44; Ro 12 2; Ph 3 21. E. E. N.

FAST, FASTING: In the O T, tsūm, 'to abstain,' tsōm, 'abstinence from food,' are the words commonly used. In Is 58 3, 5 these are parallel to 'innāh nephesh, 'to afflict' or 'humble the soul.' The latter expression is the technical term for 'fasting' (cf. Ps 35 13, where 'with fasting' is added). In the N T we have νηστεύειν, 'to abstain,' and νηστεία, 'abstinence from food.' Before special communion with J'', Moses (Ex 34 28; Dt 9 9, 18) and Elijah (I K 19 8) fasted (cf. also what is said of Jesus, Mt 4 2, and of Paul, Ac 9 9); it may be considered as having been done in preparation for receiving some great revelation. Fasting was also an expression of grief over the death of friends (e.g., over Saul and Jonathan, I S 31 13; II S 1 12). Surprise is expressed that David does not fast after the death of his child (II S 12 20 ff.). Nehemiah fasted in sorrow for the condition of Jerusalem (Neh 1 4). Here, however, it expressed also the humbling of himself before God, because of sin, as in Lv 16 29, 31; Ps 35 13, 69 19, and Dn 9 3. This was preparatory to intercession for forgiveness and help, or in hope that God would be made favorable in time of especial need (I S 7 6; Is 58 3, 5; II Ch 20 3). Ahab humbled himself when Elijah threatened evil, and thus averted it from himself (I K 21 27 ff.); Nineveh was similarly saved (Jon 3 5 ff.). There is no doubt that men thought that fasting had a certain magical efficacy in warding off evil or in making God favorable. The prophets, however, laid emphasis on repentance and the humbling of the heart, of which fasting was only the outward act or symbol (Jer 14 12; Jl 2 12 ff.; Zec 7 5). There is a suggestion in Jer 14 12 that the act was an offering to J''. Fasting also preceded difficult undertakings, in order to gain the favor of God (Est 4 16; Ezr 8 21). Before the Exile the fasting of individuals and nations was for the most part voluntary, in connection with some especial need or calamity. The only command to fast in the Law is in connection with the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 29, 31, 23 27, 29). After the Exile (Zec 8 19, 7 3, 5) four additional yearly fasts were kept on days commemorating national disasters. (See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2, IV; cf. also Est 9 31, where weeping and fasting are connected with the Purim feast.) In connection with fasting we find the rending of garments (I K 21 27; Jl 2 13), and the use of sackcloth and ashes (Is 58 5). No work was permitted on the appointed fast-days. Ordinarily the fast was from sunrise to sunset (II S 1 12); but the Day of Atonement lasted from evening to evening. If a fast extended over several days, men abstained from food during the day only. Public fasts were proclaimed (I K 21 9; Ezr 8 21) and sanctified (Jl 1 14, 2 15). Fasting was not allowed on the Sabbath and regular feast-days. The near approach of the Messianic era would make fasting unsuitable (Zec 7 3, 5). In the N T there is evidence that fasting was common among the Jews (cf. Lk 18 12). Jesus, like the prophets, laid emphasis upon the inner meaning of the outward act (Mt 6 16, 18), and recognized that it was a sign of sorrow (Mt 9 14, 15). In Mk 9 29, Mt 17 21, and I Co 7 5 'with fasting' is a gloss. C. S. T.

FASTS AND FEASTS. 1. Terms Used. The Heb. uses two words for 'feast,' hagh (חַג) and mō'ēdh (מוֹעֵד), often rendered solemn feast. The latter is the more comprehensive, as it conveys the idea of set time, while the former prescribes in a measure the mode of observance. Another later term, holy convocation (שְׁבוּעַת קֹדֶשׁ), embodies the notion of form and ceremonial. The hagh was a pilgrimage feast; the same word is used in Arabic to-day of the pilgrimage to Mecca. Originally it may have described the festal procession, or even the dance, at the shrine, and the word occurs in this sense in Ps 42 4, tho 'to observe a hagh' meant 'to visit the sanctuary' (Ex 23 14-17). In early literature no precise dating is given for any of the sacred seasons. This was partly due to the fact that the harvest varied greatly in different parts of the land. The moon also, being the chronometer (cf. Ps 104 19), introduced an inconstant element.

2. The Sacred Calendar. The calendar of sacred seasons, according to the present form of the Pentateuch, was as follows: I. Weekly and monthly festivals. (1) Sabbaths. (2) New Moons, each with a prescribed and elaborate ritual. II. Annual festivals. (1) Passover (pesakh), observed on the 14th of the first month, called Nisan, or earlier, Abib. (2) Unleavened Bread (matstsōth), beginning on the 15th of the month Abib and continuing 7 days (Ex 23 15, 34 18). (3) Weeks, or Harvest (qātsir), or Pentecost. (4) Trumpets, or New-year's day, observed on the 1st of the 7th month, Tishri. (5) The Day of Atonement, observed on the 10th of the 7th month. (6) Tabernacles, or Booths (sukkōth) or Ingathering ('āšiph), observed on the 15th of the 7th month, originally a seven-day feast, later extended to eight days, the 8th day being called Shemini 'atsereth. The ritual for these seasons is given at length in Ex ch. 12; Lv chs. 16, 23; Nu chs. 28, 29; Dt. ch. 16. III. Cyclic festivals. (1) The Sabbatical year, every 7th year to be observed, land to lie fallow, slaves to go free, debts to be released. (2) Jubilee, wherein country property reverted to the original owners and Hebrew slaves were ipso facto manumitted (Lv ch. 25). IV. Lesser festivals not prescribed in the Law. (1) Purim, celebrated on the 14th and 15th of Adar (March), in memory of the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's plot (see ESTHER, BOOK OF, § 6). (2) The Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10 22), established by Judas Maccabeus on the 25th of Chislew (Dec.-Jan.) 165 B.C., to commemorate the reconsecration of the Temple, desecrated just 3 years before by pagan sacrifices (1 Mac 4 41-61, II Mac 10 1-8). The Feast was celebrated 8 days. Ps ch. 30 (cf. the title) was read as a part of the ritual. (3) The Feast of Rejoicing for the Law, on the completion of the annual reading of the 54 Parashahs or 'Lesson-sections' of the Pentateuch, followed Tabernacles on the 23rd of Tishri. (4) The Feast of the Captivity of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans on the 9th of the 4th month (Jer 39 2). (b) For the burning of the city and Temple on the 7th of the 5th month (II K 25 8 ff.). The capture of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple by Titus, which occurred in the 4th and 5th months respectively, gave a new significance to these anniversaries. (c) For the assassination of Gedaliah in the 7th month (Jer 41 1 ff.; II K 25 25; Zec 7 5). (d) For the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem on the 10th day of the 10th month (II K 25 1; Jer 52 4; cf. also Zec 8 19). (5) The Feast of Wood-offering, on the 15th of Ab, when wood was brought and stored for the perpetual altar-fires (Jos. BJ, II 17 6; cf. Neh 10 34, 13 31). (6) Nicanor's Day, in commemoration of the victory of Judas Maccabeus over Nicanor, 160 B.C., on the 13th of Adar

(March) (I Mac 7 40). (7) The Feast of the Recovered City, in memory of the recapture of the Acra on the 23rd of the 2nd month, 141 B.C. (I Mac 13 50-52).

Other festivals of a more local or popular character, like Sheep-shearing (I S 25 4; II S 13 23), were common at different periods.

3. The Festivals in the Codes. The difficulties felt by every reader when studying the festal regulations are real and insoluble upon the theory of a nearly simultaneous origin of the entire legislation; but many obscurities disappear with the recognition that 4 (5) law codes of different dates exist in Ex-Dt and Ezk. The four Pentateuchal festal rescripts and Ezekiel's ordinal arranged chronologically are as follows: (1) Ex 34 18 ff. (J) and Ex 23 10-19; cf. 21 2-7 (Book of the Covenant [E]); (2) Dt 15 1-6, 12-18 and 16; (3) Lv 23 9-11, 14-18a, 39-43 (Holiness Code); (4) Ezk 45 18 ff. and portions of 46; (5) Lv 16 1-34, 23 4-8, 21-23, 33-38, 44; Nu chs. 28, 29 (P). Lv. ch. 25 has much material common to (3) and (5). There is a noticeable advance in these five codes from simplicity to elaborateness of ceremonial.

4. The Festivals in the History. Tho bulking so largely in the legislation, the feasts are seldom mentioned in the history. The great feasts of Solomon (I K 8 65), Hezekiah (II Ch 30 23), Josiah (II K 23 21; II Ch ch. 35), Ezra (Ezr 6 19-22), and Nehemiah (Neh ch. 8), when the Law was promulgated, are extraordinary events. The testimony of the prophets is much more impressive. The pilgrimage feasts of N. Israel with their extravagant and tumultuous ritual were revolting to Amos. Hosea describes them as a part of the very web of national life, but more a tribute to Baal than to J'. Isaiah also was acquainted with a gorgeous ritual and a festal cycle (Is chs. 1 and 29).

5. Origin and Development of the Feasts. Legislation was the crystallization of usage, and the finished product in Nu chs. 28, 29 betrays but a few traces of its origin. Yet a comparison of early legislation and practise with various Semitic customs will reveal much of interest. Two cycles, a lunar and a solar, are combined in the Jewish Sacred Year, and two stages of national life are thereby revealed. The moon is the patron of the shepherd, as the sun is of the farmer. The latter has its seasons more accurately dated and divided, but the moon is after all the most convenient chronometer. A nomad people carried their system of New Moon, Sabbaths, and Passover over into Palestine. There they met with festal celebrations of harvest and vintage, which must have varied with locality and climatic conditions. These indigenous agricultural festivals were coordinated with the lunar feasts of a conquering race, and the former in time came to be dated accurately in terms of the latter. With this gradual assimilation a change took place in the calendar. The year probably at first was divided roughly into semi-annual periods, each marked by a celebration on its first New Moon, and began with what was afterward the 7th month, whose Full Moon festival was 'the feast.' The Exile introduced many changes. New-year was transferred to the Passover month (conformably to Babylonian custom). Ten days at some time must have been added to the year to raise it from a lunar (355 days) to a solar year. The old 1st month—now become the 7th—was invested with peculiar sacredness, and its New Moon, through the Feast of Trumpets, was the most honored of the 12. Days of Atonement seem once to have existed on the 1st of the 1st and 7th months respectively (Ezk 45 18, 20; in ver. 20 we should read '7th month, new moon'). These particular days, by some rectification of the calendar, necessitated probably by wrong intercalation in this process of change, fell according to later usage on the 10th; consequently, we find that on the 10th of Nisan a lamb was to be chosen, which became now the Paschal Lamb (Ex ch. 12), and on the 10th of the 7th month occurs the only Day of Atonement recognized by P. On the 10th of the 7th month also, Jubilee was to be proclaimed, a provision hard to understand except on the theory that this was the old New-year's day. Ezekiel seems to have lived at the time of transition from the old to the new style. The Sabbatical year and Jubilee were but priestly extensions of the festal system, tho doubtless both had some existence in early custom (Ex 21 2-7; Dt 15 1-6; Jer 34 13 f; Ezk 46 17). As ritual develops, feasts originally nomadic, agricultural, and astronomical acquire historical elements. Certain seasons of the Sacred Year require a somewhat extended treatment.

6. New Moon and Sabbath. In preexilic literature New Moon and Sabbath regularly are associated (II K 4 23; Is 1 13; Hos 2 11; Am 8 6). By Is and Hos the observance of both days is disparaged. This fact, combined with strong etymological evidence, indicates that the Sabbath was originally the Full Moon, an old Semitic feast, and that both the lunar feasts were accompanied by practises displeasing to the prophets. Near the time of the Exile the name 'Sabbath' seems to have been transferred from the Full Moon to the Seventh Day, which already was observed as a rest day (Ex 34 21 [J], 23 12 [E]). Observance of the weekly Sabbath then became one of the strongest religious features of Judaism. The New Moon, too, continued to be recognized in the religious calendar. Ezekiel provided for New Moon feasts with elaborate sacrifices (Ezk 46 6 ff.). P (Nu 28 11 ff.) gives a precise ordinal and especially distinguishes the New Moon of the 7th month (Nu 29 1 ff.). Associated with the Sabbath, the lunar feast survived to N T times (Col 2 16).

7. The Passover. (1) The Name. The root pāšah (פָּשַׁח) occurs in several passages in the sense of a peculiar limping movement which denotes a festal dance (I K 18 26), or lameness (Gn 32 31), hence pešah. (פֶּשַׁח, Gr. πάσχα, rendered Easter in Ac 12 4 AV) has been explained as a feast celebrated with peculiar dances; cf. פָּח, § 1, above; but its derivation from a word cognate with the Assyrian pāšāhu, 'to propitiate,' is more probable, and we should seek its explanation therefore in the blood-rite of Ex 12 7, 22 f. The later conception and the English translation embody another notion—probably etymologically incorrect—that of the passing (leaping) over the houses of the Israelites on the night before the Exodus. Ex 12 23 is sometimes understood to mean that J' was to pass over the threshold into the house to protect, but 12 13 evidently implies that J" passed by the blood-marked houses. (2) Theories of Origin. P. was strictly a family feast, celebrated in the household (note the exception in Dt 16 5 f.). The father presided, and the lamb always possessed a sacrificial character (Nu 9 7, 13). It preserved, therefore, the memory of clan and nomad life, and was the festival of a pastoral people. The victim was to be from the flock (or the herd, Dt 16 2; cf. Ezk 45 22). The date in the later legislation is the 14th of Nisan, the day of the full moon. There is no evidence that P. was a sacrifice of firstlings, the regulation in Ex 12 5 being that the lamb shall be a yearling. The firstling law was independent of P. P., New Moon, and Sabbath appear to belong to the same cycle of observances and, like the New Moon, P. is not mentioned in the Book of the Covenant, nor in Ex 34 18-24 (the reference in ver. 25 is incidental). A 7th day rest-period is the only moon-feast definitely recognized in this stratum of the legislation. One phase of the struggle to suppress or reconstruct the feasts of the lunar cycle appears in Dt, where P. is to be celebrated at the central sanctuary and not in the home; but later the old custom was restored (Ex 12 3 ff. [P]), and has been continued ever since. 'Between the evenings' (Ex 12 6) has been variously rendered, the usual interpretation being 'between sunset and dark.' But, as the feast was nocturnal, the 'evenings' may be those of the 14th and 15th, or the phrase may mean in 'the middle of the night.' (3) Combination with Unleavened Bread. In all the codes we find somewhat extensive provision for the feast of matstsōth, or Unleavened Bread, appointed for the 15th Abib (i.e., Nisan), and to be kept 7 days. In the Book of the Covenant and in Ex 34 18-21 this feast and not P. is mentioned in the cycle of agricultural observances, and coordinated with the other two harvest feasts. In Dt we find the word 'Passover' somewhat loosely applied to the whole period beginning with P. itself. The worshiper returns home on the morning of the 15th Abib, and celebrates Unleavened Bread there. The 7th day of Unleavened Bread is to be kept with a solemn assembly. Here two things seem evident: (a) there has been a concession to popular feeling in giving an ecclesiastical standing to P., and (b) the feast of Unleavened Bread overshadows it. In Ezk 45 21 also, the feast is called 'Passover.' It is to begin on the 14th of the month and to continue 7 days with the use of unleavened bread. Sacrifices are provided for each day and a bullock for a sin-offering on the 1st day. This requirement keeps the agrarian idea prominent, while P. has given its name to the entire period. Unleavened Bread celebrated the beginning of the grain harvest. At some point in its progress, which none of the existing data enables us to fix, a sheaf of the first-fruits was to be waved before J" (Lv 23 11). This took place at the beginning of the period which 50 days later culminated in the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost in the N T). The entire 7 weeks was a festal season; probably therefore the 7 days of Unleavened Bread began a festivity which terminated with Pentecost, and this 8th day found a counterpart later in the 8th day of Tabernacles. Ezekiel omits Pentecost from his calendar, which would indicate a tendency to ignore the agrarian origin of the feasts. Undoubtedly since the old agricultural feasts were dated with reference to the moon, namely, at the full moons, P. and Unleavened Bread were brought together. Yet they are carefully distinguished, and tho the name 'Passover' is applied to both, it is quite clear that Unleavened Bread did not begin until the morning of the 15th. Since Unleavened Bread was a festival of first-fruits it suggested a like significance for P.; consequently, the firstling law was closely connected with that of P. The combined feast is appropriate to the spring month. The legislation calls this double feast a memorial, a 'night of observances' (shimmūrīm, Ex 12 42), but this was an added idea which, however, deepened the religious significance of all the rites. (4) The Ordinal. The following passages are given in the generally accepted chronological order of the Codes: Passover, Ex 12, 21-27, 34 25b (J); Dt 16 1-7; Ezk 45 21; Ex 12 1-13, 43-50; Lv 23 5; Nu 9 1-14, 28 16 (P). Unleavened Bread, Ex 13 3-10, 34 18 (J), 23 15 (E); Dt 16 3; Ezk 45 21 f.; Lv 23 9-14. (the wave-sheaf), Holiness Code (H); Lv 23 6-8; Ex 12 14-20; Nu 28 17-25 (P). Ex chs. 12 and 13 is a fundamental passage for both feasts. Certain differences in the ordinal should be noticed. (a) The month in the earlier law is called 'Abib,' in the later law 'the first month,' or 'Nisan.' (b) The memorial idea is found as early as the Book of the Covenant. (c) Dt brings in the new provision that P. shall be observed at the central sanctuary, and Unleavened Bread at home. (d) The Passover animal in Dt is from the flock, or the herd, and is to be boiled; in the later law it is to be from the sheep, or the goats, and must be roasted. Ezk, however, commands the use of a bullock. (e) In H there is no mention whatever of either feast, altho the ceremony of the wave-sheaf may imply an original matstsōth law. (f) In Lev 23 6-8 the double feast has become one of the holy convocations with fire offerings to J" during the week. In Nu 28 17-25 an elaborate ritual appears, part of which includes a sin-offering. Thus we see that the old joyous agrarian character of the feast has disappeared, leaving but few traces behind. (5) Historical Celebration. The Samaritans have preserved in many respects the ancient features of the celebration; since it is certain that their present ritual has been kept rigidly pure from later excrescences, retaining even the ancient features of the sprinkling of blood and of eating with signs of haste which were omitted from the later Jewish ritual. In some respects they are nearer the provisions of Dt than of P, for they come together at the appointed time on the summit of Mt. Gerizim, and under the superintendence of the chief priests slay the lambs and eat them in a family meal during the night of the 14th. Their feast furnished the most perfect example of an ancient Semitic rite. There are other notices of the celebration of P., e.g., that at Gilgal (Jos 5 10 f.), and the one mentioned in Ezr 6 19-22. The greatest celebration in preexilic history occurred in the 18th year of King Josiah, following the discovery of the Book of the Law (II K 23 21 ff.). A most interesting reference to P. and Unleavened Bread has recently come to light among the Aramaic Papyri discovered at Elephantine in Upper Egypt. It is a direction or command, dated in the 5th year of Darius II (419 B.C.), and in his name to the heads of the Jewish garrison at Elephantine that the P. and Unleavened Bread be observed and according to certain specific directions which are laid down (cf. Cowley, Aram. Pap. of the Fifth Cent. B.C. [1923] pp. xxiv f. and 60 ff.). II Ch ch. 35 expands this account, and is interesting as illustrating the mode of procedure in the time of the Chronicler, whose ordinal is noteworthy for being that of Dt rather than of P. In the N T, P. is several times referred to, the name of course applying to the whole period of 7 days. There are some features of the later usage important to notice: At the time of Christ, P. was a family feast, altho the lamb seems to have been slain according to Levitical rules. The drinking of 4 cups of wine seems to have been prescribed. After the first cup, the eldest son asked the meaning of the rite and the father recited the Exodus history, after which Pss 113 and 114 were sung. Then followed another cup, then the feast proper, then a third cup (cf. Lk 22 20), then a fourth, after which Pss 115-118 were sung (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26). A day of Preparation is mentioned in Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54, by which the synoptists seem to mean a preparation for the Sabbath, and it is fair to interpret Jn 19 14 as meaning that it was the preparation for the Passover Sabbath and, therefore, a great day.

8. Tabernacles. The ordinal for the Feast of Tabernacles occurs in Ex 34 22b (J), 23 16 (E); Dt 16 13-15; Ezk 45 25; Lv 23 39-43 (H), 33-36; Nu 29 12-38 (P). In the Law it is called Ingathering ('āšîph'), and Booths (šukkot). In H and Ezk it is called 'the Feast.' Dt and H prescribe 7 days, P adds an 8th, probably the last great day (cf. Jn 7 37 ff.), with a special ritual. T. is to be kept at the year's 'revolution,' 'tqūphāh,' Ex 34 22b), a word peculiar to this feast (cf. Is 29 1), or at the close of the year (Ex 23 16), and the Law was to be read every 7th year (Dt 31 10). Its final and definite dating was on the full moon of what was once undoubtedly the 1st month. The oldest attested historical feast of the Jewish year, it is probably described in Jg 9 27 ff., 21 19, and I S ch. 1, and antedated the Israelite occupation. Traces of its observance still survive. Fires are kindled on the slopes of Lebanon at the present day upon a date which approximately corresponds to this autumn festival. The joyous character, which in early times must have been almost bacchanalian (Is 9 3; cf. Hos 9 1-5), was never entirely lost, but prophetic and priestly agencies gradually reformed the practise and made T. the greatest of the Hebrew feasts (Zec 14 16). The Temple was dedicated at this season (I K 8 65 f.; II Ch 7 8-10; note the divergencies). Jeroboam instituted a like feast in the 8th month (I K 12 32). The celebration in Neh ch. 8 follows Lv 23 39-43. To the later extracanonical ritual belonged the lighting of candles and water libation (see Jn 7 37 f., 8 12).

9. The Day of Atonement. Much space is given to this fast in Lv 16 1-34, 23 26-32; Nu 29 7-11. Its germ seems to be found in Ezk 45 18-20, but no public observance can be traced prior to 444 B.C. Neh chs. 8-10 concern the 7th month of that year, but mention no such fast. The Day of A. represents, however, the culmination of the Jewish expiatory ceremonial, and the ideal expression of Israel's religion, and as such supplied the writer of Hebrews with some of his most striking typology.

In conclusion, it is important to observe that, under the transforming genius of Israel's religious teachers, these feasts became the medium of expression for the people's gratitude to J', and the memories of his grace, which quickened their sense of unworthiness. Only a narrow view would insist that a people could put no more into a form of worship than existed in the crude period of inexperienced childhood, for this would deny to growing spiritual consciousness that larger expression which maturity demands.

FAT. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 8, 10; and VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

FATHER, FATHERS. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4; AB, ABI; and ABBA.

FATHERLESS. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 6.

FATHOM. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

FATLINGS: Cattle fattened for slaughter (cf. Lk 15 23, 'fatted calf'), especially for sacrifice. In I S 15 9 the Heb. means literally 'second' but is probably a scribal error for the proper word for 'fatlings'. Cattle were fattened by withdrawing them from the open pasture and keeping them in the stall (cf. Am 6 4). See FOOD, § 10. E. E. N.

FAVOR: 'To find favor' is 'to please,' 'to show favor' is 'to be pleased.' At times the Heb. has the sense of 'grace,' in the LXX. often having χάρις as its equivalent. In the N T it is 6 times the translation of חֵן. חֵן, hēn, and other derivatives of חֵן are the Heb. words most frequently translated by 'favor.' The noun occurs commonly in the expressions 'to find' or 'to give favor in the eyes of' some one (of man, Gn 30 27; Ex 11 3; of God, Gn 18 3; Nu 11 11, 15). Eight other Heb. roots, implying 'kindness,' 'acceptance,' 'good-will,' 'pity,' are translated by 'favor.' רַחֲמִים, rāḥmīm, 'good-will,' is used 15 times, and in passages implying perhaps more especially the help of God (Ps 5 12, 30 5, 89 17, 106 4). פָּנִים, pānīm, 'face,' is used 4 times (Ps 45 12, 119 58; Pr 196 29, 26). The adjectives 'well' and 'ill-favored' (Gn 29 17, 39 6, 41 2, 4, 18; Dn 1 4), referring to the personal appearance as pleasing, are translations of יָפֶה, 'beautiful,' and רָע, 'evil,' 'bad.' C. S. T.

FEAR: The term 'fear' occurs both in its common signification as a feeling of apprehension and in a narrower religious sense. In the former sense, it is not distinctive. One may fear a fellow man, or he may fear dangers and harmful powers in nature (Ps 31 11, 64 1; Jer 6 25, 46 5, 'terror' RV). As a religious feeling, fear assumes a great variety of forms according to the degree of vividness in which the apprehension of God's personality enters into it. The very essence of religion is a form of fear produced by the realization of the being and nature of God. 'The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom' (Ps 111 10; Pr 9 10); but this is a form of emotion more properly called 'awe' or 'reverence.' It grows from the contemplation of what God is, and not of what He may do to one as an individual. Fear is thus tantamount to religion. Jacob swears to Laban by the 'Fear of his father Isaac' (Gn 31 53), which would appear to be either a method of avoiding the use of the Divine name or a metonymic use of the name of the emotion proper before God for the name of God Himself. To fear God is to worship Him (Job 1 1); but this noble form of fear may degenerate as the true, nature of God is less and less clearly understood, into a paralyzing sense of terror. This is discouraged and held up as something to be overcome and expelled from the heart (Ezk 2 1; I Jn 4 18).

FELIX (Φηλιξ): Antonius Felix, a freedman of the imperial family, brother of Pallas, the favorite of Nero, was appointed procurator of Judea at the request of the high priest Jonathan probably in 52 A.D. Tho a freedman, he was given a procuratorship with military command, 'an unheard-of novelty.' Both Josephus and Tacitus imply that Felix exercised some authority in Palestine before his appointment as Cumanus' successor, but their statements do not agree in details. Felix' predecessor Cumanus by his misgovernment left for Felix a disturbed province, which Felix in turn transmitted to Festus in a much worse condition: for 'with all manner of cruelty and lust he exercised royal functions in the spirit of a slave' (Tacitus). He was married three times, each time to a woman of royal lineage, his last wife being the Jewess Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I, whom he unscrupulously persuaded to desert her husband and further to defy Jewish law by marrying him, tho he had not become a Jew. Under the severity of his régime disturbances increased; the Zealots became aggressive, a band of secret assassins known as the Sicarii terrorized Jerusalem, and a fanatical outbreak, led by an Egyptian Jew (Ac 21 38), was crushed relentlessly. During the last two years of Felix' rule, while Paul was a prisoner in Cæsarea (Ac 23 24-24 27), a conflict arose between the Jews and Syrians of that place, which was referred to Rome for decision. Felix was recalled, but was acquitted, perhaps through the influence of Pallas. See Jos. Ant. XX 7 1-2 8 5-8; BJ II 12 8, 13 3-5; Tacitus, Annals XII. 54; History V, 9, Suetonius, Claudius, 28.

FELLOW: Besides meaning 'man' ('ish, I S 29 4 AV, and 'ēnōsh, Jg 18 25), 'fellow' in the O T represents (1) 'companion' (hābhēr, Ps 45 7), (2) 'compatriot' (āmūth, Zec 13 7), (3) 'fellow-countryman,' 'friend' (rēa', Ex 2 13; Jg 7 13 f.; I S 14 20). In the N T often for (4) 'this one' (οὗτος, used contemptuously, e.g., Mt 26 61, AV; Lk 22 59 AV), (5) 'man' (άνήρ, e.g., the 'loafers' in the market-place, Ac 17 5), (6) 'partner' (μέτοχος, He 1 9 [from Ps 45 7]), (7) 'comrade' (ἑταρος, Mt 11 16). S. D.—M. W. J.

FELLOW-CITIZEN, -HEIR, -MEMBER, -PARTAKER. See KINGDOM OF GOD, § 8 f.

FELLOW - DISCIPLE, -ELDER, -HELPER, -LABORER, -PRISONER, -SERVANT, -SOLDIER, -WORKER, YOKE-FELLOW. See CHURCH §§ 2 and 9.

FELLOWSHIP: This term represents (1) in Lv 6 2 AV the Heb šūmeth yādh, i.e., 'something placed in the hands,' meaning a 'deposit' or 'bargain' (So RV) (2) 'joint participation' (μετοχή, II Co 6 14), (3) most frequently 'communion,' 'community of possession' (κοινωνία), where the emphasis is not so much on the personal relationship as on the sphere of it; i.e., on the thing which is shared, the object of the common interest (e.g., I Co 1 9; II Co 8 4; Gal 2 9; Ph 3 10; I Jn 1 3 f.) See CHURCH AND ORGANIZATION, § 2. S. D.—M. W. J.

FELLOWSHIP WITH, TO HAVE: This phrase signifies (1) 'to be joined in alliance with' (hābhār, Ps 94 20), (2) 'to become partaker with' (κοινωνός γίνεσθαι, I Co 10 20), (3) 'to be joint partaker with' (συκοινωνεῖν, Eph 5 11; Ph 4 14 'communicate' AV; Rev 18 4). FENCED, FENCED CITY. See CITY, § 3.

FERRET: One of the list of unclean animals in Lv 11 30 AV. See PALESTINE, § 24.

FERRY-BOAT: The one occurrence of this word (II S 19 18) rests upon a doubtful Heb. text. It is likely that a verb instead of a noun should be read meaning either 'and they crossed the ford to bring over the king' or 'and they did the service of bringing over the king' (cf. Bib. Heb. ed. Kittel, in loc.). E. E. N.

FESTIVAL. See in general FASTS AND FEASTS.

FESTUS (Φηστος): Porcius Festus, a member of the Porcian gens, was appointed by Nero procurator of Judea in succession to Felix. He was apparently a man of good character, but entered on a governorship involved in difficulties, largely owing to the mismanagement of Felix. Apart from the N T and Josephus nothing is known of him. Owing to his relations with Paul, the date of his accession is important for N T chronology (Ac chs. 25, 26). Some scholars assign Festus' accession to 55 or 56 A.D., following the Eusebian Chronicle, which, however, is untrustworthy, and relying also on the statement of Josephus that the influence of Pallas with Nero saved his brother Felix when the Jews appealed against him to Rome. The fact that Pallas fell into disfavor early in the reign of Nero appears also to support this date. But he may have recovered his influence, or Josephus may be in error, and thus the way is open for a later date. Albinus succeeded Festus, after a few months' interval, not later than 62 A.D., and the governorship of Festus was short. On the whole, 58 A.D. seems the most probable date on which his procuratorship began. See NEW TESTAMENT CHRONOLOGY. R. A. F.—E. E. N.

FETTER. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

FEVER. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (1).

FIELD: Of the numerous terms rendered 'field,' the most commonly used are sādheh and sādhaq, which usually designate (a) the wild uncultivated land, in contrast to that which is more thickly inhabited or worked (cf. Gn 25 27, etc.), or (b) the open country, in contrast to the enclosed city or town (cf. Dt 21 1, etc.). The same term is also used in a more restricted sense for (c) the territory belonging to a particular tribe or people (e.g., Gn 36 35; cf. 14 7 RVmg., etc.) and (d) particular localities, as 'the fuller's field' (Is 7 3), etc. Other terms more rarely used are: (1) hūts, 'a place outside' (Job 5 10; Pr 8 26); (2) helqāh, 'portion' or 'lot' (II S 14 30); (3) she-dhēmāh, cultivated portions, as vineyards, etc. (Dt 32 32; Is 16 8; II K 23 4; Jer 31 40; Hab 3 17); (4) bar (Aram.), 'open country' (Dn 2 38, 4 12-32); (5) ἀγρός (Mt 6 28, etc.), with the same sense as (b) above; (6) χώρα (Jn 4 35; Ja 5 4), the same as (3) above; (7) χωρὸν (Ac 1 18 f.), like (d) above. See also AGRICULTURE, §§ 2-4. E. E. N.

FIERY HEAT. See DISEASE, § 4 (1).

FIERY SERPENT: A serpent whose bite was especially painful and poisonous (Nu 21 6). See PALESTINE, § 26; and SERAPHIM.

FIG, FIG-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 23; FOOD, § 5; and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

FIGHT. See WARFARE.

FIGURE: In Dt 4 16 the word translated 'figure' means a 'statue' or 'image' of a deity (cf. Driver, ICC in loc.). In I K 6 29 the Heb. word means 'carvings.' In Is 44 13 the idea is that of the 'build' of a man. In Ac 7 43, Rom 5 14 the Gr. is τύπος, 'type,' in the first instance, in the sense of image, in the second, used metaphorically. In He 9 9, 11 19 the original is παράβολή, 'parable,' i.e., 'similitude.' In He 9 24 the Gr. is ἀντίτυπα, 'anti-types,' which occurs also in I P 3 21 (sing). In Lv 26 1, Nu 33 52, Pr 1 6, Ac 7 44, RV has substituted 'figure' or 'figured' for the less accurate renderings of the AV. E. E. N.

FILE: The purely conjectural rendering of two Heb. words פִּימַיִרָה, happetsirāh phīm in I S 13 21. Recently the second word פִּימַי, pīm (perhaps to be pronounced payam) has been discovered inscribed on a small Heb. weight found near Jerusalem. This has led to a new rendering (by E. J. Pilcher) of the whole difficult passage, I S 13 20 f. (some words being still undetermined) as follows: 'And all Israel went down to the Philistines to forge every man his plowshare and his 'ēth, his ax and his goad; and the inducement (or payment) was a payam for the plowshares and for the 'ēthim and three qill'shōn for the axes and to put a point on the goad,' cf. PEFQ 1914, p. 99, and 1916, pp. 77-85.

FILLET: A ring or band about the capital of the pillars of the Tabernacle, for ornament, or perhaps of use in hanging curtains. Both the noun hāshūq (Ex 27 10, 11, 36 38, 38 10, etc.) and the verb hāshaq (Ex 27 17, 38 17, 28), to 'furnish with fillets,' occur. The fillets on the pillars at the door of the Tabernacle were overlaid with gold, those on the pillars of the court with silver. Some interpret 'fillet' to mean 'connecting-rods,' joining the tops of pillars, from which curtains were hung. For hūṭ (Jer 52 21, 'fillet' AV) RV gives 'line.' C. S. T.

FINE. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c); SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12; and as applied to the refining of metals see ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10 b.

FINE FLOUR. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12; and FOOD, § 1.

FINE LINEN: The words usually rendered 'fine linen' are (a) badh, (b) shēsh, and (c) būts. Of these (a) means 'linen,' as it was the material of certain priestly garments. In regard to (b) and (c) the evidence (archeological especially) favors 'linen' rather than 'cotton' as the proper rendering; (b) is the older term, (c) the later. In Pr 31 22 AV renders shēsh by 'silk.' In Pr 7 16 the Heb. term is of uncertain meaning. Cf. RV. See also LINEN. E. E. N.

FINGER: As used of God in an anthropomorphic sense, see GOD, § 2.

FINING POT. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10 b.

FIR, FIR-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

FIRE (for this the common Heb. word is 'ēsh = עֵשׂ in the N T. Two other Heb. words, 'ūr and b'ērāh, and two Aramaic, nūr and yēqēdhāh [Dn 3 22 f., 7 11] occur a few times): 'Fire' was used in both a literal and a figurative sense. (1) In a literal sense: (a) of its use for domestic purposes in processes of cooking (Ex 12 8, 9; Jn 21 9), and for warmth (Is 44 16; Jer 36 22; Mk 14 54). (b) of casting (Ex 32 24), working (Is 44 12), and refining (Jer 6 29) metals, and, therefore, a symbol of purification (Mal 3 2; Mk 9 49) and testing of character (Zec 13 9; Mal 3 3; I Co 3 13). (c) For burning refuse (Ex 12 10; Lv 8 17, 9 11), and infected garments (Lv 13 52). (d) It is viewed as a destructive agency in the form of lightning (Nu 11 1, 2, 3; II K 1 10), and in war in the burning of cities or property (Jos 6 24, 7 15; Jg 9 15; I S 30 1). Hence it was a figure of war (Is 10 17, 26 11; Jer 17 27). (e) As a means of punishment of grave offenses (Lv 20 14; Jos 7 16). (f) As an important means of offering sacrifices unto J' (Ex 29 18; Lv 1 9). Fire was to be kept continuously burning on the altar of burnt-offerings (Lv 6 13), and acceptance of sacrifices was shown by the fire of J' consuming the offering (Jg 6 21; I K 18 38). It was used in human sacrifice even in Israel (II K 16 3, 17 17), tho forbidden (Dt 18 10). Topheth, in the Valley of Hinnom, was the place of such sacrifices (Jer 7 31). (2) Symbolic and figurative use: (a) Fire accompanied theophanies (Gn 15 17; Ex 3 2) and was thus a symbol of God's protecting presence (Ex 13 22; Ps 78 14; Ex 40 38), of His glory (Ex 24 17; Dn 7 9), and of His wrath against sin (Dt 4 24; Jer 4 4; Am 5 6; Ps 89 46). (b) It was a symbol of the Holy Spirit (Mt 3 11; Lk 3 16; Ac 2 3). (c) Of the punishment of the wicked (Ps 68 2; Is 47 14; Jer 51 58; Mt 5 22, 13 50; cf. 'eternal fire,' Mt 18 8; Mk 9 48; Jude ver. 7; and 'lake of fire,' Rev 19 20). (d) Figuratively, sin, trouble, affliction, etc., are likened to fire, because of its destructive or purifying nature. Cf. also (b) and (d) under (1), above. C. S. T.

FIREBRAND: (1) 'ādāh, a 'bent stick' for stirring fire. In Am 4 11, Is 7 4, Zec 3 2 it is represented as almost consumed. (2) lappīdh, a 'torch,' made of a stick, with some absorbent material saturated with oil fastened on one end (Jg 15 4, 5). (3) zēq (in pl.), 'fire-missiles' (cf. Pr 26 18), or sparks, brands, as 'leaping,' or 'springing forth.' (4) mōqēdh, a 'burning mass' (Ps 102 3), a figure of J's judgment. C. S. T.

FIRST DAY: In the Priests' Code the first day of a festal season was considered to be specially significant (cf. Lv 23 7, 35, 39 f.; Nu 28 18). The 'first day' of the week in the N T usage (Mk 16 2 and ¶; Ac 20 7; I Co 16 2) means Sunday, which, as the day of the week on which Jesus rose from the dead, came to have a special significance for Christians, and gradually supplanted the Jewish Sabbath (Saturday) as the holy day of the Christian Church. As such, it was called 'the Lord's Day' (Rev 1 10; cf. Ac 20 7). E. E. N.

FIRST-FRUITS, FIRSTLINGS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 19.

FISH, FISHING. The waters of N. Palestine especially the Sea of Galilee and the streams of the Lebanon region abound in fish and from the earliest times, fishing must have been carried on extensively in those districts and fish must have formed a principal article of diet. The 'fish-gate' of Jerusalem (q.v.) and the fish-peddlers e.g., of Neh 13 16, are sufficient evidence of this. Nevertheless, the references in the Bible to fish and fishing are comparatively few. Fish, dāgh, dāghāh were taken with nets, or with hooks, or by spearing. The nets used were either the drag-net (mikkhōreth, Is 19 8; IIab 1 15; αγάνη, Mt 13 47) or the casting-net (herem, Ezk 26 5, etc.; ἀμφίβλητρον, Mk 1 16). The kind of net indicated by mitsūdhāh (Ec 9 12) is unknown, while δίκτυον, the common term for net in the Gospels, is probably generic in meaning (see also NET). For hooks several terms occur, as hakkāh (Job 41 1), tsinnāh (Am 4 2), šār (Am 4 2, here with the addition dāghāh, 'fishing'), and ἀγκίστρον (Mt 17 27). In Job 41 7 we have the sole O T reference to the fish-spear, tsiltsāl. In the Law distinction was made between clean and unclean fish (Lv 11 9-12; Dt 14 9 f.). For the fish of Palestine, see PALESTINE, § 26. For their use as food, see FOOD, § 8. See also TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 4. The art. Fish in EB is comprehensive and valuable. E. E. N.

FISHER'S COAT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2 (at the end).

FISH-GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

FISH-POOL. See HESHBON.

FITCHES: The Heb getsah (Is 28 25-27) appears to mean 'black cummin,' Nigella sativa, the black, bitter seeds of which were used as a condiment (see FOOD, § 4). In Ezk 4 9 the RV corrects the AV by reading 'spelt' instead of 'fitches.'

FIVE. See NUMBERS, SACRED AND SYMBOLIC, § 7; and CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

FLAG. See REED.

FLAGON: This is the AV rendering of the Heb. 'āshīshāh, which means 'cakes,' especially cakes of pressed grapes (raisins). These were prized as a refreshing article of diet (II S 6 19; I Ch 16 3; Song 2 5), and were also used in the Canaanite cultus-rites, so attractive to many Israelites (Hos 3 1). In Is 22 24 the Heb. is nebhēl, on which see BOTTLE. E. E. N.

FLASK. See ALABASTER.

FLAT NOSE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

FLAX (Heb. pēsheth [but usually in the pl. pish-tīm] and pish-tāh): In the O T the word is used comprehensively: (1) of the plant (Ex 9 31); (2) of the stalks laid out to dry (Jos 2 6); (3) of the fibers of the stalks from which linen was made (Pr 31 13; Is 19 9; Hos 2 5, 9); (4) of the cords, (Jg 15 14; Ezk 40 3) or wicks (Is 42 3; cf. Mt 12 20) made of flax; and (5) of the finished product, linen, woven from flax, of which a variety of articles was made, as garments (Lv 13 47 ff.; Dt 22 11; Ezk 44 17 f.), or girdles (Jer 13 1). The plant was extensively grown in Palestine (cf. Hos 2 5, 9), and the method of working it up into linen were well known. See also PALESTINE, § 22, DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5, ANIZAN LIFE, § 11; and LINEN. E. E. N.

FLAY, FLAYING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

FLEA. PALESTINE, § 26.

FLEECE: In Dt 18 4 gēz 'fleece' means literally 'shearing,' and 'the shearing of the sheep' means the 'wool,' the product of the annual sheep-shearing, the 'first' of which was to be given to the priesthood as a part of their means of support. The quantity covered by the term 'first' appears to have been left indefinite. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 19.

FLESH, FLESHLY: The word 'flesh' in Biblical usage signifies (1) the whole animate creation on earth (e.g., Gn 6 13). (2) The soft, meaty parts of an animal or man (e.g., Lv 4 11). (3) The body, or the surface of the body (e.g., Lv 6 10; Nu 8 7). (4) Human beings (e.g., Job 34 15), often in contrast to spiritual beings (e.g., Dn 2 11), and at times, especially in Paul, with emphasis on the moral weakness of man that is so closely connected with his bodily life (e.g., Ro 6 19, 7 18; Gal 5 17). Neither by the Bible in general nor by Paul in particular is it taught that the flesh is inherently sinful, tho this has been asserted. See also MAN. DOCTRINE OF, §§ 6, 7; and FAMILY, § 1. E. E. N.

FLESH-HOOK (māzlāgh and mizlāgh, 'hook'): A metal hook with one or more (three in I S 2 13) teeth, used for handling large pieces of flesh, especially in connection with sacrifices (I S 2 13 f.; Ex 27 3, 38 3; Nu 4 14; I Ch 28 17; II Ch 4 16).

FLINT: (1) ḥallāmīsh, a rocky formation of silica, common in Palestine. It was from a 'rock of flint' that water flowed for Israel in the desert (Dt 8 15; Ps 114 8). Olive-trees grew on flinty soil (Dt 32 13; cf. Job 29 6). Used figuratively of firmness (Is 50 7). (2) tsar, tsōr, tsūr, used figuratively in the same way (Is 5 28; Ezk 3 9). The last term is found in Jos 5 2, 3, where we read of 'knives of flint' used to perform circumcision. C. S. T.

FLOAT (Flotes) AV: The rendering of raphšō-dhōth (II Ch 2 15) from a root meaning 'to bind,' and dōbhrōth (I K 5 9, rafts RV) from dābhar, 'to drive.' What is meant is that the timber was brought by sea from Phenicia to Joppa in the form of logs.

FLOCK. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE.

FLOOD. 1. Introduction. The story of a universally destructive deluge in very early times is given in Gn 6 6-9 17, and the cataclysm is alluded to as 'the waters of Noah' in Is 54 9. In the N T the flood is regarded as an analog of baptism (I P 3 20 f.), and as an example of God's judgment on sinners (II P 2 5). In two apocalyptic discourses of the Gospels the history of Noah and the flood is used to illustrate the uncertainty of the Parousia or the coming of the Son of Man (Mt 23 38 f.; Lk 17 26 f.).

2. Literary Features of the Narrative. There appear to be some contradictions or discrepancies in the narrative, which affect the number of the animals taken into the ark, the duration, and the immediate cause of the deluge. In Gn 7 8, 9 (J) the distinction between clean and unclean animals is recognized, and Noah is commanded to take into the ark one pair of the latter and seven pairs of the former (7 2 [J]). The parallel account makes no such discrimination, mentioning only one pair of each species (6 19, 20, 7 14 [P]). One set of statements fixes the duration of the flood at 61 days (8 6, 8, 10, 12 [J]); in the parallel account it lasts 365 days (7 11, 13, 14; cf. 8 3 f. 14 [P]). The deluge is ascribed to rain only in 7 7, 12, 8 2b (J), while in 7 11 and 8 2a (P) it was the bursting forth of the waters under the earth and those above the firmament that brought on the catastrophe.

3. Sources. The explanation of these discrepancies is to be found in the composite character of the narrative, which is the result of weaving together two separate documents, the early Judean (J) and the later Priestly (P. See HEXATEUCH). Both documents, however, are at one in all points not mentioned above, and especially in regard to the great purpose of the deluge: it was the judgment of God upon a depraved race, and formed the watershed between two distinct eras in the history of mankind.

4. Not Meant as a Universal Deluge. The Scriptural phraseology does not imply a universal deluge; altho certain expressions seem to convey that idea. 'All the high mountains that were under the whole heaven were covered' (7 19); it was God's purpose to 'destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life' (6 17); every living thing is to be swept away 'from off the face of the ground' (7 4). It is put still more strongly in stating that the effect of the deluge was to destroy 'every living creature' (7 21-23). But these expressions are to be understood, partially at least, as instances of hyperbole, in which the Oriental delights (cf. Gn 41 67; Dt 2 25; I K 10 24; Lk 2 1), while, without exception, they are limited by the writer's geographical horizon, which was bounded by portions of Asia, Africa, and Europe (cf. Gn 10 and see GEOGRAPHY, § 1). If the narrative is approached from the standpoint of strict grammatical and historical exegesis, it is clear that the Scriptures themselves do not teach a universal deluge in our modern sense of the term. Consequently the acrimonious controversy between the theologians and scientists of the 18th cent. over this point was in no sense a debate over, a discrepancy between science and Biblical teaching, but rather a conflict between scientific principles and a dogma incorrectly based upon Scripture.

5. Difficulties involved in the Theory of a Universal Deluge. The difficulties involved in the assumption of a universal deluge are now generally acknowledged by Biblical scholars. Not only would the laws of hydrostatics be violated in the accumulation of such a great mass of water, but the climate of the globe would have been changed, making it impossible for animals to exist, even in the ark. To this should be added the practical difficulty of bringing animals from distant lands and islands to the valley of the Euphrates, and housing all known species in a vessel of the size of the ark. Nevertheless the Noachian deluge might have covered the area occupied by man. At an early age the genus Homo had a limited distribution, and, as a species, might easily have been swept away. A flood universal in this respect is all that a literal exegesis of the Biblical narrative demands. But the story of such a flood can neither be verified nor disproved historically, and consequently its value must lie in the moral and spiritual lessons it is designed to teach.

6. A Geological Diluvion. Sir John Prestwich and Professor G. F. Wright have maintained that the Noachian flood was a geological diluvion, due to the sudden submergence of the earth's surface. Professor Wright states his thesis with extreme caution, that 'since man came into the world there may have been changes of land level of sufficient extent and rapidity to destroy the human race, and fairly to meet the demands of the Biblical narrative when properly interpreted.'

The geological catastrophe occurred at the close of the postglacial period. The piling up of huge masses of ice disturbed the equilibrium of the earth's surface; in consequence there was a sudden submergence. With the disappearance of the ice there followed an upheaval. Prestwich presents other evidence for these geological changes in Europe and North Africa. In 1900 Professor Wright discovered similar evidence in Central Asia for the recent submergence of a large part of Asiatic Russia. The proofs of this theory are worthy of careful consideration, and should be examined in the literature given below.

It is to be noted, however, that some features of the Biblical narrative do not harmonize with the idea of a geological upheaval. The mountains are covered with water and reappear (7 19 ff., 8 4 ff.); as soon as the waters abate the earth assumes its former condition, for the dove brings an olive twig (8 11). To bring the length of the flood and the date of the Biblical story into harmony with the idea of a geological diluvion seems an impossibility; on the other hand, there are no a priori reasons against the possibility of such a geological catastrophe since the appearance of man on the earth.

7. Ethnic Flood-Legends. Most peoples of antiquity had a flood-legend. One notable exception were the Egyptians. Among the Greeks two traditions were current—that of the Ogygian deluge, which inundated Attica, and the story of the flood of Deucalion. The latter was probably the Babylonian account in a Hellenic mold, which later was intermixed with elements borrowed from the Biblical narrative. The Indian legend is connected with an incarnation of Bráhmá and Vishnu. The absence of a flood-legend from Egyptian folk-lore is due to the annual inundation of the Nile, which was viewed as the greatest blessing the land enjoyed. It is now known that flood-legends exist all over the world, but they are unequally distributed. They occur in the German and Scandinavian mythologies, and are found among the Mexicans, the Peruvians, the Indians of N. and S. America, and the aborigines of the islands of the Pacific. Flood-legends are conspicuously absent in Arabia, in northern and central Asia, in China and Japan, are hardly found anywhere in Europe (except Greece) and Africa. The theory that all these legends are reminiscences of a universal deluge is now generally discarded. Many are modifications and adaptations of the Biblical story which has been scattered world-wide by missionaries; others are due to special local causes. F. H. Woods (HDB, s.v.) classifies these legends into three groups with respect to their origin: (1) Those which are connected with cosmogonic myths, regarding water as a creative element. (2) Highly colored traditions of some historical event, or extraordinary natural phenomena, as the subsidence of an island or coast, the creation or destruction of an island by a volcano, a tidal wave, the inundation of a plain by the overflowing of a river, the formation of a lake, the melting of snow. (3) Flood-stories, which appear to have originated in an attempt to account for some otherwise unexplained fact, as the dispersion of peoples, differences of language, the color of the skin, the existence of fossils and glaciers.

8. The Babylonian Flood-Story. The Babylonian flood-story must be discussed more fully, as it closely resembles the Biblical account and furnishes the key for the interpretation of the latter. The former had long been known in the version of Berosus, but the cuneiform original was discovered 1872 in the library of Assurbanipal (660 B.C.). The story was reduced to writing at least as early as 2000 B.C. It constitutes Canto xi of the Babylonian Gilgamesh epic, in which Utnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah, reveals the secret of immortality to Gilgamesh. The gods having decided to destroy the city of Shurippak by a flood, Ea, the Babylonian Neptune, warns Utnapishtim to 'build a ship, to look after life.' Then follows the description of the ship. Its dimensions are different from those of Noah's ark, but it was built in 6 stories and pitched within and without with 'bitumen' (Heb. and Bab. words are identical). Into this ship Utnapishtim brings his family, his possessions, 'and all living creatures of all kinds.' Then is described the storm which terrifies men and sends even the gods to the edge of the heavens cowering like dogs. The tempest continues 6 days and nights; on the morning of the 7th a calm broods on the face of the waters, but the 'race of mortals' was no more and 'every voice was hushed'; 'all mankind had turned to clay.' The ship grounds on Mt. Nisir and on the 6th day after the Babylonian hero, like Noah, sends forth birds—a dove and a swallow which return, and a raven which finds the waters abated. Like the Biblical hero, Utnapishtim offers a sacrifice above which 'the gods gathered like flies.' Bel is enraged because Utnapishtim has escaped, but finally being appeased, he blesses Utnapishtim and his wife by conferring on them the gift of immortality. The points of similarity between the Bab. and Heb. stories are apparent on the surface, for the Heb. tradition as a whole was derived from Babylonia. But what the reader misses in the former is the lofty moral earnestness and the religious motive of the Biblical story. 'J' sends the deluge because the entire human race has become morally degenerate; in the Bab. account the flood is due to the caprice of the gods. The gross polytheism of the one and the lofty monotheism of the other are evident. Note the chaste anthropomorphism: 'J' smelled the sweet savor' of the sacrifice (8 21) and the offensiveness of the simile: 'the gods gathered like flies about the sacrifice.' Furthermore, the Noachian deluge manifests not only the judgment of God but also His grace (8 20-22; cf. I P 3 20 f.).

In recent years two fragments of a more ancient Babylonian recension have been discovered, in which the name of the hero is Atra-hasis. These fragments, however, add nothing to our knowledge of the details of the legend. A Sumerian version has been found at Nippur and has been dated between 2300 and 1200 B.C.; it has many points of contact with the Gilgamesh Epic. Perhaps the source of the Babylonian story was Sumerian.

Both stories, Babylonian and Hebrew, refer to the same event and are different versions of an early Semitic tradition. Two theories have been held by Assyriologists and Biblical scholars as to the relation of the two stories: (1) Both accounts derived the legend from a common fountain head; (2) The Hebrews borrowed their legend from the Babylonians. The consensus of modern scholarship favors the latter position. Clay, alone among Assyriologists, denies the Babylonian origin of the flood-story, and claims that the details point to an Amorite source. His own summing up of his case is as follows: 'The famine story, the force in nature which caused the deluge, the name of the hero, Noah, the mountains, the olive branches—these are not Babylonian, but Amorite. The words mabbūl 'flood' and tēbhāh 'ark' are not Babylonian' (Origin of Biblical Tradition, p. 188 [1923]). This theory of an Amorite origin of the Hebrew flood-legend demands a thorough investigation before it can be substituted for the older view. The theory propounded by Cheyne (E. Brit., s.v.), jointly with Zimmern (EB, s.v.), that the Babylonian legend is a nature myth has not been generally accepted. An actual, extraordinary inundation of the plain of Babylonia lies at the basis of the story. There was probably an unusual amount of rain, accompanied by a hurricane from the SE., and an earthquake which produced a tidal wave or lowered the surface of the land. Such a combination of natural phenomena would be sufficient to produce a great catastrophe in Babylonia.

FLOUR. See FOOD, § 1; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

FLOWER: While Palestine is noted for the variety and beauty of its flowers, little is said of them in the Bible except by way of reference to them as illustrations of quickly vanishing temporal beauty and glory (Is 28 1, 4, 40 6 f.; Ja 1 10 f.; I P 1 24). In Song 2 12 and Mt 6 28 (|| Lk 12 27) there is an appreciation of their beauty. In the carving and embroidery of the Temple and Tabernacle flowers had an important place, as also in the ornamentation of the metal-work (Ex 25 31 ff., 37 17 ff.; I K 7 26, 49). In Song 5 13 for 'flowers' AV, the RV has 'banks,' or, more correctly, in the mg., 'towers.' The 'flower of her age' (Gr. ὑπέρανθος) in I Co 7 36 means the age when it was customary for maidens to marry (in Greece about 20 years). In I S 2 3 the whole expression 'in the flower of their age' in the Heb. means simply 'men' (cf. RVmg.). In Lv 15 24, 33 the Heb. means 'separation' and the reference is to the menstrual discharge. FODDER: The Heb. b'ḥil seems to mean 'mixed food' ('grain') used as provender (so AV in Job 6 5, but 'fodder' in both AV and RV in Is 30 24). The denominative verb bālal occurs in Jg 19 21 ('gave the asses fodder' 'provender' AV). In Gn 24 25, 32, 42 27, 24; Jg 19 10 mišpō 'fodder' is rendered 'provender' in both AV and RV.

FOLD. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 6.

FOLK: This word is used in Gn 33 15 and Pr 30 26 to render the common word 'am, 'people.' The RV of Jer 51 58 has the correct rendering. In Ac 5 16 the Gr. means simply 'sick'; 'folk' is an addition of the EV.

FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS.

I. ARTICLES OF FOOD.

1. Vegetable Foods.

1. Grains. The soil of Palestine furnished everything the Israelites needed for their sustenance. The effect produced by the climate on the physical constitution made the vegetable foods the most important, as it does to-day. First among these were the grains, and especially wheat, ḥiṭṭāh, and barley, s'ōrah. The kernels were sometimes roasted or parched, qālī (I S 17 17, 25 18; II S 17 28); more rarely the ears were roasted at the fire (cf. Lv 2 14). The primitive way of grinding the grain was to crush it in a mortar, mdhōkhāh (Nu 11 8), or makhtēsh (Pr 27 22), with a pestle, 'ēlī (Pr 27 22), making the bruised grain of Lv 2 14, 16, which was eaten without further preparation. Probably it is this, or porridge made from it, which is denoted by the word 'ārīšāh (Nu 15 20; Ezk 44 30, 'dough' EV). Generally, however, the grain was ground into meal, qemāh. In distinction from ordinary meal, šōleth or qemāh šōleth designated a very fine meal, which in later times was used with sacrifices (Lv 2 1, etc.). Meal made from barley was called, like the grains of which it was made, s'ôrîm (Nu 5 15; Ezk 4 9).

2. Bread. The dough, bâtsêq, was kneaded in a kneading-trough, mish'ereh. Leaven, s'ôr, was usually mixed only with bread that was intended to be taken on a journey. Such bread was called hâmêts; unleavened bread was termed mats'sâh. The loaf was molded by the hand into the form of a disk—from which form it derived its name kikkâr ('circle')—and was about the thickness of one's thumb, so that it could easily be broken (cf. Is 58 7). Bread was baked in a bake-oven, tannûr. The lumps of dough were flattened firmly against the heated wall of the oven or spread on the stone within. At times the loaves were simply placed in the hot ashes or on red-hot stones (I K 19 6, mg.), in which case care had to be taken to turn them at the proper time (cf. Hos 7 8) and see illustrations in column 2. Such loaves, or cakes, were the so called ash-cakes ('uggâh, Hos 7 8, or 'cakes baken on the coals,' I K 19 8).

Corresponding to our pancakes were the cakes cooked in a pan, marhesheth, well-known to the Bedawin of to-day (cf. Niebuhr, Beschreibung, etc., p. 52). Possibly the same thing is meant by nîqqûdhîm (cracknels AV, I K 14 3). An especially thin, round cake is evidently meant by râqîq (Ex 29 2, 23) while hallâh (Lv 2) refers probably to one somewhat thicker and perforated. Frequently cakes were spread with oil (Lv 2 4; Ezk 16 13), or the dough was mixed with oil (Nu 11 8; cf. Lv 2 5), or honey (Ex 16 31). In times of famine, bread was also made of beans, pôl, lentils, âdâshîm, millet, dôhan, and spelt, kus'sâmîm (Ezk 4 9).

Tâbûn, or Small Oven, Used in Baking. (Under View.)

3. Vegetables. As a relish with bread, vegetables and fruit were used. The leguminous vegetables, yârâq (Pr 15 17; Dt 11 10), also 'esebh' (Gn 9 3), such as beans (II S 17 28), lentils (cf. pottage of lentils Gn 25 34), marsh-millet (Ezk 4 9), cucumbers, qînônîm, marônîm, âshûppîm, and especially garnc shânîm (Nu 11 5), onions, ôisâîm, and leeks hâtîr (Nu 11 5), were all well-known. In times of stress, wild gourds, paqqû'ôth sâdkeh, prepared with meal, were used in pottage (II K 4 39 f.), also salt-wort, mallûah (Job 30 4).

4. Spices. The spices were cummin, kammôn, ûichas, i.e., black cummin or dill, getsah (Is 28 25; Mt 23 23), mint, hêbêcepov (Mt 23 23; Lk 11 42), and mustard, ôvâpîs (Mt 13 31, 17 20). Salt, melah, was always very important. 'To eat a man's salt' meant to eat of his food (Ezr 4 14). A 'covenant of salt' was unbreakable; it was ratified by a meal seasoned with salt, i.e., of bread and salt, as is the custom to-day (cf. Nu 18 19; II Ch 13 5).

5. Fruits. The fruits, p'eri (cf. Gn 1 29), known and used were: figs, especially the early fig, bik-kûrah (Is 28 4; Jer 24 2), and the late fig, t'ânâh (Jer 8 13, 29 17). The latter were generally dried and pressed into round or square cakes, d'bhêlah (I S 25 18; II K 20 7). Grapes, 'ânâbhîm and 'eshkâl' ânâbhîm (Nu 13 23 f.), were used both fresh and dried, i.e., as raisins, tsimmûqîm (I S 25 18, 30 12). They were also, like figs, pressed into cakes, d'bhêlim (I S 25 18). It is uncertain whether the Israelites were acquainted with grape-honey, since the Arabic

dîbs, corresponding to the Heb. d'bhâsh, 'honey' EV, is used both for the artificial fruit-honey as well as for the natural product (cf. Gn 43 11; Ezk 27 17). Olives were eaten both raw and prepared, as they are to-day. Besides these may be mentioned also the pomegranate, rimmôn (Dt 8 8; Song 4 3), the fruit of the mulberry-fig, shiqmâh (sycamore Am 7 14), which was eaten by the poor, the fruit of the date-palm, tâmâr, which also was treated in the same manner as figs and grapes, the pistachio nuts, bo'nâm (Gn 43 11), almonds, sh'qedhîm (Gn 43 11), and walnuts, 'êghôr' (Song 6 11). The dried fruit of the carob-tree—the so called St.-John's-bread—χεράτιον, husks EV (only in Lk 15 16), was more fit for swine than for men. The unripe husks were frequently used to give water a pleasant taste. It is a matter of debate as to whether the Israelites were acquainted with the apple. In the Hellenistic period many varieties of produce were imported from other countries—mustard, pumpkins, beans, lentils from Egypt, asparagus, horse-beans, Persian nuts, etc.

2. Animal Foods.

6. Milk. Next to bread and vegetables the most important food was milk, hālābh, both of larger and smaller cattle (Dt 32 14), especially goat's milk (Pr 27 27), which was usually kept in skins, nō'dh (Jg 4 19). The Bedawin alone used camel's milk. As a drink the fresh milk, which in a hot climate develops a sour taste soon after milking, is most effective in quenching thirst. Among the peasantry of to-day no meal is served without this sour milk (cf. Gn 18 8). Cream, hem'āh, is mentioned frequently (Gn 18 8; Is 7 22, etc.), but the word means also thick milk, cheese (Pr 30 33), and probably butter. At the present day butter is made by pressing and shaking a goatskin filled with milk and hung between poles. The modern Arabs use a great deal of butter, both fresh and melted. Whether this was also the case with the Israelites in Palestine is doubtful, since they had olive-oil to take its place. It is also probable that they were acquainted with the 'sweet milk cheese,' hārītē-hālābh (Is 17 18). The special word for cheese is g'bhānāh (Job 10 10), which was in all probability prepared then as at the present. The curdled milk is first drained of its liquid, the curd is then salted and molded into lumps the size of one's hand and finally placed in the sun to dry. To-day such cheese is often mixed with water and furnishes with its somewhat sour taste a most cooling drink.

7. Honey. By honey, d'bbhash, so often mentioned in connection with milk, not only bee-honey but also fruit-honey is meant. While bee-culture was known to the Israelites, wild bees were abundant, as at the present time (Dt 32 13; Is 14 25 f.). The liquid honey, nōpheth tsūphīm, that drips from the comb, ya'ar or ya'rath d'bbhash (Is 14 25, 27), is mentioned many times (Ps 19 11; Pr 16 24, etc.), and is still highly prized. Honey was used with pastry (Ex 16 31) and mingled with the drink as well as eaten alone.

8. Fish. There are but few notices concerning fish as an article of diet (cf. Nu 11 5). In fact, little is said of them at all in the O T (cf. Jer 16 16; Ezk 47 10; Ec 9 12). But they must have been as much relished then as in the days of Jesus (Mt 7 10, 14 17, 15 34; Lk 24 42; Jn 21 9). The last two references show that they were often broiled and eaten with honey. According to Dt 14 10, Lv 11 9, fish without fins and scales were unclean and not to be eaten. It was in postexilic times that the Jews came to use fish in large quantities. In the neighborhood of the 'fish-gate' in Jerusalem there was the fish-market (Zeph 1 10; Neh 3 3, 12 39; II Ch 33 14), where sundried or salted fish were sold. According to Neh 13 16 they were imported by Tyrian dealers. Others came from Egypt, where cured fish constituted an important article of export. In later times the salting of fish was extensively carried on in Palestine, tho the industry was learned from foreigners (cf. the name of the town Taricheæ, 'curing-places,' from τάριχος, a 'cured fish,' at the S. end of the Sea of Galilee). See also FISH.

9. Reptiles and Locusts. From the prohibition in Lv 11 29 f. it would seem that lizards, tsābh, were occasionally eaten, just as to-day in many districts the Bedawin are fond of the daff, which corresponds to the tsābh, tho the qualifying phrase 'after its kind' in the passage cited may be intended to give the word a quite general meaning. According to Lv 11 21 f. it was allowable to eat locusts—the varieties 'arbeh, sol'am, hargōl, and hāghābh, being expressly mentioned. It is probable that this was a habit surviving from the earlier nomadic times against which Dt 14 19 utters a protest without actually forbidding it.

10. The Use of Meat. Meat has always been more rarely used as food in the Orient than with us: only on the royal table was it an article of daily diet (I K 5 3), and this was probably because of the daily offering (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). Otherwise animals were slaughtered for food only on festal occasions, such as the yearly pilgrimages to the Sanctuary, haggīm, and the annual festivals of families or relatives, or under special circumstances, such as visits, etc. (cf. Gn 18 7; II S 12 4). The primitive style of preparing the meat was by roasting. It was not until they lived in Palestine and came under the influence of the Canaanites that the Israelites learned to boil their meat (cf. see the AV, Ex 23 19; cf. broth, Jg 6 19; I S 2 13), and even then, in the Passover ritual, roasting—the old custom of the nomadic shepherds—was retained. The supply of meat was derived from the cattle-raising industry. Sheep were of greatest importance for this purpose (I S 25 11, 18, etc.). Lambs, kārim (Am 6 4), up to three years old were favorites. In addition, fatted calves, m'ri' (Is 1 11), and oxen (I S 14 32) are referred to, also kids, g'dhā 'izzīm (Gn 27 9, etc.). The hindquarters, shōq (I S 9 24), thighs, yārekḥ, and shoulders, kāthēph (Ezk 24 4), were considered the best parts. It is evident from Gn 27 6 ff. that the women of Israel, even in early times, were skilful in preparing meat. The prohibition in Ex 23 19 shows that it was common to boil the young animals in milk, as is the custom among the Arabs to-day. Venison was somewhat rare, but found on the royal table (I K 5 3). This was due to the fact that there was no large extent of wild land, and the Israelites, moreover, were not specially fond of hunting (cf. Gn 25 27). According to Dt 14 3 ff. and Lv 11 1 ff. it was allowable to eat only animals that chew the cud and have cloven hoofs. Dt names, in addition to oxen, sheep, and goats, the hart, 'ayyāl, gazel, ts'bhā, fallow deer, yahmūr, wild goat, 'aqqō, antelope, dishōn, oryx, t'ō, and the zemer, probably a variety of deer or stag. Among the fowl, doves, yōnāh, and turtle-doves, tōr, also quail, s'lāw (Ex 16 12 f.), were eaten, and from Is 10 14, Lk 11 12, it may be inferred that eggs also were an item of food. It was forbidden to eat any animal not duly slaughtered, e.g., such as had fallen or was torn—a prohibition probably due to the ancient prejudice regarding the shedding of blood (cf. I S 14 32 ff.; Dt 12 16, 23, etc.).

11. The Preparation of Food. Utensils. Cooking was done by men as well as by women. The former indeed considered it their duty only to slaughter and boil or roast the meat, as the Bedawin and Fellahin do to-day. It was the task of the women to grind the meal, bake the bread and cakes, make the cheese and butter, prepare the vegetables, etc. (cf. Gn 18 6; I S 8 13). Even women of the royal family occasionally engaged in such work (cf. II S 13 8). It was an exception for a man to prepare vegetables (cf. Gn 25 29; II K 4 38). Cooks, ṭabbāḥ, m. sing., are mentioned (I S 9 23, cf. 8 13, f. plur.), but were found only in some of the more wealthy homes. Bakemeats, 'baked food' (Gn 40 17, RV), refers to delicacies prepared by the cooks of the royal household. There were bakers, ʿōphām, only in the larger towns (Hos 7 4).

The furnishings of a Hebrew kitchen were very simple. In addition to the hand-mill and bake-oven there were the vessels, kadh, which the women filled with water at the spring or well, and carried home on their shoulders (Gn 24 14). In such vessels meal and other similar things were kept (I K 17 12). Meat was boiled in pots of earthenware and of brass. Inasmuch as the manufacture of the latter had been learned from the Phenicians (I K 7 13 f.), they were similar in form to those of Phenicia. A number of names of such vessels, or dishes have come down to us, but it is no longer possible to distinguish clearly among them (e.g., kiyyōr, dūdh, qallāḥath, pārūr, ṣēr, tsēlāḥāh, ṣaph, mizrāq, kaph, I K 7 40, 50; I S 2 14; II Ch 35 13; τρύβλιον, Mk 14 20). For fruits and bakemeats there were baskets of various sorts, of which we know the names, but not their different forms (dūdh, Jer 24 2; ṣal, Gn 40 17; teneʿ, Dt 26 2). The three-pronged forks, mazlēgh, of I S 2 13 were used, not for eating, but for drawing the meat out of the pot. Knives, maʾākhēleth, were used only for slaying the animals and cutting the meat for cooking (Gn 22 6, 10). Liquids were kept usually as they are to-day, in goatskin 'bottles,' ḥēmeth (Gn 21 15), and nō'dh (Jg 4 19); only in later times, and then rarely, were metal vessels used for this purpose.

II. BEVERAGES.

12. Water. The most common beverage, especially in towns, was water (I S 30 11; I K 19 6, 8), which was collected mainly in the cistern (bōr) that every well-appointed house possessed (II S 17 18; Jer 38 6). These cisterns were generally made wider at the bottom so as to keep the water cooler. The opening was covered with one or more stone slabs, both to prevent accidents and to guard against a too free use of the water by others. Wells, b'ēr, furnishing 'living' spring water (Gn 26 19; Nu 21 1 ff.; Jn 4 11), were rarer and most highly prized. The water of such springs was usually collected in basins that were walled up and covered over, into which one descended by steps. They were the common possession of a clan or community. See WATER.

13. Wine, etc. In the heat of the harvest time use was frequently made of a sour drink, ḥōmets (Ru 2 14), a mixture of water and wine, yayin, or some other strong drink, shēkhār. Wine was in common use, as it was produced in abundance. Both the must, i.e., 'new wine,' ṭirōsh, and the wine proper, i.e., after its fermentation, were drunk. Whether it was customary in earlier times to mix the wine with water is questionable, and can not be proved from Is 1 22. In II Mac 15 39, and in the Mishna (Pesaḥ 7 13) there is evidence of such a custom, but it may have been due to Greek and Roman influence. There was, indeed, an old custom of 'mixing' wine, but this consisted in adding spices to strengthen it or improve its taste (Song 8 2; Is 5 22; Ps 75 9; Pr 9 5). It was usual to strain, zāraq, the wine through a cloth in order to free it from dregs and insects. The method of preparing the intoxicating drink, shēkhār is unknown. According to Song 8 2 pomegranates, ʿāṣiṣ rimmōnīm, were used for the purpose. It is probable that the Israelites were also acquainted with palm-wine, pressed from soaked ripe dates. It is possible also that they were acquainted with the Egyptian barley-wine (cf. Herod. ii. 77; Pliny, HN xiv. 29; Mishna, Pesaḥ 3 1). In the Mishna cider (Terumoth 11 2) and honey-wine (Shab. 20 2) are mentioned.

14. Changes in Respect to Food. The course of time brought with it changes in respect to the food used by the Israelites. The original simplicity of the nomadic days gradually gave way, especially among the well-to-do, under the influence of a more self-indulgent mode of life, fostered by prosperity and intercourse with the outside world. The example set by the court was not without influence (I K 5 2). The various sorts of fine pastry which are mentioned in the Law (cf. Lv ch. 2) reveal the advance made in the art of cooking. It is likely also that the painstaking care shown in the preparation of spiced wines was characteristic of the period of the Kingdom. After the Exile the Jews learned to import many new varieties of food. When the exiles returned they brought with them hens, and afterwards eggs were a favorite article of food (cf. Lv 11 12). From Egypt came pickled fish, τὰρῆς (see § 8, above). Egyptian beer, ζύθος, mustard, gourds, beans, lentils were also imported from Egypt. Tyrians brought sea fish to the Jerusalem market (Neh 13 16). Finally, the use made by the people generally of Babylonian pulp, Median beer, Bithynian cheese, Persian nuts, asparagus, etc., gives clear evidence of how, with increased prosperity and contact with the outside world, a taste for more delicate foods had manifested itself among the Jews.

FOOL, FOOLISH, FOOLISHNESS, FOLLY: 1.

In the O T these words are found mainly in the Wisdom Lit. (Job, Pr, Ec). The various original terms express many varieties of meaning which the English words only imperfectly reproduce. (1) nābhāl, n'bhālāh (rare in the Wisdom Lit.) signify more than mere folly. The verb means to 'despise,' 'contemn' (cf. Dt 32 15). The nābhāl, then, is one who is positively bad, despising what is right, and n'bhālāh is open, wilful badness (cf. Gn 34 7; Dt 22 21; Jos 7 15; Jg 19 23, 20 6, 10; II S 3 33, 13 12, 13; Ps 14 1, 53 1, 74 22; Pr 17 7, 21, 30 22; Is 32 5, 6 [cf. AV], etc.). (2) ʾiwweleth, ʾēwīl, and yāʾal mean simply 'folly,' 'fool,' 'foolish,' 'to be foolish.' The root idea is thought to be 'to be thick,' but this is uncertain. While frequent in Pr (1 7, 5 23, etc.), elsewhere they occur only in Nu 12 11; Job 5 2, 3; Ps 38 5, 69 5, 107 17; Is 19 11, 35 8; Jer 4 22, 5 4, 50 36; Hos 9 7, 13; Zec 11 15. (3) keṣel, kṣil, kṣilūth. The root kṣl expresses the idea of 'thickness' and these terms signify 'intellectual dullness.' They are the favorite terms in Pr and Ec (cf. Pr 1 22; Ec 2 14, etc.) and are found only in Ps 49 10, 13, 85 8, 92 6, 94 8; Jer 10 8 outside of these books. (4) šākhāl, šekhel, šikhālūth, found often in Ec (1 17, 2 10, etc.), mean simply 'fool,' 'foolish,' 'folly,' i.e., 'lack of moral good sense.' (5) Of other less used terms, those from the root hālāl mean 'arrogant' or even 'mad' (Job 12 17; Ps 5 5, 73 3 (cf. RV), 75 4); those from tāphal mean literally 'insipid' (Job 1 22, 24 12; Jer 23 13; La 2 14; cf. Job 6 6). In Job 4 18 the meaning is 'error'; on Ps 73 22 cf. RV; in Pr 9 6 'foolish' means 'simple.' The frequency of the mention of such terms in Pr and Ec is due to the fact that 'wisdom' according to the view of the Wisdom Schools was not a speculative and abstract concept, but a practical one. The wise man understood how to live correctly, while the fool was ignorant, or negligent, or defiant of the rules of correct living. Since these books deal largely with the matter of practical life, setting forth the maxims in obedience to which it may be attained, it was natural that the reverse side—the fool and his foolishness—should often be spoken of by way of illustration or contrast.

2. The N T usage calls for little comment. 'Fool' is perhaps too strong a term in Lk 24 25 and Eph 5 15 (cf. RV). On Ro 1 21, 10 19 also cf. RV. In most other cases in the N T these terms are translations of ἀνόητος, ἄφρων, or μωρός (with their compounds, or derivatives), of which the first two mean literally 'without wit' or 'sense,' the last 'dull,' 'sluggish,' 'stupid,' altho all were used in a more general sense.

E. E. N.

FOOT: In addition to its literal use in numerous places, because of its position as the lowest part of the human body, 'foot' is used in various figures of speech to express: (1) Subjection, from the Oriental custom of placing the foot on the vanquished (Jos 10 24; II S 22 39; Ps 8 8, 47 4; Ro 16 20; I Co 15 25). Humility, in salutation, supplication, or homage (Dt 33 3; II K 4 27; Est 8 3; Mk 5 22; Rev 1 17), as of a disciple at the feet of his teacher (Lk 10 39; Ac 22 3), or as shown in the act of washing the feet of another (Jn 11 2, 13 5). (2) Poetically, the part of the body in action is used for the man himself (Ps 25 15; Jer 18 22; Lk 1 79; Ac 5 9). Washing of feet, customary at the end of a journey, or on entering a house, was an act of courtesy to a guest. In AV kēn, the 'base' of the laver, is rendered 'foot' (Ex 30 18, etc.). C. S. T.

FOOTMAN. See WARFARE, § 4. For the weapons of the footman see in general ARMS AND ARMOR.

FOOTSTOOL: Twice an exact translation of kebhesh (II Ch 9 18), and of ὑποπόδιον (Ja 2 3). It is elsewhere the translation, in Dt, of the late word hādōm, 'stool,' and in the N T of ὑποπόδιον, with the addition 'of the feet.' The footstool is used figuratively of the earth (Is 66 1; Mt 5 35; Ac 7 49), of the Temple (La 2 1), of the Ark (Ps 99 5, 132 7; I Ch 28 2), and of enemies, in a metaphor of their conquest by the Messianic King (Ps 110 1; Lk 20 43, etc.).

C. S. T.

FORBID (in the expression 'God [or the Lord] forbid'): In the O T this is the rendering of the Heb. hālālāh, 'profanation,' i.e., in reference to J" (I S 24 6, 26 11; I K 21 3; I Ch 11 19). For other instances changed by RV see FAR. In the N T 'God forbid' is the translation of the Gr. μὴ γένοιτο, i.e., 'let it not be.'

E. E. N.

FORCES. See WARFARE, §§ 3, 4.

FORD: In the O T a 'ford,' or place of crossing, is mentioned in connection with three rivers, the Jabbok (Gn 32 22), the Arnon (Is 16 2), and the Jordan (Jos 2 7; Jg 3 28). In antiquity bridges were almost unknown and fords were therefore of great importance. The Jordan has a large number of fords, some of which are impassable when the river is high. See also PALESTINE, § 12 (a) and (b).

E. E. N.

FORECAST: The word in Dn 11 24 f. AV means 'to think,' 'plan,' or 'desire,' as is indicated in RV.

FOREFATHER: This term occurs but once in the O T (Jer 11 10). The same Heb. original (in the sing.) is rendered 'first father' in Is 43 27. In the N T πατέρες (II Ti 1 3) means 'ancestors.' See also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 2, 4.

E. E. N.

FOREHEAD: The forehead is often treated in a somewhat symbolic way, as indicative of the character or personality (e.g., 'a harlot's forehead,' Jer 3 3; cf. Ezk 3 8 f.). It was on the forehead of the high priest that the golden plate with its inscription 'Holy to Jehovah' was placed (Ex 28 38). Marks, or signs, or names are spoken of as placed on the foreheads of the faithful (Ezk 9 4, where the mark is the Heb. letter n in its old form X or +; Rev 7 3, 9 4, 14 1, 22 4), or of the servants of the beast (Rev 13 16, 14 9, 17 5, 20 4).

FOREIGNER. See GENTILES.

FOREKNOW, FOREKNOWLEDGE, FOREORDAIN. See in general ELECTION.

FOREPART: In Ac 27 41, generally for the prow of the ship. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

FORERUNNER: The rendering in He 6 20 of πρόδρομος, which is applied to Christ, who as eternal High Priest enters in our behalf into the Divine presence, thus insuring our personal access to God. It is used also in the LXX. of Nu 13 (21) 20 and Is 28 4 for the first ripe fruits, and in Wis 12 8 for the advance guard of an army. See also JESUS CHRIST, § 4, and JOHN THE BAPTIST.

M. W. J.

FORESAIL, FORESHIP: Technical terms used only in the account of Paul's voyage (Ac 27 40, 30). See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

FORESKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST. See PALESTINE, § 21.

FOREST IN ARABIA (יַעַר בְּאַרָבִי, ya'ar ba-'ārābh): A forest or thicket, probably a hiding-place for Arabian merchantmen of the tribe of the Dedanites (Is 21 13). Site unknown. The second word is translated by many 'in the steppe'; by others the vowel-pointing is changed to mean 'in the evening.'

FOREST OF CARMEL. See CARMEL.

FOREST OF HARETH. See HERETH.

FOREST OF LEBANON. See LEBANON.

FORFEIT. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c).

FORGER. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10; and TUBAL CAIN.

FORGIVE, FORGIVENESS (also in the O T pardon, and in the N T remission): The idea of forgiveness may occur either in religious or in social relations. In both cases it is the annulling of a ground of estrangement, or offense, by the estranged or offended person. The principles which underlie it are viewed as the same, and the conditions are at least similar, if not absolutely identical, whether it is God's forgiveness of man or man's forgiveness of his fellow man (Mt 6 12). The term is also used of the free cancellation of a debt which is overdue (Mt 18 27). Hence sin is looked upon as a debt (Mt 6 12, 14). In general what is forgiven may be a personal indignity or offense, depriving one of his rightful property, or honor (Nu 14 19; Mt 18 21; Lk 17 3); or it may be a violation of moral law, whether viewed as a Divine prescription or an inherent right. The vast majority of cases of forgiveness in the Scriptures are of this latter type (Jos 24 19; Ro 4, 7).

The conditions of forgiveness are repentance and reparation, or atonement; but they are not mechanically conceived, nor presented as equally indispensable in every case. In fact, neither seems to have been fulfilled when Jesus on the cross forgave His executioners. The ground for His forgiving was that they knew not what they were doing (Lk 23 34). In the parable of the prodigal son, while repentance is a condition fully met by the conduct of the offender, nothing is said of atonement, or reparation. The same is true in Ps 103 1, 8-13. But in the more formal treatment of the subject both atonement and repentance are made conditions (Mk 1 4; Lk 24 47; Ac 2 38), and reparation is prescribed in the law alluded to in He 9 22.

The nature of forgiveness is shown in the different forms of its effect. One of the most frequent words in the O T pictures it as the taking off, or away, of that which is forgiven, as if it were a blot, or excrescence (nāsā, Gn 50 17). Again, it is the act of covering what is forgiven, as if it were a blemish. This is strictly an O T conception (Ps 78 38), and is related to the sacrificial notion of covering sin with the blood of the expiatory victim. But it is also used in the N T (1 P 1 9; Ja 5 20). A third way of speaking of forgiveness is suggestive of the conferring of a gratuity. The underlying thought here is, of course, the canceling of the payment of a debt (Lk 7 43; II Co 2 7). Still another manner of speaking puts what is forgiven into the class of things cast, or sent away. This is the most frequent, and is designated by the O T term šālah (e.g., Ps 103 3) and by the N T ἀφίημι. In a single instance (Ro 4 25) forgiveness is made a passing by or overlooking of sin.

The forgiveness of sin is the specific prerogative of God Himself (Mk 2 9); and in the apostolic teaching forgiveness is secured through Jesus Christ (Eph 1 7; Col 1 14). The same was anticipated in the words of Jesus claiming the privilege for the Son of Man of forgiving sin (Mk 2 10). For unpardonable sin, see SIN. See also RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT.

A. C. Z.

FORK: The only occurrence of this term in the EV is in I S 13 21. The Heb. here is sh'losh ('three') qill'shōn, usually taken to mean 'a three-pronged fork' (as the root qlsh has in Aramaic the sense of 'thin'). But the meaning is, after all, obscure. See Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the Books of Samuel, p. 80. See also AGRICULTURE, § 7; and FOOD, § 11.

E. E. N.

FORM: I. The rendering of several Gr. words: (1) μορφή, which occurs only in Ph 2 6 f., where it is used by the Apostle of the existence form in which Christ externalizes His essential being. In His pre-existent state it is the form in which the Divine Being (θεός) externalizes Himself in the world of Spirit; in His incarnate state it is the form in which the creature (ἄνθρωπος) externalizes itself in the world of matter; (2) εἶδος, which in Jn 5 37 ('shape' AV) and Lk 3 22 ('shape' AV) has reference to the externalization of the Divine Being to human vision, and in I Th 5 22 ('appearance' AV) refers to the outward manifestations of evil, from which the Apostle urges his readers to abstain; (3) μόρφωσις, which in Ro 2 20 refers to the essential substance of knowledge (γνώσις) and truth (ἀλήθεια) which the Jew possessed in the Law, but which he failed to appreciate and apply; and in II Ti 3 5 to the form of godliness which the degenerate religionists predicted by the Apostle are to hold externally, but to deny in character and life; (4) τύπος, which in Ro 6 17 is used of the special form of gospel truth that had characterized the Apostle's preaching, and had been appropriated by his readers, and in Ac 23 25 ('manner' AV), less significantly, of the cast of Claudius Lysias' letter. (5) In II Ti 1 13 RV has substituted 'pattern' for 'form,' the less accurate AV rendering of ὑποτύπωμα.

II. See also GOD, § 2; and MAN, § 2.

M. W. J.

FORMER, FORMER THINGS: The expression 'former things' occurs frequently in Is chs. 41 ff. It refers to the Divine knowledge of history by which J" was able to set forth accurately through His prophets what was to take place. The prophet challenges the representatives of the other religions to show any such knowledge on the part of their gods. See Zec 14 9, 200 East and Dead Sea. E. E. N.

FORNICATOR, FORNICATION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c); and MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 4.

FORSWEAR. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b).

FORT, FORTIFY, FORTRESS: Every city in antiquity was fortified ('fenced,' often, in AV) by its wall and citadel. See CITY, § 3. For the terms 'fort,' fortress' (AV) the RV gives other renderings in a number of places. In II S 5 9, Jer 16 19, Ezk 33 27, RV reads 'stronghold.' In Is 29 3 it reads 'siege-works.' In Is 32 14 it renders the Heb. ōphēl by 'hill,' the reference being probably to the hill on which the palace of David was built. In Is 25 12, RV reads 'the high fortress of thy walls.' In Mic 7 12 the Heb. is mātsōr, perhaps a textual error for mīlṣayim, 'Egypt,' as in RV. The 'forts' referred to in II K 25 1, Jer 52 4, Ezk 4 2, etc., were the siege-forts erected by the Chaldean army during its siege of Jerusalem. E. E. N.

FORTIFIED CITY. See CITY, § 3.

FORTUNATUS (Φορτυνάτος): One of the messengers of the Corinthian Church at whose presence in Ephesus Paul rejoices, because of the reassurance which he brought concerning the attitude of part of the Church toward Paul (I Co 16 17). See also ACHAÏCUS and STEPHANAS. J. M. T.

FORTUNE: In Is 65 11 a doom is pronounced on those "that prepare a table unto Fortune [for that troop AV] and that fill up mingled wine unto 'Destiny'." The Heb. term is gadh, which was the name of an Aramaic deity, the god of good fortune (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 21 f.) The tribal name Gad was probably due to some ancient (pre-Mosaic) worship of this deity among Israel's ancestors. E. E. N.

FORTY. See NUMBERS, SIGNIFICANT AND SYMBOLIC, § 7.

FORUM. See APPIUS, MARKET OF.

FORWARD, FORWARDNESS: In the N T these words occur in AV in several places where RV gives decidedly better renderings. In II Co 8 3 Gr. σπουδή = 'zeal,' 'earnestness'; 8 10, θέλειν = 'to wish,' 'to will'; 9 2, προθυμία = 'readiness'; Gal 2 10, σπουδάσειν = 'to be earnest' or 'zealous.' E. E. N.

FOUL SPIRIT. See UNCLEAN SPIRIT.

FOUNDATION, FOUNDATIONS: In the O T this term (nearly always the rendering of a verbal form or some derivative of נָדַב, yāṣadh 'to found') is used (1) of the walls of a building or city, for which the N T equivalent is generally θεμέλιος (I K 7 10; Ps 137 7; Lk 6 48, etc.), and (2) of God's creative act of establishing the earth, for which the N T equivalent is καταβολή (Job 38 4; Mt 13 35). Figurative applications of both of these usages are also found (Pr 10 25; Is 28 16, the principle of faith; Ro 15 20; II Ti 2 19, etc.). In Job 38 6 the Heb. is 'ēḏhan, usually rendered 'socket,' but here used of the firmly fixed 'base' or 'pedestal' on which the 'pillars' of the earth rest. In Is 16 7 the RV 'raisin-cakes' (idolatrous offerings) is the more probable rendering. In Is 6 4, RV reads 'foundations' for 'posts' (AV), and in Ps 89 14, 97 2, 'foundation' for 'habitation' (AV). In the early period the laying of the foundations of buildings, walls, etc., was accompanied by the sacrifice of young children, whose bodies were immured in the foundation (cf. Jos 6 25; I K 16 34, and consult the report of the discoveries at Gezer in PEFQS). See also COSMOGONY, § 3. E. E. N.

FOUNTAIN: I. In metaphorical usage a fountain is the emblem of any source of spiritual blessing (Jl 3 18), whether issuing in cleansing (Zec 13 1) or in refreshment and revival (Rev 7 17, 21 6). Once Jacob is called a fountain, referring to the peaceful contentment of his condition (Dt 33 28). Preeminently, however, God is the fountain of life, i.e., the source of all good (Ps 36 9; Jer 2 13, 17 13). Hence the knowledge of God is also a fountain of life (Pr 13 14).

FRIEND, FRIENDSHIP: The most common words for friend in the O T (rēa', rē'eh, mērēa') indicate acquaintanceship and intercourse of varying degrees of intimacy. In II S 15 37, 16 16; I K 4 5 the word is used probably in a somewhat technical, i.e., official sense. Another frequently used term is 'ōhēbh (participle of 'āhabh, 'to love'), lit. 'lover,' like the Gr. φίλος (II S 19 6 AV; II Ch 20 7; Est 5 10, 14, 6 13; Pr 14 20, 18 24, 27 6; Is 41 8; Jer 20 4, 6; Zec 13 6). The classic example of Biblical friendship, that of David and Jonathan, is spoken of as 'love' not friendship (I S 18 2). In Jer 38 22 the original means 'men of thy peace' (cf. 20 10). In Pr 16 23, 17 9 the Heb. term implies the existence of a bond of union, or a confidential relation. 'To speak friendly' (AV in Jg 19 3; Ru 2 13) is literally 'to speak to the heart' ('kindly' RV). In Job 19 19 'inward friend' (AV) is literally 'men of my counsel' (cf. RV). In the NT the word rendered 'friend,' except in four instances, is the common Gr. term φίλος. In Mt 20 13, 22 12, 26 50 the Gr. is ἑταῖρος, 'companion' or 'comrade.' In Ac 12 20 the statement is literally 'and having persuaded Blastus'—'friend' not being in the original at all. E. E. N.

FRINGE, FRINGES: In Dt 22 12 we have an ancient law requiring Israelites to wear 'fringes' (g'dhilim) upon the four corners of their garments. In Nu 15 38 f. essentially the same law is given, only here the word rendered 'fringes' is tsitsith, which seems to have taken the place of the older word. 'Tassels' is a much more correct rendering than 'fringes,' since g'dhilim means something 'twisted,' and these were to be attached to the corner, not the hem, of the garment. These tassels were fastened to the outer garment or simlāh (see DRESS

AND ORNAMENTS, § 3) by a cord of blue, and worn to remind the wearer of his obligation, as an Israelite, of loyalty to J", tho the original purpose, in the time of Dt and earlier, may have been quite different. Much was made of these in later times as distinct badges of Judaism (cf. Zec 8 23). They seem to have been common in N T times (cf. Mt 9 20, 14 36, 23 5). When the Jews adopted Gentile dress, they gradually ceased wearing the tassels as part of their ordinary garb, and confined them, as now, to the tallith (an adaptation of the old simlāh, worn by men at the synagog service, also, in a smaller form, as an article of underwear). E. E. N.

FROG. See PALESTINE, § 26; and in general PLAGUES.

FRONTLETS. See PHYLACTERIES.

FROMWARD: The North Eng. form of the preposition 'fromward,' meaning 'turned from,' often with the idea of perversity. In AV it is used as adjective, noun, and adverb in the rendering of several Heb. words, which are translated in other passages by 'perverse,' 'crooked,' 'false,' and 'wayward.' All these words appear in Pr much oftener than elsewhere, referring to conduct in private and public life. ARV retains 'froward' only in II S 22 27, Ps 18 26, and I P 2 18. C. S. T.

FRUIT: In the great majority of instances the words rendered 'fruit' are, in the O T, p'ri, and, in the N T καρπός, both words being of general significance and applied (1) to the produce of the earth and its plants, (2) to the increase of animals, including man, and, (3) figuratively, to the results or consequences of human actions, especially in the moral sphere. Other terms rendered 'fruit' are: 'ēbh, 'bloom' or 'budding' (Dn 4 12, 14, 21); y'bhūl, 'result' (Dt 11 17; Hab 3 17; Hag 1 10); yeledh, 'child' (Ex 21 22); lehem, 'bread' (Jer 11 10); ma'ākhāl, 'eating' (Neh 9 25, lit. 'trees of eating'); mēlē'āh, 'fulness' (Dt 22 9); nōbh, nābh, and tnūbhāh (all from nūbh, 'to grow'), meaning 'fruit,' as the result of growth (Jg 9 11; Is 27 6; La 4 9; Mai 1 12, and, figuratively, Is 57 10); t'bhū'āh, 'increase,' and often so rendered; zmrāh, meaning doubtful (Gn 43 11); kōah, 'strength' (Job 31 39); γέννημα, 'product' (Mk 14 25, and ||s; Lk 12 18 ['grain' RV]; II Co 9 10), and δπόρα, 'ripe fruit' (Rv 18 14). See also PALESTINE, § 23; and Food, § 5. E. E. N.

FRYING PAN: The translation of masheketh Lv 27, 79—probably a shallow pan, whether of metal or earthenware is not certain.

FUEL: Little is said specifically about fuel in the Bible. It may be inferred that in ancient times, when the country was more abundantly wooded, wood was commonly used as fuel. The references to coals are generally to stones heated red hot, but at times to charcoal, which was burned in a brasier, or pan, of earthenware (Jer 36 22 ff.; Zec 12 6), and used for heating rooms, also, probably, in the smelting-furnaces, and in the priestly censers. 'Coals of juniper,' i.e., charcoal made from the broom shrub (used for this purpose to-day), and mentioned in Ps 120 4. For heating pots, thorn bushes of various kinds furnished a convenient fuel (Ps 58 9; Is 33 12; Ec 7 6). The dung of camels and cattle is used to-day very commonly in Palestine as fuel, but there is only one reference to this in the O T (Ezk 4 15). E. E. N.

FUGITIVE: (1) In Gn 4 12, 14, the Heb. means 'wanderer,' one who has no fixed abode. (2) In 21 29 RV, Jg 12 4 the idea is that of one who has 'escaped.' (3) In II K 25 11 'deserters' are meant. (4) In Is 10 31, 15 5, 43 14; Jer 49 5; Ezk 17 21, 'fugitive' is the proper term. (5) In Is 16 3, 21 14 RV, gives the real sense of the Heb. 'wanderer(s).'

FURLONG: A measure of length. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

FURNACE: Several original terms are so rendered in the Bible. (1) tannūr (Aram. 'attūn, Dn 3 6 ff.), properly 'oven' (Gn 15 17; Neh 3 11, 12 38; Ps 21 9; Is 31 9; Mal 4 1); see Food, § 11. (2) kibh-shān, a 'kiln' or 'smelting-furnace' (Gn 19 28; Ex 9 8, 10, 19 18). (3) kūr, a 'crucible,' for metal-working, often used figuratively (Pr 17 3; Dt 4 20, etc.). (4) 'ēlū (Ps 12 c) is of uncertain meaning. (5) καύνο (Mt 13 42, etc.), a term of comprehensive meaning, signifying various kinds of furnaces. E. E. N.

FURNITURE: In all instances save one the Heb. term rendered 'furniture' is k'iz, a word of general import. In Gn 31 34, 'furniture' AV, the Heb. kar is more correctly rendered 'saddle' (so RV). A camel's saddle, or saddle litter, it a basket-like affair, provided with cushions inside, and covered with an awning. It is used by women when traveling by camels. Such a saddle is to be distinguished from the pack-saddle, used to hold the burdens loaded on camels. E. E. N.

G

GAAL, gē'al (גַּאֵל, ga'al): A son of Ebed, who organized a revolt of the Shechemites against Abimelech (Jg 9 20-41). Whether Gaal was an Israelite or Canaanite (probably the latter), and whether he acted as a patriot or a demagog aiming to set up his own personal authority in the place of that of Abimelech are questions on which the story does not furnish sufficient material for definite answers.

GAASH, gē'ash (גַּאֲשׁ, ga'ash): The name of a hill north of which Joshua was buried (Jos 24 30; Jg 2 9). The brooks (or 'brook valleys') of Gaash are also mentioned (II S 23 30; I Ch 11 32). For location see TIMNATH-SERAH.

GABA, gē'ba. See GEBA.

GABBAI, gab-bē'ai (גַּבְּבַי, gabbay): A prominent Benjamite in postexilic times (Neh 11 8).

GABBATHA, gab'a-fha. See JERUSALEM, § 44.

GABRIEL, gē'bri-el. See ANGEL, § 4.

GAD, gad (גַּד, gādh), 'fortune': I. 1. A son of Jacob; see TRIBES, §§ 2-4. 2. A prophet who advised, or admonished, David, first, when as an outlaw he was passing from place to place in his efforts to elude Saul's search (I S 22 5), and again, when the king took the census (II S 24 11 ff.; I Ch 21 9 ff.). Together with Nathan he further assisted David in the arrangements of the Levitical musical service (II Ch 29 25), and wrote a record of some portion at least of the great king's reign (I Ch 29 29).

II. That there was a form of Canaanitish idolatry adopted by some Hebrews, in which a fortune-god was worshiped under the name of Gad, is attested by Isaiah (65 11); ARVmg. 'Gad.' The name of this fortune-god appears also in such compounds as Baal-gad (Jos 11 17, 12 7, 13 5) and Migdal-gad (Jos 15 37). It is probable that in Leah's naming of her maid's son 'Gad' (Gn 30 11) there is a trace of the worship of this deity. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 22.

GAD, VALLEY OF (נַחַל גַּד, naḥal hag-gādh, II S 24 5), 'torrent valley [wady] of Gad': The valley of the Arnon, the boundary between Moab and Gad (cf. Dt 2 36; Jos 13 9). In II S 24 5 read, with LXX. (Lucian), Wellhausen, and Driver: 'And they began from Aroer, from the city . . . toward Gad.'

GADARENES, gad'a-rīnz'. See GERASENES.

GADDI, gād'dai (גַּדִּי, gaddi): One of the spies (Nu 13 11).

GADDIEL, gad'i-el (גַּדִּי־אֵל, gaddi'el), 'Fortune is God': One of the spies (Nu 13 10).

GADI, gē'dai (גַּדִּי, gādhā): The father of King Menahem (II K 15 14, 17).

GAHAM, gē'hām (גַּחַם, gaḥam): Probably an Aramean clan-name, connected genealogically with Nahor (Gn 22 24).

GAHAR, gē'har (גַּחַר, gaḥar): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 49).

GAI, gē'ai (גַּי, gay), 'valley': The name of a place in Philistia (I S 17 52, 'the valley' AV). The true reading is 'Gath' (cf. RVmg. and the latter half of the verse). C. S. T.

GAIUS, gē'us (Γαῖος): 1. A traveling companion of Paul mentioned in Ac 19 29. 2. Gaius who in Ac 20 4 is distinguished as 'from Derbe' and possibly identical with 1. 3. One of two persons in Corinth whom Paul himself had baptized (I Co 1 14). 4. The person to whom III Jn is addressed. 5. Gaius, 'my host' mentioned in Ro 16 23. If Ro ch. 16 was written in Corinth possibly identical with 3. J. M. T.

GALAL, gē'lal (גַּלָּל, galāl): The name of two post-exilic Levites (1. I Ch 9 15. 2. I Ch 9 16; Neh 11 17).

GALATIA, gā-lē-shī-ā. See ASIA MINOR, III, 5.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE. 1. Introductory. The Epistle to the Galatians belongs to the group of practically undisputed letters of Paul (see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 1). In this group it holds a place of special importance because of the peculiarly large autobiographical element it possesses, which brings it into significant relation to the record of the Book of Acts.

2. Circumstances of Writing. It was written on the receipt of unexpected and disturbing news of a threatened defection of the readers from the Gospel preached to them by the Apostle (1 6 f., 3 1-4, 4 13-16, 5 7-9). This defection, while it was occasioned by teachings which aroused in the readers a spirit of pride and vainglory that stimulated them to feelings of jealousy and hostility within their own circle (5 13, 15, 26; cf. 5 6, 20, 6 1-5), practically united them in an attack upon the authority of Paul's apostleship as underlying the Gospel which he preached (1 11-17, 2 6-10), and involved them in beliefs vitally different from those he proclaimed, and consequently fatal to their Christian life (1 6 f., 3 1, 4 8-11, 19, 5 1-4). It was apparently written on a journey, and not from a city center (1 1 f.). The information on which it was based bears all the marks of having come to the Apostle not through general rumor, nor through official correspondence, but through a personal messenger. (cf. 1 6-10, 3 1-5, 4 12-20, 5 1-15, 6 11-13). It was produced under the pressure of strong feeling (cf. 1 6-8, 11-17, 20, 3 1-5, 4 11-16, 19 f., 5 2-4, 11 f., 6 11 f. Note in contrast to Paul's other letters the absence from the greeting of any thanksgiving for the readers' spiritual life).

3. Order of Contents. At the same time, the order of its thought is simple. After the formal address (1 1-2), in which he seems to forecast the claim he is to make for himself (ver. 1), and the rebuke he is to administer to the churches (ver. 4), the Apostle passes at once to a consideration of the situation (1 6-10).

He states in language the plainness of which can not be misunderstood his astonished disappointment at the unreasonable and alarming course the readers are pursuing (vs. 6, 7a) and his unhesitating anathema upon the false teachers who were responsible for it (vs. 7b-9), justifying the solemnity of his condemnation by the disinterested motive involved in the language (ver. 10).

With this said, he takes up the personal element in the controversy and presents, in a detailed review of his life from his conversion to the period of the Jerusalem Council, a vindication of his apostolic authority (1 11-2 21). He begins this vindication with a solemn statement of the origin of his Gospel—that it had not come from man but from God (1<sup>11</sup>). In proof of this he calls to their mind the bitter zeal of his Jewish life (1<sup>13</sup>), in order that they might understand the significance of the change which had come over him in his conversion—a change which was due to nothing short of a Divine agency, and had for its purpose nothing less than the entrusting to him of this God-given Gospel which he preached (1<sup>15</sup>, 16a).

To this subjective experience he adds a statement of objective facts, showing not merely his independence of the Jerusalem Apostles subsequent to his conversion (1<sup>16b-20</sup>), but the acknowledgment which these same Apostles made of the equality of his apostleship at the time of the Jerusalem Council (2<sup>1-10</sup>)—an equality of which he was conscious enough to rebuke Peter himself, the head of that apostolic circle, for conduct inconsistent with the principles they all confessed (2<sup>11-14</sup>). These facts gave evidence that his Gospel was of Divine and not of human origin, since with a human gospel he would have had no expectation of such action on the part of the other Apostles, and no justification for such action on his own part.

The circumstances in which this equality was acknowledged and this rebuke administered were all the more significant for Paul's argument, because the question before the Jerusalem Council had been the observance of the ceremonial law by the Gentile converts as necessary to their admission into the Christian brotherhood—the very same matter as was being urged by the false teachers in Galatia (2<sup>1</sup> f.). As to this question Paul had had a conference with the Apostles, most likely just before the gathering of the Council, and had taken strong ground against the compulsion of these converts to such observance (2<sup>3-5</sup>), and had won the Apostles to his view (2<sup>3</sup>, 6 f., 9 f.).

Peter's inconsistency had also to do with this same question. In spite of his acknowledgment of Paul's position at the Council—that nothing should be required of the Gentiles as a condition of salvation and, therefore, of church-membership, beyond faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Ac 15 7b-11), he had not only given up partaking with the Gentiles in the common meal, which doubtless had been instituted as a natural result of the Council's decision, but had abandoned it in such a spirit as practically to deny the Gentile converts the right of Christian fellowship (2<sup>11-13</sup>).

In his rebuke of this Apostle, which, of course, we do not have here fully reproduced, Paul presents the principle of justification by faith in such a way as to show that Peter could not be logically true to it and act as he had done (2<sup>15-21</sup>). This closes the personal discussion of the situation and leads the way to the more purely doctrinal discussion (chs. 3 and 4).

This discussion is opened with a renewed statement of his astonished disappointment at the course the readers are pursuing (2<sup>15</sup>), in which he contrasts them with the inconsistency it showed with all their previous experience (vs. 2, 4a), tho he hints at the hope that this experience may yet assert itself (ver. 4b).

He then proceeds to place before them the mutually exclusive principles of the Gospel of faith, which they had received and accepted, and the gospel of works, which they were now following (3<sup>5-4</sup>). He reminds them (1) that Abraham, to whom the false teachers harked back, as the father of circumcision and the representative of the covenant of the Messianic promises, was justified not by works, but by trust in God; so that they who lived by faith were the true children of Abraham, and the real recipients of the promises (3<sup>6-9</sup>); for they who live by works must keep the whole Law, and this has never been possible in the sight of God, since the only basis on which God ever justifies man is faith and the Law is not something toward which faith can be exercised (3<sup>10-12</sup>). (2) That Christ had redeemed man from the penalty consequent upon his failure to keep the Law, in order that, instead of the fruitlessness of works, man might receive the promised blessings through faith (3<sup>13</sup>). (3) That, if it be claimed that the promises to Abraham were superseded by the Mosaic Law (3<sup>16-17</sup>), it must be remembered (a) that the promises were of the nature of a covenant (3<sup>15</sup>); so that the Law, tho subsequent to them, could not annul them (3<sup>17</sup>)—in fact, if it could, it would invalidate the very principle on which they were given, which was one of free promise received in trust, and not of earned reward for obedience to law (3<sup>18</sup>) and (b) that the Law was given, not to supersede the promises, but by showing man his inability to keep its commands to bring him, through a consciousness of his spiritual helplessness, to faith in Christ (3<sup>19</sup>); so that the Law, far from superseding the promises, makes possible their realization through bringing man to an appreciation of the need of faith (3<sup>21-29</sup>).

This presentation of the relation of the principles of faith and works is then illustrated from the position of an heir under the Roman law (4<sup>1-7</sup>). This brings the Apostle to still another statement of his disappointment at the readers' present course (4<sup>8-20</sup>), in which he recalls to them their enthusiasm for his Gospel, and their personal attachment to himself when he first preached to them (4<sup>13-16</sup>), appealing to them, through an allegorical presentation of the superiority of the covenant of the promise, to appreciate the blessings which belonged to them through faith (4<sup>21-31</sup>).

Upon this follows the practical portion of the Epistle, beginning with an exhortation to stand fast in their liberty from the bondage of the Law (5<sup>1-12</sup>), and then proceeding, through an elaboration of what this idea of liberty should mean to their living (5<sup>13-26</sup>), to a group of admonitions regarding their fellowship and service within the Christian brotherhood (6<sup>1-10</sup>), closing with a final restatement of the Apostle's position (6<sup>11-15</sup>), and the benedictory remarks (6<sup>16-18</sup>).

4. Composition and Location of the Churches.

The churches to which this burning remonstrance was addressed must have had a definite Jewish element within their membership in order to give the false teachers a point of contact for their ceremonial propaganda; altho the previous nature-religion of the Gentile majority, through its ascetic tendencies, had left them open to the legalism these teachers enjoined (4<sup>8-10</sup>).

Where in Asia Minor these churches were located has been a question of much debate—the accepted view, up to recent times, being that they belonged to that northern portion of the large Roman province of Galatia known as Galatia proper. As long ago, however, as the close of the 18th cent. it was suggested that they may have been the churches of Paul's first mission tour, since those were within the Galatian province. (See Map of the Pauline World.)

With the opening of the 20th cent. this suggestion has gained in favor, largely through its strong advocacy by Ramsay (1890), and is now the widely accepted opinion of scholars. It has many arguments in its favor—chiefly (1) that it allows one of Paul's most important letters to go to churches whose founding is given us in detail in Ac, and whose situation among Syrian and anti-Jewish elements there he had made a Jewish propaganda as this letter contests, but makes such an agitation almost inevitable, in view of the fact that it was the Gentile success of Paul's first mission among these churches which caused in Antioch the outbreak of the whole controversy (cf. Ac 15 1 ff.). No mention is made in Ac of the founding of churches in Galatia proper; while such churches as may have been there in Paul's time must have been too remote from Syria to be in vital contact with any such specifically Jewish movement as this crusade for ceremonialism. (2) That it will account for several references in the letter which otherwise would be obscure, e.g., Paul's repeated mention of Barnabas (2<sup>1</sup>, 9, 13), who had been with him on his first mission tour only (cf. Ac chs. 13, 14, 15 36-41), Paul's reference to his reception by the readers as an angel ('messenger') of God (4 14; cf. Ac 14 11-14), Paul's complaint that, tho he is charged with preaching circumcision, he is still persecuted by those who advocate this rite (5 11; cf. Ac 16 1-3), the attention Paul calls to the marks of Jesus, which he bears branded on his body (6 17; cf. Ac 14 19 f.).

5. Date. In view of this location of the churches it would seem that the Epistle could not have been written earlier than the latter part of Paul's second mission tour; since he evidently had visited the readers at least twice before sending them the letter. (Note the necessity of two visits to account for the difference in the attitude of the readers in 4 13-15 and 19.) It has been assigned, accordingly, to some time within Paul's second mission tour, either at Corinth, when the Thessalonian Epistles were written (Zahn), or at Antioch in Syria, between his second and third mission tour (Ramsay); also to his third mission tour, either at Ephesus (Burton), or in Macedonia on his way from Ephesus to Corinth (Von Dobschütz). On the other hand, there are those who, holding that 4 13 does not necessarily imply two previous visits, place its composition on the journey from Antioch to Jerusalem just preceding the Council of Ac 15 (Lake); while some, claiming that the second visit is the return half of his first visit to the churches (Ac 14 23), assign its writing to the stay in Antioch after the Council (McGiffert)—in either case making it the earliest of Paul's letters.

Apart, however, from the fact that it was written while the Apostle was on a journey, accompanied by traveling companions, and not while he was in some city center, the guest of the local church (see above, § 2), and that οὕτως ταχέως (1 6) does not mean 'how quickly,' but 'how rashly' (cf. I Ti 5 22), it is clear if, when II Co was written, there was in the Corinthian situation any intimation of the Galatian situation (see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 12 and above § 2), that the absence of all warning in II Co (especially chs. 10-13) as to the doctrinal possibilities of such a Judaizing movement as may have been present can not be adequately explained if Paul had already experienced the severity of the Galatian defection.

It is difficult to account for the light and easy treatment of circumcision in the Corinthian letters, if he had already been taught by the Galatian trouble the fatal significance it would have in the religious life. This is confirmed by the fact that, altho there was no Judaizing movement at all in Rome, the Epistle to that church shows that the doctrinal impressions of the Galatian discussion were still strong in Paul's mind when he wrote that letter. (Note the treatment of circumcision in Ro 2 25-29, 4 9-17, which would be quite natural, if Galatians had just preceded Romans.) It is but reasonable to suppose that these impressions must have been with him when he wrote to the Corinthians, if Gal had preceded the letters to them. Recognizing the fact of development in Paul's formulating of his doctrinal ideas and the continuity of thought involved in such development, Epistles so similar in doctrinal thought as Ro and Gal are not likely to have been separated by Epistles so dissimilar to either as I and II Co.

That Paul could not have written to the Galatians after the Council of Ac 15 without mentioning the decrees misses in a singular way the significance of 2 1-10 which was not to remind them of the decrees, of which they already knew, but to inform them of his private conference with the Apostolic leaders, of which being private, they did not know; for it was at this conference that he won the Apostles to his views and brought the Council to the confirmation of his position.

Taking all things into consideration, the writing of Gal is best assigned to that part of Paul's third mission tour covered by his journey from Ephesus to Corinth a portion of which he spent possibly in Epirus (cf. Ro 15 19), after his last letter to the Corinthian church, in other words to the summer, or fall, of 55, or more probably 56 A.D.

6. Bearing of Epistle on Paul's Work. The early apostolic Church was wholly Jewish in its membership. It was, therefore, naturally Jewish in the spirit of its worship and its thought, and Jewish in the purpose of its evangel. It considered the religion of Jesus as the vital outcome of Judaism, to which, in form, it still belonged, and which it aimed simply to reform up to this new standard of the Gospel. Theoretically this was right. Practically, however, it failed to realize that any such reform involved an abandonment of the spirit of the old exclusivism by which all Gentilism was to come into the new religion by way of Judaism. Consequently when Paul appeared with his commission to the Gentiles the Church accepted him, not foreseeing what his work implied (cf. Ac 9 26-29). The startling results of his first mission tour, however, made this vividly real, and the controversy regarding the admission of Gentiles without circumcision became a necessary issue (cf. Ac 14 25-15 1, 3-5).

This controversy was joined first at Antioch, carried up to Jerusalem for decision, and settled there in full recognition of the principle of salvation by faith tho the racial lines and prejudices of Judaism remained (Ac 15 19-21, 21 17-28). This duality of life and thought inside the Church, however, made further dispute inevitable, and rendered certain that, within the regions near Jerusalem and Syria in which Paul's Gentile work was being carried on, this dispute would open the way for a Judaizing propaganda against his ministry. It is to contest this propaganda that Gal was written—showing us the first stage in the practical working out of the religious dualism within the Apostolic Church. (See CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 12).

LITERATURE: Among the introductions accessible in English, Julicher (Eng. trans. 1904) fairly represents the more advanced criticism, while Zahn (Eng. GALBANUM. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2; and PALESTINE, § 22.

GALEED, gal'i-ed (גל'עד, gal'ēdn), 'witness-pile': The name given by Jacob to a pile of stones, raised as a 'witness' to the compact between himself and Laban (Gn 31 47, 48). Apparently intended as an explanation of the word Gilead (cf. the witness-altar of Jos 22 34). C. S. T.

GALILEE, GALILEAN. See PALESTINE, § 36.

GALILEE, SEA OF (called also Lake Gennesaret [Lk 5 1, originally Γεννησάρ, I Mac 11 67], and Sea it at the extreme SW., at a point much lower, as shown by the cataract-like aspect of the water at this point. It constitutes a bright, light-blue body of water, which on account of the low level is generally warmer than similar bodies in other parts of the world. Its temperature ranges from 69° on the surface to 59° at a depth of 65 ft. and lower. It is located in a volcanic region, the mountains on the E. and the country on the N. being full of lava formations and basalt rocks. The hot springs at Tiberias, which always have been and are to the present day famous for their medicinal qualities, and the freof Tiberias [Jn 6 1, 21 1]; in the O T Sea of Chinnereth [Nu 34 11; Jos 13 27] and Chinneroth [Jos 12 3]. In I K 15 20 [Chinneroth AV] the term is evidently used of the plain of Gennesaret, and not of the sea): The largest fresh-water lake of Palestine, being 13 m. from N. to S. and 8 m. from E. to W., at its widest part. Its shape is in general that of an irregular pear, its depth less than 200 ft. and its surface 681 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. The river Jordan enters it at the extreme NE. and issues from quent earthquakes show that the volcanic forces in this region are not yet exhausted.

The scenery about the lake does not lack in variety, as the sky-line never runs on a dead level for any distance, but either rises, as in the E., with the steep mountains, or sinks to the very level of the shore, as in the NW., where the water imperceptibly passes into the plain of Gennesaret, and the land slopes up to the hills of Galilee. The only feature needed to put it on an equality with the most beautiful landscape in the world is that of thick woods on at least a portion of the highlands around.

The waters of the lake are noted for abundant fish. The industry of fishing was accordingly one of the most stable resources of the country round about. Clear evidences of this are to be found in the names of the cities Bethsaida ('house of fish') at the N. end of the lake, and Tarichœa (from ταριχεύειν, 'to cure for purposes of preservation,' mod. Kerak) at the S. end. Several varieties of Galilean fish were regarded as choice, and it was claimed that they were the same as those found in the waters of the Nile. See PALESTINE, § 26. Jesus called His disciples from among those engaged in this industry. He also made use in His parables of the methods of fishermen (Mt 13 47, 48).

Another feature of the Sea of Galilee is its susceptibility to sudden storms. These are occasioned partly by its lying so much lower than the surrounding table-land (a fact that creates a difference of temperature and consequent disturbances in the atmosphere), and partly by the rushing of gusts of wind down the Jordan valley from the heights of Hermon. The event recorded in Mt 8 24 is no extraordinary case. Those who ply boats on the lake are obliged to exercise great care to avoid peril from such storms.

The shores of the Sea of Galilee as well as the lake itself were the scenes of many of the most remarkable events recorded in the Gospels, such as the feeding of the 5,000 (Mt 14 13 and ||s).

GALL: Two different conceptions are represented by the words which EV translates 'gall' (a) m'rōrāh, or m'rērāh, lit. 'bitterness' (Job 13 26; Dt 32 32), is used for the bile (Job 16 13), the human gall-bladder (Job 20 25), and the venom of serpents (Job 20 14). (b) rō'sh, the name of a quick-growing weed (Hos 10 4, 'hemlock'), which bore berries (Dt 32 32) and was coupled with wormwood (q. v.), as a type of bitterness (Dt 29 18; La 3 19; Am 6 12). Hence the word is twice used for the 'poison' of serpents (Dt 32 33; Job 20 16). The plant indicated is probably the poppy, which grows abundantly in Palestine, and whose capsules might well give rise to the name rō'sh ('head'). The 'water of gall' (Jer 8 14, 9 15, 23 15) was apparently a decoction of poppy-heads, rather than the opium drug itself. In the N T, 'gall' (χολή) seems to indicate rō'sh, especially in Mt 27 34, which is influenced by Ps 69 21. Many scholars however, explain χολή as signifying in Hellenistic usage any kind of bitter liquid, including myrrh (cf. Mk 15 23). L. G. L.—E. E. N.

GALLANT SHIP: An expression found in Is 33 21 where the prophet, in comparing the future Jerusalem to a great city, naturally used illustrations drawn from the large commercial cities on the Nile or Euphrates with their well-appointed ships and boats (see also SHIPS AND NAVIGATION). The Heb. word rendered 'gallant' is 'addir, 'large,' 'mighty,' 'glorious.' The word rendered 'galley' is the common word ('ōnā) for ship.

GALLERY: (1) In Song 7 6 this is AV rendering of rahaṭ, a word of uncertain meaning, for which

RV gives 'tresses.' (2) For other occurrences see TEMPLE, §§ 20, 21.

GALLEY. See GALLANT SHIP; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

GALLIM, gal'im (גל'ים, gallim), 'stone heaps': A place in Benjamin, the home of Paltiel, Michal's second husband (I S 25 44), also mentioned in Is 10 30 as not far from Gibeah of Saul. The name may be only a shortened form of Gilgal. Site uncertain.

GALLIO, gal'io, Γαλλίων: The adopted name of Marcus Annæus Novatus, son of M. Annæus Seneca of Cordova in Spain, brother of the philosopher L. Annæus Seneca, and uncle of the poet Lucan. He was a man of fine character and culture, was proconsul of Achaia in the last (i.e., the second) year of Paul's first visit to Corinth (52 A.D.), and fell a victim to Nero's cruelty in 66 A.D. His decision in Acts was significant, because, if Paul's preaching concerned Jewish religious belief and practise—as Gallio evidently thought it did—it showed that he as Roman governor would not interfere, and that in other respects he saw nothing in it that conflicted with Roman law (Ac 18 12-17). The recent publication of an inscription at Delphi (discovered in 1905) has made it practically certain that Gallio's proconsulship was for the years 52-53. Paul was evidently brought before G. soon after G.'s arrival in Corinth. This gives us a 'fixed point' for N T chronology. For a translation of the inscription see Barton, Archæology and the Bible, p. 439. See also Deissmann, St. Paul (Eng. Transl. 1912.) R. A. F.—E. E. N.

GALLOWS. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3, (a).

GAMALIEL, ga-mē'li-el (גמלי'ל, gamli'el, Gr. Γαμαλιήλ), 'reward of God': 1. A son of Pedahzur, a prince of Manasseh (Nu 1 10, 2 20, etc.), in charge of a section of the census in the wilderness (Nu 10 23). 2. A rabbi in the Apostolic Age (to be distinguished from a later one of the same name), a grandson of the renowned Hillel, a student of Greek literature and a leader of the liberal school of Pharisees. According to Ac 22 3, Paul was a student under him. G. is also noted for the counsel which moved the Sanhedrin not to molest the first preachers of Christianity (Ac 5 34 ff.). An untrustworthy Christian tradition (Clem. Recog., I, 65) represents him as a convert to the new faith. By the Jews he was regarded as the first of the seven great 'Rabbans' (preeminent rabbis). A. C. Z.

GAMES. The rendering in I Co 9 25 RV of the ptepl. ἀγωνίζεσθαι, 'contending in a struggle or game' (fr. ἀγών, 'contest,' cf. I Ti 6 12; He 12 1), and in II Ti 2 5 RV of vb. 6 ἀθλεῖν (whence our word 'athletics').

GAMMADIM, gam'a-dim (גמדי, gammādīm): The context in Ezk 27 11 seems to require that this word should be interpreted as the name of a people. The ARV 'valorous men' has little to commend it. No satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Evidently a people near Tyre was meant, possibly the Kumidi of the Amarna letters. E. E. N.

GAMUL, gē'mul (גַּמּוּל, gāmūl): The ancestral head of the 22d course of priests (I Ch 24 17).

GANGRENE. See DISEASES AND MEDICINE, § 5.

GARDEN. See EDEN; and PALESTINE § 23.

GARDENS, THE KINGS'. See JERUSALEM,

GAREB, gē'reb (גָּרֵב, gārēbh): I. One of David's chiefs (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40), said to be a member of the Ithrite family of Kiriath-jearim (cf. I Ch 2 53). It is probable, however, that the Heb. text should be vocalized so as to read 'the Jattirite,' i.e., an inhabitant of Jattir (cf. I S 30 27). II. An unidentified hill near Jerusalem (Jer 31 39). L. G. L.—E. E. N.

GARLANDS: The rendering of the Gr. στεμματα, which occurs but once in the N T (Ac 14 13). The reference is to the wreaths used in heathen sacrifices. They were ordinarily made of the leaves and flowers of such trees or plants as were most acceptable to the divinity to whom the sacrifice was to be offered. If the phrase ταύρους καὶ στεμματα 'oxen and garlands' is a hendiadys for ταύρους ἐστεμμένους, 'oxen adorned with garlands,' then they are to be understood as adorning only the victims; otherwise they may have been intended for the ministering priests and such temporary altars as they may have planned to erect, if, as is probable, the sacrifice was to be offered before the gates of the city, or the house, within which were the acclaimed divinities, and thus apart from the temple building itself. In fact, as the custom was to place them on the statue of the divinity before sacrificing to it, they may have been intended even for the Apostles themselves. See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8. M. W. J.

GARLIC. See FOOD, § 3; and PALESTINE, § 23.

GARMENT. See in general DRESS AND ORNAMENTS; and PRIESTHOOD, § 9b.

GARMITE, gūr'mait (גֻּרְמַיִת, gurmī): A gentile name found only in I Ch 4 19. Its significance is unknown.

GARRISON: The proper Heb. term for 'garrison' is matstsābh (fem. matstsābhāh, in I S 14 12), which is so rendered in both RV and AV (I S 13 23, 14 1, 4, 6, 11, 15; II S 23 14). In other passages, where the Heb. is nṣṣābh, 'pillar,' or 'governor' (I S 10 5, 13 3 f.; II S 8 6, 14; I Ch 11 16, 18 13; II Ch 17 2), RV has retained the AV rendering 'garrison,' which should be changed, perhaps, to 'governor' (except in I Ch 11 16). In Ezk 26 11 'pillars' RV, and in II Co 11 32 'guarded' RV, are the correct renderings. E. E. N.

GASHMU, gash'miu. See GESHEM.

GATAM, gē'tam (גֹּתָם, ga'tām): A 'duke,' i.e., 'chief,' of Edom (Gn 36 11, 16; I Ch 1 36).

GATE. See CITY, § 3; WISE MEN; TEMPLE, § 6; and JERUSALEM, passim.

GATH (גֶּת, gath), 'wine-press'; gentilic, Gittite (II S 6 10): One of the five cities of the Philistines (II S 1 20). It is first mentioned as a place where Anakim were still living at the time of Joshua (Jos 11 22). The Ark of the Covenant was held here for a time (I S 5 8). It is also known as the residence of two Philistines, i.e., Goliath, the gigantic champion whom David slew (I S 17 4 ff.), and Achish, its king, with whom David later took refuge (I S 21 10 ff.). Still later, David captured and reduced it to subjection (II S 8 1; cf. I Ch 18 1). Rehoboam fortified it (II Ch 11 8); but in the days of Uzziah it appears to have regained its status as an independent Philistine city (II Ch 26 6). In the wars of Syria against Judah, it was seized by Hazael as a preliminary step to an attack on Jerusalem (II K 12 17). From Am 6 2 it has been inferred that it was taken by Sargon in 711. Its name is to be recognized as the Gintu Asdudim of that monarch's inscription (cf. Schrader, COT, II, p. 143). In the Onom. Sac. it is located 5 Roman m. from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) in the direction of Diospolis (Lydda), which would point to the modern Dikkerin, a village with ancient ruins that might possibly be those of a city like Gath. But according to modern explorers a more probable site is Tell-es Safiyeh, 10 m. SE. of Ekron and 10 m. E. of Ashdod (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 194-195). See Map I, C 9. A. C. Z.

GATHERED TO ONE'S FATHERS. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, §§ 3-6; and ESCHATOLOGY, § 17 f.).

GATH-HEPHER, gath-hī'fer (גֶּתְהֵפֶר, gath haḥēpher): The residence of Jonah, son of Amittai (Jos 19 13; II K 14 25), by mistake made into Gittah-hepher in AV of Jos 19 13. The modern site is El-Meshed, about 3 m. NE. of Nazareth and 2 m. SW. of Sepphoris, where a tomb of the prophet Jonah is shown. Map IV, C 7.

GATH-RIMMON, -rim'an (גֶּתְרִמּוֹן, gath rim-mōn). 1. A Levitical city situated in the territory of Dan (Jos 19 45, 21 24). Its exact site is not identifiable, but it must have lain near and somewhat E. of Joppa. 2. Another Levitical Gath-rimmon is mentioned in Jos 21 25 as in the half-tribe of Manasseh; but in I Ch 6 60 the corresponding description reads 'Bileam' and 'Gath-rimmon' and is probably a textual corruption of this form (possibly Ibleam). A. C. Z.

GAULANITIS, gōl'ā-nai'tis (Γαυλανίτις, the modern Jaulan): One of the provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip (Lk 3 1; cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 1), bounded by the Jordan on the W., the Jarmuk on the S., and the Hermon on the N., with an uncertain line on the E., perhaps the river Allan. It is a volcanic region of the nature of a plateau varying in elevation from 2,000 ft. in the N. to 1,000 ft. in the S. extremity. Parts of it are rich and fertile but the greatest portion only yields pasture ground for nomads (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 541, and Schumacher, The Jaulan (1888). Map I, F, G, 4, 5. See also GOLAN). A. C. Z.

GAZA, gē'zā (גֶּזָא, 'azzāh), also Azzah (Dt 2 23 AV), gentilic, Gazites and Gazatites (Jos 13 5 AV). The southernmost of the five principal cities of the Philistines (II K 18 8), and in general a conventional territorial limit in the S., e.g., of the country of the Canaanites (Gn 10 19 [J]), of the conquest of Joshua (Jos 10 41), of the realm of the Avvim (Dt 2 23) and of the empire of Solomon (I K 4 24). Map II, A 2. It was an important city as early as the days of Rameses II, in whose lists its name occurs (Rec. of the Past, 2d ser., VI, pp. 27, 41). In the distribution of the land by Joshua it was assigned to Judah (Jos 15 47), but never possessed. It was fortified, for it had gates (Jg 16 3), and possessed a temple of Dagon (Jg 16 21 ff.). Its location on the high road between Egypt and Mesopotamia brought it into relations with the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser III subjugated its king Hanno in 734. It rebelled, but was again conquered by Sennacherib (701) and Esarhaddon (676); cf. Schrader, COT, I, pp. 91, 149, 247. A. C. Z.

GAZELLE. See PALESTINE, § 24, and FOOD, § 10.

GAZER, gē'zər. See GEZER.

GAZEZ, gē'zez (גָּזֶז gāzēz): The name of two individuals, both Calebites (I Ch 2 46), tho there may be a textual error in the verse.

GAZZAM, gaz'əm (גַּזָּאם, gazzām): The 'sons of Gazzam' were a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 51).

GEAR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

GEBA, gī'bā (גֶּבָא, gebha', in pause gābha', whence the AV Gaba), 'hill': 1. A Levitical city on the N. border of Benjamin (Jos 21 17; cf. II K 23 8, 'from Geba to Beer-sheba'), and on the opposite side of the valley from Michmash (I S 14 5). It is to be distinguished from the neighboring Gibeah (Is 10 26); but the similarity of the names (without vowel-points gb', gb'h) has caused some confusion in the Heb. text. See GIBEAH, 2. In II S 5 25 'Geba' should be 'Gibeon' (so LXX., I Ch 14 16, and Is 28 21). Geba is certainly the modern Jeba', a small village conspicuously situated on the S. side of the Wādī es-Suweinīt, opposite Michmash. Map III, F 5. 2 (Γαβᾶ, Jth 3 10). Probably Jeba', a village 4 m. NE. of Samaria. Map III, F 3.

L. G. L.—E. E. N.

GEBAL, gī'bal (גִּבְלָא, gēbhal): 1. The Heb. name of the very ancient Phœnician city Byblus, now known as Jebeil, situated on the coast 20 m. N. of Beirut. The O T locates the land of the Gebalites, or Giblites, correctly near Lebanon (Jos 13 5). Gebal furnished stone-masons for Solomon. (Instead of 'stone-squarers' AV, read 'Gebalites' RV, I K 5 18.) According to Ezk 27 9 it was the headquarters of shipbuilders. It was known to the Egyptians of the Ancient Empire as Kepuna, and to Assyrians and Babylonians as Gubal or Gubli. The excavations which the French have conducted since 1919 have brought to light extensive remains, both Egyptian and Phœnician. The more important are two ancient shrines, one Egyptian and the other Syrian. In the ruins of the latter were found vases with the names of famous kings of the Ancient Empire—Mycerinus, Unas, Pepi I and Pepi II. Near the shrines was the burial ground of the royal family of Byblus; within its precincts several tombs have been discovered. Of these, two are of special interest as they are the sepulchers of two princes, father and son, and have hieroglyphic inscriptions on the lids of the sarcophagi which associate these ancient Phœnician rulers with Amenemhat III and Amenemhat IV of the XII dynasty (1849-1792 B.C.). Among the El-Amarna letters there are several from Rib-Adda, ruler of Gebal, who acknowledges the sovereignty of the Egyptian King and protests his loyalty. The close connection between Gebal and Egypt is further attested by Wenamon the Egyptian traveler who mentions his visit to the prince of Gebal (c 1100 B.C.). 2. The northern portion of Edom which is now known as Jebāl (Ps 83 7). J. A. K.

GEBER, gī'bər (גִּבְרָא, gebher), 'man,' 'mighty man': One of twelve officers of Solomon in charge of his commissariat (I K 4 19). His district, E. of the Jordan and S. of those mentioned in vs. 13 and 14, was somewhere between the Jabbok and the Arnon. C. S. T.

GEBIM, gī'bīm (גִּבִּימ, gēbhīm), 'cisterns': A place between Madmenah and Nob, and not far N. of Jerusalem (Is 10 31). Not identified.

GECKO. See PALESTINE, § 26.

GEDALIAH, ged'ā-lai'ā (גְּדַלְיָה, gēdalyāhū), 'J' is great': 1. A son of Ahikam and grandson of Shaphan, the secretary of King Josiah, appointed by Nebuchadrezzar as governor of those left in the land after the fall of Jerusalem (II K 25 22 f.), and assassinated by Ishmael (Jer 41 18). 2. One of the sons of Jeduthun (I Ch 25 3, 9). 3. A son of Hezekiah and grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1). 4. A son of Pashhur, a ruler who consigned Jeremiah to prison (Jer 38 1). 5. A priest who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 18).

GEDER, gī'dər (גִּדְרָא, gedher), 'wall': A Canaanite royal city, the same as Beth-gader (Jos 12 13). Site unknown. Gederite, an inhabitant of Geder (I Ch 27 28).

GEDERAH, gi-dī'ra (גִּדְרָה, gēdhērāh), 'a walled place' (usually 'a sheepfold'): A town in the lowlands of Judah (Jos 15 36). See Map II, D 1. Identification uncertain. The inhabitants were called Gederathites (I Ch 12 4). See also RV at I Ch 4 28.

GEDEROTH, gi-dī'rēth (גִּדְרֹת, gēdhērōth), 'walled places' (or 'sheepfolds'): A town of Judah (Jos 15 41; II Ch 28 18). See Map II, C 1. Identification uncertain.

GEDEROTHAIM, gi-dī'rō-thē'im (גִּדְרֹתַיִם, gēdhērōthayim), 'place of enclosures': One of 14 towns in the Shephelah of Judah (Jos 15 36). Perhaps an error through dittography for the preceding name Gederah, as there are 14 without it. LXX. translates 'its enclosures.' C. S. T.

GEDOR, gī'dər (גִּדְרָא, gēdhōr), 'wall': I. 1. A Benjamite ancestor of Saul (I Ch 8 31, 9 37). 2. A family in Judah (I Ch 4 4, 18. See II, 1). II. 1. A town in Judah, now Jedur (Jos 15 58), Map II, E. 2. 2. The home of Jeroham, in Benjamin (I Ch 12 7), possibly the same as 1. 3. For 'Gedor' (I Ch 4 39), read with LXX. 'Gerar,' a town of Simeon in the extreme S. of Judah. Map II, A 3. C. S. T.

GE-HARASHIM, gī'hā-rē'shīm (גִּי'הַרְשִׁים, gē'hārāshīm), 'valley of the smiths'; 'valley of Charashim' (I Ch 4 14 AV): In Neh 11 35 the same Heb. term is rendered 'valley of craftsmen.' The words are not free from suspicion, but as they stand they mean that in a certain valley near Lod and Ono were the works of a guild of smiths. E. E. N.

GEHAZI, g<sub>1</sub>-hē'zai (גֵּהָזִי, gēhāzī), 'valley of vision': The servant of the prophet Elisha, II K chs. 4-8. In ch. 4 G. appears in a favorable light, sympathetic with the Shunamite woman, because she was childless (ver. 14), and at the same time jealous of his master's honor (ver. 27). But in ch. 5 he is described as covetous and untruthful, and as punished with the leprosy of Naaman. After this we are surprised to find him, in 8 4 f., talking freely with the king of Israel, to whom he is recounting the deeds of Elisha (as tho the prophet were then dead). The stories have evidently been gathered from different sources, and no attempt has been made to render them perfectly harmonious. See also ELISHA.

E. E. N.

GEHENNA. See JERUSALEM, § 6; and ESCHATOLOGY, § 30.

GELILOTH, gi-lai'leth (גִּלְלוֹת, gēlōth), 'circles,' i.e., 'stone circles' or, more broadly, 'districts': A place in the boundary of Benjamin (Jos 18 17) called Gilgal in 15 7. It was between Jerusalem and the Jordan, not far from the ascent of Adummim (q.v.), but is still unidentified.

GEMALLI, g<sub>1</sub>-mal'ai (גִּמְלִי, gēmālī): One of the twelve spies (Nu 13 12).

GEMARIAH, gem''a-rai'a (גִּמְרְיָהּ, gēmāryāh), 'J' accomplishes': 1. A noble of Judah, in the days of Jehoiakim, apparently somewhat favorably disposed toward Jeremiah (Jer 36 10-12, 25). 2. A son of Hilkiah, sent to Babylon by Zedekiah and the bearer of a letter from Jeremiah to the Jewish captives there (Jer 29 3).

GEMS: This term is found only in Pr 26 8 ERV where the Heb. is 'ebhen, 'stone.' While a jewel or precious stone may be meant, and would make good sense, both AV and ARV correctly render the word 'stone,' avoiding all inferences.

GENEALOGY, OLD TESTAMENT. 1. Reasons for Genealogical Records. Zeal in establishing and recording genealogies is promoted by anything which connects privilege with the establishment of descent. For example, the remarkable genealogical records of the Arabs, which in many respects are a most suggestive parallel study to that of the Jewish genealogies, appear to owe their character and extent to the method introduced by the Calif Omar I of distributing the spoil taken from the infidels so that certain classes of the believers and their children received a larger share than other Arabs. In the circumstances of the Exile and the Return we find a sufficient cause, if not for the creation, yet certainly for great extension of genealogical zeal among the Jews. So long as the Jews were in their own land, actual possession of the patrimony and discharge of the duties connected therewith may frequently have served as sufficient proof of the inclusion of the owners in the Jewish nation; but divorced from their land they needed other proofs of their descent, if, in the Exile, they were to look forward to, or at the Return were to claim with confidence reinstatement in what were then to rank as the full privileges of Jews by descent. Thus we find Ezekiel, at the beginning of the Exile, making allusions to written registers, when he says of the false prophets that 'they shall not be in the council of my [J''s] people, or be written in the writing [register, mg.] of the house of Israel, neither shall they enter into the land of Israel' (Ezk 13 9). And in the list of those who returned from the Exile we find certain families mentioned who were unable to show 'their fathers' houses and their pedigrees' (zar'ām, Neh 7 61). What loss of privilege befell these secular families is not specified, but of certain priestly families in like case it is related that 'these sought their register among those who were reckoned by genealogy,'<sup>1</sup> but it was not found: therefore were they deemed polluted and put from the priesthood. And the governor ['Tirshatha'] said unto them that they should not eat of the most holy things [i.e., exercise the privileges of priests; cf., e.g., Nu 18 9-11] till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim' (Neh 7 64-65), i.e., till the doubt left by the defectiveness of the family register could be determined by the sacred lot. The exclusive policy of Ezra, involving as it did the illegitimacy of marriages between Jews and those who were not Jews, must also have stimulated genealogical research and record. This cause, too, or anything corresponding to it, was absent in earlier times, for intermarriages had then been recognized and frequent.

2. Genealogical Records Before the Exile. We can scarcely be wrong, then, in concluding that genealogies were kept much more regularly after the Exile than before. Indeed, if we ask how early and how direct is the evidence for genealogies, in particular for uninterrupted genealogies of individuals, recorded in writing before the Exile, it must be admitted that it is relatively late and indirect. The laws of Dt 23 2-8 (7th cent. B.C.) perhaps presuppose, and would certainly require for their satisfactory fulfilment, such records; while the narrative of the census in II S ch. 24, and such allusions as those in Ex 32 32, Jer 22 30 may point, if not to actual genealogical records, to records from which genealogies might be constructed.

A certain form of genealogical knowledge was in any case doubtless prevalent in early Israel. It must be remembered that by their social organization the Israelites consisted of a number of tribes, these tribes of a number of clans, these clans of a number of houses or families, the family even being a more complex group than the family (in its more restricted sense of a man, his wife, and their children) is with us. Thus when we read in a relatively early passage (Jos 7 16, 17 JE) that 'Joshua brought Israel near by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken. And he brought near the family ('clan') of Judah; and he took the family of Zerahites; and he brought near the family of the Zerahites, man by man; and Zabdi was taken: and he brought near his household, man by man; and Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken,<sup>2</sup> we can see that Judah was one of many tribes constituting Israel, Zerah one of many clans constituting Judah, Zabdi one of many families constituting Zerah, and Achan, himself the father of a family, one of many individuals belonging to different families (in our restricted sense of the term) that constituted the family of Zabdi (cf. also I S 10 21). Now we may well believe that in early Israel a man could commonly have given the name of his family, clan, or tribe, and moreover many or all of the families that constituted his clan and of the clans that made up his tribe. And early records of the names of these tribal divisions may well have been kept in records made for various purposes. But this is a very different matter from genealogies of individuals carried upward through many generations.

Whatever we may infer as to early periods, it is certain that of the genealogical material preserved in the O T by far the greater part is found in works of postexilic origin—in the Priestly Code (P), in Ch, Ezr, Neh. In preexilic writings it is rare to find an individual identified more closely than by reference to his father: in some cases, especially in the Book of Jeremiah, the name of the grandfather is also given; but it is altogether exceptional (and probably due to the kingly position of the last-named ancestor) that the prophet Zephaniah's ancestors are given (Zeph 1 1) to the fourth generation before him. Contrast with this the lengthy genealogies with which Ezra (Ezr 7 1), Tobit (To 1 1), and Judith (Jth 8 1) are provided. But tho the genealogical material is found mainly in the later literature, much of it relates to far earlier periods; the genealogies of P end with the Mosaic Age, those of I Ch chs. 1-9 (mainly, if not exclusively, apart from interpolated sections) are apparently intended<sup>3</sup> not to descend below the age of David (cf. 4 31, 7 2). If, then, these genealogies are throughout genuine, the custom of carefully registering tribal, clan, and family divisions and, in some cases, lengthy lines of the descent of individuals must have been widely prevalent far earlier than the direct evidence would suggest. There thus emerge important questions: with what degree of trustworthiness should the O T genealogies be credited? Are many or any of them artificial constructions resting less on fact than on imagination and theory? Or are the genealogies even when genuine and accurate tables of relations, referred to the correct period?

3. Significance of the Terms Used. Before attempting to give the very brief answers, which will alone be possible here, to these questions, it will be well to consider the language of the genealogies. For we shall thus see that a number of the O T genealogies are not intended to be and consequently must not be criticized as tables showing the descent of individuals; they are modes of describing the relations between tribes, clans, families, and places. It is not always easy to decide to which type particular genealogies were originally intended to belong; again, it is not improbable that descriptions once intended in the one sense came to be taken in the other. But these difficulties will be lessened if we approach the genealogies by a study of certain linguistic usages of the Hebrews, and, in particular, two: (1) Terms of kinship, more particularly the term 'son,' are used to cover other relations than those occasioned by physical descent. What we should term membership in a gild is in Hebrew 'sonship'; a member of the gild of the perfumers is a 'son of the apothecaries' (cf. Neh 3 8 AV; RV paraphrastically 'one of the perfumers') members of prophetic societies, or gilds of porters, are respectively 'sons of the prophets,' or 'children [sons] of the porters' (Ezr 2 42); the Jews as exiled are termed collectively haggōlāh, 'the company of exiles' (Ezk 1 1; Jer 28 6; Ezr 10 8, etc.), or b'nē haggōlāh, 'children of the captivity' (Ezr 4 1; etc.). Nor is this usage to be explained by the descent of calling, or profession, from father to son; for this would not explain why a single perfumer is a son of the perfumers (plural), nor such a closely allied phrase as 'sons of the troop' ('men of the army,' II Ch 25 13 RV), with which we may compare the expression 'sons of the caravans' in the Aramaic of Palmyra, or even the N T 'sons of the bride-chamber.' Various other relations are also expressed by the term 'son'; hostages are 'sons of pledges' (II K 14 14), valiant men 'sons of might' (II S 2 7); cf. the N T 'sons of thunder.' All these expressions, it must be observed, occur in ordinary prose. 'Son' is used also with geographical terms: Ezekiel (16 23, 28, 23 17) terms Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians respectively 'sons of Egypt,' 'sons of Assyria,' and 'sons of Babylon.' Joel (3 6) terms those whose home was Jerusalem 'children [sons] of Jerusalem'; 'children [sons] of the province' are the exiles who returned and settled in the province of Judah (Ezr 2 1). So, in poetry it is true, 'rams of the breed of Bashan' (Dt 32 14) are in Hebrew idiom 'sons of Bashan.' Towns or villages dependent on another are its 'daughters' (cf. 'Heshbon and in all the towns [daughters mg.] thereof,' Nu 21 25). Is the case different when an ethnographical takes the place of a geographical term? Did the expression 'sons' ('children' RV) of Esau, Heth, Lot, Manasseh, Israel, etc., mean the actual children or, at least, the lineal descendants of individuals named Esau, Heth, etc.? Certainly in later times the Jews treated their descent from the patriarchs literally enough. This is not the place to examine in detail the validity of the claim, but it must be pointed out that such an inference can not be safely drawn from the term 'sons of Israel,' for this is ambiguous; it may mean persons physically descended from an individual named Israel, or persons belonging to the people so named. That the latter usage occurs is obvious in one case; for we can not sharply distinguish the use of this term 'sons' in 'sons of Manasseh' and 'children [sons] of the half-tribe of Manasseh' (I Ch 5 23), yet in the latter case 'sons' can mean only 'members' of the half-tribe. (2) The second linguistic use needing to be kept in mind is the frequent personification of a whole group of people, so that the whole is spoken of, or represented as speaking, as an individual. As illustrations it may suffice to cite: 'And the Egyptians [Heb. 'Egypt'] said, Let me flee'

(Ex 14 25; RV paraphrastically, as often, 'Let us flee'); 'and the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure 'ye' [Heb. 'thou'] dwell among us' (Jos 9 7); 'The children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given 'me' but one . . . inheritance, seeing 'I' am a great people' (Jos 17 14; cf. further Nu 20 14-21, 21 1-3; Jg 1 3; Gn 34 30). 4. Geographical and Ethnological Relations Expressed Genealogically. We may now examine some instances of genealogies which clearly describe geographical and ethnographical relations. And first, Gn ch. 10: The RV rather obscures the obvious meaning by transliterating certain names which it elsewhere translates: so 'Mizraim' (ver. 6) is regularly elsewhere rendered 'Egypt,' 'Cush' commonly by 'Ethiopia,' 'Asshur' (ver. 22) by 'Assyria.' If we substitute the familiar for these entirely exceptional English equivalents of the Hebrew words, Gn 10 6, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18 runs thus: 'And the sons of Ham: Ethiopia and Egypt and Put and Canaan. And Egypt begat Ludim, and Ananim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim, and Pathrusim, and Casluhim, . . . and Caphtorim. And Canaan begat Sidon, his first-born, and Heth and the Jebusite and the Amorite . . . and the Arvadite and the Zemarite and the Hamathite.' The meaning of all this is clear; the terms 'sons' and 'to beget' are used metaphorically; and what is stated is that one of the three great divisions of the inhabitants of the world known to the Hebrews included as its subdivisions Ethiopians, Egyptians, Putites, and Canaanites; and in those subdivisions the inhabitants and subjects of Egypt included Ludites (all the terms in ver. 13 are plurals in Hebrew), the inhabitants of Upper Egypt (Pathros) and Caphtor and others; the Canaanites included the Phenicians (who are intended by Sidon, which being regarded as the most ancient settlement in Canaan, is described metaphorically as Canaan's 'first-born'), Hittites, Jebusites, inhabitants of Arvad and Hamath (in N. Syria), and others. The compiler of Gn ch. 10, like the compilers of the Arabic genealogies, may have held the theory, which would, however, conflict no less with the facts of the growth of nations given in the Bible than with the findings of modern historical and scientific research, that each nation consisted exclusively of descendants from a common ancestor, and again that all allied nations were descended from another common tho more remote ancestor, but this is not directly stated in the chapter; the genealogy supplies no links between terms so wide as Egypt and Canaan on the one hand and terms so relatively limited as Caphtor and Sidon on the other. The value of the genealogy lies in the light it casts on the geographical distribution and, to some extent, on the political relations of nations at the periods to which its several parts belong.

The metaphorical language of Gn ch. 10 is relatively simple; 'sons' are obviously subdivisions of the ethnographic groups that rank as 'fathers.' Elsewhere it is often more elaborate and sometimes more ambiguous. For example, in I Ch 2 18 f., 50-55 we read that Caleb married Azubah, and, after her death, Ephrath; that the first-born of the second marriage was Hur and the sons of Hur, Shobal, Salma, and Hareph, were fathers respectively of Kiriath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader, and that the families of Beth-lehem were Ithrites, Putites, and others. The presence of names of well-known districts and towns (Ephrath, Beth-lehem, Kiriath-jearim) at once indicate that the terms 'son,' 'father,' 'marry,' 'beget' are used metaphorically. In detail there is room for some difference of interpretation, but the general drift of the genealogical statement is clear—the clan Caleb first settled in the district of Azubah and was there subdivided into certain clans (Jesher, Shobab, and Ardon); subsequently Azubah passed out of the possession of the clan which then settled in Ephrath—the district which included Beth-lehem (Mic 5 2; Gn 35 19); during the occupation of Ephrath a main subdivision of the clan was called Hur, and was again subdivided into divisions named Shobal, Salma, and Hareph, who inhabited the towns Kiriath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader respectively—the Shobalites of Beth-lehem being split up into the families of Ithrites, Putites, and others. Here, as in Gn ch. 10, 'sons,' 'grandsons,' 'great-grandsons,' represent the divisions, subdivisions, and further subdivisions of an ethnic group: but here 'son' or 'wife' may also represent the town or district inhabited.

Facts remain facts, and literal descriptions of the same facts, if true, must agree whatever their age or origin; but metaphorical descriptions of the same fact may vary largely according to the taste of the writer. A relation which one may describe as that of father and son, another may prefer to describe as that of husband and wife. Further in the course of the centuries tribal divisions and tribal relations vary. A tribe may increase and it may fall at one time into, say, five, at another into ten main divisions; or the reverse may happen; or, again, a once independent tribe, or clan, through diminution may become incorporated with another, or a particular subdivision of a tribe may become so important as to form a new independent tribe; or, once more, a clan which occupied a particular district may move to another. Then in the metaphorical language of these genealogies it will be said, in the first case, that X (=the tribe) had five sons, but at a later or earlier period, as the case may be, it will be said with equal correctness that he had ten; in the next case X and Y will be at one time described as brothers, at another as father and son. The last case may be variously expressed. As above, in the case of Caleb, X being the clan, Y and Z the districts, X may be said first to marry Y and then Z, or at one time X may be father of Y, at another of Z; or again X may be first son of Y and then son of Z. In spite of frequent textual corruption and not infrequent ambiguity of the metaphorical terms, up to a certain point the geographical and ethnographical genealogies of the O T may be understood, once the general method is appreciated; but if it be disregarded and the names taken to represent individuals and the terms to be literal description of fact, then various genealogies being compared will simply bristle with contradictions and difficulties. For example, in I Ch 7 6, Benjamin is said to have three, in I Ch 8 1 f., and Nu 26 38 five, and in Gn 46 21 ten sons; in Gn 46 21 Gera is a son of Benjamin and brother of Bela, in I Ch 87 a grandson of Benjamin, and a son of Bela; similarly Ard and Naaman are sons of Benjamin in Gn, but of Bela in Nu 26 40. According to Nu 26 29-32 Manasseh's son, Machir, had by his son Gilead (a district!) six grandsons—Iezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, and Hephher; but in Jos 17 1, 12 the six grandsons of Machir become sons of Manasseh and younger brothers of Machir. The real difficulty in such cases is to determine the periods to which the several descriptions apply; there is seldom reason to doubt that such descriptions are genuine descriptions of fact.

The Book of Genesis is articulated by a succession of interrelated genealogies—of heaven and earth, 1-2 4a; of Adam, ch. 5; of Noah, 6 9 f.; of the sons of Noah, ch. 10; of Shem, 11 10-27; of Terah, 11 27, 32; of Ishmael, 25 12-16; of Isaac, 25 19 f.; of Esau, ch. 36; of Jacob, 35 22b-26, 37 2. The character and value of these must in the main be determined by wider considerations than those that fall under the present subject. However, the first of the foregoing genealogies is obviously metaphorical and so, as we have seen, is the fourth. On the other hand, in some cases it is clearly the intention of the writer that we should think of individuals; the twelve 'sons' of Ishmael are expressly said to be twelve princes (25 16; cf. 17 20). Whether he be right or wrong, the list has value; for it preserves the names of actual Ishmaelite clans, even tho the 'sons' of Ishmael thus named may as individuals be nothing more than an inference from an incorrect theory of the origin of clans and tribes. As the genealogies present twelve 'sons' of Ishmael, so they present twelve 'sons' of Israel; and these 'sons' again, whether they ever had existence as individuals or not, are the twelve tribes of Israel, tho it must be added that the twelve 'sons' of Israel, as tribes of Israel, are not an entirely fixed and permanent quantity; for the twelve sometimes includes and sometimes excludes Levi, sometimes makes of Joseph a single tribe and sometimes two—Ephraim and Manasseh. In Gn ch. 36 there can be little doubt that we are dealing with clans and their relations, and not with individuals. The earlier genealogies of Genesis are, in part, of yet a third type; they tabulate neither clans nor individual men, but mythical names and matter.

5. The Lists in I Chronicles. Turning to the early chapters of I Ch, we find that the main purpose here also is to present the names of the tribes and their subdivisions at a time when each 'son' is a clan numbering many individuals; so most clearly and exclusively in the case of Issachar (7 1-5), Manasseh (7 14 ff.), Asher (7 30 ff.). In these cases the genealogies given seldom exceed three or four, and, of course, in no way correspond to the number of generations between an individual common ancestor and the numbers given. But interspersed in these chapters are lengthy genealogies of individuals—of the ancestors of a certain Elishama (2 34-41); of the descendants of David (ch. 3); of the ancestors to the 8th preceding generation of a certain Beerah, described as contemporary with Tiglath-pileser (8th cent. B.C.) (5 4-6); of certain priests and Levites (ch. 6); of the descendants of Saul to the 12th generation (8 33-40=9 33-44). With these we reach the final point to be considered—the trustworthiness of genealogies of preexilic individuals. As already stated, evidence that such genealogies were recorded in early times is scanty. Of the genealogies just enumerated, that of David down to the Exile is certainly genuine, but could, of course, have been compiled at a late period from the books of Kings. It is difficult to prove the authenticity of any of the rest, and some of them contain features which create suspicion. Freest from suspicious features is the genealogy of Saul. On the other hand, the priestly and Levitical genealogies are so full of suspicious features that they may safely be treated as not genuine. They contain, certainly, some names of actual persons gleaned from earlier sources, but also many 'dummies,' mere names that represent no actual persons in the periods implied, and as a whole they seek to establish lines of descent that must be regarded as historically unproved and improbable, in some cases even demonstrably wrong. The genealogies of I Ch ch. 6, for example, present a series of features which are known to be characteristic of postexilic names, but which are entirely different from those that mark groups of well-attested early names. Thus the same name recurs in the same genealogy, implying the custom of naming children from ancestors, yet this custom, as Jewish, can not be clearly traced beyond the 5th cent. B.C. Names compounded with the Divine name Yah(weh) form a highly suspicious proportion of the whole; the formations of the names are those most frequent in late and least frequent in early times; some of the names are frequent in later, but otherwise unattested in the earlier periods. An indication that these genealogies could not in all cases be, even if real, complete is found in the wide difference in the number of genealogies that separate contemporaries from a common ancestor.

6. The Levitical and Priestly Genealogies. Finally, reasons for the invention of these genealogies are to be found in the history of the priesthood, and particularly in the movement powerfully started by Ezekiel (Ezk 44 10 ff.), which illegitimized certain priests and their descendants, and confined the priesthood to a single line, and required all servants of the Temple to be Levites and not, as heretofore, aliens.

The basis of fact in the Levitical genealogies, as in the genealogies of the other tribes, is to be found in the names of the Levitical divisions; but from the narratives we can see that the divisions no more remained constant in Levi than in other tribes. In Nu 26 58 the primary divisions of Levi are five—the Libnites, the Hebronites, the Mahlites, the Mushites, and the Korahites (gentilics formed from Libnah, Hebron—names of places—and Mahli, Mushi [Moses], and Korah); elsewhere (Nu 26 57; I Ch ch. 6, etc.) they are three—Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, 'sons' of Levi, while Mahli and Mushi become 'sons' of Merari, Hebron of Kohath, Libni sometimes a 'son' of Gershon (Nu 3 18; I Ch 6 17), sometimes of Merari (I Ch 6 29), and Korah, a great-grandson of Levi (Nu 16 1; I Ch 6 37 f.). Worthless as genealogies of individuals, these tables nevertheless contain many valuable clues alike to late Jewish theory and to the actual origin and history of the priestly and Levitical orders, but it is impossible to follow them further here.

GENERAL: This word occurs once (I Ch 27 34 AV) as the rendering of sar, elsewhere generally rendered 'captain' (q.v.).

GENERATION. See TIME, § 5; GENEALOGY, § 4; GENESIS, § 2; COSMOGONY, § 1; and JESUS CHRIST, § 19.

GENESIS. 1. The Name. The first book of the O T was called by the Jews בְּרֵאשִׁית, ber'e'shith ('in the beginning'), from its first word. The word Genesis is Greek (γένεσις), meaning 'generation,' or 'origin,' and was the title given to the book in the Greek version of the O T (the LXX.), whence it passed to the Latin and other versions.

2. Outline. Gn is constructed on a simple tho somewhat artificial outline, being divided into ten unequal parts, each introduced by the formula, 'These are the generations of.' The first one of these, now found at 2 4a, probably originally stood before 1 1. According to these headings the scheme of the book is: (1) The 'generations' of the heavens and earth (1 1-4 26). (2) Of Adam (5 1-6 8). (3) Of Noah (6 9-9 29). (4) Of the sons of Noah (10 1-11 9). (5) Of Shem (11 10-26). (6) Of Terah (Abraham) (11 27-25 11). (7) Of Ishmael (25 11-18). (8) Of Isaac (25 19-35 29). (9) Of Esau (ch. 36). (10) Of Jacob (chs. 37-50). All the material in 11-11 26 may be called the primeval history, and that in 11 27-50 may be termed patriarchal history. The plan of the writer was, evidently, to connect the history of Israel with the larger history of mankind, and the method followed was that of continually passing from a wider to a narrower field, until at last the history of Jacob-Israel was reached. Thus he passed from the Universe (ch. 1) to Mankind (Adam); from Mankind to the line of Noah: from the Sons of Noah to one line, Shem; from all the Shemites to the line of Terah-Abraham; from all of Abraham's line to that of Isaac; and from the story of Jacob and Esau (the line of Isaac) to that of Jacob alone, for Israel and Jacob were equivalent terms.

3. Critical Analysis. When the contents of Gn are closely examined, it becomes evident that the unity of the book is only superficial. It is in reality composite in structure, the result of combining three narratives originally separate and each complete in itself. The evidence for this is given in part in the article HEXATEUCH (q.v.). The outline given above (§ 2) is that of P, the latest document, which was adopted by the compiler as the basis for his large composite work (Gn-Jos). An analysis of P in Gn will be found under HEXATEUCH, § 27, and need not be repeated here.

Of the two older documents (J and E), J began with creation and passed gradually to the story of Israel's ancestors, a method later imitated by P. Since no certain trace of E is found before ch. 15, it is probable that E began with Abraham. From ch. 20 onward J and E can be traced as parallel narratives dealing with the same ancient traditions, and in much the same way. The narrative of J can be traced with comparatively little difficulty because of its consistent use of the name Jehovah for God and, as far as ch. 20, by means of its easy, flowing narrative style. After ch. 20 the analysis is more difficult, not only because there are now three interwoven narratives instead of two, but because, on the one hand, two of these (E and P) use 'God' instead of 'Jehovah,' and, on the other, the style of E is much more nearly that of J. The places most difficult to analyze are those where J and E are closely interwoven. In such sections the style and contents of the two documents are often so similar and the clues so elusive that a sure analysis is impossible.

4. Contents of J and E. The analysis exhibited below is mainly that of Dr. Driver in LOT 8 (1913). This is but one of many analyses made by careful scholars in modern times. While all agree in the main, some have ventured to distinguish between the documents much more minutely (cf. e.g., the analysis in Carpenter-Harford, The Comp. of the Hexateuch, p. 509 ff. or Skinner's in his Com. on Gn in ICC [1910]). In this analysis such passages as should be assigned probably to the various editors of this literature in the long course of its transmission have not been specially designated.

In the foregoing analysis of JE and that of P given in HEXATEUCH, § 27, all the material in Gn is accounted for, except ch. 14, which seems to have been a separate composition, found at hand by an editor, or compiler, and inserted in its present position.

5. Comparison of the Documents in Gn. Reading the narratives for the sake of comparison, certain distinctive characteristics of each will become manifest. In P we have a carefully planned, systematic narrative, arranged according to an exact chronological scheme, with a view to the progress of history toward a certain well-defined end. The writer of P was profoundly convinced that the goal of human history was Israel, the theocratic people, with its holy institutions, and in Gn we have that part of P's history in which the preliminary unfolding of that Divine purpose is revealed (cf. Skinner, ICC on Gn, p. lxi f.). Thus the Sabbath is founded at creation; commands concerning food are given from the beginning (1 29 f., 9 3 f.); emphasis is placed upon circumcision as the sign of the covenant (ch. 17); God is known to the primeval world as 'God' ('El') simply, to the patriarchs as 'God Almighty' ('El Shaddai') (17 1; cf. 28 3, 35 11), to be later known to Israel as Jehovah (see Ex 6 2). In P there is no mention of sacrifice or priesthood in the primeval, or in the patriarchal, world, for these came only later with the founding of Israel's institutions by Moses. The theological conceptions of P are advanced too somewhat abstract. God is great, infinite, transcendent, and while He reveals Himself, there is no hint of any external means (as by a vision or angel). All that is said is simply, 'God said unto' this or that one. Furthermore, there is comparatively little in P that savors of a close touch with popular tradition, or seems to have been drawn from popular story. All is exact, carefully planned and worked out, the result of much thought and even research (cf. the genealogies of Ishmael, or Esau, the geographical material in ch. 10, the table in ch. 5, or the chronological scheme into which the events are fitted). In both J and E, on the other hand, the narrative is of a much more popular character. It shows itself to have been drawn quite directly from the popular tradition. The stories are told in a vivid, realistic way, designed to interest and attract the listener or reader. In these stories there is no connected chronology—in fact, there is no chronology at all, and the combination of P's chronological arrangement with the non-chronological narratives of J and E works havoc with the consistency of the whole (cf. Skinner, pp. lvii ff.). In religious and moral character the material in J and E varies greatly. Much of most ancient and primitive material has been preserved, or still lingers in these stories along with more advanced and refined religious or moral conceptions (e.g., in the stories of paradise, of the visit of the three angels to Abraham, or of Jacob at Peniel).

6. Sources of the Material in Gn. In considering the sources whence the writers of the documents in Gn drew their material a distinction must be made between the ultimate origin of the material and its condition when the authors J, E, or P made use of it. In both J and E we have evidently quite a collection of ancient tradition. Close examination of J will reveal the fact that behind the collection, as we find it in that document, there were earlier and smaller collections which were at hand and used by the author of J. It is altogether probable that quite a process of collection, and even editing, is to be posited before the composition of J. The ultimate sources of Gn were separate traditions, legends, or even myths, mainly oral rather than written, each having its specific occasion and independent history before being taken in hand, altered, and adjusted to a place in a group of more or less closely connected traditions. Doubtless the homes of many of these traditions were the various holy places, or sanctuaries, which figure in them, as Beersheba, Hebron, Bethel, or Shechem. Some of them may have been originally Canaanite, and later transformed by the Hebrews. Some may have related originally to the movements of tribes, retold later as the experiences of individuals (e.g., chs. 34 and 38). The fragments of ancient poetry (4 24 f., 25 23, 27 27 ff., etc.) may well, in some instances at least, be much older than the narrative in which they are embedded, and their original reference may have been to different circumstances. None of the material in 1 1-11 25 is specifically Israelitic, and its formal elements at least must have been derived by the Israelites from the larger Semitic world of which they were a part, and to which they were very closely related. We now find all this varied material collected, edited, and arranged according to one ruling purpose—a national-religious purpose—to show how Israel originated as the people of J'. It was along these lines that the ancient document J was constructed and, tho dealing exclusively with patriarchal stories, this was also the method followed by the writer of E.

As to the sources of P, while it is evident that this work is planned much along the same lines as J, it is just as evident that the author was not interested especially in merely reproducing popular tradition. His creation and flood stories, his comprehensive chronology, his interest in ceremonial prescriptions, his careful array of facts of a geographical, ethnological, and genealogical character, together with his advanced theological conceptions, all reveal reflection, study, and calculation—in other words, the careful working over of ancient material from certain well-defined points of view. Consequently, in regard to P, the question of sources is comparatively unimportant. P presupposes acquaintance on the part of his readers with the general body of popular tradition. It was the purpose of the author, as a scholar and theologian, to use those elements of ancient tradition to make manifest the lofty, supreme purpose of God, the One Maker of heaven and earth, manifested in the creation of His covenant people Israel.

7. Historical Value of Gn. In the light of modern science and of recent archeological discovery the historical value of Gn chs. 1-11 is no longer an open question. We can not go to Gn ch. 1 for our cosmogony, or our geology. We can not go to Gn chs. 2-3 for the literal facts of the origin of man, or of evil. Neither can we go to 4 17 ff. for exact knowledge of the origin of early civilization, nor does the story of Babel really account for the origin of the diverse languages. We must judge the material or formal elements of all these narratives precisely as we do the very similar matter found in abundance all over the ancient world. The case is somewhat different with the contents of chs. 12-50. Here, to a large extent, we are dealing with traditions centering for the most part about places in the land actually occupied by Israel and about persons considered to be the actual forefathers of the nation. Such traditions might easily be greatly elaborated and embellished in the course of transmission, until finally committed to writing, and it is exceedingly difficult to determine what is to be considered the historical kernel and what the later elaboration. That a great part of the substratum of the traditions in Gn is historical seems to be a reasonable position.

8. Religious Value of Gn. The question of the religious value of Gn is, in great measure, distinct from that of its historical value. The Hebrews belonged to a world full of all kinds of mythological legends, and of all grades and varieties of theistic conceptions. It was certainly no small matter that they were able to face that world and make use of many of its theories and yet triumph over its religious deficiencies in the interests of a pure, spiritual, ethical, and monotheistic faith. It is just such a victory of Israel's religion that we find in Gn, and of that victory the Book of Gn itself is an incontestable witness. The book is everywhere instinct with this vital faith. Whether the writers are dealing with the ancient Babylonian cosmogony (as in ch. 1) or with the old legend of Jacob wrestling with an angel (the original significance of which must remain unknown), it is the same earnest religious feeling and purpose that are manifested. It is Israel's religion, the post-Mosaic religion of Israel, that we find in Gn. Speaking broadly, one may say that in the J and E sections we see the best type of the 'pre-prophetic' religion of Israel and in the P sections the more formal type of the postexilic period. And it is in what Gn tells us, and seeks to teach, of the character and progress of this religion in that ancient world that we are to find its highest value and may discern its inspiration.

O T, especially in the postexilic writings, and are found frequently in the Apocrypha and Apocalyptic Literature, and in the literature of later Judaism. The term heathen, common in the AV, conveys this idea, but the RV has rightly preferred the more impartial rendering 'nations.' In N T times, the Jew divided mankind into three classes, Jews, Greeks ("Ἕλληνες, made to include Romans, thus meaning the civilized peoples of the Roman Empire, often rendered 'Gentiles' AV), and barbarians (the uncivilized, Ac 28 4; Ro 1 14; I Co 14 11). The terms uncircumcised, uncircumcision were also used sometimes with deep meaning, to designate those who had no share or lot with Israel in her peculiar privileges (Gn 17 14; Jg 14 3, 15 8; I S 31 4; Gn 34 14; Ac 11 3; etc.). Besides these general terms there are several special terms, which show the attitude of Israelites toward foreigners who lived among them. Two of these, gēr (generally sojourner RV, but stranger AV, once alien, Ex 18 3 AV) and tōshābh (also sojourner RV), express the nearer relationship, while zār (stranger) and nēkhār or nokhrī (stranger, strange woman, etc., sometimes alien) designate the more remote. The gēr (pl. gērīm) or tōshābh was one who put himself under the protection of Israel and of J', Israel's God, who submitted to many of the requirements of Israel's law, and was entitled to certain privileges not accorded to the 'stranger' (zār or nēkhār). In the earliest code the gēr was given the benefit of the Sabbath rest, and it was recommended that he be treated kindly (Ex 20 10, 22 21, 23 9, 12). In the Code of Dt the same kindly spirit prevails, the gēr being classed with the Levite, the fatherless, and the widow (Dt 14 21, 23, 16 11, 26 11-13), and guaranteed the same just judgment as was the right of the Israelite himself (24 14, 17, 19-21, 27 19). At the same time Dt 14 21 permits the Israelite to give to a gēr meat that he himself was not to eat, because the animal had 'died of itself.' In the Holiness Code it is presumed that the gēr offered sacrifices to J' (Lv 17 8, 22 18); he is required to observe various ceremonial and other requirements (Lv 17 10 ff., 18 26, 20 2, 24 16, 22); he is to be treated kindly (19 10; etc.). On the other hand, if a rich gēr acquires a Heb. slave by purchase, the latter can be redeemed at once (Lv 25 47). In P, while the gēr is supposed to offer sacrifice to J' (Nu 15 14 ff.), he must be circumcised in order to partake of the Passover (Ex 12 19, 48 f.; Nu 9 14), by which act he becomes an Israelite. The status of the tōshābh was exactly that of the gēr, the two terms being synonymous.

The status of the nēkhār (or nokhrī) was based on the idea that he had (or desired) no cultus-fellowship with Israel. His real allegiance was to another people and another deity. Hence even the humane Code of Dt does not extend the privileges of the year of release to the nokhrī, and permits the exaction of usury from him (Dt 15 3, 23 20). No nokhrī could be king (Dt 17 15), and in P he is stringently forbidden to partake of the Passover (Ex 12 43). In Ezk 44 7-9 he is forbidden to enter the sanctuary. The 'strange' wives against whom Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezr 10 2 ff.; Neh 13 26 f.) protested and (probably) the 'strange' women against whom the wise men warned the heedless (Pr 2 16, etc.) were foreigners. The zār was not necessarily of foreign blood. The term is used at times of class distinctions within Israel, as, e.g., of the non-priestly vs. the priestly (Ex 29 33; Lv 22 12; etc.). In the same way the term is applied to the 'strange' woman as one outside the pale of respectable society (Pr 2 16, 5 3; etc.). But it was often used of foreigners as people entirely different from, or even hostile to, Israel (Is 1 7; Ezk 11 9; etc.).

Even in preexilic days some felt that the Gentile world shared with Israel in J's care and purpose (hints in Is 2 2-4 or 19 23 f., date uncertain). In the postexilic period, in spite of the dominant exclusive tendency to separation from the Gentile there were those like II Is (cf. Is 49 6) or the author of the Book of Jonah who had a deep sympathy for the Gentile world and felt that it could share in Israel's hope. But the main trend was the other way and consequently in the postexilic and N T times the distinction between the Israelite and the non-Israelite was emphasized in the scrupulous abstinence on the part of loyal Jews from all familiar, unrestrained fellowship with Gentiles, like eating with them, etc. (Ac 11 3; Gal 2 12). Another striking evidence of the same prejudice was the demarcation of a portion of the Temple court as the 'court of the Gentiles,' beyond whose bounds no foreigner could pass without incurring the death penalty (see TEMPLE, § 27, and cf. Ac 21 28). Notwithstanding this, the way of entrance into Judaism from without was always open. Proselytes (προσέλυτοι) were numerous and zealously sought for (Mt 23 15). These corresponded to the O T gērīm who had received circumcision, without the local and political allegiance natural to the O T times. Strictly speaking, there was but one class of proselytes, as the so called 'proselytes of the gate' (in the N T, 'devout' men, who 'feared God,' Ac 10 2; etc.) were not proselytes proper, but merely Gentiles favorably disposed toward the Jewish faith, who attended synagog services, and were willing to impose on themselves some of the Jewish rules of life (cf. Nowack, Heb. Arch., I, p. 339 f.; and Schürer GVI 4, vol. III, pp. 177 f. See also PROSELYTES). The occasional occurrence in the N T of 'sojourner' (He 11 9; I P 2 11) or 'alien' (He 11 34) is but a figurative echo of O T usage, and not especially significant. See also NETHINIM and SLAVERY.

GEOGRAPHY. 1. Geography in General. The ancient Orient gave no consistent and interested study to the surface of the earth. While the aspect of the heavens attracted the Babylonians, and a considerable amount of correct information was secured, making up a crude science of astronomy, knowledge of places upon the earth was regarded as of secondary importance. Especially is this true of the Hebrews in the earlier stages of their history. Their contact with the world outside of their own territory was not like that of the Phenicians, motivated by aggressive commercialism, but occasioned by initiative from without, and was for the most part indirect. Their knowledge of the world was thus not the same from one age to another, but increased with each generation.

2. Form and Size of the Earth. As to the form of the visible earth, the Jews held that it was circular, and surrounded by water, which extended as far as where the dome of heaven, like an inverted bowl, rests on it (Job 26 10; Pr 8 27 f.). The surface of the earth was believed to be generally plain, but studded with mountains, and broken by rivers and lakes. It was vast beyond the power of man to measure or compute (Job 28 5, 38 18); but yet it was limited within certain boundaries which were definitely known to exist (Dt 28 64; Job 28 24; Jer 10 13; Ps 2 8). The center of it was the Holy City, Jerusalem (Ezk 5 5; 'navel of the earth' LXX.). Around this central point the nations of the earth were arranged as described in Gn ch. 10.

3. Points of the Compass. Within the circle of the known earth the Hebrews were accustomed to distinguish four and only four directions in the horizon (cardinal points), and four winds to correspond with these (Jer 49 36; Ezk 37 9; Zec 6 5; Dn 8 8). The designation of these directions was made according to three different systems: (1) The first of these took the rising sun as its fixed point, and by placing the observer face to face with it named the East 'front' (qedhem), the West 'behind' ('aḥārōn), the North 'the left hand' (s'mō'el), and the South 'the right hand' (yammān, ieman) (see also EAST). (2) The second system was based on the daily apparent motion of the sun; hence the East was 'the rising of the sun' (mizrāh), the West the 'going down' of the sun (m'bhō' hashshemesh, Ps 50 1; Mal 1 11), the North the regions of darkness (tsāphōn), and the South the region of light or brightness (dārōm). (3) The third was descriptive of the character of the place relatively to the center of Palestine. The West and South were designated respectively from the fact that the former was limited by the sea (yām, miyyām, yammāh), and the latter was the arid or dry quarter (neghebb, from obs. nāghabh). Corresponding terms for North and East are lacking in this system.

4. The Land of Israel. The center of geographical knowledge was the Holy City. About it three irregular circles might be drawn, indicating geographical knowledge according to its degree of definiteness. The innermost of these would contain the Holy Land. But even of this territory all knowledge was predominantly practical, and not distinct enough to leave its traces in the form of maps or minute descriptions.<sup>1</sup> The name given to the land varies according as it is viewed as the residence of certain peoples—the land of Canaan (Gn 11 31), the land of the Hebrews (Gn 40 15), the land of Israel (I S 13 19); or as possessed of sacred associations—the 'holy land' (Zec 2 12), the 'pleasant land' (Zec 7 14), the 'glorious land' (Dn 11 16), the 'land of J'" (Hos 9 3), 'the land which J'" swore to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob' (Gn 50 24), and 'the land of promise' (He 11 9).

5. The Ideal Limits of the Land. The ideal limits of this land the Hebrews found in the empire achieved and maintained for a brief period under David and Solomon (I K 4 21, 9 26). Roughly speaking, it was bounded on the N. by the range of Lebanon, on the S. by the wilderness of Paran, on the W. by the Mediterranean, and on the E. by the Arabian desert. Its length was designated in the phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba' (II S 3 10, 24 15; etc.). The subdivision of it among the tribes was probably not a fixed one, tho certain ideal boundaries were held in mind for each tribe, as dating from the Mosaic age (Nu 32 33-42, 34 2-12; Jos chs. 15, 16, 17).

6. Natural Features. Four districts were anciently distinguished (Dt 1 7), as the 'Arabah,' or Jordan Valley, the 'Shephelah,' or lowland along the western coast, the 'Negeb,' or South country, and the seashore. To these the hill-country of Ephraim and the hill-country of Judah might be added (Jos 17 15, 21 11). More particularly, the Valley of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7, later called Coele-Syria), lying between Lebanon, 'that goodly mountain' (Dt 3 25), and the Antilebanon ranges, was the northern section of the land. Mt. Hermon, the southernmost summit in the group, was the most conspicuous of the mountains. Other mountains which secured a fixed place in the popular geography were Mt. Naphtali (Jos 20 7), Mt. Tabor (Jos 19 22; Jg 8 18), Mt. Gilboa (I S 31 1 f.), Mt. Carmel (I K 18 19 ff.; Is 35 2), Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (Dt ch. 27), and, in the outer rim of the country, the mountains of Bashan (Ps 68 15; Is 2 13), Mt. Gilead (Dt 3 17), Mt. Nebo, and Mt. Pisgah (Abarim, Dt 32 49).

<sup>1</sup>Fragments of a remarkable map of Palestine in mosaic work made in the 6th cent. A.D. were discovered in 1897. Cf. Schulzen, Die Mosaikkarte v. Madaba (1900), and photographs in Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Peira, vol. II.

EARLY BABYLONIAN MAP OF THE WORLD

A map of the world as it was known in 'the late Babylonian period' (Sayce would substitute 'early' for 'late') has been published in the 22d vol. of the Cuneiform Texts from Babylonian Tablets in the British Museum, Plate 28, and is reproduced here by permission. It is said to be by a tourist of the age, is accompanied by explanatory text, and throws a flood of light on the subject. For a popular account by Sayce, cf. Exp. Times, Nov., 1906, p. 68 ff.

7. Plains and Rivers and Seas. Chief among the lowlands of the country were the Valley of Jezreel (Jos 17 16; Jg 6 33), the Plain of Sharon (Is 33 9), the Lowland ('Vale' AV) or Shephelah (Jos 10 40), the Valley of Sorek (Jg 16 4), the Plain of Jordan (Gn 13 10), which is in the vicinity of Jericho, and was also called the Valley of Jericho (Dt 34 3), and its extension beyond the Dead Sea, the Valley of Salt (II S 8 13). Besides the Mediterranean, called 'the Sea' par excellence (Nu 34 5), the Dead Sea (also called the 'Sea of the Arabah,' 'the Salt Sea' Dt 3 17, and the 'East Sea' Ezk 47 18), the Sea of Chinneroth (Jos 12 3), or Chinnereth (Nu 34 11), later called the Lake, or Sea, or Gennesaret, Galilee, or Tiberias, were noted. Of rivers, the principal one was the Jordan, constituting, as it does, the chief line of division between the E. and W. parts of the country. But besides this great river, others were familiar, such as the Shihor-libnath (Jos 19 26), the Kishon (Jg 5 21; I K 18 40), the River of Egypt (Gn 15 18); and on the E. of the Jordan, the Jarmuk, the Jabbok, and the Arnon.

8. Adjacent Foreign Countries. From the earliest days the relations of the Hebrews with the outside world brought them into direct touch with Phenicia, altho mention is made only of its cities Tyre, Sidon, Arvad, etc. To the E. of Phenicia lay the great stretch of land known as Aram (Syria), extending to the Euphrates. The Euphrates itself, together with the Tigris (Hiddeqel), was familiar as the territory of Asshur, Nineveh, and Babylon, gradually recognized as having an internal unity under the name of Mesopotamia ('Aram-Naharayim'). To the E. and the SE. of the land of Israel lay Moab, with its cities of Kir and Ar (Is 15 1), the territory of Ammon, and Edom (also called Mt. Seir, together with Mt. Hor [Nu 20 22], one of its conspicuous summits), with Ezion-geber and Elath (I K 9 26; Dt 2 8), its ports, and Bozrah and Sela (Is 34 6), its principal cities. To the W. of Edom the Wilderness of Paran, gradually passing into the Wilderness of Shur (Gn 21 21; Ex 15 23), stretched as far as the border of Egypt. Further S. was the peninsula of Sinai, with the mountain from which it takes its name, tho this mountain is but a single peak in the range called Horeb (Ex 3 1). Still more remote, and almost lost in the dim distance, was the land of Sheba (I K 10 1), and Ophir so far away that its exact location has been made the subject of conjectures (Arabia, India, Africa?).

9. Egypt and Africa. In the intermediate zone between the Holy Land and the remoter world the most prominent country to the Israelite's view was Egypt. Its whole length to Syene ('from Migdol to Syene,' Ezk 29 10, 30 6, RVmg.) was more or less familiar ground throughout the whole of the Biblical period. S. of Syene lay Ethiopia (or Cush; cf. II K 19 9) and Seba. To the W. of Egypt the whole coast of Africa was comprehended under the one great name of Libya (Jer 46 9, 'Put,' q.v.).

10. The Uttermost Parts. To the eye of the Hebrew, at least before the Exile, the circle within which the inhabited earth is fixed was one with a radius of approximately 1,000 miles. The furthest countries known in any sense were: to the E., Persia, Media, Elam (Pāraś, Mādhay, and Ēlām) and Susiana; to the N., Armenia to the Caucasus, and the regions of Asia Minor, as far as the Black Sea ('Magog,' 'Togarmah,' 'Ararat,' and 'Gomer'); to the W., Cyprus, the coasts of Greece, the Archipelago, Ionia, and Libya ('Elisha,' 'Javan,' 'Kittim,' 'Caphtor,' and 'Lubim'); and to the S., Ethiopia, Yemen, Hadramaut, E. Arabia ('Cush,' 'Phut,' 'Seba,' 'Hazarmaveth,' 'Ophir,' 'Raamah' EV).

11. Growth of Geographical Knowledge. The foregoing stands in general for geographical ideas in the O T as a whole. Naturally, these are not equally full and clear in all the periods of the history. They develop from cruder and vaguer notions. Events such as the wars of David, the commercial enterprises of Solomon, the Babylonian Exile, and contact with the Greek world vastly enlarged and clarified them. In the N T geographical ideas coalesce with those of Greco-Roman science. Nothing approaching a systematic presentation is given anywhere, but the accounts of the missionary journeys of Paul furnish materials for the identification of Biblical ideas with those of the best authorities outside (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1896). See also ASIA MINOR, etc., and cf. Francis Brown in EB, article Geography. A. C. Z.

GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE. See PALESTINE, §§ 14-16.

GERA, gī'rə (גֵּרָא, gērā): The ancestral name of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21). In the list in I Ch 8 3 ff. one or more Geras are mentioned as subdivisions of the clan of Bela of the tribe Benjamin. The fact that both Ehud (Jg 3 15) and Shimei (II S 16 5, etc.) are called 'sons' of Gera also indicates that Gera was one of the ancient clans of Benjamin. E. E. N.

GERAH, gī'ra. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

GERAR, gī'rār (גֵּרָר, g'rār): An ancient city S. of Gaza, near the boundary of Canaan (Gn 10 19), visited by Abraham (Gn 20 1, 2) and Isaac (Gn 26 1, 6). Asa (II Ch 14 13 f. destroyed a company of Ethiopians led by Zerah at Gerar. It is commonly identified with Umm el-Jerār, on the deep torrent-valley Jurf el-Jerār (Gn 26 17). Map II, A 3. But according to Gn ch. 20, it lay between Kadesh and Shur, and Trumbull (Kadesh-Barnea, p. 61 ff.) identifies it with the Wādy Jerār, W. of 'Ain Kadesh. The kingdom of the Philistine king may have extended S. into the Negeb, and Gerar may have been the name of a large region. C. S. T.

GERASA, ja-rē'sə, GERASENES, ger'a-senz (Γερασσηνός, Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26, 37; Gergesenes Lk 8 26 mg., Gadarenes Lk 8 26 mg., Mt 8 28. The Revisers' reading in Mk is undoubtedly correct, being supported by the best MSS., and is adopted by recent editors. That of Lk is more doubtful, but 'Gerasenes' is better supported than 'Gergesenes.' In Mt 'Gadarenes' is to be preferred to the 'Western' reading 'Gerasenes': Undoubtedly the textual difficulty is complicated by a geographical one. According to the narrative the scene is laid on the E. shore of the Lake of Galilee, where a cliff rises abruptly from the Lake. But this will not suit either of the cities which at first sight are suggested by the readings in the Gospels. The Greek city Gerasa, modern Jerāsh, was in Gilead, or Perea, a little N. of the Jabbok, and its ruins to-day are among the most magnificent in Syria. An interesting description will be found in Henry Van Dyke's Out-of-Doors in the Holy Land. More is to be said for the identification of the Gerasa of the Gospels with Gadara, since the 'country of the Gadarenes' (ἡ Γαδάρων, Jos. BJ, III, 10 10) was a political district extending to the SE. shore of the Lake, with Gadara as its capital. This city was 6 m. from the Lake, finely situated in a fertile region, with beautiful views over the Jordan Valley, Galilee, and the Lake. The distance of Gadara from the Lake, however, is too great to allow of any identification. See DECAPOLIS. On the other hand, the identification of the city mentioned in the Gospels with a place now called Kersa, Gersa, or Kursi, first made by Dr. Thomson, is almost certain. It lies at the mouth of the Wādy Samak, about the middle of the E. shore, where a cliff covered by ruins rises sheer above the beach, with numerous tombs in the vicinity. Origen and Eusebius knew of a village on the E. of the Lake, which they called Gergesa. But this is probably the same as Kersa, from which the adjectives Gergesenes and Gerasenes would be derived, the latter form having been suggested perhaps by the similarity in sound to the well-known Gerasa. The reading 'Gadarenes' in Mt may have been a gloss by the editor of the Gospel, to whom the reading 'Gerasenes' was inexplicable.

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

GERGESENES, gōr''gī-sīnz'. See GERASA.

GERIZIM, MOUNT, ger'i-zim. Mts. Ebal and Gerizim were two mountains lying one on the N. and the other on the S. of the valley in which Shechem was situated (Map III, 3 F). Mt G. was the sacred Mountain of the Samaritans. See SHECHEM; and PALESTINE, § 7 (d).

GERSHON, gōr'sham (גֵרְשֹׁן, gērshōn): 1. A son of Levi (Gershon in I Ch 6 15 a. and 15 7 a., but also where Gershon). His descendants constituted the priestly family of the Gershonites. On account of the disproportionate importance which they are given, both in the description of their service and in the distribution of Levitical cities, it is probable that they were a branch of the priesthood directly descending from Gershon, the son of Moses, and that their ancestor's name is included among the sons of Levi by a conventional genealogical connection. 2. The eldest son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex 2 22), and the ancestor of Jonathan, the priest of the idolatrous sanctuary at Dan (Jg 18 30). 3. A son of Phinehas, or at least the head of a branch of the priestly family of Phinehas (Ezr 8 2).

GERUTH-CHIMHAM, gī'rūth-kim'hām. See CHIMHAM.

GESHAN, gī'shān (גֶּשְׁחַן, gēshān; in AV Gesham, except in ed. of 1611): A descendant of Caleb (I Ch 2 47).
C. S. T.

GESHEM, gī'shem (גֶּשֶׁם, gēshēm, Neh 2 19, 6 1 f., written Gashmu 6 6): He is called 'the Arabian.' He joined with Sanballat and Tobiah in opposing Nehemiah, when rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem.
C. S. T.

GESHUR, gī'shūr, GESHURITE, gī-shū'rait: 1. See ARAM, § 4 (5). 2. Geshur in the S. of Palestine. In Jos 13 2 Geshurites are named in connection with Philistines, and in I S 27 8 (Heb. text) David is said to have warred against the Geshurites, where evidently a southern tribe is meant. If the Heb. text of I S 27 8 is correct, we have evidence of a southern Geshur (omitted in LXX. B), of which nothing more is known. Possibly Absalom's mother was from this Geshur, not from the northern one (in which case the words 'in Aram,' II S 15 8 are a later gloss).
E. E. N.

GETHER, gī'ther. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

GETHSEMANE, gefh-sem'a-nī: A garden across the Kidron (Jn 18 1), a resort for Jesus and His disciples (Mk 14 32; Mt 26 36; Lk 22 39). The name means 'oil-press,' one probably being in the enclosure. The traditional site, if not authentic, is at least near the original place, lying on the W. slope of the Mt. of Olives, about 50 yards beyond the Kidron.
R. A. F.—E. E. N.

GEUEL, giū'el (גִּיּוֹעַל, gī'ū'ēl), 'majesty of God': One of the spies (Nu 13 15).

GEZER, gī'zər (גֶּזֶר, gezer), also Gazer AV (II S 5 25; I Ch 14 16), gentilic Girzites (I S 27 8), Gizrites RVmg., Gezrites AV, Gerzites AVmg. (the variants are probably due to textual corruptions): An ancient city of great military importance named in the Amarna tablets (c. 1400 B.C.) as in alliance with Ashkelon, Lachish, and Jerusalem. The account of its destruction by Joshua (Jos 10 33, 12 12) is unhistorical. Gezer remained Canaanite until conquered by Egypt; it passed into the possession of Solomon, as the dowry of his Egyptian wife (I K 9 16). It was later named as a Levitical city (Jos 21 21). It figures largely in the Maccabæan wars, under the name Gazara (I Mac 4 15, etc.). Its modern site Tell-Jezer (see Map III, D 5) has been more thoroughly excavated and explored than any other Palestinian locality thus far examined. (Cf. Clermont-Ganneau, Arch. Res. in Palestine, II, 257, and Stewart Macalister, Memoirs of the Excavations of Gezer (1912), also in popular form, Bible Lights from the Mound of Gezer (1907).)

A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

GHOST: An old English term, which, apart from the expression 'Holy Ghost,' occurs only in the phrase 'to give up the ghost' (Job 11 20; Jer 15 9, etc.), which is used as the equivalent of 'to die' (Mt 27 50; Jn 19 30, 'spirit' RV).

GHOST, HOLY. See HOLY SPIRIT.

GIAH, gai'a (גֵּי'א, gīah): Apparently a place near Gibeon (II S 2 24).

GIANT, GIANTS: Four Heb. words are so rendered: (1) gibbōr (Job 16 14), which means simply a physically strong and courageous man. (2) rāphā'im ('Rephaim' RV), the name of a part of the pre-Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine (Dt 2 11, 20, 3 11, 13; Jos 12 4, 13 12, 15 8, 17 15, 18 16). See REPHAIM. (3) rāphāh, possibly a proper name and, if so, the father of a race of giants in SW. Palestine. The word may, however, mean 'giant.' The passages in which it occurs indicate that in historic times certain individuals of extraordinary size were thought of as descended from an imaginary race of gigantic men in SW. Palestine (II S 21 16-22. The || in I Ch 20 4-8 reads rāphā', which may be a mistake, or it may show that the original reading for both texts was rāphā'im). See also ANAK (and cf. G. A. Smith on Dt 1 28 in Camb. Bible). (4) nephilim, a term of unknown etymology, probably well rendered by 'giants' (AV). See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5; and NEPHILIM. E. E. N.

GIANTS, VALLEY OF. See REPHAIM.

E. E. N.

GIBBAR, gib'ar (גִּבְבָּר, gibbār): A district of Judah (Ezr 2 20). Probably a mistake for Gibeon (cf. Neh 7 25).

GIBBETHON, gib'i-then (גִּבְתֹּן, gibbēthōn), 'mound,' 'height': A Danite (Jos 19 44) and Levitical city of refuge (Jos 21 23). It was a frontier Philistine city toward Ephraim and was besieged by Nadab, who was slain here by his general, Baasha, who conspired against him (I K 15 27). Twenty-five years later it was in the possession of the Philistines, when Omri (I K 16 15 f.) who was besieging the city was made king after Elah had been assassinated by Zimri. Exact site unknown, but see Map III, E 5. C. S. T.

GIBEA, gib'i-a. See GIBEAH.

GIBEAH, gib'i-a (גִּבְעָה, gibh'āh, and גִּבְעָה, gebha', Geba EV), 'hill': 1. A town of Judah (Jos 15 57; I Ch 2 49). Site unknown. 2. Geba of Benjamin, a town on the N. border of Benjamin. Map III, F 5 (Jos 18 24; Jg 20 43; I S 13 2, 16, 14 2, 5, 16; I K 15 22; II K 23 8; I Ch 6 60, 8 6; II Ch 16 6; Neh 7 30, 11 31, 12 29; Is 10 29; Zec 14 10). The similarity of the spelling has led to confusion with Gibeah of Saul, such passages as Jos 18 24, 28 and Is 10 29 clearly show that these two names did not refer to the same place. See GEBÄ. 3. Gibeah of Saul (Is 11 4). A town a few m. S. of Geba, identified with the ruins Tell-el-fäl, about midway between Ramah (Map III, F 5) and Jerusalem. Excavations carried on by the Am. Sch. Or. Research in 1922 show that the site was occupied in the Canaanite period and was strongly fortified in the time of Saul and David. G. was the scene of the shameful deed and its bloody vengeance recorded in Jg chs. 19 and 20 (cf. Hos 9 9, 10 9). It was an old sacred site, a 'hill of God' (I S 10 5, 10) and here a Philistine garrison was stationed (I S 10 5, 13 3). It was also the home of Saul and his headquarters while king, and here seven of his sons were executed and exposed to satisfy the vengeance of the Gibeonites (II S 21 6). It was also the home of Ittai, one of David's heroes (II S 23 29), and of Micaiah, the mother of Abijah, King of Judah (II Ch 13 2). In II S 6 3 f. read 'hill' with RV. See Bul. ASOR, Oct., 1922 and Feb., 1923; also Burney, Judges (1918) on chs. 19-20. E. E. N.

GIBEATH, gib'i-ath, GIBEATHITE, gib'i-ath-ait. See GIBEAH, 2.

GIBEON, gib'i-an (גִּבְעֹן, gibh'on), GIBEONITE gib'i-an-ait: A royal city of the Hivites (Jos 9 3, 17). It was apparently the head of a league or confederacy, the other cities being Chephirah, Beeroth, Kiriath-jearim (ver. 17). By a stratagem it secured terms of peace with Israel under Joshua, and persisted as a non-Israelitish community as late as the days of David (II S 2 12). In spite of the discovery of their ruse, Joshua kept the compact with the Gibeonites. He drove from the gates of the city a group of Amorite kings (Jos 10 10, 12). In the civil war following the death of Saul, Abner and Joab, representing Ishbosheth and David respectively, met with their armies in its neighborhood (by 'the pool,' II S 2 12), but avoided a battle for a time by selecting twelve champions on each side to settle their differences (cf. HELKATH-HAVVURIM). In this affair mention is made of the Wilderness of G., but such a region can not be identified. Later, the place was the scene of a battle between David and the Philistines (II S 5 25, here 'Geba,' but in I Ch 14 18 'Gibeon'). Here, too, 'at the great stone' Joab slew Amasa (II S 20 8). Saul rashly put to death many of the Gibeonites; but the survivors were given satisfaction by David through the delivery of seven from among Saul's descendants into their hands to be put to death (II S 21 1 ff.). G. was later counted as a priestly city (Jos 21 17). It had a 'great high place,' at which Solomon offered his first sacrifice as king (I K 3 4; cf. also I K 9 2). The notice in I Ch 21 20 that the tabernacle was for a time erected here is hardly historical. It was the residence of Haniah the prophet (Jer 28 1). Some of its inhabitants took part in the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Neh 3 7). The Valley of Gibeon (Is 28 21) refers to Geba, where J' triumphed through David (II S 5 22 ff. = I Ch 14 13 ff.). Mod. El-Jib; Map I, D 8; III, F 5 (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 250 ff.). A. C. Z.

GIBLITE, gib'ait. See GEBAL.

GIDDALTI, gi-dal'tai (גִּדְדָלְתִּי, giddaltī): A musician, the ancestral head of the 22d division of the choir of the Second Temple (I Ch 25 4, 29).

GIDDEL, gid'el (גִּדְדֵּל, giddel): 1. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 49). 2. The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of Solomon's servants (Ezr 2 58; Neh 7 58).

GIDEON, gid'i-an (גִּדְעֹן, gidh'on), 'hewer,' or 'feller': A son of Joash, of the Manassite family of Abiezer, also called Jerubbaal (Jg 6 32), and Jerubesheth (q.v.), a native of Ophrah and one of the Judges of Israel (Jg chs. 6-8). The name Jerubbaal 'let Baal (i.e. J'), since Baal was often used as the equivalent of J' in early times) contend' (i.e., for His rights) is found only in the secondary strand of the story.

The story of G. (Jg chs. 6-8) is the result of combining several separate and quite divergent threads of tradition. The main features of one story can be found in 6 2-6a, 11-24, 34, 7 16-20 (the parts in which pitchers and torches are spoken of), 21, 22b. 8 4-21 is a unit, but whether originally a part of this story is uncertain. Another main thread is found in 6 36-40, 7 2-7, 16-20 (the parts in which trumpets are spoken of). Of the other parts of the narrative, some sections as 6 1, 7-10, 8 33-35 are probably editorial. The first story is the simpler and more objective, and gives the more original account of G.'s victory over the Midianite hordes. In this old story great emphasis is laid on G.'s valor (6 12, 14, 8 21, etc.), on his faith in J', coupled with bold reliance on his own resources, and on his military skill. There is here no reference to the religious condition as corrupt and disloyal to J'. In the later forms of the tradition miracle plays a prominent part, and far less is accredited to G.'s own initiative and ability. In all, however, it is J' who gives the victory.

This signal deliverance from their enemies led the people of central Israel to offer G. a crown, the first recorded movement toward monarchy in Israel. Loyalty to the old tribal constitution led him to refuse the honor. His home town became the center of a worship of J' which was viewed with disfavor by the later editor. G. lived on a large scale, having an extensive harem and many children. The evil results of this departure from the primitive Israelitic simplicity showed themselves in the career of his son Abimelech (q.v.). See also EPHOD and consult Commentaries by Moore (ICC) or Burney (1918).

E. E. N.

GIDEONI, gid'ī-ō'nai (גִּדְיֹנִי, gidh'ōnī). The father of Abidan (Nu 1 11, 2 22, etc.).

GIDOM, gai'dem (גִּדְמוֹן, gidh'ōm): A place mentioned in Jg 20 45 (perhaps an error for Geba, cf. Burney, Judges ad loc.).

GIER EAGLE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

GIFT: The giving of gifts, or presents, in ancient times was not usually from disinterested motives. Some return, in service or otherwise, was expected, or some obligation was thereby recognized, or confessed. Consequently 'gifts' played an important part in the ordinary life of the times, and the terms 'gift,' or 'present,' in the English Bible should not be interpreted exactly according to Western standards. When the Heb. term is minhah ('gift,' or 'present' AV) and is used in a political sense, the ARV renders it by 'tribute.' The 'gift' one gave for a bride was more a purchase price than a present. 'Gift' is also used a number of times in the sense of 'bribe' (Ex 23 8, etc.). Finally, 'gift' is used in the sense of an offering, i.e., to God, or for His service (cf. Ex 28 38, etc.), or to false gods (Ezk 16 33).

In the NT the word is used with few exceptions in a religious sense. Where the Gr. is δῶρον, it generally stands for an offering, either a sacrifice (Mt 5 23), or of money (e.g., Lk 21 1; He 5 1; cf. also Mk 7 11, RV); where δῶμα is used, the idea is the bestowment of benefits because of affection (cf. Mt 7 11; Eph 4 8; Ph 4 17). In other cases (Gr. δωρεά, or δῶρημα) it is used of the new life in Christ (Jn 4 10; Ro 5 15, etc.), or more specially of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2 38, etc.). Finally, the special dispensations or graces of the Spirit are called 'gifts,' χαρίσματα, μερίσματα (e.g., Ro 12 6; I Co 12 4 ff.; He 24, etc.) See also SACRIFICE, §§ 1, 12, 18; CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b); and CHURCH, §§ 5-7.

GIHON, gai'hon. See EDEN, and JERUSALEM, § 11.

GILALAI, gil'a-lai (גִּלְגַּלַּי, gilālay): A postexilic musician (Neh 12 36).

GILBOA, gil-bō'a (גִּלְבּוֹא, gilbōa'): A collective name for a hilly district (about 1,700 ft. above the sea at its highest point) located in the neighborhood of Shunem, Jezreel, and Bethshean, renowned as the battle-field on which the Israelites pitched their camp in Saul's last campaign against the Philistines (I S 28 4, 31 1; II S 1 21), and as the scene of the death of Saul. Map I, E 6. See PALESTINE, § 9.

GILEAD, gil'i-ad (גִּלְעָד, gil'adh), 'hard, firm' (?):

I. 1. A son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh, eponym of a clan (Gileadites, Nu 26 29, 30; Jos 17 1). 2. The father of Jephthah (Jg 11 1). 3. A son of Michael, a Gadite (I Ch 5 14).

II. 1. A city (Jg 10 17) near Mizpan (Hos 6 8). Gileadite (Jg 11 1) may mean an inhabitant of this city (cf. also JABESH-GILEAD). 2. The name of a somewhat loosely defined district E. of the Jordan. In its largest extent it is identified with the whole country S. of Hermon (Gn 37 25; Jos 22 9 ff.; II S 2 9; II K 10 33; Am 1 3; Ezk 47 18). In a narrower sense, it is one of the three sections of the E. Jordan country, the other two being Bashan and Moab (Dt 3 10; Jos 13 11; II K 10 33). In a still narrower sense, G. was bounded on the N. by Bashan and Geshur, or, conventionally, by the river Jarmuk, on the S. by a line drawn from the N. end of the Dead Sea eastward just S. of Heshbon (this portion of the district was more anciently called Jazer [q.v.], Nu 32 1), on the W. naturally by the Jordan, and on the E. by the wilderness (Jos 13 11, 13). The late story of territorial allotment by Joshua assigns G. to the half-tribe of Manasseh and Gad, with a boundary between the two, shifting from the Jabbok (Dt 3 16; Jos 12 2) to a line drawn NE. and SW. from the S. end of the sea of Chinnereth, through Mahanaim. The N. part of the district was given to Manasseh, and the S. to Gad (but, according to I Ch 5 11, 16, Gad extended as far N. as Bashan). G. is, generally speaking, a mass of low mountains ranging in height from 1,500 to 2,500 ft. above the sea-level. It abounds in beautiful scenery and, tho presenting a rugged and barren aspect from a distance, turns out on nearer approach to be pleasing and measurably fertile. It was famed as the home land of Jephthah (Jg 11 1), and of Elijah (I K 17 1); also for its rich pasturage (Mic 7 14; I Ch 5 16 mg.), on account of which it was chosen by the tribes to whom it was assigned (Nu 32 1). It was also known for its rich balsam (Jer 8 22, 46 11; see BALM OF GILEAD). See also PALESTINE, § 13 (b).

A. C. Z.

GILEAD, BALM OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

GILEAD, MOUNT: Strictly speaking, this term signifies the mountain range in the district of Gilead (q.v.) (Gn 31 21 ff.), but is applied in Jg 7 3 to a summit which projects into the valley of Jezreel. This may mean: (1) That the same name was somehow given independently to two separate mountainous districts on the two sides of the Jordan; (2) that there was a connection between the E. and W. sides, the possessions of the tribe of Naphtali reaching over to the E. side, thus extending the name over the hills in the neighborhood of Jezreel; (3) that the text was originally different, admitting of the application of the name to the region E. of the Jordan (cf. Moore on Jg 1 1); or (4) that Mt. Gilead is a textual corruption for some other name, now lost, like Gilboa, or Jālad, the mod. name of the spring of Harod, near by. (See Burney on Judges 7 3). A. C. Z.

GILGAL, gil'gal (גִּלְגָּל, gilgal), 'circle of stones,' from gālal, 'to roll'; but Jos 5 9 f. derives it from the secondary meaning 'roll away': A name of places designated by a sacred circle of stones. The Heb. always has the article except in Jos 5 9, 12 23. 1. A place E. of Jericho, between that city and the Jordan (Jos 4 19). Map III, G 5. It was the first encampment of Israel W. of the river (Jos 5 10), where they set up 12 stones taken from the river-bed (Jos 4 20). According to Jos 5 2-9 the men of Israel were circumcised here. Josephus and others identified G. with what is now the modern Tell jeljāl, a mound with the ruins of a stone cloister or church. Conder in 1873-75 and 1880 found here the name Birket Jiljuliye. Joshua maintained a standing camp at G. during the earlier period of the conquest of Canaan (Jos 9 6, 10 6 ff., 14 6; Jg 2 1; cf. Mic 6 5). Perhaps the 'quarries,' or graven images, of Jg 3 19 are to be in some way connected or identified with this Gilgal. It was a religious and military center in the time of Samuel and Saul (I S 10 8, 11 14 f., 13 7 f., 12, 15, 15 12, 21, 33). Judah received David at G. on his return after the death of Absalom (II S 19 15 [16], 40 [41]). At Gilgal was a frequented sanctuary in the 8th cent. (Hos 4 15, 9 15, 12 11 [12]; Am 4 4, 5 5). Samuel visited a G. with Bethel and Mizpah (I S 7 16). The prophets may have referred to the G. in the Jordan Valley, but, as Bethel and Mizpah are on the central range of hills, the Gilgal visited by Samuel was near Bethel and identical with the following. 2. The modern village Jiljilia, on a hill lying between Bethel, Shechem, and Samaria. Map III, F 4. Here there was a school of the prophets (II K 4 38), connected with Elijah and Elisha. The order in II K 2 1-7, Gilgal, Bethel, Jericho, is evidence that this G. is to be found in the hill-country rather than in the Jordan Valley. 3. A place associated with Mt. Gerizim and Mt. Ebal (Dt 11 30), if not the G. of 1, then the Judejil just E. of Mt. Gerizim. Map III, F 3. 4. A place mentioned in Jos 12 23 as in Sharon, unless we are to read, with LXX, 'Galilee.' 5. A place on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15 7), over against Adummim (cf. Map II, G 1) = Geliloth (Jos 18 17); cf. Beth-gilgal (Neh 12 29), a place near Jerusalem. This last G. may be the same as 1. C. S. T.

GILOH, gai'lō (גִּלּוֹה, giloh): A town of Judah (Jos 15 51), the home of Ahithophel, the Gilonite (II S 15 12). The identification on Map II, E 2 is probable, but not certain.

GIMZO, gim'zo (גִּמְצוֹ, gimzō): A town in the NW. of Judah (II Ch 28 18). Map III, D 5.

GIN. See HUNTING.

GINATH, gai'nath (גִּנָּת, ginath): The father of Tibni, the rival of Omri (I K 16 21 f.).

GINNETHOI, gin'i-thō'ai (גִּנְתָּוִי, ginn'thōy, Ginnetho AV), and GINNETHON, gin'i-chen (גִּנְתָּוִן, ginn'thōn): The head and ancestor of a priestly family in postexilic days (Neh 10 6, 12 4, 16).

GIRD, GIRDLE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, §§ 1 and 2.

GIRGASHITE, gūr'ga-shait (גִּרְגָּשִׁי, girgāshā), also Girgasite (Gn 10 16 AV), generally Girgashites in AV (Gn 15 21; Dt 7 1; Jos 3 10, 24 11; I Ch 1 14; Neh 9 8): One of the tribes, or divisions, of the Canaanites. Of these references, however, only Jos 24 11 gives any intimation regarding the location of the tribe. Its name is included among those opposing the Israelites along with the men of Jericho. Hence they lived west of the Jordan. A. C. Z.

GIRZITE, gūr'zait. See GEZER.

GISHPA, gish'pa (גִּשְׁפָּא, gishpā, Gispa AV): One of the overseers of the Nethinim (Neh 11 21).

GITTAH-HEPHER, git'a-hī'fār. See GATH-HEPHER.

GITTAIM, git'a-im (גִּטַּיִם, gittayim), 'two wine-presses' (?) A town of Benjamin (II S 4 3; Neh 11 33). Site unknown.

GITTITE, git'ait. See GATH.

GITTITH, git'ith. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (4).

GIZONITE, gai'zo-nait. See JASHEN.

GLAD TIDINGS: To 'bring glad (or good) tidings' (Lk 2 10) is the rendering of the Greek verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι (used in LXX. for Heb. bāsar in such passages as Is 40 9, 52 7, etc.). This verb generally refers to bringing the good tidings of the Gospel message either (1) generally (e.g. Mt 11 5), or (2) in its various phases and is usually translated 'to preach' (e.g. Lk 20 1; Gal 1 23; Ac 5 42). See also GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 1.

GLASS: The rendering of z'khakhūh (Job 28 17 'crystal' AV), where the poet compares wisdom in value to gold and glass. In Dt 33 19 Zebulun and Issachar are promised 'the hidden treasures of the sand, possibly an allusion to the manufacture of glass at Akka, on the coast nearby (cf. G. A. Smith Camb. Bible, ad loc.). It is noteworthy that these two tribes were immediate neighbors of the Phenicians who are often regarded as the discoverers of the process of making glass (Pliny, Nat. Hist., XXXVI, 651). But see below. A legend tells of a pavement of glass in the palace of Solomon. Undoubtedly the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with glass, as its manufacture runs back to an extremely early age. Glass beads of remote antiquity have been discovered in the excavations at Gezer. Small fragments of this material were brought to light at Megiddo in the stratum which is assigned to 2000-1500 B.C. The Egyptians manufactured glass at an early period. We have a lion's head of opaque blue glass with the name of Nuantef IV, of the 11th dynasty; a bead of glass bearing the name of Queen Ha't-sepsut; and a green opaque jar of Thothmes III. The Phoenicians learned the art probably from the Egyptians; they used glass beads for bartering with rude African tribes. The Romans executed works of great beauty in this material, and many specimens of their workmanship have been found in Palestine. In the N T we read of the 'sea of glass like unto crystal' (Rev 4 6), and the golden streets of the New Jerusalem are 'as it were of transparent glass' (Rev 21 18, 21). The force of the comparison lies in the transparency of the glass. The crystal (Job 28 18 'pearls' AV; Ezk 1 22 'ice' RVmg.) is the translucent rock-crystal, which was well known to the ancients. The glass of antiquity was opaque, hence the transparency of it is emphasized when it is compared to crystal. The terms mar'ah (Ex 38 8) and gillāyōn (Is 3 23), rendered 'glass' AV, refer to mirrors made of polished metal commonly used in antiquity.

Mirror of Polished Metal.

GLEDE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

GLORY: 1. Original Terms. The generic idea in the Heb. and Gr. terms rendered by 'glory' glorious, gloriously, glorify is that of 'excellency,' 'height' or 'preeminence.' In some ('addereth, Zec 11 3; hādhār, Ps 90 16, etc.), it is a matter of adornment; in others (hōdh, Job 39 20, etc.; ts'bhā, Is 13 19, etc.; pā'ar, tiph'ereth, Is 10 12, etc.; tōhar, Ps 89 44 ['brightness' RV]) it is 'beauty'; in a third class the distinctive idea is 'preciousness,' or 'rarity' (y'gār, Dn 2 37, etc.); in a fourth, and by far the most numerous, class of passages in the O T, the specific thought is that of 'honor' (kābhōdh, 'weight,' Gn 45 13; Ps 81, etc.). In the N T the conception of glory is primarily visual, that of a halo of light (365x). This conception was moreover taken over from the O T through the LXX. in which 365x is the usual rendering of kābhōdh. The Gr. κλέος (I P 2 20) is rather 'praise' than 'glory.'

2. The More General Use of the Term. These variations blend in two distinct uses, a general and a more specific. The former is the application of the term to human conditions, including the idea of glory as external pomp. The kings and prominent characters of public and social life display such glory in their appearance among men (Is 8 7; Mt 6 29; Ps 45 13). With this is naturally associated intellectual preeminence (Est 5 11). It includes, further, the conception of honor in the esteem of men, hence it is synonymous with reputation (I Ch 16 24; Ps 96 8), or anything for the possession of which one may be proud, or admire and defer to another. Even inanimate objects are in this sense endowed with glory (cf. 'the glory of Lebanon,' Is 35 2, 60 13; 'the glory of the celestial bodies,' etc., I Co 15 40, 41). Poetically, when glory is attributed to God, speaking of His distinctive character, it may thus become equivalent to the word 'self' (Gn 49 6), 'honor' AV; Ps 57 8).

In this general sense, the term is used in the Pss of God's glory as the revelation of His preeminence, calling for awe and admiration, whether conceived as external splendor or inward power (Ps 19 1, 'the heavens declare the glory of God,' 66 2, 96 3, 7).

3. Glory of J''; a Physical Appearance. In its specific sense, the glory of J'' is conceived of as a physical phenomenon accompanying the revelation of His presence. This usage appears uniformly in Ezk and in the Hexateuch (P). The representations of God's physical glory found in these two places differ in some respects. The glory of J'' as seen by Ezekiel (1 27 f., etc.) is a definite shape with color: 'as . . . the appearance of fire, . . . As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about.' This is associated with a vision. In a true sense the description is apocalyptic. As such, it may be an actual theophany or a literary expedient to express a revelation received by the prophet in a subconscious form. In either case, the reality of the revelation will depend not on its external form, but on the fact that God wished to, and did, make His will known to the prophet. In neither case, however, was the glory visible to the physical eye of any one but the prophet himself.

The glory of J'' as described in P is a brightness of undefined form. 'Devouring fire' is the nearest approach to a description given (Ex 24 17). This all the people were able to see (Ex 16 7). It manifested itself in the Tent of Meeting (Ex 40 34, 35; Lv 9 23; Nu 14 10, 16 19, 42, 20 6) and filled the Temple at its dedication (II Ch 7 1 f.). There are two possible explanations of the literary relationship of the conceptions of Ezk and P. Either P describes a theophany in the form of a dazzling light, which served as a basis and preparation for Ezekiel's more definite vision, or Ezekiel's vision is an apocalypse, which paved the way for the idea of the more constant and broadly perceptible halo implied in P. General critical considerations favor the second alternative. Again, upon the basis of the unity of these two pictures of physical glory (Ezk and P), the question will next arise whether the physical as a whole is older than the general and metaphorical conception. Tho the former may seem more primitive, the facts leave practically no ground for this view. The conception of a specific glory in material form could arise much easier after than before the greatness and splendor of God had been fully appreciated.

4. Glory in Ex 33 18 f. An intermediate conception of the glory of J'' appears in Ex 33 18-22. That here the reference is to something different from the physical glory appears from Moses' earnest petition for a vision of God's glory. He could not have asked for a glimpse of that which he could have seen by visiting the Tent of Meeting. Therefore, in the answer to the petition, the glory is identified with the person of God Himself. 'It shall come to pass while my glory passeth by' is explained by 'until I have passed by' (Ex 33 22).

The terms glorify and glorious, while frequently used in the O T and the N T, occur in their ordinary cognate meanings and involve nothing which has not been covered in the foregoing discussion of the primary term glory. A. C. Z.

GNOSTICISM: Origins of the Gnostic Ideas Current in N T Times. The beginnings of Gnosticism can not be traced or ascribed to any one person, place, or time. This much only is clear, that gnostic 'tendencies' had been cropping out here and there throughout the Orient long prior to the rise of any definite leader or system. The Gnosticism of the 2d and 3d Centuries A.D. was one of the results of the gradual intermingling of the old faiths and philosophies under the tolerant rule of Rome. The movement had by that time become positively aggressive and missionary, claiming to give a more profound and truer interpretation of Christianity than that which was given by the orthodox faith. It was then a very diversified movement, expressing itself in a number of different systems or 'schools' such as those of Basilides, Valentinus, etc. With this fully developed Gnosticism, which was attacked by Irenæus, Hippolytus, and other Church Fathers, this article is not concerned. It is rather with those thought-movements of a 'gnostic' character that were already in the world at the advent of Christianity and with which it came in contact, and which are implied as at hand in certain N T passages, that this article has to deal. The beginnings of Gnostic thought go back far beyond the Christian Era. And the directions from which the various streams of incipient 'Gnostic' ideas originated were quite divergent. India, Persia, Babylonia, Egypt, Asia Minor (especially Phrygia) have all been named as the regions in which gnostic speculations arose and whence they flowed into the common religious life of the Mediterranean world of the first centuries of our era. With the possible exception of India, it is likely that each one of the countries named contributed something to the common fund, but no one of them can be considered as the sole source of Gnostic thought.

Judaism as well as Christianity was peculiarly liable to attract to itself those who were inclined to gnostic speculation. It furnished a framework, a fairly complete outline-theory of the universe and God's relation to it, of man as a subject of redemption, and of a goal or end toward which all things are moving. And it was Judaism that furnished Christianity its fundamental principles of cosmogony and cosmology. It was around Judaism first, and then around Christianity that a great deal of the current gnostic thought gathered, and it seems that the most probable theory of the origin of the great gnostic systems of the 2d cent. A.D. is that the speculations on which they rested were developed first in connection with Judaism and thence they passed on to their contact with Christianity.

It was demonstrated by M. Friedländer (Vor-christliche jüd. Gnosticismus, 1898), and subsequent investigations, some of them as yet unpublished, have largely confirmed his views, that in Judaism, both Alexandrian and Palestinian, Gnostic ideas found a fertile soil in which to thrive. These speculations were largely of an esoteric nature, carried on by such sects as the Cainites, Melchizedekians, Sethites, etc. But others were of a more open type and even Philo has a distinct 'Gnostic' strain in his thought, tho he preserves his orthodoxy by his resort to allegorical interpretation. In Rabbinic circles in Palestine it was forbidden, e.g., to speculate (openly) on such subjects as 'Bereshith' (the 'beginning,' cf. Gn 11) or the 'Merkaba' (the 'Chariot,' cf. Ezk ch. 1) but it was done nevertheless—an essentially gnostic type of speculation.

The extent and ramifications of this 'pre-Christian' Jewish Gnosticism we may not be able to determine. It doubtless connected itself with much that was not Jewish, for those early 'gnostics' were free lances. In Egypt elements would be taken over from Egyptian thought, in Palestine and Syria from religious speculations current in those lands, and in Asia Minor doubtless much was found in the somewhat mystical character of the old Phrygian religion that readily lent itself to new interpretation and connection with elements of Jewish belief. In the numerous Jewish synagogas, probably, in many cases essentially gnostic thought was propagated, in secret and by the less orthodox members, if not openly.

When the Christian faith began to make its way it was the synagog that furnished it the point of contact with the world at large. The first doctrinal conflicts Christianity experienced were with Judaism. It first had to define itself versus Judaism. The first disturbers of the doctrinal peace of the Church were Jewish-Christians. And we believe it can be established that the most, if not all, of the types of 'error' combated in the N T are of Jewish rather than pagan origin. Such free-thinking Jews would not hesitate to accept views from any source and use any method in their attempt to demonstrate the superior wisdom or 'gnosis' which they claimed to possess.

In addition to such efforts to add to or modify Christian doctrine by speculations consciously known to be foreign to its original content, one must allow for a certain amount of indirect appropriation on the part of the most loyal and devoted Christians of ideas and terms that were essentially 'gnostic' in character. The very word γνῶσις, 'gnosis,' 'knowledge' and the verb γινώσκω 'to know' (so frequent in the Johannine literature), to say nothing of terms such as αἰών, æon or 'age', i.e. a world-period, βάθος, 'depth,' πλήρωμα, 'fulness,' etc., all have more or less of a 'gnostic' flavor and came easily into the language of Christianity. Both Paul and John had certain affinities with the better side of gnostic thought, tho they took decided ground against any positive, direct appropriation of such speculations by the Church.

2. Gnostic Contacts with N T Faith. The gnostic movement being of an eclectic, philosophico-mystic nature, drew elements from the current disintegrating systems of religion and philosophy, and at the same time it freely appropriated apostolic teaching and absorbed something of the virile faith and zeal of youthful Christianity.

The first definite contact of Christianity with Gnostic claims is found in the story of Simon Magus (Ac 8 9 f.). As the story is told in Ac Simon's chief claim, it is true, was to the possession of magical power, but such an assumption was not wholly foreign to historic Gnosticism, and besides, in this instance, it seems to have rested back upon premises of a distinctly gnostic character. To what extent Simon had a fully developed gnostic theory is, however, impossible to state (see SIMON MAGUS).

The chief information concerning the contact between Christianity and nascent Gnosticism in N T times comes to us through five groups of documents: Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, the Pastorals, II P and Jude, Rev, I, II, and III Jn, and the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp. It need not be assumed that some specific form of Gnosticism was present in each or indeed in many of the communities covered by these documents. But gnostic tendencies were everywhere emerging, which foreshadowed the coming struggle. Many of the elements in the future gnostic systems were causing irritation, especially to the churches of Asia Minor, and the Apostles and other leaders recognized them as foreign and even hostile to the Christian faith, and uttered their words of warning. It is possible that reflections of the presence of gnostic influences as disturbing the peace of the churches may also be detected in the Epp. to the Corinthians and Romans, but this would be difficult to prove.

It is clear from a study of the Colossian Epistle that the Christian communities of the Lycus valley were being troubled by self-appointed teachers, whose doctrines arose through an intermingling of current Jewish and Christian and even pagan elements. The essentially gnostic notes are found in the pretentious philosophy, angel-worship, and ascetic requirements referred to in ch. 2. And the emphasis which Paul in this Epistle puts upon the headship of Christ (1 15 f.) leaves us to infer that this central Christian doctrine was suffering serious reduction through the medium of some form of the general 'gnostic' theory of intermediary powers (principalities, æons, etc.), at the hands of these precocious theologians. Here surely was soil from which the later gnostic systems may easily have sprung.

The situation reflected in the Pastorals is still more advanced. From such passages as I Ti 1 3 f., 4 1 f., 6 3 f.; II Ti 1 13 f., 2 14 f., 3 1 f., 4 3 f.; Tit 1 10 f., 2 1 f., 3 9 f., it is evident that the Christian communities of Ephesus and Crete were much perturbed. False teaching of various kinds and degrees was rife among them. Certain men among whom were Hymenæus and Philetus, had crept into the churches and created a crisis. Some of them were of the circumcision and assumed to be teachers of the Law. But many views widely aberrant from the common Jewish and Christian faith were stealthily taught. Here again we have a pretentious philosophy, a specious cosmology, a mild docetism, a practical asceticism, and perhaps also libertinism, and a tinge of simony. Most of these are constituent elements in one or another of the later gnostic systems.

In Jude and II P there is an advance over the situation described in the Pastorals, in that some of these 'false teachers' are entrenched in the churches, or at least in certain Syrian and Asian communions (cf. Jude 1, 3 f.; II P 2 1 f., 3 2 f.). And they have perhaps also advanced farther in their divergence from the common Christian conception of the unique and central position of Christ. But their teaching is still inchoate, and they are without commanding leadership. Of course these 'false prophets' were aberrant from the common faith in varying degrees, some being wholly unconscious of their divergence. There were among them charlatans and rogues, but there were doubtless also those who were seeking for the truth and for the lofty pathway of the Christian life. It is plain that we have here the germs of Gnosticism, which needed only time and occasion to put forth and bud and blossom.

The heretical teaching combated in the Johannine writings is of a distinctly gnostic type and is more decidedly self-conscious and antichristian. The churches at Ephesus and Pergamum are commended for having rejected those who claimed to be apostles, and then they are warned against the 'Nicolaitans,' who seem to be crystallizing into a sect. In Thyatira the 'woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess,' has secured a following, which professes to 'know the deep things of Satan,' and observes and practises things contrary to the Christian faith. In Smyrna and Philadelphia the churches are greatly troubled by those professing to be Jews, 'but are of the synagog of Satan' (Rev chs. 2 and 3). It is in I and II Jn, however, that the main advance and divergences are marked. From such passages as I Jn 1 8, 2 18 f., 4 1-3; II Jn 7 f., it is plain that the cardinal doctrine of the Christian faith has been called in question. Plainly the crisis has come, the climax has been reached, and the breach must be made. The 'false prophets who have gone out into the world' must not be allowed to return and bring back 'this teaching,' and lead the brethren astray. The familiar tone of these Epistles indicates an intimate knowledge of the inner life of the Christian communions to which they are addressed. The author saw the 'tendencies' in the teaching which he so vigorously condemns and repudiates; and he foresaw whereunto it would grow. Evidently the churches were not aware of the great danger which threatened them, else the warning need not have been reiterated again and again.

The Ignatian epistles combat two heretical tendencies. The one was a false conception of the person of Christ, which questioned the reality of His earthly physical life, and seems to have been especially rife in Ephesus, Tralles, and Smyrna. The other was a disposition on the part of some in the churches of Magnesia and Philadelphia to relapse into 'Judaism,' which meant 'the keeping of the Law,' the observance of the Sabbath to the neglect of the Lord's Day, the exploiting of 'antiquated fables,' the living 'apart from Christ,' and similar errors. The docetism which Ignatius combats is essentially the same as that denounced so vigorously in the Johannine epistles, and the stress placed upon the reality of the human, physical nature of Christ is likewise the same.

Our examination of the five groups of documents, with reference to the origin and progress of Gnosticism, leads us to infer: (1) That there was a widespread and increasing gnostic tendency, especially in Asia Minor, during the closing decades of the 1st cent.; (2) that gnostic views of religion and life were filtering into the churches, and provoking increasing resentment on the part of the leaders; (3) that these advanced ideas came in the first instance and in large measure from, or through, the Jewish environment of the churches; (4) that the advocates of this fuller Christian gnosis were for the most part unconscious of any actual departure from the true faith; (5) that they were, however, children of their own age, and had become eclectic in philosophy and religion, and especially in ideas concerning revelation and redemption; (6) that the common allegorical method and habit of interpreting the Scriptures, whether Jewish or pagan, were responsible for many, if not most, of the gnostic vagaries; (7) that the emphasis upon 'knowledge' tended to discount faith, and led to arrogance and want of charity and of brotherly love; (8) that the dualistic philosophy of the day, together with the allegorical method, fairly accounts for the docetic view of the person of Christ, so common to the Gnostics; (9) that the ascetic principles and practises of the Gnostics were the heritage which they shared with the men of their day; and, finally, (10) that Gnosticism was but a common distemper of the times, which gradually penetrated into the churches, and aroused the leaders to a vigorous and oftentimes ill-tempered resistance.

GOAD: A long stick about nine feet in length, sharpened at one end, or fitted with a sharp brad, used in urging cattle (Jg 3 31; I S 13 21 [Ec 12 11; Ac 9 5 AV] 26 14). See plate of AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS, Fig. 9.

GOAH, גֹּאֵה (גֹּאֵה, gō'āh, Goath AV): An unknown locality near, or in, Jerusalem (Jer 31 39).

GOAT. See FOOD, §10; NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 4; PALESTINE, § 24; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5. For Scapegoat, see AZAZEL.

GOAT: In reference to Daniel's vision, see DANIEL, BOOK OF, § 2.

GOATS' HAIR: This material was used in the making of a coarse cloth (Nu 31 20), for the filling of pillows (I S 19 13), and for tent-cloth (Ex 26 7), which gave it a place on the list of articles acceptable as offerings for the sanctuary (Ex 25 4, 35 6).

GOAT'S SKIN: The skins of goats often served in early times as crude articles of clothing, but at a later period to be reduced to a goat's skin as a garment was evidently a sign of great destitution (He 11 37).

GOB, גֹּב (גֹּב and גֹּב, gōbh): A place where David had several encounters with the Philistines (II S 21 18 f.), otherwise unknown. The text here may be corrupt, since in I Ch 20 4 (|| II S 21 18) 'Gezer' is read and in ver. 5 no town is mentioned.

GOBLET. The Heb. 'aggān means a 'basin' or 'bowl' rather than a 'goblet' (Song 7 2).

GOD. The fundamental subject of the Bible is God. The first book in the canonical order opens with announcements about God as the Creator of the Universe. The last book closes with words of Him, in and through whom God brings the history of man to its consummation. The Bible is, therefore, regarded by all Christians as containing the record of the revelation of God, and of the duties and the destiny which that revelation necessarily brings to every human being.

Before summarizing the doctrine of God in the O T we must recognize some principles and methods which seem to characterize the course of the revelation.

1. Pre-Mosaic Beliefs and Practises. The historic revelation began with a group of Semitic tribes afterward known as Israel, who already possessed religious beliefs and practises resembling those of cognate tribes. In the midst of these the new religion took shape through Moses, and only gradually and, in some cases, after long labor succeeded in extruding or correcting them. There is much discussion among scholars on two vital points: (1) The degree of extra-Israelitish approaches to monotheism, and (2) the origin of the name and worship of Yahweh (Jehovah, q.v.) (cf. L. B. Paton in Biblical World, 1906). It is clear that the O T recognizes affinities with earlier conceptions of God, for inter alia we find: (a) the God of whom Moses teaches is the God of their fathers (Ex 3 6, 15, 6 3); (b) Melchizedek was priest of 'El 'Elyōn, 'God Most High' (Gn 14 18 π.); (c) even J'' is known to other tribes before Moses receives his revelation (Ex 3 18). Recent knowledge of Babylonian and Egyptian religions makes it clear that something more had been attained by some races than a simple monolatry. But it was not true ethical monotheism, and therefore perished. The god was still attached to some astral body (as Sin to the moon), or to some great natural phenomenon (some believe that J'' may have been the name of a thunder-god). That which distinguishes the movement in Israel may be set forth as follows: (1) Moses had an experience of the presence and power of God deeper and purer than any man before him. (2) This experience, or voice, of God fitted him to become the leader of a group of tribes out of Egyptian bondage, in a manner which they ever after recognized as the act of God (Ex 15 13; 20 2; Am 3 1; Hos 13 4, etc.). (3) The name of J'' received an interpretation which released it from all mere physical association (Ex 3 13 f.), made it the name of a supreme and living personality and attracted to itself the truth in older names (El, Elohim, El Shaddai [God Almighty], Adonai; cf. article Divine Names, EB, III, 3320-3331). See NAMES, §§ 6 and

7. (4) The covenant between Israel and J'', founded under Moses, was established by and founded on His righteousness and grace, His good-will. (James Moffatt. The O. T.; A New Translation (1924) translates it 'compact'). (5) That covenant (see COVENANT, § 3) required of the people complete trust in God and obedience to His will as their only God. Hence the rise of that great system of Law in which the will of God was formally announced (Smend, 41 ff.). All these elements were present in the religion of Israel from the time of Moses, and formed the conditions under which heathen beliefs and practises were gradually cast out and a true monotheism was established.

2. Erroneous Beliefs and Heathen Practises. The signs are found, as said above, that some races had lofty conceptions of their gods, yet the Semitic tribes immediately related to Israel, as well as the Canaanites among whom they settled, as a rule practised idolatry of a profuse kind, while some reached what has been called 'monolatry' (a tribe owing allegiance to one god as its god). The worship of J'' was begun under Moses amid such beliefs and practises. From the first, three things stood firm and clear whenever a prophet spoke: (1) That J'' is alone Lord of Israel, (2) that He loathes idolatry, and (3) that He has a fixed will (or character) and demands the same of His people. From these vital centers the life and light spread. It is natural to find that in belief and practise Israel continued many things whose inconsistency with the worship of the living God was only gradually and painfully discovered. Students of the O T are laboriously striving to trace out the long and tortuous path through racial, political, economic, as well as intellectual and moral, changes, by which from age to age the self-revelation of God was accomplished. (A) In the matter of belief, for example, we find that the Israelites long retained the habit of thinking of their God as if He were a human being (anthropomorphism), not only as to the possession of moral and intellectual characteristics (e.g., mercy, grace, patience, long-suffering, loving-kindness) and limitations (e.g., His fury, jealousy, hate, vengeance, wrath), but even of physical organs (e.g., His back, face, finger, foot, form, hand, heart, mouth, and voice). See also the poetic expressions 'pinions' (feathers AV) and 'wings' (Ps 91 4). So gradual and laborious was the removal of these ideas that scholars are in doubt as to when they can be said to have died out. They naturally passed from a literal to a symbolic use, as when even we speak of the heart or the mind of God; and it may well be that for the nobler spirits in Israel this anthropomorphism in its grosser forms ceased at a much earlier date than for the mass of the people. (B) In the matter of religious practise: (1) Some practises, as idolatry, polytheism, human sacrifice, sensual ceremonies, were utterly condemned from the beginning of the worship of J''. That they survived, or intruded themselves at later periods, in no wise proves that they were not felt to be condemned by the inward nature of J'' worship. It began to make and mark its distinctiveness at the very start, or it could never have done so later. (2) Some practises, as circumcision, sacrifice, feasts, purification, perhaps the Sabbath, which were already in use, or were taken over in Canaan, were gradually changed in form and meaning. Hence we may well expect to find, as we do, that the use and value of these are found to alter from one stage to another, as the growing revelation of God flung its light upon them. (3) Other practises, as the observation of sacred places, stones, trees, animals, etc., continued for a while without explicit condemnation, but were found to be inconsistent with the worship of J'', when His self-revelation had become more familiar to the general thought of the people.

3. Periods and Instruments of Revelation. In the study of the growth of the knowledge of God in Israel, it is necessary to pay attention alike to the main periods of the people's history and to the instruments of revelation. (1) For it was always in connection with their changing economic, social, and political circumstances that the light of that knowledge increased. The settlement in Canaan brought contact with more highly civilized peoples, new forms of worship, new customs. And these brought at once stimulus and temptation. The rise of the kingship ushered in a new era in which great strides were made alike in national unity and intelligence, and in the need for that prophetic instruction through which henceforth the knowledge of God grew more definite, more spiritual, more awful. Contact with the great empires of the East (Assyria, Babylon, Persia) evoked tremendous changes in which the nation's life seemed to be utterly quenched. The long and terrible struggle was made the occasion of sublime revelations of God by Amos, Hosea, Isaiah (chs. 1-39), Jeremiah, etc. The Exile was midnight for the nation, but dawn for the Church of Israel. Out of it the people of J'' came with such clear knowledge of the living God as no human mind had ever possessed (Ezekiel, Isaiah [chs. 40-66], the collection of the Psalms, etc.). (2) The instruments of revelation were (a) institutions of religious and political life (the covenant, sacrifice, priesthood, temple, law, the judgeship, kingship, etc.); (b) events in history (famine and poverty, wealth and power, war and victory, defeat and exile). These institutions and events were not peculiar to Israel. All peoples, small and great, have had them. That which made them channels and occasions of revelation was the work of the prophets (see PROMETHEUS). Under their teaching, spread over many centuries, the people were held to their faith in J'' and were taught to see in Him the Lord of their life, the faithful, merciful, omnipotent, righteous, and invisible King, not of Israel only, but, at last, of all nations.

4. The Resulting Monotheism. The name by which the O T doctrine of God is known is monotheism. It is nowhere set forth in a formal manner. It is the general view of God, which is gained from a survey of the whole literature. It is implied in the earliest teachings; it is made explicit in the latest. It begins in the conviction of that covenant relationship between J'' and Israel; it culminates in the spiritual experience of many psalmists and preeminently of Jeremiah and in the Messianic prophecies of second Isaiah. When we bring the various elements together we have as a result that doctrine of God out of which the Christian is historically derived. The following references are given merely as illustrations, for which many parallels are in the O T (1) There is but one God, Jehovah of Israel (Jer 10 8-10; Is 42 8). He alone is the living God (Jer 4 2, 10 10); the idols are dead things (Is 44 9-17). (2) The living God is the Creator of all things (Gn 1 1 ff.; Is 42 5, 45 18; Ps 104; Pr 8 22-29), Himself eternal (Ps 90 2; Is 44 6, 48 12). (3) He is, therefore, the Ruler of all nations, as well as of the universe (Job chs. 38-39; Pss 8, 19; Am 9 7; Is 19 25, 45 1-13, 18). He is omnipresent (Ps 139), omnipotent (Is 43 6, 45 9, 50 2 f., 64 1-4), omniscient (Job 34 21 ff.; Dn 2 20-22; Pr 8 22-31; Is 16 7). (4) Among the moral attributes of God we find His holiness (see HOLINESS and of the expression Holy One of Israel, especially frequent in Isaiah), supreme and all-inclusive (Ex 15 11; Is 5 16, 57 15; Lv 11 44 f.), His righteousness, which appears in His just dealings with men, rewarding each according to his works (Gn 18 25; Ps 18 25 ff.; Is 42 21, 45 24); as righteous, He is also faithful to His covenant word and therefore to His people (Dt 4 30 f., 7 9; Hos 2 18-20; Is 40 8; and many Pss); from His very righteousness and faithfulness comes His mercy. He is full of compassion, of unlimited kindness (Dt 7 8; Ex 34 6 f.; Is 40 1; Ps 103). (5) One of the most remarkable elements in the monotheism of Israel is that J' is God of the future. This religion arose from His promises, which became more wonderful in their scope and character as the national tragedy deepened. The Messianic is an essential element in monotheism; without it God is not a fully spiritual being and His attributes are shorn of their absolute nature. Hence the Messianic element in all the varied meanings and forms of that great hope is always a reflection of the character, as well as a revelation of the authority, power, and purpose of J' before the faith of His people (cf. the spirit of the King in Ps 72 with that of Ps 103, or the spirit of Is ch. 53 with that of Is ch. 41) (see MESSIAH; PROPHECY).

5. In the N T. When we pass to the N T we find ourselves in a new world made for us by a new revelation. The change is due to the creative personality of Jesus Christ. It was as rapid as it was great, and yet it passed through certain well-defined stages. And, as in the O T, the full N T doctrine of God is not gained from any one stage, not even from the oral teaching of Jesus, but is the effect of the whole revealing process therein described. (1) It began with the appearing of Jesus (identified by John the Baptist, Mk 1 1-8) as the Messiah. He avoided the title because of its current misinterpretations, but He accepted it (Mt 8 29, 14 33) when His personality and work had opened the eyes of men to the truth. He at once elucidated and fulfilled the true meaning of Messiahship by (a) the energy of His personal will, authority, power (Mk 1 21-28, 3 13, 4 41, 6 1-3, etc.), which overawed the people and even awoke dread among His disciples at certain crises (Mk 5 17, 10 32; Lk 5 8, 26); (b) the sublimity and finality of His teaching about God and man. He spoke with convincing and original authority (Mt 7 28 f., 13 54; Mk 1 22, 6 2, 11 18); (c) the emphasis on His relationship to God as the Son to the Father, especially when compared with His assurances that all men must call God their Father (Mt 5 44 f., 6 9, 18, 11 25-27; cf. Jn 5 18, 10 24-39). This emphasis was no mere formal claim to His own share in a general human relationship. It was the foundation in His own consciousness for the demand that men come to Him, believe in Him, follow Him, obey Him, as the condition of their right relationship with God (Mt 7 21-27, 10 32 f., 37-39, 11 25-30, 12 50, 16 27, 17 5, 9, 18 5 f., 19, 21 33-45). It is of course prominent and explicit in the Fourth Gospel; (d) the exercise of His authority to forgive the sins of individual persons (Mk 2 1-12); (e) His description of the kingdom of God (or of heaven) as both present and future, established here and fulfilled there, which may have led His disciples to misunderstand the course of coming events, but made all the more clear and impressive His consciousness as Master of life eternal (Mt 5 3, 10 [ἐσθ], 13 37 f.; Lk 17 20 f.; Mk 10 17-21, 24-31; cf. Jn, passim); (f) His view of His own death as no mere disaster and close of His active ministry, but as the supreme act whose full personal and, therefore, moral significance must henceforth condition the relations of God and man (Mk 10 45, 14 22-25). In all these self-expressions there moved a consciousness of a new type, not that of prophetism nor of private saintliness, a consciousness which all through seemed to act and speak and reveal itself as if veiled, restrained, as if only preparing the field and itself for its full scope. (2) All this, as the N T tells the story, would have remained unapprehended and fruitless, save as a baffling and pathetic mystery in one man's picture of humanity and of the inscrutable Divine, but for (a) the resurrection (Lk 24 5-7, 19-27; Jn 20 8 f.; Ac 1 2-4, 3 26, 13 29-37, 17 31; Ro 1 4; I Co 15 3-8, 29; I P 1 3) and (b) the gift of the Holy Spirit (see HOLY SPIRIT). In these events the inner nature, source, and meaning of His consciousness became fully revealed. And through the change which the whole of these facts and events wrought in the relations of those men toward God the human consciousness broke into a new era, a new universe, and a new, sublime, and luminous knowledge of God. For it was God who had sent His Son and His Spirit, and He stood revealed in the whole redeeming work which was thus done before the eyes and upon the hearts of men.

6. Apostolic Theology. Only a brief summary of the main features in the new doctrine of God can be given here. Those Jewish monotheists were surprised out of their pure monotheism into a new way of conceiving and worshiping God. (1) We find them rendering worship and ascribing Divine titles and glory to Jesus Christ as Lord (Jn 20 28; I Co 1 2, 16 22-24; II Co 12 8; Rev 1 4 f.), and in prayers and ascriptions of praise His name is continually used along with the name of God the Father. And, indeed, as God acts through Christ on man, worship is given to God through Christ (Ro 5 11; Jude ver 25; He 13 20). (2) The supreme blessings of the soul are said to be derived from all three names, Father, Son, and Spirit: grace (Ro 1 7, 15 15; I Co 15 10, 16 23; II Co 6 1, 13 14), peace (Eph 6 23; Ro 8 6; Gal 5 22), life (Ro 6 23, 8 2; I Jn 5 11 f.), love (Ro 5 5, 8 35, 39; Eph 3 14-19; I Jn 4 10-13). (3) In many passages all three names are used in a coordination and interchange of powers and attributes which were new and startling to the whole world—both of Jew and Gentile (Mt 28 19; Ro 5 5 f., 8 1-17, 15 30; I Co 2 10-16, 6 19 f.; II Co 13 14; Gal 5 16-24; Ti 3 4-7; Jn 14 16, 26, 15 26; I Jn 3 23 f., 4 2 f.). Altho in certain passages the relations of Christ to God and to the universe are discussed, or abruptly stated (Ph 2 5-11; Eph ch. 1; Col ch. 1), we do not find in the N T an elaborated theory or doctrine of the Trinity. What we find is a community of individuals to whom has come the very indwelling of God, whose open conscious fellowship with Him has resulted from the person and work of Jesus Christ and the gift of the Spirit of God. This new and highest, and indeed final, type of human experience is realized in their faith, worship, love, and obedience, directed toward the three names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, as three coordinate, living, Divine sources of mercy, righteousness, love, life eternal. And yet they worship and serve one God. Monotheism had evidently passed into a remarkable and new form (I Co 8 4-6; I Ti 1 12-17; II Ti 1 8-10, 14).

7. The Christian Idea of God. Christian men were forced to think out the implications of this whole situation. (1) The redemption wrought by Christ, the revelation of the will, power, wisdom, purpose, holiness, and love of God were now too clear, too glorious, too real, to admit of doubt on the part of those who had passed into life and light. Using every hint in the apostolic records, they gradually worked out various theories regarding the ultimate significance and relations of the three names. The Trinity of historical experience was there, given once for all in the very origin and nature of the Christian life. Its explanation resulted in various forms of Trinitarian doctrine. This is not the place to recount them. Sufficient to say that the instinct of the Church has ever been to reject any theory of the Divine nature and the three names which, by reaction, weakens faith in the reality of the Atonement, the act of Divine redemption on the Cross; or in the permanent relation of the Father and the Son to the earthly life of man through the Spirit; or in the reality of the immediate and personal revelation of God the Father in these events, facts, and experiences. Since what we may call realistic Trinitarianism is the essential, or typical, view of God given in the N T, some form of theoretic Trinitarianism has always characterized the doctrine of the Church as a whole. (2) The N T doctrine of God retains all the highest O T conceptions of Him, as the Creator and Lord of Nature (Mt 5 34 f., 6 26, 30; Ac 7 49-50, 17 24-28; Ro 1 20, 11 33-36; Col 1 15-19; Jn 1 1-4); holy and righteous (the whole teaching of Jesus rests on the idea that God is of an inflexible justice and holiness, as well as mercy, in His rule and judgment of men) (Mt 5 2-10, 6 23, 11 21-24, 13 41-43, 24 45-51; cf. Ro 1 17, 2 5-10, 3 21-30, Jn 3 18); almighty and all-wise (Mt 19 26, 25 31-46, 28 18-20; Jn 10 27-29; Ro 11 33; I Co 2 10 f.; I Ti 1 17); merciful and gracious (Mt 5 7, 45, 6 14 f., 7 11, 11 25 f., 29 f.); but the N T contains the supreme revelation of His character as holy love, for which indeed a noun seems to have been coined or at least baptized into a new and higher sense, ἀγάπη (Mt 5 43-48; Jn 3 16; I Jn 4 7-13; Ro 5 5, 8, 8 35-39; Eph 2 4, 3 17-19). It is in the fellowship of this God thus revealed as Father of Jesus Christ the Redeemer, and as indwelling Spirit, that those hearts of apostolic men reached a combined fervor of love and moral clearness, in peace and hope and power, which are accepted wherever the gospel goes as the very essence of the Supreme Good itself.

GOD, CHILDREN OF. See GOD, SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF (3).

GOD, SON OF. See JESUS CHRIST, § 15 (b).

GOD, SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF: A phrase used in whole or in part with various meanings. (1) In Gn 6 1, Job 1 8, 2 1 the expression 'sons of God' refers to the heavenly spirits who minister about the throne (cf. I K 22 19 f.; Is 6 2 f.) and make up the court of the Supreme Ruler. The passage Gn 6 1 stands practically alone in the O T in its conception of the possibility of union between spiritual beings and the daughters of men. It may be a fragment of Semitic mythology, which the writer in Gn (3) saw fit to make use of (see GENESIS, § 4 ff.). (2) The expressions 'my sons' and 'my daughters' in Is 43 6 refer to the exiled Israelites, who are to be restored to their land through Cyrus. This passage (with Hos 1 10) was probably in Paul's mind in II Co 6 18, where he uses it of Christians in distinction from unbelievers. (3) In the O T 'my sons' ('children' in EV) is frequently applied by the prophets in the name of J' to Israel as the people of J' (Is 1 2, etc.). This expression reappears in the N T in the more spiritual sense of those who truly recognize God as their Father and seek to do His will (Mt 5 9, 45, etc. [ποῖ]; Ro 8 16 f., etc. [τέκνα]). E. E. N.

GOD FORBID. See FORBID.

GODHEAD: Of the three Greek words represented by this term that in Ac 17 29 (τὸ θεῖον) is more literally rendered 'the divine'; but in classical usage it is the exact equivalent of 'God.' It is therefore chosen by Paul as the more philosophical designation of God in this address, designed to recall to the minds of his hearers a conception more exalted than that associated with their pantheon. The other two terms (θεότης and θεότης) differ from each other precisely as 'divinity' and 'deity' in English. In Ro

1 20 ('divinity' RV) the Apostle has in mind the quality of God; in Col 2 9 His inner essence or personality. For classical parallels for Ac 17 29 cf. Plato, Phaedr. 246 D; for Ro 1 20, cf. Plut. Cur Pythia nunc nomeddat, etc., 8; and for Col 2 9 cf. Plut. De defec. Orac., and Lucian, Icarom., 9. A. C. Z.

GODLESS: This word occurs only in RV, rendering a Hebrew term (hānēph), which means 'profane' (Job 8 13, 13 16, 15 34, etc.; Pr 11 9; Is 33 14, 'hypocrite' AV). The original is derived from a root denoting 'that which cuts itself off (from God) and is rejected.' The idea of hypocrisy is attached to the word in later Mishnaic usage. A. C. Z.

GODLINESS: A strictly N T term, its root idea being 'reverence,' or more specifically, 'the loving fear of God' (I Ti 2 2; II Ti 3 5; II P 3 11; cf. Eus. Præp. Ev., 1, 3). Godly is used in the O T as equivalent to 'merciful' (Ps 4 3, 32 6), and once to what has a 'special relation to God' ('from God,' Mal 2 15). In the N T it renders both the adjective 'godly' (εὐσεβής) and the general conception of being specifically 'related to God' (II Co 11 2; I Ti 1 4). Hence 'after a godly sort' (II Co 7 9, 'after a godly manner' AV) means, strictly, 'according to the will of God,' or 'in a way suitable in relations with God.' A. C. Z.

GODLY. (1) The rendering of the Heb hāšîdîh (Ps 4 3, 12 1, 32 6) for which 'pious' would be more satisfactory. (2) It takes the place of the more literal 'of God' (Mal 2 15; II Co 1 12 [cf. RV], 11 2; I Ti 1 4 [cf. RV]). (3) In the N T for the Gr. εὐσεβής (adj. II P 2 9) and εὐσεβώς (adv. II Ti 3 12; Tit 2 12) 'pious,' 'piously' or 'reverent,' 'reverently' would give the real meaning. (4) In II Co. 7 9, 10, 11 the Gr. is κατὰ θεόν, 'according to God' for which 'godly' is an accurate rendering. (5) On III Jo 6, see RV.

GODS. See in general GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLATRY; and SEMITIC RELIGION.

GOG, gog (גֹּג, gōgh): A name given to a race or people inhabiting some part of the 'northern' region. In I Ch 5 4 'Gog' = Magog of Gen 10 5. In Ezk 38 and 39 Gog is associated with Meshech, etc. as Magog is in Gen 10 5, and probably both refer to the same people, who may be the Gagaia of the Amarna Tablets (see ICC. on Gen 10 5), a northern people living in this mountainous region of E. Asia Minor. Ezekiel, followed by the author of the Apocalypse of John (Rev 20 8), uses the terms Gog, etc. symbolically for the world as hostile to God's people and kingdom. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13, under Magog and Meshech.

GOIM, gei'im. See TIDAL.

GOING, GOINGS, GOINGS FORTH, or OUT, GOING UP: The verb 'go' represents a large number of different words in the Heb. or Gr. originals. In most cases the interpretation involves no difficulty. One or two special usages call for remark, 'Goings forth' is used frequently of the boundary of a district (Nu 34 5, etc.). 'Going up' in the AV is frequently much better rendered in the RV by 'ascent' (Jos 15 7, etc.). E. E. N.

GOLAN, gō'lan (גִּלְיָן, gōlān): A city of refuge (Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8, 21 27 in the territory assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh. Both a town, Golan, and a district, Gaulanitis (q.v.) were known to Josephus (Ant. XIII, 15 3; XVII, 81). The latter is called by the Arabs Jaulān. It was one of the provinces in the tetrarchy of Philip, bounded by the Jordan on the W., by the Jarmuk on the S., and by Mt. Hermon on the N. The E. boundary was probably the river 'Allan' (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 541, and Schumacher, The Jaulan). Perhaps the name was applied, first, to a city and later to the district round about; etymologically, however, the root, meaning 'circuit,' would point to the opposite conclusion. Site uncertain. G. GOLDEN CITY: A term applied to Babylon in Is 14 4 (but cf. alternative reading in mg.).

GOLDSMITH. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10 (b).

GOLGOTHA. See JERUSALEM, § 45.

GOLIATH, go-lai'ath (גִּלְיָת, golyāth): A Philistine giant ('six cubits and a span,' or between 7 ft. 1 in. and 8 ft. 5 in. in height) slain, according to I S 17 4 ff., by David. In II S 21 19, however, he is said to have been slain by Elhanan the Bethlehemite in single combat. In I Ch 20 5, probably to avoid this contradiction, the text (taken from II S 21 19) is changed to read that 'Elhanan slew [not Goliath but] Laehmi, the brother of Goliath.' A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

GOOD, GOOD WORKS: There is nothing peculiar in the use of the term 'good' in the Bible. In the O T it nearly always stands for the Heb. tōbh (adj.), tūbh (subst.), or yātābh (vb. 'to do good'), all of which are significant of 'good' in a comprehensive sense, easily applied (1) to material or physical good, or (2) to moral good. In most cases the English reader should have no difficulty in making the distinction. In the N T 'good' is in most cases the rendering of the Gr. adjectives ἀγαθός or καλός, the former nearly always in a moral or spiritual sense, the latter often in a material or esthetic sense. Both adjectives frequently occur in the expression 'good works' with almost equivalent meaning—καλός however, generally retaining something of its fundamental esthetic coloring. The following additional instances call for comment: In Mic 7 2 the word hāšîdîh means 'full of love,' 'kindly' (godly) RV). In Ec 5 11 'good' AV = 'advantage' RV. In Dt 2 4, 4 15; Jos 23 11, 'good' renders the adv. mē'ōdh, 'very,' 'very much'; in Jer 13 10 (cf. RV) it renders a verb meaning 'to succeed,' and then 'be fit for.' In Job 15 3 the Heb. means 'to be of no profit'; in Jer 18 4 it means 'as it was right in the eyes of the potter'; in Gn 24 12 'send me good success' stands for 'cause (it, i.e., success) to meet (i.e., happen),' while in Jos 1 8 'good success' means thou shalt 'deal wisely.' In I Co 15 33 the Gr. is χρηστός, lit. 'useful' or 'kind'; here used in a sense akin to 'morally refined.' In Gn 46 29 'good while' means 'again,' or 'still more,' and in Ac 18 18 (AV) it means 'a (sufficient) number of days.' In Ro 16 18 'good words' means 'courteous, pleasant speech calculated to disarm suspicion' (cf.

RV). Practically, 'the good' are contrasted with 'the evil' (e.g., Mt 5 45), but nowhere is a strict definition of 'the good' given. That which is in harmony with recognized ethical standards or with the spirit and teachings of the gospel is 'good' (ἀγαθός or καλός). Good works are the natural fruit of good hearts (Mt 7 17). God alone is absolutely good, and only through a true perception of Jesus' relation to God can one know how to call Him good (Mk 10 18 and ||s). See also JUSTIFICATION.

E. E. N.

GOODMAN: In Pr 7 19 the meaning is 'husband' ('the man' RV). The woman appears purposely to refrain from saying 'my husband.' 'Goodman' was once frequently used in the sense of 'head of the house.' In the N T the Gr. term is οἰκοδεσπότης i.e., 'master, or head of the house' (Mt 20 11, etc.; cf. RV).

E. E. N.

GOODNESS: In most cases this word is the accurate rendering of the original terms. In the O T ḫbḥ and ṭūbh are comprehensive. God's goodness is manifest in the blessings He bestows on His servants, i.e., the good things of life, and also the more spiritual blessings of forgiveness and love (e.g., Ex 33 19, cf. 34 6). The word ḥesedh often translated 'goodness' in AV (e.g., Ex 34 6) is much better rendered by 'mercy' or 'loving-kindness' (so RV). In the N T in Ro 2 4, 11 22, the Gr. χρηστός, χρηστότης, signify 'kindness' (cf. Eph 2 7), or 'benignity,' not 'goodness' in the abstract. See GOOD, GOOD WORKS.

E. E. N.

GOOD PLEASURE, GOOD WILL: In the N T εὐδοκία usually refers to God's 'good will,' either in the sense of His delight or satisfaction (II Th 1 11, cf. RVmg) or of His sovereign purpose or will (cf. Mt 11 26; Eph 1 5, 9; Ph 2 13). The passage that has occasioned most comment is Lk 2 14. Here for 'good will toward men' (AV) RV reads 'among men in whom he is well pleased' ('men of [His] good will'). The RV is based on the reading εὐδοκίας (genitive) found in the best MSS. The AV is based on the nominative. The sense is practically the same in either case. εὐνοια, in Eph 6 7, means 'good disposition' or 'intent.'

E. E. N.

GOODS: The EVV use this word to render a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) 'ōn, 'strength,' 'ability' (Job 20 10 AV); (2) ḥayil, 'strength,' 'vigour,' 'power' (Nu 21 25; (3) ṭūbh, 'good' (in a general sense) (Dt 28 11 AV; Ec 5 11); (4) mēleḥḥāh, 'work,' 'business' (Ex 22 8, 11); (5) nikkān, 'riches' (Ezr 6 8, 7 20); (6) qinyān, 'acquisition' (Ezk 38 12 f.); (7) r'khūsh, 'that which is gathered' (Gn 14 11-21, 31 18 AV, 46 6; Nu 16 32, 35 3 AV; II Ch 21 14 AV; Ezr 1 4, 6). The same term is often rendered 'substance.' (8) kēbhāddāh, 'weighty material' (Jg 18 22); (9) ṭā āgāḏā (Lk 12 18 f.); (10) ośā, 'substance' (Lk 15 12 AV); (11) ṭā ośēy, 'vessels,' 'implements' (Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27; Lk 16 1); (12) ṭā ḥāḥāḥōnā, 'possessions' (Mt 24 47 AV, 25 14; Lk 11 21, 16 1, 19 8; I Co 13 3; He 10 34 AV); (13) ḥā ḥōs, 'the means of living' (I Jn 3 17); (14) ḥāḥāḥōnā, 'substance' (Ac 2 45); (15) ṭā ośā, 'thy (things)' (Lk 6 30); (16) ploutēin, 'to be wealthy,' (Rev 3 17 AV; cf. RV.).

GORE (Ex 21 32). See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (a).

GOSHEN, gō'shen (גֹּשֶׁן, gōshen): 1. A district in Egypt in which Jacob and his family were placed (Gn 45 10, 46 28, 47 27, 50 8; Ex 9 26 [all J]). According to J, here the Israelites lived, quite apart from close contact with the Egyptians. In E and P a different view is held. G. was noted for its adaptation to pastoral life and regarded as in general unsuitable for agriculture, perhaps because of its distance from the Nile and the difficulty of irrigation. But that it must have been cultivated to some extent appears from Nu 11 5. The LXX. renders Gn 45 10 Γέσημ 'Αραβίας, intimating that G. was located in the nomos (political division) Arabia; and names Heropolis (Ἡρώων πόλις, Gn 46 28) ostensibly as its capital. The site of this city has been identified as the modern Tell-Mashkūta in the Wādy Tumilat, and excavated by Naville (The Store City of Pithom, 1888), but, according to the geographer Ptolemaeus, the nomos Arabia had Phacussa for its capital. This would identify G. with Kešem (Egyptian, Pa Sept—'home of [the god] Sept'), modern Seft-Henna, which is somewhat NW. of Pithom. Steindorff's suggestion in PRE<sup>3</sup>, art. Gosen, that the capital of the nomos may have been changed from one city to the other, as was frequently the case in the subdivisions of Egypt may be the solution of the difficulty. G. therefore, as a district was undoubtedly in the E. portion of Egypt, and N. of the southern point of the Delta. 2. A district in the Negeb and the Shephelah (Jos 10 41, 11 16); perhaps named from No. 3 following. 3. A city in Judah (Jos 15 51). Site unknown.

GOSPEL, GOSPELS. I. GOSPEL (εὐαγγέλιον, 'good tidings'; AS, god-spell; OHG, gotspel = 'God-story'): The N T term for the contents of the message given by Jesus Christ to the world.

1. Usage of the Term. In the statements which Matthew gives of Jesus' early preaching in Galilee (4 23, 9 35), and in the record which he gives of Jesus' prediction of the future proclamation of his message (24 14), the phrase 'gospel of the kingdom' shows that the term is to be understood in its primary meaning of 'good tidings' (as in the RV of Ro 10 16 and Rev 14 6). The Matthew phrase is an elaboration of the simple term 'gospel' which Mark has in the title of his narrative (1 1), and in his record of Jesus' initiatory preaching (1 14 f.) and of His later teaching (8 35, 10 29, 13 10, 14 9). This term, when used by Mark in connection with the primitive idea of κηρύσσειν (1 14 f., 13 10, 14 9), is undoubtedly intended to be understood in its primary sense, as by Matthew; but when used in such connections as in 1 1, 8 35, 10 29 it is presented in its more technical meaning of a 'formulated message.' In this Mark shows, as he does elsewhere (e.g., 1 4), a tendency to introduce into his narrative, primitive tho it is, phraseology borrowed from the developed thought of the Apostolic preaching. It is in this technical sense that the term is to be understood in Peter's council speech (Ac 15 7), and in Paul's farewell address at Miletus (20 24)—the only instances in which Lk uses the word in either of his writings. For it he substitutes in his Gospel the cognate verb (εὐαγγελίἔσθαι, 'to announce good news'), using it mostly in connections where to his mind the primary idea of heralding the good news is present (e.g., 3 18, 4 18, 7 22; cf. Mt ||). Such connections are also clear in certain Acts passages (e.g., 8 12, 25). At the same time, when the verb is used in connection with objective truths, or distinctive messages, there is an evident technical meaning, which is most apparent in Ac, where it seems to represent the formulated Apostolic preaching (e.g., 5 42, 11 20, 14 15, 17 18). It is quite natural, therefore, that in the Epistles both noun and verb should appear almost constantly in their technical meanings (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 1 16, 15 16; I Co 9 23; II Co 9 13, 11 4; Gal 1 6 f., 2 5, 7, 14; Col 1 5, 23; II Th 1 8; II Ti 1 8; I Pe 4 17; [εὐαγγελίζεσθαι], Ro 1 15; I Co 9 16, 18; Gal 1, 16, 23; I P 4 6), and that there should be meanings developed beyond this, as (a) of the distinctively Pauline gospel (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 2 16, 16 25; II Co 4 3; Gal 1 11, 2 2, 7; I Th 1 5; II Th 2 14; I Ti 1 11; II Ti 2 8; [εὐαγγελίζεσθαι], I Co 15 1 f.; Gal 1 8 f., 11—which throw light on the peculiarly Pauline meaning to be given to such passages as Gal 2 5, 14; Eph 1 13, 3 6, 8, 6 19; Ph 1 27; Col 1 23); (b) of the general gospel, in the administrative sense of the dispensation, or the service characteristic of gospel times (e.g. [εὐαγγέλιον], Ro 1 1, 9; I Co 9 12, 14; Ph 1 5, 7, 12, 16; Phm ver. 13); (c) of the gospel in a written form ([εὐαγγέλιον], Rev 14 6). The solitary passage I Th 3 6 shows how generally in the N T the early literary usage of the word had disappeared.

The foregoing induction of the usage of the term 'gospel' makes clear the sense in which it is applied to the canonical narratives of the ministry of Jesus, and leads the way to the following consideration of the process by which the message and mission of Jesus came into written form, and the characterization of Jesus which this form presents.

II. GOSPELS.

2. The Process from Oral Tradition to Written Gospels. Behind the written gospel narratives stood the oral tradition of Jesus' life and teachings. This had its origin in the reports which were spread abroad concerning Him, while His ministry was yet in progress, and crystallized into the testimony regarding Him which followed upon that ministry's completion. The formal expression of this testimony was in the Apostolic preaching, the basis of which was the story of Jesus, as culminating in His death and resurrection (cf. Ac 2 22-32, 10 36-41, 13 23-31, 17 18).

Naturally, this oral record of the ministry of Jesus was more or less fragmentary. It did not record all there was to record. It dwelt on certain parts of His life, certain phases of His teaching. This was as true of the formal Apostolic preaching as it was of the informal reminiscences of the disciples. Naturally also, as the gospel generation aged, this oral and fragmentary character of its record was felt to be imperfect, and created the desire to have in more permanent and completed form what it had preserved of the past. As a result, these oral records came to be committed to writing, at first in fragmentary form (cf. Lk 1 1 f.), then as more collected, until there were evolved the gospel narratives, as we have them in the N T (cf. Lk 1 2-4).

3. Literary Character and Purpose of the Gospels.

In all this development, however, the writing followed the form of antiquity, which had no idea of biography as we understand it to-day, but was at most a selection of a few great deeds, or sayings, or discoveries, especially at the close of the life; consequently, when our Gospels came to be written, their form was that of brief memoirs rather than of formal biographies. It can easily be understood, therefore, that this process was at no time strictly historical. The motive of the disciples in their oral reminiscences, of the Apostles in their formal preaching and of the Evangelists in their Gospels was not so much to make a record of the past as to make an impression on the present. Luke's Gospel is the nearest approach to a conscious historical effort, and yet 1 4 shows that it was written for Theophilus as one who had been favorably impressed with the religion of Jesus and whom Luke wished by his writing to strengthen in his impression; (cf. also Jn 20 3 f.). Their motive was primarily evangelistic. In fact, however much their experience of Jesus' personal self may have made them lovingly retain in their memory the things He had said and done, it was on the future rather than the past that they dwelt; for He had left them with the promise of a personal return to earth to consummate His work. For this return they themselves waited with keen expectancy, and against its coming they sought to win the world to a faith in their Lord (cf. I Th 1 9 f.; Ac 17 30 f.). Our Gospels are thus not so much the records of history as they are the impressions of experience. That we have four Gospels, therefore, is not due to repeated efforts to give an accurate narrative of the life and teaching of Jesus, but to the individual desire with each writer to present Jesus Himself through what He had said and done in a way to meet the special evangelistic needs which confronted him individually in his own particular work. Consequently, we are not surprised to find these Gospels differing greatly among themselves. Matthew presents the Master from the view-point of fulfilled prophecy, to appeal to Jewish minds. Mark presents Him from the point of the Apostolic preaching outside of Jewish circles, to meet the Gentile mind. Luke, more nearly than any of the others, presents Him from the point of investigated facts, to influence the mind of a cultured man of rank. John, most of all, presents Him from the point of a meditated experience, to meet the needs of troubled faith. And yet, in spite of these wide differences, there is a necessary community among the Gospels, from the common subject they present—and especially among the first three Gospels, from the fact that they present this subject in a common way, going over the same portion of the Ministry and with the same general outline of events, so that a combined survey of their narratives is necessary in order to secure an understanding of the history (see Jülicher, N T Introduction, Eng. transl., 1904, p. 293; Milligan, N T Documents (1913), p. 132, note). For this reason they are called the Synoptic Gospels.

4. Outline of Composite Narrative. The composite narrative presented by the four Gospels is briefly as follows: Following the introductory material given by Jn, Mt and Lk (Prolog [Jn 1<sup>1-18</sup>]; Genealogies [Mt 1<sup>1-17</sup>; Lk 3<sup>23-38</sup>]; Annunciation and Birth of Baptist and of Jesus [Mt 1<sup>18-25</sup>; Lk 1<sup>5-38</sup>, 67-80, 2<sup>1-20</sup>]; Early Years of Jesus [Mt 2<sup>13-16</sup>, 19-23; Lk 2<sup>39-52</sup>] is a preliminary narrative, consisting of a description of the ministry of the Baptist, culminating in the induction of Jesus into His public ministry, through His Baptism and Temptation (Mk 1<sup>1-13</sup>, and [s]). There then follows a record of Jesus' presence in Judea in the region of the Baptist's work, where there came to Him from the following of the Baptist His first disciples (Jn 1<sup>19-36</sup>). After this is a note of a short visit to Galilee (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>) from which He returns for His first official visit to Jerusalem (2<sup>12-3</sup>, 21). There is then noted His retirement to the region of the Baptist's ministry, where He remains until His departure to Galilee (Jn 3<sup>22-4</sup>, 46). Then follows the record of His ministry in Galilee, beginning with a visit to His home in Nazareth from which place He withdraws to Capernaum (Mt 4<sup>13</sup>), where He formally attaches to Himself a discipleship, and makes the place a center from which His work is carried on (Mk 1<sup>16-34</sup>, and [s]). As far as this work is represented as following any distinctive method it is that of preaching tours through the surrounding country, with a return to the home city. Mk and Lk record such a tour soon after His coming to Capernaum (Mk 1<sup>35-39</sup>, and Lk [s]; probably Mk 1<sup>40-45</sup> and Lk 5<sup>12-16</sup> belong to this tour. It was confined, apparently, to the villages of the immediate neighborhood and was of short duration, being followed by a considerable period of activity in Capernaum itself, which excited increasingly the hostility of the Scribes and Pharisees (Mk 2<sup>1-28</sup> [3<sup>1-6</sup> (?)], 3<sup>7-12</sup>, and [s]). There is given then, in evident preparation for a more extended tour, the formal appointment of the Twelve to their service in His ministry (Mk 3<sup>13-19</sup>, and [s]), with its accompanying discourse (the Sermon on the Mount [Mt 5<sup>1-48</sup>], and Lk [s]). This is followed by one or two selected incidents from the tour (Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>, and Mt [s]), leading up to the incident of the healing of the blind and dumb demoniac on the return to Capernaum (Mk 3<sup>19b-30</sup>, and Mt [s]). This is presented as significant in its arousal of popular enthusiasm to an open acclaim of Jesus as the Messianic Son of David and the meeting of this claim by the Scribes and Pharisees with the counterecharge of Beelzebul (Mt 12<sup>22-24</sup>; Mk 3<sup>22</sup>; Lk 11<sup>14-15</sup>), the outcome of which conflict was a tendency among His hearers to separate into receptive and hostile groups (Mk 3<sup>21-23</sup>, and [s]; Mt 12<sup>23-26</sup>, and Lk [s]; Lk 11<sup>14</sup>, 8<sup>19-21</sup>). There is then given an account of a day of parable teaching by the seaside at Capernaum (Mk 4<sup>1-34</sup>, and [s]), by which method Jesus is represented as having sought to encourage this grouping tendency of His hearers (Mk 4<sup>10-12</sup>, and [s]). Following this is the account of a departure of Jesus and His disciples across the lake, a brief stay in the Gentile region of Gerasa, and a return to further activity at Capernaum and a second visit to Nazareth, where He offended the national pride of the people who attempted to take His life. (Mk 4<sup>35-6</sup>, and [s] [including Lk 4<sup>16-29</sup>]). A third teaching tour is then recorded, which seems to have issued in a sending out of the Twelve on a more extended mission, while Jesus continued His restricted work (Mk 6<sup>6b-12</sup>, and [s]). Upon the return of the Twelve, Jesus, hearing of the death of the Baptist, departed with them across the lake out of Herod's territory where they were followed by the multitude, which He miraculously fed (Mk 6<sup>16-26</sup>, and [s], including Jn 6<sup>1-15</sup>). The miracle having roused the nationalism of the multitude, Jesus is represented as withdrawing into the desert, and then coming out to the people with the spiritual character of His message and mission, the result of which is a general defection of his Galilean following (Jn 6<sup>16-71</sup>). The narrative then brings Jesus to Jerusalem, where a discourse following a Sabbath miracle results in a hostility which threatens His life (Jn ch. 5, 7<sup>14-24</sup>, 8<sup>12-20</sup>). He is next found with His disciples in the regions of Tyre and Sidon, and the Decapolis, through a period of restricted activity (Mk 6<sup>47-54</sup>, 7<sup>24-31</sup>, and [s]), toward the close of which He called forth from His disciples a confession of their belief in His spiritual Messiahship, on the basis of which He made His first announcement to them of His coming Passion, and, in the company of the three with whom He was most intimate, was transfigured (Mk 8<sup>27-30</sup>, and [s]). After the account of a short stay at Capernaum the Synoptic Gospels represent Jesus as having finally departed from Galilee for Jerusalem (Mk 10<sup>1</sup>, and [s]), Lk recording, in connection with the journey, an extended ministry of teaching (chs. 10-18). The Fourth Gospel discloses this ministry, however, as broken up into at least two visits to Jerusalem—the first occurring at the Feast of Tabernacles, on which occasion Jesus delivered a discourse resulting in a murderous attack upon Him causing His retirement from the City

(Jn 7<sup>1-14</sup>, 26-52, 8<sup>21-59</sup>); the second at the Feast of Dedication where a notable miracle occasioned another discourse which resulted in a renewed hostility that compelled His withdrawal from the City (Jn chs. 9 and 10). From this retirement He returns to Bethany, near Jerusalem, on the death of Lazarus, and after raising him withdraws to Ephraim, a city of Judea (Jn 11<sup>1-54</sup>). From that place he comes for His final ministry in Jerusalem (Mk 11<sup>1-14</sup>, and [s]; Jn 11<sup>55-12</sup>, 50), culminating in the Passover with His disciples (Mk 14<sup>12-21</sup>, and [s], including Jn 13<sup>1-20</sup>) followed by His farewell discourse and prayer (Jn 31<sup>1-17</sup>, 26), the Passion in Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>22-26</sup>, and [s]), the Betrayal by Judas (Mk 14<sup>27-30</sup>, and [s], including Jn 18<sup>1-10</sup>), the Trial before the Sanhedrin and Pilate (Mk 14<sup>31-15</sup>, and [s], including Jn 18<sup>12-19</sup>), the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (Mk 15<sup>25-16</sup>, and [s], including Jn 19<sup>16b-20</sup>). There is then given an account of Jesus' appearances to His disciples after His Resurrection, Matthew confining his narrative to those which took place in Galilee (28<sup>16-20</sup>), Luke to those in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (24<sup>13-48</sup>), John notices only his appearance to the disciples in connection with the experience of Thomas (Jn 20<sup>19-29</sup>) and to a portion of them at the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21<sup>1-23</sup>). Mark, his Gospel ending as it does with the 8th verse, giving no account of them. The general narrative is then closed with an account of the Ascension, given alone by Luke (24<sup>44-52</sup>).

The characterization of Jesus presented by this narrative is one of strong and irresistible impressiveness.

Announced by angels and supernaturally born, He comes into the world bearing upon Himself all the marks of the unseen universe, and the little is said of His childhood, and we become really acquainted with Him only as He enters upon His public work, we realize, from such record as is given, that His consciousness of Himself is of one who stands separate from those around Him in His communion with God, that it is this consciousness of His spiritual isolation among men that brings Him to a consciousness of His Divine mission in the world, that it is in this consciousness that He comes to His baptism as the symbol of His public consecration to His work, and that it is to test this consciousness that the Spirit drives Him into the wilderness to His temptation.

It is on this understanding of Himself and His work that He enters upon His public ministry, and it is because of Himself and His work so understood that He challenges at once the ceremonialism of the Pharisees and Scribes. He takes up from the beginning an attitude of judgment with reference to the ceremonial Law—ignoring it when it symbolized and developed separation between man and God and between man and his fellow man, and observing it in full when it symbolized and effected their communion—and at the same time directs His ministry toward the ceremonially unchurched, calling to His discipleship the tax-gatherer, and making clear that it was for the sinner that His ministry of helpfulness was intended. Inevitably this confronts Him with a hostility from the Scribes and Pharisees, and sets in motion two tendencies among His hearers—the one of criticism under the influence of this opposition, the other of sympathy under the power of His personality. To encourage this sympathy, and with the necessary accompaniment of strengthening the criticism, He adopts the parable in His teaching and makes an ever-increasingly clear statement of the personal relationships with Himself which His discipleship demanded.

In such a consciousness of Himself and His work, and in such assertion of them against the materialism around Him, He carries on in Galilee and the surrounding regions His ministry of healing and of revelation of the sin of man and of the love of God. From the beginning, however, this consciousness of Himself and His work makes clear to Him that His ministry must not only involve hostility from the materialism of Judaism, but an inevitable development of his hostility into an open persecution of Himself which can only end in His death.

As His Galilean work comes to its close under His spiritual confronting an aroused national Messianism with the spiritual character of His ministry, this conviction of the outcome of His work becomes increasingly strong, and under its influence He turns His face toward Jerusalem, where must be brought to final issue the conflict between the ceremonialism of the nation and His spiritual mission to the world. There He casts aside all reserve; face to face with His enemies He makes plain His Messianic claims, and shows with unmistakable clearness the national consequence of their rejection, while He gathers closer to Himself His disciples and, as far as it was possible to their unaroused conceptions, prepares them for the result. With the calmness of this great consciousness of all He was in Himself and of all His mission meant for the world, He comes to His Passion and His death. From the beginning He had shown the personal relations to Himself which His discipleship involved. Increasingly He had laid emphasis upon that faith without which that discipleship could not issue in acceptance with God, and now as the end came in His death it was this same personal relationship between Himself and His disciples that gave it all its significance as the only way to that forgiveness of sin and reforming of life which was the object of all He had come to do.

To some conception of His personality and of their personal relation to Himself in their salvation the disciples apparently came during His ministry, more clearly doubtless through the instruction given them by Jesus during the period of His presence with them after the Resurrection, tho it is evident that their final comprehension of it came from that understanding of His redemptive relation to them which gradually resulted from their maturing spiritual experience. This conception of Jesus is what lies before us, then, in these Gospels—the conception of a man among men, possessed of all the qualities of humanity, its frailties of body, its sympathies of heart, its powers of mind, but lacking that one common element of sinfulness, not only in the manifestations of life, but in the consciousness of soul, that marked Him out as separated from them all and gave Him thus the isolated right beyond any mere Messianic meaning to the title 'Son of God.' (For the literary interrelation of the Gospels see THE SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.)

LITERATURE: Generally in the larger N T Introductions will be found in connection with the criticism of the Gospels some reference to the need and growth of Gospel writing (see especially Zahn, N T Introd. [1917] § 48). But a fuller treatment of this process is given in Moffatt's "The Development of N T Literature," in Peake's Commentary on the Bible (1919); also in his Approach to the N T (1921) ch. II. Cf. Wrede, The Origin of the N T. (1909) and Sanday's art. "The Bible," in ERE, pp. 574-6. See also APPROACH TO THE BIBLE, II. M.W.J.

GO TO: An expression, now obsolete, found eleven times in AV. It corresponds to our modern hortatory 'come,' which RV gives instead in Gn 11 3-7, 38 16; Ec 2 1; Ja 4 13, 5 1. In other cases RV omits it as an unnecessary addition (Jg 7 3; II K 5 5; Jer 18 11; Is 5 5).

GOURD. See FOOD, § 3; PALESTINE, § 23.

GOVERNMENT, GOVERNMENTS: the term in Is 9 6 means properly 'princely' or 'royal authority.' On II P 2 10 cf. RV. On I Co 12 28, and for the organization of the early Church, see CHURCH, § 7. For the different forms of government in ancient Israel, see ISRAEL.

GOVERNOR: In the O T the one word that properly means 'governor' is pehāh, used chiefly in the documents of the Persian period (Ezr, Neh, Hag, Mal). It signifies (in the Bible) both the 'satrap,' or 'governor,' of one of the main subdivisions of the Persian Empire (e.g., Ezr 5 3, Tattenai, who was satrap of the region W. of the Euphrates), or the governor of a subdivision of a satrapy (e.g., Judah, of which Nehemiah was pehāh; cf. Neh 5 14). In both cases the appointment was made directly by the king. The functions of the governors of the smaller provinces were administrative and civil rather than military. The word 'Tirshatha' (Ezr 2 63, etc., AV) is a Persian term, the equivalent of pehāh. Other O T terms rendered 'governor' are expressive of leadership, or authority, but are not of technical significance.

In the N T Pilate is called 'governor' of Judaea, Felix and Festus of all Palestine, with their headquarters at Caesarea. The Gr. term is ἡγεμὼν, standing for the Latin procurator, i.e., a governor of a far town, or unruly country, appointed directly by the emperor, and who was only partially subordinate to the Imperial legate of the province, to which his district belonged. Such 'governors' were usually of equestrian rank, Felix, a freedman, being an exception to this rule (see Schürer, I, i, pp. 43-48). Quirinus ('Cyrenius,' Lk 2 2) was an Imperial legate, not a procurator, of the large Province of Syria. On II Co 11 32 see ARETAS. On Ja 3 4 cf. RV. In Gal 4 2 'steward' ('governor' AV) is the overseer of the household.

GOZAN, gō'zan (גֹּזָן): A district on the river Habor in Mesopotamia. After several revolts it was finally reduced to submission by Asshurban of Assyria c. 760 B.C. (Schrader, KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 48). It was one of the provinces of the Assyrian Empire to which the captives of N. Israel were deported in 722 B.C. (II K 17 6, 18 11, 19 12; I Ch 5 26; Is 37 12).

GRACE: The rendering of two Heb. (hēn, חֵן) and two Gr. (χάρις, εὐπρέπεια) words. I. General: In the main, two leading ideas are represented by the Eng. term: (1) The objective idea of 'outward grace,' or 'beauty,' and (2) the subjective idea of 'personal kindness,' or 'favor.' In the O T the former is represented, with two exceptions, in all the passages in which RV retains the term 'grace,' the Heb. being hēn (Ps 45 2, 84 11; Pr 1 9, 3 22, 4 9, 22 11; Zec 4 7, 12 10). In the excepted passages (Ezr 9 8; Pr 3 34) the latter is represented, the Heb. being in Ezr hinnāh, and in Pr hēn. In the passages where AV rendered hēn by 'grace,' RV has substituted 'favor' (Gn 6 8, etc.; Ex 33 12, etc.; Nu 32 5; Jg 6 17; Ru 2 2, 10; I S 1 18, etc.; II S 14 22; Est 2 17; Jer 31 2). In the NT the term 'grace' is abundantly used, both ideas being represented, and the term receiving a large development along the line of the latter. Practically but one Gr. word (χάρις) is employed throughout, the exception being the passage Ja 1 11, where εὐπρέπεια might have been better rendered 'beauty' or 'shapeliness.'

II. Particular: In NT usage we have the objective idea in such passages as Lk 4 22 and Col 4 6. The subjective idea, in general, is found in Lk 2 52 'favor' EVV; Eph 4 29. This idea is enlarged, however, in the direction of emphasizing the undeserved nature of the kindness, or favor, shown (e.g., Lk 1 30), but more specifically, as characterizing the favor shown by God in His redemptive work (e.g., Ro 4 4, 16, where χάρις is contrasted with ὀφειλόμενα, 11 6, where the contrast is with ἐξ ἔργων, and Eph 2 8, where the contrast is with ἐξ ὁμῶν; cf. also II Co 8 9). Naturally, from this Gospel use of the term, we have a further enlargement in the direction of designating the spiritual force exerted by God upon those who are receptive to His work (e.g., Jn 1 16; Ac 11 23; II Co 6 1, 9, 14, 12 9; I Ti 1 14; II Ti 2 1; He 4 16), which is further broadened out to include the special gifts of life by which God renders men capable of His service (e.g., Ro 1 5; Gal 2 9; I Co 1 4, 3 10; Ph 1 7). The combination of these two usages is seen conspicuously in such a passage as I Co 15 10 (cf. also II Co 9 8). So the word is used of the results of this Divine energizing—generally, as representing the state and condition of spiritual life into which its recipients come (e.g., II P 3 18; cf. also Ro 5 2), or, specifically, as designating some particular phase of spiritual life, brought to manifestation in them (e.g., Ac 13 43; II Co 8 1-7, 19). In Col 3 16 the reference may be generally to this state of Christian grace, or, specifically, to that phase of it which might be better rendered 'thankfulness.' (For the use in the NT of χάρις to designate 'thanks' cf. Lk 17 9; I Co 10 30; II Co 9 15.)

Viewed in the light of this special Gospel meaning, grace finds its source in God's love to man. Paul tells the Ephesians in that characteristically soteriological letter that 'God being rich in mercy, because of the great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ,' and then adds, as a brief summary of that statement, 'by grace have ye been saved' (2 4 f.; cf. Jn 3 16; Ro 5 8; II Th 2 16). As to its content, it consists in providing for man a plan of salvation with which it is possible for him to fall in. In this same Epistle the Apostle says, 'By grace have ye been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God' (2 8), in which he characterizes the way in which they have been redeemed as one not based upon their own righteousness, a condition they could never fulfil, but upon the gracious provision of God, made effective, subjectively, by that faith in Christ which it was always possible for them to exercise, if they would (Jn 5 40, 6 37). As to its process, it does no violence to the human spirit, but works upon it, negatively, in devitalizing those impulses and forces which make it easy for the will to move away from God and, positively, in vitalizing those which make it easy for the will to move toward God. 'With fear and trembling,' Paul wrote to the Philippians, 'work out the salvation you have received from God, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do' (2 13; cf. I Co 15 10; He 13 21). Naturally, therefore, when it has been admitted by the receptive soul within itself, its energizing establishes a condition of that soul which most properly is termed a state of grace, and which can be increased in its effectiveness by the soul's own cooperation (II P 3 18), or destroyed by its resistance (II Co 6 1). See also God, § 2. M. W. J.

GRACE, MERCY, AND PEACE. See EPISTLE.

GRACIOUS: This word is the rendering of (1) the Heb. noun hēn, 'grace,' in the construct form, e.g., 'a woman of grace,' 'gracious woman' (Pr 11 16); 'words . . . of grace' (Ec 10 12). (2) Of hānan, in the sense of 'charming,' 'winning' (Jer 22 23 AV; but 'to be pitied' RV, and 'how wilt thou groan' ERV-mg.). (3) Generally of hānan and hannūn, 'gracious,' always of God, to designate His exercise of mercy. (4) Of ṭōbh, 'good' (Hos 14 2 AV; cf. RV). (5) Of χάριτος, Gen. of χάρις (Lk 4 22 AV, but 'of grace' RV). (6) Of χρηστέας, 'serviceable,' 'useful' (I P 2 3). A. C. Z.

GRAIN, GRAINS. See PALESTINE, § 23; AGRICULTURE, §§ 4-6; and FOOD, § 1.

GRAPE, GRAPES, WILD GRAPES. See in general VINES and VINTAGE.

GRASS: The word 'grass' is used in a somewhat comprehensive sense in the EVV. It is the rendering of four Heb. and one Gr. terms. (1) Of deshe' (e.g., Gn 1 11), the 'fresh,' 'tender grass.' (2) Of hātsir, apparently of grass when in full growth (I K 18 5, etc.). (3) Of yereq, the 'green' grass (Nu 22 4). (4) Of 'esebh, which signifies the 'herb' that bears seed, i.e., grain (cf. Gn 1 11, 29), but is used in quite a general sense, including grasses, both those that bear grain and those that are suitable only for fodder, herbs, and vegetables. (5) of χόρτος, which may mean either green grass (Mk 6 39, etc.) or the stalk with the head of grain (cf. Mt 13 26).

GREECE. 1. Natural Features. Ancient Greece was bounded on the N. by Macedonia and Illyria, on the E. by the Ægean Sea, and on the W. by the Ionian Sea. Its greatest length from Mt. Olympus to Cape Matapan was about 250 m., but it varied greatly in width. To this continental Greece must be added many islands in the Ægean and Ionian seas, as well as numerous colonies in Asia Minor, Thrace, the Black Sea region, Sicily, S. Italy, France, and N. Africa, for much of the influence of Greece on the world came through these islands and colonies. The Greeks themselves called their country Hellas—originally a small territory in S. Thessaly—and they spoke of themselves as Hellenes. The name Greeks (Græci) came to us through the Romans, who heard the name Γραικοί in S. Italy, whither it had come from Illyria. See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 6 and 13 under Javan.

2. Influence of the Natural Features on the National Character. G. is so covered by ramifications of mountains that but little of its surface is left for plains and valleys. These mountains are the distinctive features of the inland landscape. The national character was molded in great measure by the mountains. Being mountainous, Greece is also very rocky, and the stones of Greece had a great influence on the national institutions. They not only promoted city life by insuring the safety of the dwellers within the city walls, but, being chiefly marble, they made Greek architecture and sculpture possible. Again, mountains are natural barriers, but since the rivers of Greece were not large enough to serve as means of transit, land traffic between towns and between the land-locked mountain valleys was difficult. Nature herself ordained that Greece should be socially and politically disunited, and it was primarily because of its mountains that Greece never became a united state. But the great extent of the seacoast and the easy accessibility from the sea to any part of the interior counteracted the difficulties of transit by land. The coast-line is deeply indented with bays and inlets, affording safe harbors. Therefore the determining element in Greek geography was, not the mountains, but the sea, which the Greeks thought of as a bridge, or means of passage. All Greek colonies were situated on the sea; intercommunication was by the sea, which was necessary not only for commerce, but for the transmission of ideas and for progress in general. The dwellers in inland cities were conservative, rustic, courageous, full of endurance, sterile of imagination, hostile to innovations, narrow in their sympathies and ideas, tenacious of ancient habits. The dwellers in the sea-towns were progressive, tolerant, active, eager for gain, ready for innovation and revolution, daring at sea, full of imagination, fickle in character, given to pomp and luxury, open to refining influences, delicate in taste and intellectual sympathy.

As the configuration of Greece kept the country disunited and perpetuated separate autonomy, so the smallest town was an autonomous unit. But still the Greeks were united for social, religious, recreative, intellectual, and esthetical purposes. Their national games brought the conservative of the interior into close touch with the radical of the sea-town, and the meeting stimulated the observant faculties, and the vagaries of both sections were thereby modified. Greece was the meeting-place of the nations. Ideas and movements emanating from the Orient passed through Greece, where they were assimilated and then recast in the Greek mold, ere they were passed on to the West.

3. The Greek Mind. The most striking characteristics of the Greek mind—that is, of Hellenism—were: the variety of its aptitudes, its graceful versatility, combined with unique originality, its vivacity and penetrating keenness, its balanced development of diverse faculties, its reason tempered with imagination, sentiment with intelligence, passion with reflection; it was supple, subtle, astute, wily, adaptable, discursive and analytical. The Greek thought with acuteness, and imagined with brilliancy; his mind was incapable of entertaining the vague, the obscure, or the undefined. Yet his conceptions were moderate and within bounds, and hence his gods were not monsters, but anthropomorphic. Greek genius was anthropocentric as opposed to the theocentric nature of Oriental genius. In contrast to the vague symbolism and love of the colossal in the Orient and the realism of Rome, the genius of Greece was essentially idealistic. The Greek was social; he sought out his fellow man, both to receive and to give; he was fond of gossip and facile in conversation; he possessed a great experience of life (seen even in the Epos); he was eminently curious and inquisitive, in the best sense, about the enigmas of the world, and for that reason he propounded all the great problems and inaugurated all the correct methods. The characteristic excellences of Greek literature are plastic neatness of conception, limpidity, transparency, even in abstruse matters, such as metaphysics, and a marvelous restraint ('nothing too much') in conjunction with a self-forgetfulness which contrasts sharply with the more personal and self-conscious element in Roman literature. The Greeks copied nothing slavishly. They did employ models, but they recast them and put upon them the imprint of their own individuality and liberty. In their temperament the Greeks were youthful and gay, tho ever sensitive to the miseries of life. They fixed their thoughts on the ideals of youth and beauty; the poetry of life characterized their writings, yet the Greeks had no monopoly of optimism. Just in proportion to their keen response to the joys of life and their passionate attachment to 'youth and bloom and this delightful world' they were liable to a deep melancholy. No literature contains more pathetic laments over the sorrows of life, the passing of love, the deceitfulness of hope, and the ruthlessness of death.

4. Greece and Christianity. Inestimable have been the services of Greece to Christianity. Greece especially through her colonies in Asia Minor, Magna Grecia, N. Africa, and Gaul, brought the Mediterranean peoples into mutual relations. She educated and civilized the two conquering empires—Macedon and Rome—which unified the world for the Gospel. She supplied the missionaries of the 'new Way' with a common language such as no other religion ever had for its propaganda. Her philosophy, both in its lofty spirituality and idealism and in its arid criticism, prepared the way of the Lord. The Greeks dedicated their matchless genius to Christ, which gave Christianity an immense advantage over Mithraism and the religion of the Great Mother which never won their loyalty. They were the first metaphysicians and philosophers of Christianity. It is not an accident that the N T is written in Greek, and that for over two centuries the language of primitive Christianity was almost everywhere Greek. It was the Hellenized world which most eagerly embraced the new faith. It was in a Greek atmosphere, and largely under the influence of the Greek spirit, that the first and greatest reinterpretation of Christianity (Fourth Gospel) was penned, giving a timelessness to the revelation of Jesus which no change of environment can antiquate, and presenting a view of His personality which so raises Him above the accidents of history that He leads the generations on. Moreover, 'Hellas the nurse of man complete as man' was the most eloquent witness for Jesus' ideal of the wholeness of life with every rational activity, upon which ideal Oriental asceticism encroached from an early date, but toward which modern Christianity is turning again for self-expression.

GREEK LANGUAGE (HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK): 1. Comparative Philology. The introduction of historical method into the study of the Greek language was due primarily to the discovery of Sanskrit by Sir William Jones in 1786. But it was not until Bopp published his Vergleichende Grammatik in 1857 that the full import of the new discovery was seen. Before that time grammar had been based upon abstract theory, and everything that did not conform to the rules laid down was treated as an 'exception.' But when the data were examined in the light of the kindred tongues, it was seen that there was an orderly historical development which can be readily understood even if it can not all be brought under grammatical rules.

Brugmann and Delbrück brought modern knowledge to the history of the subject in the five massive volumes entitled Grundriss der Vergleichenden Grammatik der Indogermanischen Sprachen (1st edition, 1886-1900). The late Albert Thumb, one of the most distinguished workers in this fruitful field, revised and enlarged Brugmann's Griechische Grammatik (1913), a book that every teacher of Greek should know. Giles, Short Manual of Comparative Philology (2d edition, 1910) is the best work for the beginner in this subject. The historical and comparative method of study has made it possible for us to understand and interpret aright the varied uses of case, preposition, voice, mode, and tense.

I. THE KOINÉ.

2. Origin. The age of the dialects ended with the work of Alexander the Great. He carried the Greek language with him in his conquest of Asia and Egypt. As a result Greek was current over the entire eastern Mediterranean world from 330 B.C. to 330 A.D.

3. Name. The term Koiné, 'common,' is now generally accepted as the name for the Greek language of this period. It means the Greek that was common to the whole Mediterranean world, not merely the Greek of the common people. Greek became the lingua franca of the time, the one language besides his native tongue that every one would be likely to know. 'Hellenistic' is sometimes employed, but that word is naturally applied to the speech of those not native Greeks, or Hellenes, whereas the word Koiné is applicable to the speech of both Hellenes and Hellenists alike.

4. Relation to Dialects. The base of the Koiné is the Attic, tho the other dialects color the Attic here and there. The Ionic leaves the strongest mark on the Attic base in forms like σπερῆς and δοτέα, absence of the rough breathing, dropping of μ in verbs like ἰδῶ, while the Doric makes distinct contributions like λαός, νάος, ἀφείωνται (the latter being Arcadian and Ionic also). Northwest Greek furnishes forms like λέλυκαν, τοὺς λέγοντες, τέσσαρες for τέσσαρας. Every country had provincial peculiarities of its own, but none of sufficient amount to become a special dialect. Such differences as existed were in pronunciation rather than in anything else. There was one Koiné everywhere (cf. Thumb, Die Griechische Sprache im Zeitalter des Hellenismus, p. 200).

5. Vernacular Koiné. There is always a difference between the vernacular and the literary style. We know from the remains of the vernacular Attic preserved in literature and especially in inscriptions that it differed much from the literary Attic. (Meisterhans-Schwyzer, Grammatik der Attischen Inschriften, 3 Aufl. 1900.) The vernacular may be written as well as spoken, and there are many specimens of it in Aristophanes. The vernacular Koiné grew directly out of the vernacular Attic, and the modern Greek vernacular continues the history down to the present day. (Thumb-Angus, Handbook of the Modern Greek Vernacular, 1912.)

6. Literary Koiné. The literary Koiné is something of a compromise between the older literary style and the contemporary vernacular. It is found chiefly in the works of Polybius, Plutarch, Philo, Diodorus, and Josephus, the latter being rather a self-conscious example. Xenophon and Aristotle exhibit the later Attic on its way toward the Koiné.

7. Atticism. There were some writers like Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Dio Chrysostom who disdained to write the literary Koiné, and consciously imitated the literary Attic. But this was too artificial to last, and the Atticizing grammarians, Moeris and Phrynichus, labored in vain.

8. The Inscriptions. The inscriptions furnish invaluable instances of the Koiné idiom in various parts of the Greco-Roman world. They show examples of both the vernacular and the literary Koiné, the decrees being usually in the literary style. Many of the inscriptions are in a formal and stilted phraseology, but they have the distinct advantage for our study of being widespread in both place and date. Besides Boeckh's Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, there are numerous handbooks, like that of Hicks and Hill, A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions, revised edition, 1901.

9. The Papyri and Ostraca. The papyrus plant in Egypt was a common source for making paper for writing. The material was very brittle and perishable, tho numerous specimens have come to light in Herculaneum, preserved under the ashes from the volcano, as shown by Crönert, Memoria Græca Herculaneensis (1903). But the rubbish heaps of Egypt, covered by ages of sand from the desert, have preserved papyri in amazing quantities. Some collections of the papyri have been known for a long time, like the Turin Papyri (1826-27); but it was not until Grenfell and Hunt, Flinders-Petrie, Mahaffy, and others began to publish the results of their discoveries at Hibeh, Fayūm, Oxyrhynchus, Tebtunis, and elsewhere in Egypt, that the full significance of the new discoveries began to be appreciated. Almost every year since 1898 has seen one or more volumes published out of the great collections of papyri which have been gathered. The bulk of these writings show the vernacular Koiné of Egypt. Among them one finds love letters, marriage contracts, divorce papers, wills, deeds, receipts, business correspondence, anything and everything that made up the life of the people. Here is the real vernacular Koiné, the language of life. There is great variety in the culture seen in these scraps of paper. Some of the writers are quite ignorant and make many crass blunders in spelling, as the result of careless pronunciation, or of tendencies like itacism which blended oi, ei, u, η, ι into the one sound of ι. Hence one is likely to see any one of these forms anywhere. Prof. W. H. Davis, of Louisville, Kentucky, has found three thousand words in the papyri not in any Greek lexicon. Small portions of the New Testament in Greek, written as early as the 3d cent. A.D., have been found in the papyri. Excellent handbooks of the Greek papyri are those by Lietzmann, Griechische Papyri, 2 Aufl. (1910), and by Milligan, Greek Papyri (1910), Here and There in the Papyri (1922). There is now a vast and constantly growing literature on the papyri discoveries. For the grammar of the papyri one can be referred to Mayser's Grammatik der Griechischen Papyri. (The first volume, published in 1906, covers Phonology and Accidence only. The second volume is promised soon.)

Scraps of pottery called ostraca, which are found in Egypt and elsewhere, preserve specimens of the vernacular Greek of the non-literary and poorer classes who could not afford the papyri. Of these 1,624 are given in Wilcken's Griechische Ostraka aus Aegypten und Nubien (1889).

There is therefore a wealth of material for presenting the Koiné, and the characteristics of this really great period of the Greek language are now fairly well known. Besides the works of Mayser, Thumb, and Dieterich, a sketch of the Koiné appears in Moulton's Prolegomena (ch. 2), and Robertson's large Grammar of the Greek N T (ch. 3).

II. THE SEPTUAGINT.

10. Relation to the Koiné. There is no 'Biblical' Greek, as the older grammarians spoke of it. There is a Greek Bible, but it is written in the current Koiné, as one would have expected. It is true that the Septuagint is translation Greek, and inevitably shows marks of the Hebrew idiom. The work shows varying degrees of merit, because it was not all done by one man, nor at one time. There are crudities in it, like ἐσσομαι διδόναι, 'I shall give,' To 5 15. But in the main the translation is into the vernacular Koiné of Egypt. Most of the peculiarities of the vernacular Koiné appear in the Septuagint, as can be seen in Thackeray's A Grammar of the O T in Greek (Vol. 1, Introduction, Orthography and Accidence, 1909) and Helbing's Grammatik der Septuaginta (Laut- und Wortlehre, 1907). These two volumes enable one to see the relation between the Septuagint and the Koiné. Swete's Introduction to the O T in Greek (2d ed., 1914) is still exceedingly useful, as his edition of the Septuagint in three volumes (1887-94) is indispensable. The Selections from the Septuagint (1905) by Conybeare and Stock have a grammar that is antiquated in its outlook. The Concordance to the Septuagint by Hatch and Redpath (1897) is very helpful, as is the larger Cambridge edition of the Septuagint. Ottley's Handbook to the Septuagint (1920) is one of the best of the recent monographs.

11. Relation of LXX. to the N. T. The relation between the Septuagint and the Greek of the N T is brought out from the old standpoint by Hatch (Essays in Biblical Greek, 1889), from the transitional standpoint by Kennedy (Sources of N T Greek, 1895), and from the new point of view by Deissmann (Philology of the Greek Bible, 1908) and by Psichari (Essai sur le grec de la Septante, 1908). There is no denying the real influence of the Greek of the Septuagint upon the writers of the N T. Over half the quotations in the N T are from that translation. Luke, who was a Greek, used the Septuagint to such an extent that his own style bears marks of its idioms even when he is not using Semitic sources, like προσέθετο τρίτον πέμψαι (Lk 20 12). After a knowledge of the ancient Greek is obtained, the best equipment for the study of the Greek N T is reading in the papyri and in the Septuagint. Thus one will get the real linguistic atmosphere that reappears in the N T.

III. THE NEW TESTAMENT.

12. Recent Contributions to Study of the Greek of the N T. Deissmann published his Bibelstudien in 1895 and Neue Bibelstudien in 1897. An English translation of these two books in one volume entitled Bible Studies was made by A. Grieve, and published in 1901. Here for the first time was presented definite proof that the Greek of the Bible is the current Koiné, that of the last three centuries B.C. for the Septuagint, of the first century A.D. for the New Testament. There had been anticipations of this view before, especially by Lightfoot in 1863. But it is Deissmann who has proved the point beyond controversy. In 1908 Deissmann produced Licht vom Osten, Das Neue Testament und die Neuentdeckten Texte der Hellenistisch-Römischen Welt, which was translated by Strachan and appeared in 1910 as Light from the Ancient East. By 1923 Deissmann had thoroughly revised this valuable work which appeared in its 'Vierte, völlig neubearbeitete Auflage mit 83 Abbildungen im Text.'

The contribution of Deissmann was mainly in the sphere of lexicography. James Hope Moulton was the first to make detailed application of the new discovery of Deissmann to the grammar of the Greek New Testament. In 1901 he began to publish in The Classical Review and in the Expositor, 'Grammatical Notes from the Papyri' which attracted attention by their freshness and scholarly insight. In the same year appeared Thumb's Die Griechische Sprache im Zeitalter des Hellenismus which enabled New Testament scholars to make use of the new knowledge of the Koiné. In 1906 appeared Moulton's brilliant Prolegomena, Vol. I of A Grammar of N T Greek, which reached the third edition by 1908. Moulton fell a victim to a submarine attack on his return from India in 1917. However he had nearly finished Vol. II (Accidence), and made a beginning on the syntax. Prof. W. F. Howard is editing and continuing his work. Two parts of the second volume have been published (1919-20), and the third part on word formation is now practically ready. The third volume on syntax is still to appear. In 1911 L. Radermacher published his Neutestamentliche Grammatik, with many fresh illustrations from the papyri and later Greek writers. In 1903 the Short Grammar of the Greek N T by A. T. Robertson appeared (sixth edition, 1923). It has also been translated into four foreign languages (Dutch, French, German, Italian). In 1914 Robertson's Grammar of the Greek N T in the Light of Historical Research was published. In 1923 the fourth edition appeared, the third having been thoroughly revised and considerably enlarged (LXXXVI, 1454 pages), with statistical tables by H. Scott. These modern grammars give the Greek of the N T as the current Koiné of the 1st century A.D. In 1921 A. Debrunner published the fifth, carefully revised edition of F. Blass' Grammatik des Neutestamentlichen Griechisch, in which the work of that famous classicist is revised in the light of the papyri without changing the fundamental standpoint. No new English edition of Blass' Grammar of N T Greek (tr. by Thackeray) has appeared since 1905.

13. The 'Hebraistic' Element in N T Greek: (a) The End of the Controversy between Purists and Hebraists. No longer does any scholar hold that the Greek of the New Testament has to be literary Attic. No more can one say it is intensely Hebraistic, except in the Apocalypse of John, which Charles, Revelation of St. John, p. cxiii, holds to be 'absolutely unique': 'While he writes in Greek, he thinks in Hebrew.' It is certain that Moulton, Prolegomena, p. 8, underrated the Hebraisms in the Apocalypse of John, but it is equally clear that Charles overrates them. The explanation of the peculiar phenomena in the Apocalypse lies in the undoubted Hebraisms plus the rough and more or less uncouth vernacular Koiné, as the papyri amply illustrate. But no one claims that the Greek of the New Testament is a peculiar dialect of Greek. In fact, there are many differences of style in the writers, as one would expect. The phrase 'Biblical Greek' now only means the Greek of the Biblical books, as one would speak of the Greek of Plato or of Thucydides. It is only just to say that Winer's Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms (1822. 7 Aufl. by Lünemann, 1867), which was translated by W. F. Moulton (3rd ed., 1882), and by Thayer (1869), has served well the generations before the new discoveries. It is now out of date. The late H. Scott, of Birkenhead, insisted that Buttman's Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachgebrauchs (1859. Translated by Thayer, A Grammar of the New Testament Greek, 1880) is a better grammar than that of Winer. But it also is out of date. Schmiedel began a revision of Winer's work, but has published nothing of it since 1894.

(b) Some Semitic Influence. Deissmann and Moulton at first admitted such influence only in 'translation Greek' from Semitic sources. But this was going too far, as Deissmann in particular soon saw. There is 'translation Greek' in the N T beyond a doubt. We see it in the Hebrew and Aramaic proper names that are transliterated into Greek. The Aramaic words given in Mk like ταλειθ, κορυ in 5:41 are translated also as το κοράσιον, ἔγειρε. It is plain that Jesus usually spoke Aramaic when with those who understood it. The Gospels have translated these Aramaic sources and naturally bear some marks of translation. But Jesus also spoke Greek at times, for Palestine was a bilingual country and people who would not understand Aramaic flocked to hear him from Decapolis, Perea, Tyre and Sidon. In Jerusalem Paul spoke both Greek and Aramaic (Ac 21:37, 40). All the writers of the N T were Jews except Luke. They would naturally read Hebrew and often quote from the Hebrew O T, tho usually from the Septuagint translation. But the constant reading of that intensely Hebraistic translation would influence to some extent the style of those who read it. That is seen particularly in the Gospel of Lk, who, tho a Greek and able to write an introduction to his Gospel in literary Koiné on a level with the introductions of Thucydides and other Greek writers, yet at once reveals the Semitic influence of his source, whether oral or written, for the Infancy Narratives (1:5-2:52). The same thing is true of the early part of Ac, whether we accept or not C. C. Torrey's idea of an original Aramaic document for these chapters. But Lk has occasional Hebraisms in his free composition, due, probably, to constant reading of the Septuagint (Septuagintisms). A distinction must be made between Aramaisms and Hebraisms (see Robertson's Grammar, pp. 162-165).

14. Chiefly Vernacular Koiné. There is a literary element in the N T, as Heinrici has shown, (Der literarische Charakter der neutestamentlichen Schriften, 1908). Luke himself is a man of scholarship (cf. Robertson, Luke the Historian in the Light of Research, 1920), and is familiar with the literary art of his time. Paul is also a man of culture, whether or not an actual student of the University of Tarsus. The Epistle to the He is more like the literary Koiné throughout than any other book in the N T, tho the Epistle to Ja has a certain literary finish. The Fourth Gospel seems in the Prolog to show knowledge of gnostic teaching, tho Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (1922), argues that the book was originally written in Aramaic. But there is no real support for the view of Blass that the N T writers were conscious imitators of the professional rhetoricians with their artificial linguistic devices, (Die Rhythmen der asianischen und römischen Kunstprosa, 1905). The papyri prove conclusively that the New Testament writers as a rule used the vernacular Koiné of the time. It was dignified language, not the language of the street, but the speech of men in dead earnest on the highest of themes. There is eloquence in Paul's Epistles, as in I Co 13 and 15 and Ro 8, but it is not the studied phrasing of Demosthenes or of Lysias, but the rhythm of a soul on fire and in tune with the Infinite God. There is something in the distinction of Deissmann between letters and epistles, the one familiar and free for private use, the other more formal and for public use, Bible Studies, pp. 3-59; Light from the Ancient East, pp. 217-238. But he overdoes the distinction when he insists that even Ro is a letter, not an epistle. It is not too much to say that the Koiné was better suited to be the permanent storehouse of the N T than the ancient Attic or any of the other dialects. Precisely because it was a world speech adapted to people of all races and degrees of culture it is suited for the world to-day. It was written in the language of life and gripped the hearts of men of the first century, as it still holds the heart of the world. (See ch. 4 of Robertson's large Grammar, 'The Place of the N T in the Koiné.')

15. Peculiarities of N T Greek. (a) Individual Peculiarities. It is not necessary to have a special grammar on each of the N T writers, in spite of the good work done by Abbott, Johannine Vocabulary, (1905); Johannine Grammar (1906), which reflects little of the new learning, but shows much careful research. Nägeli has begun a study of Paul's vocabulary, Der Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus (1905), and J. Weiss has a keen discussion in Beiträge zur paulinischen Rhetorik (1897); Vogel also has a good treatment of Luke's style in his Zur Charakteristik des Lukas nach Sprache und Stil (1899), while Cadbury's Style and Literary Method of Luke (1920) concerns mainly his vocabulary as bearing on his use of medical terms. But each writer does have his own style, as is true of any group of great writers upon any great theme. They all wrote the language of life. Some were men of the schools, and others were ἀγράμματοι καὶ ἰδιῶται, 'unlearned and ignorant' (Ac 4 13).

(b) Latinisms. It is natural that some Latin words should appear in the New Testament, such as proper names, military terms, court procedure, names of officials, and designations of money. There are more of them in the Gospel of Mark than elsewhere, tho not an excessive number there. This book is sometimes called the Roman Gospel. There are a few Latin idioms that reappear in the New Testament, as in the Koiné (see Robertson's Grammar, p. 109).

(c) Christian Contribution. It was once thought that Christianity called for the invention of a vast number of new words to express the new message. We now know, thanks to the papyri, the inscriptions, and a fuller knowledge of current Greek writings, that this is not true. As a rule, the teachers of the Gospel employed the language of their day, but charged the words with new meanings. Paul and other early Christians took words like κύριος, σωτήρ, υἱὸς θεοῦ, used in flattery in the emperor cult, and boldly applied them to Jesus (See Wendland, Hellenistisch-römische Kultur (3 Aufl., 1912). There are only fifty Greek words in the New Testament not yet found elsewhere. That number will probably be much reduced. But later Christian writers enriched the Greek vocabulary, especially in compounds and new meanings, as one sees in Sophocles' Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Period (1888), and Goodspeed's Index Patristicus (1907), and his Index Apologeticus (1912).

16. Need of a New Lexicon. The needs of students have still to be supplied in some respects by the Thayer-Grimm Greek-English Lexicon of the N T (second edition, 1890), which has none of the new lexical help from papyri and inscriptions. Souter's Pocket Lexicon of the Greek N T (1916) is a handy statement of the results of modern research.<sup>1</sup> Abbott-Smith's Manual Greek Lexicon of the N T (1922) is much fuller and makes careful use of the Septuagint, as well as of the papyri and inscriptions. There is great help to be found in Moulton and Milligan's Vocabulary of the Greek N T Illustrated from the Papyri and other Non-literary Sources of which five parts (1914, 1915, 1919, 1920, 1924) have appeared. Cremer's Biblisch-theologisches Wörterbuch was revised by Kögel (10 Aufl., 1912), but without any great change in standpoint. There are also recent lexicons in German by Preuschen (1910), and by Ebeling (1913). Preuschen's work is characterized by Deissmann as 'a regrettable backward step,' but the inclusion of the primitive Christian literature makes it useful in that direction.

The vast and growing literature of the subject has been sufficiently presented in the body of this article.

IV. SPECIAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE KOINÉ.

17. Nouns. The dual number has disappeared entirely in both nouns and verbs. There are still five distinct case endings, while modern Greek has only three, but the vocative has already been largely displaced by the nominative, while the preponderance of the dative case is due entirely to the excessive use of the preposition ἐν. The use of the accusative has increased. εἰς is found for ἐν, as in Jn 1 18, and we often find πρὸς σε for σοι. The great extension in the use of the genitive absolute is a noteworthy feature. In the papyri it is often used for a series of statements covering several lines, and it occurs in the N T where in classical Greek there would be assimilation to a noun or pronoun in another part of the sentence, as in Mt 8 1, 9 18.

18. Pronouns. Personal pronouns are used in abundance, as in the colloquial style of all languages, and therefore lose something of their emphasis. The special pronoun of the third person οὗ, οἱ, ἐ, plural οὗτοι, is not used at all. The reflexive αὐτοῦ, is used frequently in the plural for the first and second persons as well as the third, and in the accusative plural sometimes stands for the reciprocal ἀλλήλους, I Co 6 7; Col 3 18. The indefinite relative ὅστις appears only in the nominative case and the accusative neuter, except for the phrase ὅς ἐστις, but in these forms is frequently used for the simple relative ὅς; Mt 7 26; Lk 2 4; Ac 8 6, 1210; I Jn 1 2. The dual interrogative πότερος has disappeared with other duals, and τίς is used in its stead, Mk 2 9.

19. Adjectives. In the adjective also the distinction between duality and plurality has largely disappeared, i.e., in comparisons the comparative and superlative forms have not both maintained themselves, and it is largely the superlative that is lost. The careful footnotes in the R V to such passages as Mt. 18 1 and I Co 13 13 are a work of supererogation. There are still examples of the superlative in its absolute sense, corresponding to the English 'very.'

20. Verb. The process of assimilation had been going on in the verb. The μ verbs were passing over gradually into the ω class, a process which has been completed in modern Greek. We find for ἵστημι two ω forms, that in -αω and a new formation in -αω. Instead of δύναμαι, δύνασαι, etc., there often appears δύνομαι, δύνη. In the compounds of ἵημι we have many cases of the ω forms. And there are sporadic occurrences in many other of the μ verbs. With the second aorist we find increasingly the α, ε endings which are proper to the first aorist. The optative mode had always been a luxury, little used in the vernacular, and entirely gone in modern Greek. In the N T it occurs 67 times, but 59 of these occurrences are in two writers, Luke and Paul. The disuse is more marked in the N T than in the Sept. The so called periphrastic tenses, made up of a participle and the present and imperfect forms of εἶμι, are largely used. In the syntax of the verb perhaps the most striking thing is the development in the use of ἵνα, which is no longer confined to purpose clauses, but is used with great frequency to introduce substantive clauses giving the content of a preceding statement, where in classical Greek there would have been an infinitive. A good illustration is Jn 17 3.

21. Prepositions. More and more it came to be felt that prepositions were needed in addition to the case forms in order to make the meaning clear. But there was another tendency—to use each preposition with a fewer number of cases. μετά, πρός and ἐν are not found with the dative in the N T, and πρός is found rarely with anything but the accusative. ἐν is the only preposition which is still thoroughly at home with all the cases.

22. Particles and Connectives. The great wealth of particles which is so characteristic of Attic Greek has been largely lost. The use of paratactic instead of hypotactic construction, so characteristic of the N T, was formerly thought to be a Hebraism. Now it is recognized as merely the loose putting together of ideas which is common to the vernacular of all languages. For the use of the negative a fair working rule is that οὐ is used with the indicative and μή with all other parts of the verb; tho οὐ is found with the participle 16 times in the N T.

GREEK RELIGION. 1. General Characteristics. Greek Religion was the expression, esthetically, morally, and intellectually, of a gifted race, and, like themselves, a fusion of Nordic, Aryan, and Mediterranean cultures. It was marked by freedom from tradition; the absence of sacerdotalism, fanaticism, and proselytism; by fluidity of dogma; an immense variety of cults, due to local worships and to the failure of the Greeks to attain nationalism, and yet bearing a certain common Hellenic character; by a closer association with art than any other religion ever secured. It abounded in etiological myths, and by means of allegorization, it displayed an extraordinary power of adaptation. It moved between the poles of anthropomorphic polytheism—the strongest religious bias of the Greeks, which made their religion rich in humanized personalities—and a monistic pantheism, which always fascinated Greek thought. It was on the whole a bright religion, Apollo, the ever-youthful and shining one, being, perhaps, its characteristic divinity. The Greeks were never a ghost-ridden people, like the neighboring Semites and Romans, until they fell under the spell of Oriental polydæmonism in the Graeco-Roman period. Their religious history extends over a period of two thousand years, during which it passed, without violent cataclisms, through an evolution in consonance with the education and refinement of the Greek spirit. This evolution may be thus sketched:
